ACT I

SCENE I.—Lady Sneerwell's House.

Discovered Lady SNEERWELL, at the dressing-table, SNAKE drinking chocolate.

Lady S. The paragraphs, you say, Mr. Snake, whence they inserted?

Snake. They were, madam; and as I copied them myself in a feigned hand, there can be no suspicion whence they came.

Lady S. Did you circulate the report of Lady Brittle's intrigue with Captain Boastall?

Snake. That's in as fine a train as your ladyship could wish. In the common course of things, I think it must reach Mrs. Clackitt's ears within four-and-twenty hours; and then, you know, the business is as good as done.

Lady S. Why, truly, Mrs. Clackitt has a very pretty talent, and a great deal of industry.

Snake. True, madam, and has been tolerably successful in her day. To my knowledge she has been the cause of six matches being broken off, and three sons being disinherited; of four forced elopements, as many close confinements, nine separate maintenances, and two divorces. Nay, I have more than once traced her causing a tête-à-tête in the Town and Country Magazine, when the parties, perhaps, had never seen each other's faces before in the course of their lives.

Lady S. She certainly has talents, but her manner is gross.

Snake. 'Tis very true. — She generally designs well, has a free tongue and a bold invention: but her colouring is too dark, and her outlines often extravagant. She wants that delicacy of tint and mellowness of sneer, which distinguish your ladyship's scandal.

Lady S. Ah! you are partial, Snake.

Snake. Not in the least — everybody allows that Lady Sneerwell can do more with a word or a look than many can do with the most laboured detail, even when they happen to have a little truth on their side to support it.

Lady S. Yes, my dear Snake; and I am no hypocrite to deny the satisfaction I reap from the success of my efforts. Wounded myself in the early part of my life by the envenomed tongue of slander, I confess I have since known no pleasure equal to the reducing others to the level of my own reputation.

Snake. Nothing can be more natural. But, Lady Sneerwell, there is one affair in which you have lately employed me, wherein, I confess, I am at loss to guess your motives.

Lady S. I conceive you mean with respect to my neighbour, Sir Peter Teazle, and his family.

Snake. I do. Here are two young men, to whom Sir Peter has acted as a kind of guardian since their father's death; the eldest possessing the most amiable character, and universally well spoken of — the youngest, the most dissipated and extravagant young fellow in the kingdom, without friends or character: the former an avowed admirer of your ladyship's, and apparently your favourite: the latter attached to Maria, Sir Peter's ward, and confessedly beloved by her. Now, on the face of these circumstances, it is utterly unaccountable to me, why you, the widow of a city knight, with a good jointure, should not close with the passion of a man of such character and expectations as Mr. Surface; and more so why you should be so uncommonly earnest to destroy the mutual attachment subsisting between his brother Charles and Maria.

Lady S. Then at once to unravel this mystery, I must inform you, that love has no share whatever in the intercourse between Mr. Surface and me.

Snake. No!

Lady S. His real attachment is to Maria, or her fortune; but finding in his brother a favoured rival, he has been obliged to mask his pretensions, and profit by my assistance.

Snake. Yet still I am more puzzled why you should interest yourself in his success.

Lady S. Heavens! how dull you are! Cannot you surmise the weakness which I hitherto, through shame, have concealed even from you? Must I confess, that Charles, that libertine, that extravagant that bankrupt in fortune and reputation, that he it is for whom I'm thus anxious and malicious, and to gain whom I would sacrifice every thing?

Snake. Now, indeed, your conduct appears consistent : but how came you and Mr. Surface so confidential?

Lady S. For our mutual interest. I have found him out a long time since. I know him to be artful, selfish, and malicious—in short, a sentimental knave; while, with Sir Peter, and indeed with all his acquaintance, he passes for a youthful miracle of prudence, good sense, and benevolence.

Snake. Yes : yet Sir Peter vows he has not his equal in England—and above all, he praises him as a man of sentiment.

Lady S. True—and with the assistance of his sentiment and hypocrisy, he has brought him entirely into his interest with regard to Maria; while poor Charles has no friend in the house, though, I fear, he has a powerful one in Maria's heart, against whom we must direct our schemes.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Surface.

Lady S. Show him up. [Exit Servant.] He generally calls about this time. I don't wonder at people giving him to me for a lover.

Enter JOSEPH SURFACE.

Joseph S. My dear Lady Sneerwell, how do you do to-day? Mr. Snake, your most obedient.

Lady S. Snake has just been rallying me on our mutual attachment; but I have informed him of our real views. You know how useful he has been to us, and, believe me, the confidence is not ill placed.

Joseph S. Madam, it is impossible for me to suspect a man of Mr. Snake's sensibility and discernment.

Lady S. Well, well, no compliments now; but tell me when you saw your mistress, Maria—or, what is more material to me, your brother.

Joseph S. I have not seen either since I left you; but I can inform you that they never meet. Some of your stories have taken a good effect on Maria.

Lady S. Ah! my dear Snake! the merit of this belongs to you: but do your brother's distresses increase?

Joseph S. Every hour. I am told he has had another execution in the house yesterday. In short, his dissipation and extravagance exceed anything I have ever heard of.

Lady S. Poor Charles!

Joseph S. True, madam; notwithstanding his vices, one cannot help feeling for him. Poor Charles! I'm sure I wish it were in my power to be of any essential service to him; for the man who does not feel for the distresses of a friend, even though merited by his own misconduct, deserves—

Lady S. O lud! you are going to be moral, and forget that you are among friends.

Joseph S. Egad, that's true!—I'll keep that sentiment till I see Sir Peter;—however, it is certainly a charity to rescue Maria from such a libertine, who, if he is to be reclaimed, can be so only by one of your ladyship's superior accomplishments and understanding.

Snake. I believe, Lady Sneerwell, here's company coming; I'll go and copy the letter I mentioned to you.—Mr. Surface, your most obedient.

Joseph S. Sir, your very devoted. [Exit SNAKE.]
Lady Sneerwell, I am very sorry you have put any further confidence in that fellow.

Lady S. Why so?

Joseph S. I have lately detected him in frequent conference with old Rowley, who was formerly my father's steward, and has never, you know, been a friend of mine.

Lady S. And do you think he would betray us?

Joseph S. Nothing more likely:—take my word for't, Lady Sneerwell, that fellow hasn't virtue enough to be faithful even to his own villany—Ah! Maria!

Enter MARIA.

Lady S. Maria, my dear, how do you do?—What's the matter?

Maria. Oh! there is that disagreeable lover of mine, Sir Benjamin Backbite, has just called at my guardian's, with his odious uncle, Crabtree; so I slipped out, and ran hither to avoid them.

Lady S. Is that all?

Joseph S. If my brother Charles had been of the party, madam, perhaps you would not have been so much alarmed.

Lady S. Nay, now you are severe; for I dare swear the truth of the matter is, Maria heard you were here.—But, my dear, what has Sir Benjamin done, that you should avoid him so?

Maria. Oh, he has done nothing—but 'tis for what he has said: his conversation is a perpetual libel on all his acquaintance.

Joseph S. Ay, and the worst of it is, there is no advantage in not knowing him—for he'll abuse a stranger just as soon as his best friend; and his uncle Crabtree's as bad.

Lady S. Nay, but we should make allowance.—Sir Benjamin is a wit and a poet.

Maria. For my part, I own, madam, wit loses its respect with me, when I see it in company with malice.—What do you think, Mr. Surface?

Joseph S. Certainly, madam; to smile at the jest which plants a thorn in another's breast, is to become a principal in the mischief.

Lady S. Pshaw!—there's no possibility of being witty without a little ill nature: the malice of a good thing is the barb that makes it stick.—What's your opinion, Mr. Surface?

Joseph S. To be sure, madam; that conversation, where the spirit of raillery is suppressed, will ever appear tedious and insipid.

Maria. Well, I'll not debate how far scandal may be allowable; but in a man, I am sure, it is always contemptible. We have pride, envy, rivalryship, and a thousand little motives to depreciate each other. but the male slanderer must have the cowardice of a woman before he can traduce one.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Madam, Mrs. Candour is below, and if your ladyship's at leisure, will leave her carriage.

Lady S. Beg her to walk in.—[Exit Servant.] Now, Maria, however, here is a character to your taste; for though Mrs. Candour is a little talkative, everybody allows her to be the best natured and best sort of woman.

Maria. Yes,—with a very gross affectation of good nature and benevolence, she does more mischief than the direct malice of old Crabtree.

Joseph S. I faith that's true, Lady Sneerwell: whenever I hear the current running against the characters of my friends, I never think them in such danger as when Candour undertakes their defence,

Lady S. Hush!—here she is!—

Enter Mrs. CANDOUR.

Mrs. Can. My dear Lady Sneerwell, how have you been this century?—Mr. Surface, what news do you hear?—though indeed it is no matter, for I think one hears nothing else but scandal.

Joseph S. Just so, indeed, ma'am.

Mrs. C. Oh, Maria! child,—what! is the whole affair off between you and Charles?—his extravagance, I presume—the town talks of nothing else.

Maria. I am very sorry, ma'am, the town has so little to do.

Mrs. C. True, true, child: but there's no stopping people's tongues. I own I was hurt to hear it, as I indeed was to learn, from the same quarter, that your guardian, Sir Peter, and Lady Teazle, have not agreed lately as well as could be wished.

Maria. 'Tis strangely impertinent for people to busy themselves so.

Mrs. C. Very true, child:—but what's to be done?—People will talk—there's no preventing it. Why, it was but yesterday I was told that Miss Gadabout had eloped with Sir Filigree Flirt.—But, Lord! there's no minding what one hears; though, to be sure, I had this from very good authority.

Maria. Such reports are highly scandalous.

Mrs. C. So they are, child—shameful, shameful! But the world is so censorious, no character escapes.—Lord, now, who would have suspected your friend, Miss Prim, of an indiscretion? Yet such is the ill-nature of people, that they say her uncle stopt her last week, just as she was stepping into the York mail with her dancing-master.

Maria. I'll answer for't, there are no grounds for that report.

Mrs. C. Ah, no foundation in the world, I dare swear; no more, probably, than for the story circulated last month, of Mrs. Festino's affair with Colonel Cassino;—though, to be sure, that matter was never rightly cleared up.

Joseph S. The license of invention some people take is monstrous indeed.

Maria. 'Tis so,—but, in my opinion, those who report such things are equally culpable.

Mrs. C. To be sure they are; tale-bearers are as bad as the tale-makers—'tis an old observation, and a very true one: but what's to be done, as I said before? how will you prevent people from talking? To-day, Mrs. Clackitt assured me, Mr. and Mrs. Honeymoon were at last become mere man and wife, like the rest of their acquaintance. She likewise hinted that a certain widow, in the next street, had got rid of her dropsy, and recovered her shape in a most surprising manner. And at the same time, Miss Tattle, who was by, affirmed, that Lord Buffalo had discovered his lady at a house of no extraordinary fame; and that Sir Harry Bouquet and Tom Saunter were to measure swords on a similar provocation.—But, Lord, do you think I would report these things?—No, no! tale-bearers, as I said before, are just as bad as the tale-makers.

Joseph S. Ah! Mrs. Candour, if everybody had your forbearance and good nature!

Mrs. C. I confess, Mr. Surface, I cannot bear to hear people attacked behind their backs; and when ugly circumstances come out against our acquaintance, I own I always love to think the best. By-the-by, I hope 'tis not true that your brother is absolutely ruined?

Joseph S. I am afraid his circumstances are very bad indeed, ma'am.

Mrs. C. Ah! I heard so—but you must tel him to keep up his spirits; everybody almost is in the same way—Lord Spindle, Sir Thomas Splint, and Mr. Nickit—all up, I hear, within this week; so if Charles is undone, he'll find half his acquaintance ruined too, and that, you know, is a consolation.

Joseph S. Doubtless, ma'am—a very great one.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Crabtree and Sir Benjamin Backbite.

[Exit Servant.]

Lady S. So, Maria, you see your lover pursues you; positively you sha'n't escape.

Enter CRABTREE and Sir BENJAMIN BACKBITE.

Crab. Lady Sneerwell, I kiss your hand. Mrs. Candour, I don't believe you are acquainted with my nephew, Sir Benjamin Backbite? Egad! ma'am, he has a pretty wit, and is a pretty poet, too; isn't he, Lady Sneerwell?

Sir B. O fie, uncle!

Crab. Nay, egad, it's true; I back him at a rebus or a charade against the best rhymers in the kingdom.—Has your ladyship heard the epigram he wrote last week on Lady Frizzle's feather catching fire?—Do, Benjamin, repeat it, or the charade you made last night extempore at Mrs. Drowzie's conversazione. Come now;—your first is the name of a fish, your second a great naval commander, and—

Sir B. Uncle, now—pr'ythee—

Crab. I'faith, ma'am, 'twould surprise you to hear how ready he is at these things.

Lady S. I wonder, Sir Benjamin, you never publish anything.

Sir B. To say truth, ma'am, 'tis very vulgar to print; and as my little productions are mostly satires and lampoons on particular people, I find they circulate more by giving copies in confidence to the friends of the parties. However, I have some love elegies, which, when favoured with this lady's smiles, I mean to give the public.

Crab. 'Fore Heaven, ma'am, they'll immortalize you!—you will be handed down to posterity, like Petrarch's Laura, or Waller's Sacharissa.

Sir B. Yes, madam, I think you will like them, when you shall see them on a beautiful quarto page, where a neat rivulet of text shall murmur through a meadow of margin.—'Fore Gad they will be the most elegant things of their kind!

Crab. But, ladies, that's true—have you heard the news!

Mrs. C. What, sir, do you mean the report of—

Crab. No, ma'am, that's not it—Miss Nicely is going to be married to her own footman.

Mrs. C. Impossible!

Crab. Ask Sir Benjamin.

Sir B. 'Tis very true, ma'am; everything is fixed, and the wedding liveries bespoken.

Crab. Yes—and they do say there were very pressing reasons for it.

Lady S. Why, I have heard something of this before.

Mrs. C. It can't be—and I wonder any one should believe such a story, of so prudent a lady as Miss Nicely.

Sir B. O lud! ma'am, that's the very reason 'twas believed at once. She has always been so cautious and so reserved, that everybody was sure there was some reason for it at bottom.

Mrs. C. Why, to be sure, a tale of scandal is as fatal to the credit of a prudent lady of her stamp as a fever is generally to those of the strongest constitutions. But there is a sort of puny, sickly reputation, that is always ailing, yet will outlive the robust characters of a hundred prudes.

Sir B. True, madam,—there are valetudinarians in reputation as well as constitution; who, being conscious of their weak part, avoid the least breath of air, and supply their want of stamina by care and circumspection.

Mrs. C. Well, but this may be all a mistake. You know, Sir Benjamin, very trifling circumstances often give rise to the most injurious tales.

Crab. That they do, I'll be sworn, ma'am.—Did you ever hear how Miss Piper came to lose her lover and her character last summer at Tunbridge?—Sir Benjamin, you remember it?

Sir B. Oh, to be sure!—the most whimsical circumstance.

Lady S. How was it, pray?

Crab. Why, one evening, at Mrs. Ponto's assembly, the conversation happened to turn on the breeding Nova Scotia sheep in this country. Says a young lady in company, I have known instances of it—for Miss Letitia Piper, a first cousin of mine, had a Nova Scotia sheep that produced her twins.—What! cries the lady dowager Dundizy (who you know is as deaf as a post), has Miss Piper had twins?—This mistake, as you may imagine, threw the whole company into a fit of laughter. However, 'twas the next day everywhere reported, and in a few days believed by the whole town, that Miss Letitia Piper had actually been brought to bed of a fine boy and a girl; and in less than a week there were some people who could name the father, and the farm-house where the babies were put to nurse.

Lady S. Strange, indeed!

Crab. Matter of fact, I assure you.—O lud! Mr. Surface, pray is it true that your uncle, Sir Oliver, is coming home?

Joseph S. Not that I know of, indeed, sir.

Crab. He has been in the East Indies a long time. You can scarcely remember him, I believe?—Sad comfort whenever he returns, to hear how your brother has gone on!

Joseph S. Charles has been imprudent, sir, to be sure; but I hope no busy people have already prejudiced Sir Oliver against him. He may reform.

Sir B. To be sure he may: for my part, I never believed him to be so utterly void of principle as people say; and, though he has lost all his friends, I am told nobody is better spoken of by the Jews.

Crab. That's true, egad, nephew. If the Old Jewry was a ward, I believe Charles would be an alderman: no man more popular there. 'fore Gad! I hear he pays as many annuities as the Irish ton-tune; and that, whenever he is sick, they have prayers for the recovery of his health in all the synagogues.

Sir B. Yet no man lives in greater splendour. They tell me, when he entertains his friends he will sit down to dinner with a dozen of his own securities; have a score of tradesmen waiting in the antechamber, and an officer behind every guest's chair.

Joseph S. This may be entertainment to you, gentlemen, but you pay very little regard to the feelings of a brother.

Maria. Their malice is intolerable. Lady Sneerwell, I must wish you a good morning: I'm not very well. [Exit MARIA.]

Mrs. C. O dear! she changes colour very much.

Lady S. Do, Mrs. Candour, follow her: she may want your assistance.

Mrs. C. That I will, with all my soul, ma'am.—Poor dear girl, who knows what her situation may be! [Exit Mrs. CANDOUR.]

Lady S. 'Twas nothing but that she could not bear to hear Charles reflected on, notwithstanding their difference.

Sir B. The young lady's penchant is obvious.

Crab. But Benjamin, you must not give up the pursuit for that: follow her, and put her into good humour. Repeat her some of your own verses. Come, I'll assist you.

Sir B. Mr. Surface, I did not mean to hurt you; but depend on't your brother is utterly undone.

Crab. O lud, aye! undone as ever man was.—Can't raise a guinea!

Sir B. And every thing sold, I'm told, that was moveable.—

Crab. I have seen one that was at his house.—Not a thing left but some empty bottles that were overlooked, and the family pictures, which I believe are framed in the wainscots—

Sir B. And I'm very sorry, also, to hear some bad stories against him.

Crab. Oh! he has done many mean things, that's certain.

Sir B. But, however, as he is your brother—

Crab. We'll tell you all another opportunity.

[Exit Mr. CRABTREE and Sir BENJAMIN.]

Lady S. Ha! ha! 'tis very hard for them to leave a subject they have not quite run down.

Joseph S. And I believe the abuse was no more acceptable to your ladyship than Maria.

Lady S. I doubt her affections are further engaged than we imagine. But the family are to be here this evening, so you may as well dine where you are, and we shall have an opportunity of observing further; in the meantime, I'll go and plot mischief, and you shall study sentiment.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Sir Peter's House.

Enter Sir PETER.

Sir P. When an old bachelor marries a young wife, what is he to expect? 'Tis now six months since Lady Teazle made me the happiest of men—and I have been the most miserable dog ever since. We tift a little going to church, and came to a quarrel before the bells had done ringing. I was more than once nearly choked with gall during the honeymoon, and had lost all comfort in life before my friends had done wishing me joy. Yet I chose with caution—a girl bred wholly in the country, who never knew luxury beyond one silk gown, nor dissipation above the annual gala of a race ball. Yet she now plays her part in all the extravagant fopperies of fashion and the town, with as ready a grace as if she had never seen a bush or a grass-plot out of Grosvenor-square! I am sneered at by all my acquaintance, and paragraphed in the newspapers. She dissipates my fortune, and contradicts all my humours; yet, the worst of it is, I doubt I love her, or I should never bear all this. However, I'll never be weak enough to own it.

Enter ROWLEY.

Rowley. Oh! Sir Peter, your servant: how is it with you, sir?

Sir P. Very bad, master Rowley, very bad. I meet with nothing but crosses and vexations.

Rowley. What can have happened since yesterday?

Sir P. A good question to a married man!

Rowley. Nay, I'm sure, Sir Peter, your lady cannot be the cause of your uneasiness.

Sir P. Why, has anybody told you she was dead?

Rowley. Come, come, Sir Peter, you love her, notwithstanding your tempers don't exactly agree.

Sir P. But the fault is entirely hers, master Rowley. I am, myself, the sweetest tempered man alive, and hate a teasing temper: and so I tell her a hundred times a day.

Rowley. Indeed!

Sir P. Ay! and what is very extraordinary, in all our disputes she is always in the wrong! But Lady Sneerwell, and the set she meets at her house, encourage the perverseness of her disposition. Then, to complete my vexation, Maria, my ward, whom I ought to have the power of a father over, is determined to turn rebel too, and absolutely refuses the man whom I have long resolved on for her husband; meaning, I suppose, to bestow herself on his profligate brother.

Rowley. You know, sir, I have always taken the liberty to differ with you on the subject of these two young gentlemen. I only wish you may not be deceived in your opinion of the elder. For Charles, my life on't! he will retrieve his errors yet. Their worthy father, once my honoured master, was, at his years, nearly as wild a spark; yet, when he died, he did not leave a more benevolent heart to lament his loss.

Sir P. You are wrong, master Rowley. On their father's death, you know, I acted as a kind of guardian to them both, till their uncle Sir Oliver's eastern liberality gave them an early independence: of course, no person could have more opportunities of judging of their hearts, and I was never mistaken in my life. Joseph is indeed a model for the young men of the age. He is a man of sentiment, and acts up to the sentiments he professes; but for the other, take my word for't, if he had any grain of virtue by descent, he has dissipated it with the rest of his inheritance. Ah! my old friend, Sir Oliver, will be deeply mortified when he finds how part of his bounty has been misapplied.

Rowley. I am sorry to find you so violent against the young man, because this may be the most critical period of his fortune. I came hither with news that will surprise you.

Sir P. What! let me hear.

Rowley. Sir Oliver is arrived, and at this moment in town.

Sir P. How! you astonish me! I thought you did not expect him this month.

Rowley. I did not; but his passage has been remarkably quick.

Sir P. Egad, I shall rejoice to see my old friend. 'Tis sixteen years since we met.—We have had many a day together;—but does he still enjoin us not to inform his nephews of his arrival?

Rowley. Most strictly. He means, before it is known, to make some trial of their dispositions.

Sir P. Ah! there needs no art to discover their merits—however, he shall have his way: but, pray, does he know I am married?

Rowley. Yes, and will soon wish you joy.

Sir P. What, as we drink health to a friend in a consumption. Ah! Oliver will laugh at me. We used to rail at matrimony together: but he has been steady to his text. Well, he must be at my house, though!—I'll instantly give orders for his reception. But, master Rowley, don't drop a word that Lady Teazle and I ever disagree.

Rowley. By no means.

Sir P. For I should never be able to stand Noll's jokes; so I'd have him think, Lord forgive me! that we are a very happy couple.

Rowley. I understand you:—but then you must be very careful not to differ while he is in the house with you.

Sir P. Egad, and so we must—and that's impossible. Ah! master Rowley, when an old bachelor marries a young wife, he deserves—no—the crime carries its punishment along with it. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Sir Peter's House.

Sir P. Lady Teazle, Lady Teazle, I'll not bear it!

Lady T. Sir Peter, Sir Peter, you may bear it or not, as you please; but I ought to have my own way in everything; and what's more, I will too. What! though I was educated in the country, I know very well that women of fashion in London are accountable to nobody after they are married.

Sir P. Very well, ma'am, very well;—so a husband is to have no influence, no authority?

Lady T. Authority! No, to be sure—if you wanted authority over me, you should have adopted me, and not married me: I am sure you were old enough.

Sir P. Old enough!—ay—there it is. Well, well, Lady Teazle, though my life may be made unhappy by your temper, I'll not be ruined by your extravagance.

Lady T. My extravagance! I'm sure I'm not more extravagant than a woman of fashion ought to be.

Sir P. No, no, madam, you shall throw away no more sums on such unmeaning luxury. 'Slife! to spend as much to furnish your dressing-room with flowers in winter as would suffice to turn the Pantheon into a green-house, and give a fête champêtre at Christmas.

Lady T. Lord, Sir Peter, am I to blame, because flowers are dear in cold weather! You should find fault with the climate, and not with me. For my part, I'm sure, I wish it was spring all the year round, and that roses grew under our feet!

Sir P. Oons! madam—if you had been born to this, I shouldn't wonder at your talking thus; but you forget what your situation was when I married you.

Lady T. No, no, I don't; 'twas a very disagreeable one, or I should never have married you.

Sir P. Yes, yes, madam, you were then in somewhat a humbler style:—the daughter of a plain country squire. Recollect, Lady Teazle, when I saw you first sitting at your tambour, in a pretty figured linen gown, with a bunch of keys at your side; your hair combed smooth over a roll, and your apartment hung round with fruits in worsted, of your own working.

Lady T. O, yes! I remember it very well, and a curious life I led.—My daily occupation to inspect the dairy, superintend the poultry, make extracts from the family receipt book,—and comb my aunt Deborah's lap-dog.

Sir P. Yes, yes, ma'am, 'twas so indeed.

Lady T. And then, you know, my evening amusements! To draw patterns for ruffles, which I had not materials to make up; to play Pope Joan with the curate; to read a novel to my aunt; or to be stuck down to an old spinet to strum my father to sleep after a fox-chase.

Sir P. I am glad you have so good a memory. Yes, madam, these were the recreations I took you from; but now you must have your coach—vis-à-vis—and three powdered footmen before your chair; and, in the summer, a pair of white cats to draw you to Kensington-gardens. No recollection, I suppose, when you were content to ride double, behind the butler, on a dock'd coach-horse.

Lady T. No—I swear I never did that: I deny the butler and the coach-horse.

Sir P. This, madam, was your situation; and what have I done for you? I have made you a woman of fashion, of fortune, of rank; in short, I have made you my wife.

Lady T. Well, then,—and there is but one thing more you can make me add to the obligation, and that is—

Sir P. My widow, I suppose?

Lady T. Hem! hem!

Sir P. I thank you, madam—but don't flatter yourself; for though your ill conduct may disturb my peace of mind, it shall never break my heart, I promise you: however, I am equally obliged to you for the hint.

Lady T. Then why will you endeavour to make yourself so disagreeable to me, and thwart me in every little elegant expense!

Sir P. 'Slife, madam, I say, had you any of these little elegant expenses when you married me?

Lady P. Lud, Sir Peter! would you have me be out of the fashion!

Sir P. The fashion, indeed! What had you to do with the fashion before you married me?

Lady T. For my part, I should think you would like to have your wife thought a woman of taste.

Sir P. Ay—there again—taste—Zounds! madam, you had no taste when you married me!

Lady T. That's very true, indeed, Sir Peter; and after having married you, I should never pretend to taste again, I allow. But now, Sir Peter, since we have finished our daily jangle, I presume I may go to my engagement at Lady Sneerwell's.

Sir P. Ay, there's another precious circumstance—a charming set of acquaintance you have made there.

Lady T. Nay, Sir Peter, they are all people of rank and fortune, and remarkably tenacious of reputation.

Sir P. Yes, egad, they are tenacious of reputation with a vengeance: for they don't choose anybody should have a character but themselves!—Such a crew! Ah! many a wretch has rid on a hurdle who has done less mischief than these utterers of forged tales, coiners of scandal, and clippers of reputation.

Lady T. What! would you restrain the freedom of speech?

Sir P. Ah! they have made you just as bad as any one of the society.

Lady T. Why, I believe I do bear a part with a tolerable grace.

Sir P. Grace, indeed!

Lady T. But I vow I bear no malice against the people I abuse.—When I say an ill-natured thing, 'as out of pure good-humour; and I take it for granted, they deal exactly in the same manner with me. But, Sir Peter, you know you promised to come to Lady Sneerwell's too.

Sir P. Well, well, I'll call in just to look after my own character.

Lady T. Then indeed you must make haste after me, or you'll be too late. So, good bye to ye. [Exit.]

Sir P. So—I have gain'd much by my intended expostulation: yet, with what a charming air she contradicts everything I say, and how pleasingly she shows her contempt for my authority! Well, though I can't make her love me, there is great satisfaction in quarrelling with her; and I think she never appears to such advantage as when she is doing everything in her power to plague me. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Lady Sneerwell's House.—Company sitting at the back of the stage at Card Tables.

LADY SNEERWELL, MRS. CANDOUR, CRABTREE, SIR BENJAMIN BACKBITT, and JOSEPH SURFACE, discovered; Servants attending with Tea, &c.

Lady S. Nay, positively we will hear it.

Joseph S. Yes, yes, the epigram, by all means.

Sir B. O plague on't uncle! 'tis mere nonsense.

Crab. No, no; 'fore Gad, very clever for an extempore!

Sir B. But, ladies, you should be acquainted with the circumstance. You must know, that one day last week, as Lady Betty Currie was taking the dust in Hyde Park, in a sort of duodecimo phaeton, she desired me to write some verses on her ponies; upon which I took out my pocket-book, and in one moment produced the following:—

Sure never were seen two such beautiful ponies;
Other horses are clowns, but these macaronies:
To give them this title I'm sure is not wrong,
Their legs are so slim, and their tails are so long.

Crab. There, ladies, done in the smack of a whip, and on horseback too.

Joseph S. A very Phæbus, mounted—indeed, Sir Benjamin.

Sir B. O dear, sir! trifles—trifles.

Enter MARIA and Lady TEAZLE.

Mrs. C. I must have a copy.

Lady S. Lady Teazle, I hope we shall see Sir Peter?

Lady T. I believe he'll wait on your ladyship presently.

Lady S. Maria, my dear, you look grave. Come, you shall sit down to piquet with Mr. Surface.

Maria. I take very little pleasure in cards—however, I'll do as your ladyship pleases.

Lady T. I am surprised Mr. Surface should sit down with her; I thought he would have embraced this opportunity of speaking to me, before Sir Peter came. [Aside.]

Mrs. C. Now, I'll die, but you are so scandalous, I'll forswear your society.

Lady T. What's the matter, Mrs. Candour?

Mrs. C. They'll not allow our friend Miss Vermilion to be handsome.

Lady S. O, surely, she is a pretty woman.

Crab. I am very glad you think so, ma'am.

Mrs. C. She has a charming fresh colour.

Lady T. Yes, when it is fresh put on.

Mrs. C. O fie! I'll swear her colour is natural: I have seen it come and go.

Lady T. I dare swear you have, ma'am: it goes off at night, and comes again in the morning.

Mrs. C. Ha! ha! ha! how I hate to hear you talk so! But surely now, her sister is, or was, very handsome.

Crab. Who? Mrs. Evergreen? O Lord! she's six-and-fifty if she's an hour!

Mrs. C. Now positively you wrong her; fifty-two or fifty-three is the utmost—and I don't think she looks more.

Sir B. Ah! there's no judging by her looks, unless one could see her face.

Lady S. Well, well, if Mrs. Evergreen does take some pains to repair the ravages of time, you must allow she effects it with great ingenuity; and surely that's better than the careless manner in which the widow Ochre calks her wrinkles.

Sir B. Nay, now, Lady Sneerwell, you are severe upon the widow. Come, come, 'tis not that she paints so ill—but when she has finished her face, she joins it on so badly to her neck, that she looks like a mended statue, in which the connoisseur may see at once that the head is modern, though the trunk's antique.

Crab. Ha! ha! ha! Well said, nephew!

Mrs. C. Ha! ha! ha! Well, you make me laugh; but I vow I hate you for it. What do you think of Miss Simper?

Sir B. Why she has very pretty teeth.

Lady T. Yes, and on that account, when she is neither speaking or laughing (which very seldom happens), she never absolutely shuts her mouth, but leaves it always on a jar, as it were,—thus.

[Shows her teeth.]

Mrs. C. How can you be so ill-natured?

Lady T. Nay, I allow even that's better than the pains Mrs. Prim takes to conceal her losses in front. She draws her mouth till it positively resembles the aperture of a poor's box, and all her words appear to slide out edgewise, as it were,—thus—How do you do, madam? Yes, madam. [Mimics.]

Lady S. Very well, Lady Teazle; I see you can be a little severe.

Lady T. In defence of a friend it is but justice. But here comes Sir Peter to spoil our pleasantry.

Enter Sir Peter Teazle.

Sir P. Ladies, your most obedient. Mercy on me! here is the whole set! a character dead at every word, I suppose. [Aside.]

Mrs. C. I am rejoiced you are come, Sir Peter. They have been so censorious—they'll allow good qualities to nobody.

Sir P. That must be very distressing to you, indeed, Mrs. Candour.

Mrs. C. Not even good-nature to our friend Mrs. Popsy.

Lady T. What, the fat dowager who was at Mrs. Quadrille's last night?

Mrs. C. Nay, but her bulk is her misfortune; and when she takes such pains to get rid of it, you ought not to reflect on her.

Lady S. That's very true, indeed.

Lady T. Yes, I know she almost lives on acids and small whey; laces herself by pullies; and often, in the hottest noon in summer, you may see her on a little squat pony, with her hair plaited up behind like a drummer's, and puffing round the Ring on a full trot.

Mrs. C. I thank you, Lady Teazle, for defending her.

Sir P. Yes, a good defence, truly!

Mrs. C. But, Sir Benjamin is as censorious as Miss Sallow.

Crab. Yes, and she is a curious being to pretend to be censorious—an awkward gawky, without any one good point under heaven.

Mrs. C. Positively, you shall not be so very severe. Miss Sallow is a near relation of mine by marriage, and as for her person, great allowance is to be made; for, let me tell you, a woman labours under many disadvantages who tries to pass for a girl at six-and-thirty.

Lady S. Though, surely, she is handsome still—and for the weakness in her eyes, considering how much she reads by candlelight, it is not to be wondered at.

Mrs. C. True, and then as to her manner; upon my word, I think it is particularly graceful, considering she never had the least education; for you know her mother was a Welsh milliner, and her father a sugar-baker at Bristol.

Sir B. Ah! you are both of you too good-natured!

Sir P. Yes damned good-natured! This their own relation mercy on me! [Aside.]

Sir B. And Mrs. Candour is of so moral a turn.

Mrs. C. Well, I will never join in ridiculing a friend; and so I constantly tell my cousin Ogle; and you all know what pretensions she has to be critical on beauty.

Crab. O to be sure! she has herself the oddest countenance that ever was seen; 'tis a collection of features from all the different countries of the globe.

Sir B. So she has, indeed—an Irish front—

Crab. Caledonian locks—

Sir B. Dutch nose—

Crab. Austrian lips—

Sir B. Complexion of a Spaniard—

Crab. And teeth à la Chinois.

Sir B. In short, her face resembles a table d'hôte at Spa—where no two guests are of a nation—

Crab. Or a congress at the close of a general war—wherein all the members, even to her eyes, appear to have a different interest, and her nose and chin are the only parties likely to join issue.

Mrs. C. Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. Mercy on my life!—a person they dine with twice a week. [Aside.]

Mrs. C. Nay, but I vow you shall not carry the laugh off so—for, give me leave to say, that Mrs. Ogle—

Sir P. Madam, madam, I beg your pardon—there's no stopping these good gentlemen's tongues. But when I tell you, Mrs. Candour, that the lady they are abusing is a particular friend of mine, I hope you'll not take her part.

Lady S. Ha! ha! ha! Well said, Sir Peter! but you are a cruel creature,—too phlegmatic yourself for a jest, and too peevish to allow wit in others.

Sir P. Ah! madam, true wit is more nearly allied to good-nature than your ladyship is aware of.

Lady T. True, Sir Peter; I believe they are so near akin that they can never be united.

Sir B. Or rather, suppose them man and wife, because one so seldom sees them together.

Lady T. But Sir Peter is such an enemy to scandal, I believe he would have it put down by parliament.

Sir P. 'Fore heaven, madam, if they were to consider the sporting with reputation of as much importance as poaching on manors, and pass an act for the preservation of game, as well as game, I believe many would thank them for the bill.

Lady S. O Lud! Sir Peter: would you deprive us of our privileges?

Sir P. Ay, madam; and then no person should be permitted to kill characters and run down reputations, but qualified old maids and disappointed widows.

Lady S. Go, you monster!

Mrs. C. But, surely, you would not be quite so severe on those who only report what they hear?

Sir P. Yes, madam. I would have law merchant for them too; and in all cases of slander currency, whenever the drawer of the lie was not to be found, the injured parties should have a right to come on any of the indorsers.

[Servant enters and whispers Sir PETER.

Crab. Well, for my part, I believe there never was a scandalous tale without some foundation.

Lady S. Come, ladies, shall we sit down to cards in the next room?

Sir P. [To the Servant.] I'll be with them directly. —I'll get away unperceived. [Apart.

[Exit Servant.

Lady S. Sir Peter, you are not going to leave us?

Sir P. Your ladyship must excuse me; I'm called away by particular business. But I leave my character behind me. [Exit.

Sir B. Well—certainly, Lady Teazle, that lord of yours is a strange being: I could tell you some stories of him would make you laugh heartily, if he were not your husband.

Lady T. O, pray don't mind that;—why don't you?—come, do let's hear them.

SURFACE and MARIA advance.

Joseph S. Maria, I see you have no satisfaction in this society.

Maria. How is it possible I should?—If to raise malicious smiles at the infirmities or misfortunes of those who have never injured us, be the province of wit or humour, Heaven grant me a double portion of dulness!

Joseph S. Yet they appear more ill-natured than they are,—they have no malice at heart.

Maria. Then is their conduct still more contemptible; for, in my opinion, nothing could excuse the intemperance of their tongues, but a natural and uncontrollable bitterness of mind.

Joseph S. But can you, Maria, feel thus for others, and be unkind to me alone?—Is hope to be denied the tenderest passion?

Maria. Why will you distress me by renewing this subject?

Joseph S. Ah, Maria! you would not treat me thus, and oppose your guardian, Sir Peter's will, but that I see that profligate Charles is still a favoured rival.

Maria. Ungenerously urged!—But whatever my sentiments are for that unfortunate young man, be assured I shall not feel more bound to give him up, because his distresses have lost him the regard even of a brother.

Joseph S. Nay, but Maria, do not leave me with a frown: by all that's honest, I swear. Gad's life, here's Lady Teazle!—[Aside.]—You must not—no, you shall not—for, though I have the greatest regard for Lady Teazle—

Maria. Lady Teazle!

Joseph S. Yet, were Sir Peter to suspect—

Enter Lady TEAZLE.

Lady T. What is this, pray? Does he take her for me?—Child, you are wanted in the next room. —[Exit MARIA.]—What is all this, pray?

Joseph S. O, the most unlucky circumstance in nature! Maria has somehow suspected the tender concern I have for your happiness, and threatened to acquaint Sir Peter with her suspicions, and I was just endeavouring to reason with her when you came in.

Lady T. Indeed! but you seemed to adopt a very tender method of reasoning—do you usually argue on your knees?

Joseph S. O, she's a child, and I thought a little bombast.—But, Lady Teazle, when are you to give me your judgment on my library, as you promised?

Lady T. No, no; I begin to think it would be imprudent, and you know I admit you as a lover no farther than fashion requires.

Joseph S. True—a mere platonic cicisbeo—what every London wife is entitled to.

Lady T. Certainly, one must not be out of the fashion. However, I have so many of my country prejudices left, that, though Sir Peter's ill-humour may vex me ever so, it never shall provoke me to—

Joseph S. The only revenge in your power. Well—I applaud your moderation.

Lady T. Go—you are an insinuating wretch. But we shall be missed—let us join the company.

Joseph S. But we had best not return together.

Lady T. Well—don't stay; for Maria sha'n't come to hear any more of your reasoning, I promise you. [Exit LADY TEAZLE.

Joseph S. A curious dilemma, truly, my politics have run me into! I wanted, at first, only to ingratiate myself with Lady Teazle, that she might not be my enemy with Maria; and I have, I don't know how, become her serious lover. Sincerely, I begin to wish I had never made such a point of gaining so very good a character, for it has led me into so many damn'd rogueries, that I doubt I shall be exposed at last. [Exit

SCENE III.—SIR PETER TEAZLE'S.

Enter SIR OLIVER SURFACE and ROWLEY.

Sir O. Ha! ha! ha! So my old friend is married hey?—a young wife out of the country.—Ha! ha! ha! That he should have stood bluff to old bachelor so long, and sink into a husband at last.

Row. But you must not rally him on the subject, Sir Oliver; 'tis a tender point, I assure you, though he has been married only seven months.

Sir O. Then he has been just half a year on the stool of repentance!—Poor Peter!—But you say he has entirely given up Charles,—never sees him, hey?

Row. His prejudice against him is astonishing, and I am sure, greatly increased by a jealousy of him with Lady Teazle, which he has been industriously led into by a scandalous society in the neighbourhood, who have contributed not a little to Charles's ill name. Whereas, the truth is, I believe, if the lady is partial to either of them, his brother is the favourite.

Sir O. Ay, I know there are a set of malicious, prating prudent gossips, both male and female, who murder characters to kill time; and will rob a young fellow of his good name, before he has years to know the value of it.—But I am not to be prejudiced against my nephew by such, I promise you.—No, no,—if Charles has done nothing false or mean, I shall compound for his extravagance.

Row. Then, my life on't, you will reclaim him.—Ab, sir! it gives me new life to find that your heart is not turned against him; and that the son of my good old master has one friend, however, left.

Sir O. What, shall I forget, Master Rowley, when I was at his years myself?—Egad, my brother and I were neither of us very prudent youths; and yet, I believe, you have not seen many better men than your old master was.

Row. Sir, 'tis this reflection gives me assurance that Charles may yet be a credit to his family.—But here comes Sir Peter.

Sir O. Egad, so he does.—Mercy on me!—he's greatly altered—and seems to have a settled married look! One may read husband in his face at this distance!

Enter Sir PETER TEAZLE.

Sir P. Hah! Sir Oliver—my old friend! Welcome to England a thousand times!

Sir O. Thank you—thank you, Sir Peter! and 'faith I am glad to find you well, believe me.

Sir P. Oh! 'tis a long time since we met—fifteen years, I doubt, Sir Oliver, and many a cross accident in the time.

Sir O. Ay, I have had my share.—But, what! I find you are married, hey, my old boy?—Well, well—it can't be helped—and so—I wish you joy with all my heart.

Sir P. Thank you, thank you, Sir Oliver.—Yes, I have entered into—the happy state;—but we'll not talk of that now.

Sir O. True, true, Sir Peter: old friends should not begin on grievances at first meeting—no, no, no.—

Row. Take care, pray sir.

Sir O. Well—so one of my nephews is a wild rogue, I find, hey?

Sir P. Wild!—Ah! my old friend, I grieve for your disappointment there; he's a lost young man, indeed. However, his brother will make you amends; Joseph is, indeed, what a youth should be. Everybody in the world speaks well of him.

Sir O. I am sorry to hear it; he has too good a character to be an honest fellow. Everybody speaks well of him!—Pshaw! then he has bowed as low to knaves and fools as to the honest dignity of genius and virtue.

Sir P. What, Sir Oliver! do you blame him for not making enemies?

Sir O. Yes, if he has merit enough to deserve them.

Sir P. Well, well—you'll be convinced when you know him. 'Tis edification to hear him converse; he professes the noblest sentiments.

Sir O. Oh! plague of his sentiments! If he salutes me with a scrap of morality in his mouth, I shall be sick directly.—But, however, don't mistake me, Sir Peter; I don't mean to defend Charles's errors: but before I form my judgment of either of them, I intend to make a trial of their hearts; and my friend Rowley and I have planned something for the purpose.

Row. And Sir Peter shall own for once he has been mistaken.

Sir P. Oh! my life on Joseph's honour.

Sir O. Well—come, give us a bottle of good wine, and we'll drink the lads' health, and tell you our scheme.

Sir P. Allons then!

Sir O. And don't, Sir Peter, be so severe against your old friend's son. Odds my life I am not sorry that he has run out of the course a little: for my part, I hate to see prudence clinging to the green suckers of youth; 'tis like ivy round a sapling, and spoils the growth of the tree. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Sir PETER TEAZLE'S.

Enter Sir OLIVER SURFACE, Sir PETER TEAZLE, and ROWLEY.

Sir P. Well, then, we will see this fellow first, and have our wine afterwards:—but how is this, master Rowley! I don't see the jet of your scheme.

Row. Why, sir, this Mr. Stanley, whom I was speaking of, is nearly related to them by their mother. He was once a merchant in Dublin, but has been ruined by a series of undeserved misfortunes. He has applied, by letter, since his confinement, both to Mr. Surface and Charles; from the former he has received nothing but evasive promises of future service, while Charles has done all that his extravagance has left him power to do; and he is, at this time, endeavouring to raise a sum of money, part of which, in the midst of his own distresses, I know he intends for the service of poor Stanley.

Sir O. Ah; he is my brother's son!

Sir P. Well, but how is Sir Oliver personally to—

Row. Why, sir, I will inform Charles and his brother, that Stanley has obtained permission to apply personally to his friends, and as they have neither of them ever seen him, let Sir Oliver assume his character, and he will have a fair opportunity of judging, at least, of the benevolence of their dispositions; and believe me, sir, you will find in the youngest brother, one, who, in the midst of folly and dissipation, has still, as our immortal bard expresses it,—“a heart to pity, and a hand, open as day, for melting charity.”

Sir P. Pshaw! What signifies his having an open hand or purse either, when he has nothing left to give? Well, well—make the trial, if you please. But where is the fellow whom you brought for Sir Oliver to examine, relative to Charles's affairs?

Row. Below, waiting his commands, and no one can give him better intelligence. This, Sir Oliver is a friendly Jew, who, to do him justice, has done every thing in his power to bring your nephew to a proper sense of his extravagance.

Sir P. Pray let us have him in.

Row. Desire Mr. Moses to walk up stairs.

Sir P. But, pray, why should you suppose he will speak the truth?

Row. Oh! I have convinced him that he has no chance of recovering certain sums advanced to Charles, but through the bounty of Sir Oliver, who he knows is arrived; so that you may depend on his fidelity to his own interests: I have also another evidence in my power, one Snake, whom I have detected in a matter little short of forgery, and shall shortly produce to remove some of your prejudices, Sir Peter, relative to Charles and Lady Teazle.

Sir P. I have heard too much on that subject.

Row. Here comes the honest Israelite.—

Enter MOSES.

This is Sir Oliver.

Sir O. Sir, I understand you have lately had great dealings with my nephew, Charles.

Moses. Yes, Sir Oliver, I have done all I could for him; but he was ruined before he came to me for assistance.

Sir O. That was unlucky, truly; for you have had no opportunity of showing your talents.

Moses. None at all; I hadn't the pleasure of knowing his distresses till he was some thousands worse than nothing.

Sir O. Unfortunate, indeed!—but I suppose you have done all in your power for him, honest Moses?

Moses. Yes, he knows that;—this very evening I was to have brought him a gentleman from the city, who does not know him, and will, I believe, advance him some money.

Sir P. What!—one, Charles had never money from before?

Moses. Yes—Mr. Premium, of Crutched-friars, formerly a broker.

Sir P. Egad, Sir Oliver, a thought strikes me!—Charles, you say, does not know Mr. Premium?

Moses. Not at all.

Sir P. Now then, Sir Oliver, you may have a better opportunity of satisfying yourself than by an old romancing tale of a poor relation—go with my friend Moses, and represent Premium, and then, I'll answer for it, you'll see your nephew in all his glory.

Sir O. Egad I like this idea better than the other, and I may visit Joseph afterwards as old Stanley.

Sir P. True—so you may.

Row. Well, this is taking Charles rather at a disadvantage, to be sure;—however, Moses, you understand Sir Peter, and will be faithful?

Moses. You may depend upon me; [Looks at his watch.] this is near the time I was to have gone.

Sir O. I'll accompany you as soon as you please, Moses—But hold! I have forgot one thing—how the plague shall I be able to pass for a Jew?

Moses. There's no need—the principal is Christian.

Sir O. Is he? I'm very sorry to hear it. But then again, an't I rather too smartly dressed to look like a money-lender?

Sir P. Not at all; 'twould not be out of character, if you went in your own carriage,—would it, Moses?

Moses. Not in the least.

Sir O. Well—but how must I talk?—there's certainly some cant of usury and mode of treating that I ought to know.

Sir P. O! there's not much to learn. The great point, as I take it, is to be exorbitant enough in your demands—hey, Moses?

Moses. Yes, that's a very great point.

Sir O. I'll answer for't I'll not be wanting in that. I'll ask him eight or ten per cent. on the loan at least.

Moses. If you ask him no more than that, you'll be discovered immediately.

Sir O. Hey!—what the plague!—how much then?

Moses. That depends upon the circumstances. If he appears not very anxious for the supply, you should require only forty or fifty per cent.; but if you find him in great distress, and want the monies very bad, you may ask double.

Sir P. A good honest trade you're learning, Sir Oliver!

Sir O. Truly, I think so—and not unprofitable.

Moses. Then, you know, you hav'n't the monies yourself, but are forced to borrow them for him of a friend.

Sir O. Oh! I borrow it of a friend, do I?

Moses. Yes; and your friend is an unconscionable dog; but you can't help that.

Sir O. My friend an unconscionable dog, is he?

Moses. Yes, and he himself has not the monies by him, but is forced to sell stock at a great loss.

Sir O. He is forced to sell stock at a great loss, is he? Well, that's very kind of him.

Sir P. I'faith, Sir Oliver—Mr. Premium, I mean,—you'll soon be master of the trade.

Sir O. Moses shall give me further instructions as we go together.

Sir P. You will not have much time, for your nephew lives hard by.

Sir O. O! never fear: my tutor appears so able, that though Charles lived in the next street, it must be my own fault if I am not a complete rogue before I turn the corner.

[Exit Sir OLIVER SURFACE and MOSES.]

Sir P. So, now, I think Sir Oliver will be convinced: you are partial, Rowley, and would have prepared Charles for the other plot.

Row. No, upon my word, Sir Peter.

Sir P. Well, go bring me this Snake, and I'll hear what he has to say, presently.—I see Maria, and want to speak with her. [Exit ROWLEY.] I should be glad to be convinced my suspicions of Lady Teazle and Charles were unjust. I have never yet opened my mind on this subject to my friend Joseph—I am determined I will do it—he will give me his opinion sincerely.

Enter MARIA.

So, child, has Mr. Surface returned with you?

Maria. No, sir; he was engaged.

Sir P. Well, Maria, do you not reflect, the more you converse with that uniaible young man, what return his partiality for you deserves?

Maria. Indeed, Sir Peter, your frequent importunity on this subject distresses me extremely—you compel me to declare, that I know no man who has ever paid me a particular attention, whom I would not prefer to Mr. Surface.

Sir P. So—here's perverseness!—No, no, Maria, 'tis Charles only whom you would prefer. 'Tis evident his vices and follies have won your heart.

Maria. This is unkind, sir. You know I have obeyed you in neither seeing nor corresponding with him: I have heard enough to convince me that he is unworthy my regard. Yet I cannot think it culpable, if, while my understanding severely condemns his vices, my heart suggests some pity for his distresses.

Sir P. Well, well, pity him as much as you please; but give your heart and hand to a worthier object.

Maria. Never to his brother!

Sir P. Go—perverse and obstinate! but take care, madam; you have never yet known what the authority of a guardian is: don't compel me to inform you of it.

Maria. I can only say, you shall not have just reason. 'Tis true, by my father's will, I am for a short period bound to regard you as his substitute; but must cease to think you so, when you would compel me to be miserable. [Exit MARIA.]

Sir P. Was ever man so crossed as I am? Every thing conspiring to fret me! I had not been involved in matrimony a fortnight, before her father, a hale and hearty man, died, on purpose, I believe, for the pleasure of plaguing me with the care of his daughter. [Lady TEAZLE sings without.] But here comes my help-mate! She appears in great good humour. How happy I should be if I could tease her into loving me, though but a little!

Enter Lady TEAZLE.

Lady T. Lud! Sir Peter, I hope you haven't been quarrelling with Maria? It is not using me well to be ill-humoured when I am not by.

Sir P. Ah! Lady Teazle, you might have the power to make me good-humoured at all times.

Lady T. I am sure I wish I had; for I want you to be in a charming sweet temper at this moment. Do be good-humoured now, and let me have two hundred pounds, will you?

Sir P. Two hundred pounds! What, an't I to be in a good humour without paying for it? But speak to me thus, and i'faith there's nothing I could refuse you. You shall have it [Gives her notes]; but seal me a bond for the repayment.

Lady T. O no—there—my note of hand will do as well. [Offering her hand.]

Sir P. And you shall no longer reproach me with not giving you an independent settlement. I mean shortly to surprise you:—but shall we always live thus, hey?

Lady T. If you please. I'm sure I don't care how soon we leave off quarrelling, provided you'll own you were tired first.

Sir P. Well—then, let our future contest be, who shall be most obliging.

Lady T. I assure you, Sir Peter, good nature becomes you—you look now as you did before we were married, when you used to walk with me under the elms, and tell me stories of what a gallant you were in your youth, and chuck me under the chin, you would; and ask me if I thought I could love an old fellow, who would deny me nothing—didn't you?

Sir P. Yes, yes, and you were as kind and attentive—

Lady T. Ay, so I was, and would always take your part, when my acquaintance used to abuse you, and turn you into ridicule.

Sir P. Indeed!

Lady T. Ay, and when my cousin Sophy has called you a stiff, peevish old bachelor, and laughed at me for thinking of marrying one who might be my father, I have always defended you, and said, I didn't think you so ugly by any means.

Sir P. Thank you.

Lady T. And I dared say you'd make a very good sort of a husband.

Sir P. And you prophesied right; and we shall now be the happiest couple—

Lady T. And never differ again?

Sir P. No, never!—though at the same time, indeed, my dear Lady Teazle, you must watch your temper very seriously; for in all our little quarrels, my dear, if you recollect, my love, you always begin first.

Lady T. I beg your pardon, my dear Sir Peter: indeed, you always gave the provocation.

Sir P. Now see, my angel! take care—contradicting isn't the way to keep friends.

Lady T. Then don't you begin it, my love!

Sir P. There, now! you—you are going on. You don't perceive, my life, that you are just doing the very thing which you know always makes me angry.

Lady T. Nay, you know if you will be angry without any reason, my dear—

Sir P. There now! you want to quarrel again.

Lady T. No, I am sure I don't:—but if you will be so peevish—

Sir P. There now! who begins first?

Lady T. Why you, to be sure. I said nothing:—but there's no bearing your temper.

Sir P. No, no, madam: the fault's in your own temper.

Lady T. Ay, you are just what my cousin Sophy said you would be.

Sir P. Your cousin Sophy is a forward impertinent gipsy.

Lady T. You are a great bear, I'm sure, to abuse my relations.

Sir P. Now may all the plagues of marriage be doubled on me, if ever I try to be friend with you any more!

Lady T. So much the better.

Sir P. No, no, madam: 'tis evident you never cared a pin for me, and I was a madman to marry you—a pert, rural coquette, that had refused half the honest 'squires in the neighbourhood.

Lady T. And I am sure I was a fool to marry you—an old dangling bachelor, who was single at fifty, only because he never could meet with any one who would have him.

Sir P. Ay, ay, madam; but you were pleased enough to listen to me: you never had such an offer before.

Lady T. No! didn't I refuse Sir Tivy Terrier, who every body said would have been a better match? for his estate is just as good as yours, and he has broke his neck since we have been married.

Sir P. I have done with you, madam! You are an unfeeling, ungrateful—but there's an end of every thing. I believe you capable of every thing that is bad.—Yes, madam, I now believe the reports relative to you and Charles, madam.—Yes, madam, you and Charles are—not without grounds—

Lady T. Take care, Sir Peter! you had better not insinuate any such thing! I'll not be suspected without cause, I promise you.

Sir P. Very well, madam! very well! A separate maintenance as soon as you please. Yes, madam, or a divorce!—I'll make an example of myself for the benefit of all old bachelors.

Lady T. Agreed! agreed!—and now, my dear Sir Peter, we are of a mind once more, we may be the happiest couple—and never differ again, you know—ha! ha! ha! Well, you are going to be in a passion, I see, and I shall only interrupt you—so, bye-bye. [Exit.]

Sir P. Plagues and tortures! Can't I make her angry either! Oh, I am the most miserable fellow! but I'll not bear her presuming to keep her temper: no! she may break my heart, but she sha'n't keep her temper. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Charles Surface's House.

Enter TRIP, Sir OLIVER SURFACE, and MOSES.

Trip. Here, master Moses! if you'll stay a moment, I'll try whether—what's the gentleman's name?

Sir O. Mr. Moses, what is my name?

Moses. Mr. Premium.

Trip. Premium—very well.

[Exit Trip.]

Sir O. To judge by the servants, one wouldn't believe the master was ruined. But what!—sure, this was my brother's house?

Moses. Yes, sir; Mr. Charles bought it of Mr. Joseph, with the furniture, pictures, &c., just as the old gentleman left it. Sir Peter thought it a piece of extravagance in him.

Sir O. In my mind, the other's economy in selling it to him was more reprehensible by half.

Re-enter TRIP.

Trip. My master says you must wait, gentlemen: he has company, and can't speak with you yet.

Sir O. If he knew who it was wanted to see him, perhaps he would not send such a message?

Trip. Yes, yes, sir: he knows you are here—I did not forget little Premium: no, no, no.

Sir O. Very well; and I pray, sir, what may be your name.

Trip. Trip, sir; my name is Trip, at your service.

Sir O. Well, then, Mr. Trip, you have a pleasant sort of place here, I guess?

Trip. Why, yes—here are three or four of us pass our time agreeably enough; but then our wages are sometimes a little in arrear—and not very great either—but fifty pounds a year, and find our own bags and bouquets.

Sir O. Bags and bouquets! halters and bastinades! [Aside.]

Trip. And, a-propos, Moses—have you been able to get me that little bill discounted?

Sir O. Wants to raise money, too!—mercy on me! Has his distresses too, I warrant, like a lord, and affects creditors and duns. [Aside.]

Moses. 'Twas not to be done, indeed, Mr. Trip.

Trip. Good lack, you surprise me! My friend Brush has indorsed it, and I thought when he put his name at the back of a bill 'twas the same as cash.

Moses. No! 'twouldn't do.

Trip. A small sum—but twenty pounds. Hark'ee, Moses, do you think you couldn't get it me by way of annuity?

Sir O. An annuity! ha! ha! a footman raise money by way of annuity! Well done, luxury, egad! [Aside.]

Moses. Well, but you must ensure your place.

Trip. Oh, with all my heart! I'll ensure my place, and my life too, if you please.

Sir O. It's more than I would your neck. [Aside.]

Moses. But is there nothing you could deposit?

Trip. Why, nothing capital of my master's wardrobe has dropped lately; but I could give you a mortgage on some of his winter clothes, with equity of redemption before November—or you shall have the reversion of the French velvet, or a post-obit on the blue and silver: these, I should think, Moses, with a few pair of point ruffles, as a collateral security—Egad, I heard the bell! I believe, gentlemen, I can now introduce you. Don't forget the annuity, little Moses! This way, gentlemen. I'll insure my place, you know.

Sir O. If the man be a shadow of the master, this is the temple of dissipation indeed! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Antique Hall.

CHARLES SURFACE, CARELESS, SIR HARRY, &c., at a table, with wine, &c.

Charles S. 'Fore heaven, 'tis true!—there's the great degeneracy of the age. Many of our acquaintance have taste, spirit, and politeness; but, plague on't, they won't drink wine.

Care. It is so indeed, Charles! they give into all the substantial luxuries of the table, and abstain from nothing but wine and wit. O, certainly society suffers by it intolerably: for now, instead of the social spirit of raillery that used to mantle over a glass of bright Burgundy, their conversation is become just like the Spa water they drink, which has all the pertness and flatulency of Champagne, without its spirit or flavour.

Sir H. But what are they to do who love play better than wine?

Care. True: there's Sir Harry diets himself for gaming, and is now under a hazard regimen.

Charles. Then he'll have the worst of it. What! you wouldn't train a horse for the course by keeping him from corn? For my part, egad! I am never so successful as when I am a little merry: let me throw on a bottle of Champagne, and I never lose.

All. Hey, what?

Charles S. At least, I never feel my losses, which is exactly the same thing.

Care. Ay, that I believe.

Charles S. And then, what man can pretend to be a believer in love, who is an abjurer of wine! 'Tis the test by which the lover knows his own heart. Fill a dozen bumpers to a dozen beauties, and she that floats at the top is the maid that has bewitched you.

Care. Now then, Charles, be honest and give us your real favourite.

Charles S. Why, I have withheld her only in compassion to you. If I toast her, you must give a round of her peers, which is impossible—on earth.

Care. Oh! then we'll find some canonized vestals, or heathen goddesses that will do, I warrant!

Charles S. Here then, bumpers, you rogues! bumpers! Maria! Maria!—

Sir H. Maria who?

Charles S. O damn the surname—'tis too formal to be registered in Love's calendar;—Maria!

All. Maria!

Charles S. But now, Sir Harry, beware, we must have beauty superlative.

Care. Nay, never study, Sir Harry: we'll stand to the toast, though your mistress should want an eye, and you know you have a song will excuse you.

Sir H. Egad, so I have! and I'll give him the song instead of the lady.

SONG.

Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen;

Here's to the widow of fifty;

Here's to the flaunting extravagant quean,

And here's to the housewife that's thrifty.

Chorus. Let the toast pass,—

Drink to the lass,

I'll warrant she'll prove an excuse for the glass.

Here's to the charmer whose dimples we prize;

Now to the maid who has none, sir:

Here's to the girl with a pair of blue eyes,

And here's to the nymph with but one, sir.

Chorus. Let the toast pass, &c.

Here's to the maid with a bosom of snow;

Now to her that's as brown as a berry:

Here's to the wife with a face full of woe,

And now to the damsel that's merry.

Chorus. Let the toast pass, &c.

For let 'em be clumsy, or let 'em be slim,

Young or ancient, I care not a feather;

So fill up your glasses, nay, fill to the brim,
And let us e'en toast them together.

Chorus. Let the toast pass, &c.

All. Bravo! bravo!

Enter TRIP, and whispers CHARLES SURFACE.

Charles S. Gentlemen, you must excuse me a little. Careless, take the chair, will you?

Care. Nay, prithee, Charles, what now? This is one of your peerless beauties, I suppose, has dropt in by chance?

Charles S. No, faith! To tell you the truth, 'tis a Jew and a broker, who are come by appointment.

Care. O damn it! let's have the Jew in.

Sir H. Ay, and the broker too, by all means.

Care. Yes, yes, the Jew and the broker.

Charles S. Egad, with all my heart! Trip, bid the gentlemen walk in—[Exit TRIP—though there's one of them a stranger, I can assure you.

Care. Charles, let us give them some generous Burgundy, and perhaps they'll grow conscientious.

Charles S. O hang 'em, no! wine does but draw forth a man's natural qualities; and to make them drink would only be to whet their knavery.

Enter TRIP, MOSES, and Sir OLIVER SURFACE.

Charles S. So, honest Moses, walk in; walk in, pray, Mr. Premium—that's the gentleman's name, isn't it, Moses?

Moses. Yes, sir.

Charles S. Set chairs, Trip—sit down, Mr. Premium—glasses, Trip—sit down, Moses. Come, Mr. Premium, I'll give you a sentiment; here's Success to usury!—Moses, fill the gentleman a bumper.

Moses. Success to usury!

Care. Right, Moses—usury is prudence and industry, and deserves to succeed.

Sir O. Then—here's all the success it deserves.

Care. No, no, that won't do! Mr. Premium, you have demurred at the toast, and must drink it in a pint bumper.

Sir H. A pint bumper, at least.

Moses. O pray, sir, consider—Mr. Premium's a gentleman.

Care. And therefore loves good wine.

Sir H. Give Moses a quart glass—this is mutiny, and a high contempt for the chair.

Charles S. No hang it, you shan't! Mr. Premium's a stranger.

Care. Plague on 'em then!—if they won't drink, we'll not sit down with them. Come, Harry, the dice are in the next room—Charles, you'll join us when you have finished your business with the gentlemen?

Charles S. I will! I will! [Exeunt all the Gentlemen.] Careless!

Care. [Returning.] Well!

Charles S. Perhaps I may want you.

Care. O, you know I am always ready: word, note, or bond, 'tis all the same to me. [Exit.]

Moses. Sir, this is Mr. Premium, a gentleman of the strictest honour and secrecy; and always performs what he undertakes. Mr. Premium, this is—

Charles S. Pshaw! Have done.—Sir, my friend Moses is a very honest fellow, but a little slow at expression: he'll be an hour giving us our titles. Mr. Premium, the plain state of the matter is this: I am an extravagant young fellow, who want money to borrow—you I take to be a prudent old fellow, who has got money to lend.—I am blockhead enough to give fifty per cent. sooner than not have it; and you, I presume, are rogue enough to take a hundred if you can get it. Now, sir, you see we are acquainted at once, and may proceed to business without farther ceremony.

Sir O. Exceeding frank, upon my word.—I see, sir, you are not a man of many compliments.

Charles S. Oh no, sir, plain dealing in business I always think best.

Sir O. Sir, I like you the better for it—however, you are mistaken in one thing; I have no money to lend, but I believe I could procure some of a friend; but then he's an unconscionable dog; isn't he, Moses? And must sell stock to accommodate you—mustn't he, Moses?

Moses. Yes, indeed! You know I always speak the truth, and scorn to tell a lie!

Charles S. Right. People that speak truth generally do; but these are trifles, Mr. Premium. What! I know money isn't to be bought without paying for't!

Sir O. Well—but what security could you give? You have no land, I suppose?

Charles S. Not a mole-hill, nor a twig, but what's in the bough-pots out of the window!

Sir O. Nor any stock. I presume?

Charles S. Nothing but live stock—and that's only a few pointers and ponies. But pray, Mr. Premium, are you acquainted at all with any of my connexions?

Sir O. Why, to say truth, I am.

Charles S. Then you must know that I have a devilish rich uncle in the East Indies, Sir Oliver Surface, from whom I have the greatest expectations.

Sir O. That you have a wealthy uncle I have heard; but how your expectations will turn out, is more, I believe, than you can tell.

Charles S. O no!—there can be no doubt. They tell me I'm a prodigious favourite, and that he talks of leaving me everything.

Sir O. Indeed! this is the first I've heard of it.

Charles S. Yes, yes, 'tis just so—Moses knows 'tis true, don't you, Moses?

Sir O. Egad, they'll persuade me presently I'm at Bengal. [Aside.]

Charles S. Now I propose, Mr. Premium, if it's agreeable to you, a post-obit on Sir Oliver's life: though at the same time, the old fellow has been so liberal to me, that I give you my word, I should be very sorry to hear that anything had happened to him.

Sir O. Not more than I should, I assure you. But the bond you mention happens to be just the worst security you could offer me—for I might live to a hundred, and never see the principal.

Charles S. O, yes, you would—the moment Sir Oliver dies, you know, you would come on me for the money.

Sir O. Then I believe I should be the most unwelcome dun you ever had in your life.

Charles S. What! I suppose you're afraid that Sir Oliver is too good a life?

Sir O. No, indeed, I am not; though I have heard he is as hale and healthy as any man of his years in Christendom.

Charles S. There again, now you are misinformed. No, no, the climate has hurt him considerably, poor uncle Oliver! Yes, yes, he breaks apace, I'm told—and is so much altered lately, that his nearest relations would not know him!

Sir O. No! Ha! ha! ha! so much altered lately, that his nearest relations would not know him! ha! ha! egad—Ha! ha! ha!

Charles S. Ha! ha!—you're glad to hear that, little Premium?

Sir O. No, no, I'm not.

Charles S. Yes, yes, you are—ha! ha! ha!—You know that tends your chance.

Sir O. But I'm told Sir Oliver is coming over?—nay, some say he is actually arrived?

Charles S. Pshaw! Sure I must know better than you whether he's come or not. No, no; rely on't, he's at this moment at Calcutta—isn't he, Moses?

Moses. O yes, certainly.

Sir O. Very true, as you say, you must know better than I, though I have it from pretty good authority—hav'n't I, Moses?

Moses. Yes, most undoubtedly!

Sir O. But, sir, as I understand you want a few hundreds immediately—is there nothing you could dispose of?

Charles S. How do you mean?

Sir O. For instance, now, I have heard that your father left behind him a great quantity of massy old plate!

Charles S. O lud!—that's gone long ago.—Moses can tell you better than I can.

Sir O. Good luck! all the family race cups and corporation bowls. [Aside.]—Then it was also supposed that his library was one of the most valuable and complete.

Charles S. Yes, yes, so it was—vastly too much so for a private gentleman. For my part, I was always of a communicative disposition, so I thought it a shame to keep so much knowledge to myself.

Sir O. Mercy upon me! Learning that had run in the family like an heirloom! [Aside.]—Pray, what are become of the books?

Charles S. You must inquire of the auctioneer, Master Premium, for I don't believe even Moses can direct you.

Moses. I know nothing of books.

Sir O. So, so, nothing of the family property left, I suppose?

Charles S. Not much indeed; unless you have a mind to the family pictures. I have got a roomfull of ancestors above, and if you have a taste for old paintings, egad, you shall have 'em a bargain.

Sir O. Hey! what the devil! Sure, you wouldnt sell your forefathers, would you?

Charles S. Every man of them to the best bidder.

Sir O. What! your great uncles and aunts?

Charles S. Ay, and my great grandfathers and grandmothers too.

Sir O. Now I give him up. [Aside.]—What the plague, have you no bowels for your own kindred? Odd's life, do you take me for Shylock in the play, that you would raise money of me, on your own flesh and blood?

Charles S. Nay, my little broker, don't be angry: what need you care if you have your money's worth.

Sir O. Well, I'll be the purchaser: I think I can dispose of the family canvass. Oh, I'll never forgive him this! never! [Aside.]

Enter CARELESS.

Care. Come, Charles, what keeps you?

Charles S. I can't come yet: i'faith, we are going to have a sale above stairs; here's little Premium will buy all my ancestors.

Care. O, burn your ancestors!

Charles S. No, he may do that afterwards, if he pleases. Stay, Careless, we want you: egad, you shall be auctioneer; so come along with us.

Care. Oh, have with you, if that's the case, I can handle a hammer as well as a dice-box! Going! going!

Sir O. Oh, the profligates! [Aside.]

Charles S. Come, Moses, you shall be appraiser, if we want one. Gad's life, little Premium, you don't seem to like the business?

Sir O. O yes, I do, vastly. Ha! ha! ha! yes, yes, I think it a rare joke to sell one's family by auction—ha! ha!—O the prodigal! [Aside.]

Charles S. To be sure! when a man wants money, where the plague should he get assistance, if he can't make free with his own relations?

Sir O. I'll never forgive him; never! never! [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Picture Room at Charles's.

Enter CHARLES SURFACE, SIR OLIVER SURFACE, MOSES, and CARELESS.

Charles S. Walk in, gentlemen; pray walk in—here they are, the family of the Surfaces, up to the Conquest.

Sir O. And, in my opinion, a goodly collection.

Charles S. Ay, ay, these are done in the true spirit of portrait painting;—no volontier grace or expression. Not like the works of your modern Raphaels, who give you the strongest resemblance, yet contrive to make your portrait independent of you; so that you may sink the original, and not hurt the picture. No, no; the merit of these is the inveterate likeness—all stiff and awkward as the originals, and like nothing in human nature besides.

Sir O. Ah! we shall never see such figures of men again.

Charles S. I hope not.—Well, you see, Master Premium, what a domestic character I am: here I sit of an evening surrounded by my family.—But, come, get to your pulpit, Mr. Auctioneer; here's an old gouty chair of my grandfather's will answer the purpose.

Care. Ay, ay, this will do.—But, Charles, I hav'n't a hammer; and what's an auctioneer without his hammer?

Charles S. Egad, that's true; what parchment have we here?—O, our genealogy in full. Here, Careless,—you shall have no common bit of mahogany; here's the family tree for you, you rogue,—this shall be your hammer, and now you may knock down my ancestors with their own pedigree.

Sir O. What an unnatural rogue!—an ex post facto parricide! [Aside.]

Care. Yes, yes, here's a list of your generation indeed; faith, Charles, this is the most convenient thing you could have found for the business, for 'twill not only serve as a hammer, but a catalogue into the bargain.—Come, begin—A-going, a-going!

Charles S. Bravo, Careless!—Well, here's my great uncle, Sir Richard Raveline, a marvellous good general in his day, I assure you. He served in all the Duke of Marlborough's wars, and go that cut over his eye at the battle of Malplaquet.—What say you, Mr. Premium?—look at him—there's a hero, not cut out of his features, as your modern-elypt captains are, but enveloped in wig and regimentals, as a general should be.—What do you bid?

Sir O. [Aside to Moses.] Bid him speak.

Moses. Mr. Premium would have you speak.

Charles S. Why, then, he shall have him for ten pounds, and I'm sure that's not dear for a staff-officer.

Sir O. Heaven deliver me! his famous uncle Richard for ten pounds! [Aside.—Very well, sir, I take him at that.

Charles S. Careless, knock down my uncle Richard.—Here, now, is a maiden sister of his, my great aunt Deborah, done by Kneller in his best manner, and esteemed a very formidable likeness.—There she is, you see, a shepherdess feeding her flock.—You shall have her for five pounds ten—the sheep are worth the money.

Sir O. Ah! poor Deborah! a woman who set such a value on herself! [Aside.—Five pounds ten—she's mine.

Charles S. Knock down my aunt Deborah, Careless!—This, now, is a grandfather of my mother's, a learned judge, well known on the western circuit.—What do you rate him at, Moses?

Moses. Four guineas.

Charles S. Four guineas!—Gad's life, you don't bid me the price of his wig.—Mr. Premium, you have more respect for the woolsack; do let us knock his lordship down at fifteen.

Sir O. By all means.

Care Gone!

Charles S. And there are two brothers of his, William and Walter Blunt, Esquires, both members of parliament, and noted speakers; and what's very extraordinary, I believe, this is the first time they were ever bought or sold.

Sir O. That is very extraordinary, indeed! I'll take them at your own price, for the honour of parliament.

Care. Well said, little Premium!—I'll knock them down at forty.

Charles S. Here's a jolly fellow—I don't know what relation, but he was mayor of Norwich: take him at eight pounds.

Sir O. No, no: six will do for the mayor.

Charles S. Come, make it guineas, and I throw out the two aldermen there into the bargain.

Sir O. They're nine.

Charles S. Careless, knock down the mayor and aldermen.—But, plague on't, we shall be all day retailing in this manner: do let us deal wholesale: what say you, little Premium? Give me three hundred pounds, and take all that remains on each side in a lump.

Care. Ay, ay, that will be the best way.

Sir O. Well, well, anything to accommodate you;—they are mine. But there is one portrait which you have always passed over.

Care. What, that ill-looking little fellow over the settee?

Sir O. Yes, sir, I mean that, though I don't think him so ill-looking a little fellow, by any means.

Charles S. What! that?—Oh! that's my uncle Oliver; 'twas done before he went to India.

Care. Your uncle Oliver!—Gad, then you'll never be friends, Charles. That, now, to me, is as stern a looking rogue as ever I saw; an unforgiving eye, and a damned disinheriting countenance!

an inveterate knave, depend on't. Don't you think so, little Premium?

Sir O. Upon my soul, sir, I do not; I think it as honest a looking face as any in the room, dead or alive;—but I suppose uncle Oliver goes with the rest of the lumber?

Charles S. No, hang it; I'll not part with poor Noll. The old fellow has been very good to me, and, egad, I'll keep his picture while I've a room to put it in.

Sir O. The rogue's my nephew after all! [Aside.—But, sir, I have somehow taken a fancy to that picture.

Charles S. I'm sorry for't, for you certainly will not have it.—Oons, haven't you got enough of them?

Sir O. I forgive him everything! [Aside.—But, sir, when I take a whim in my head I don't value money. I'll give you as much for that as for all the rest.

Charles S. Don't tease me, master broker; I tell you I'll not part with it, and there's an end of it.

Sir O. How like his father the dog is! [Aside.—Well, well, I have done.—I did not perceive it before, but I think I never saw such a resemblance. [Aside.—Here is the draught for your sum.

Charles S. Why, 'tis for eight hundred pounds.

Sir O. You will not let Sir Oliver go?

Charles S. Zounds! no!—I tell you once more.

Sir O. Then never mind the difference, we'll balance that another time—but give me your hand on the bargain; you are an honest fellow, Charles—I beg pardon, sir, for being so free.—Come, Moses.

Charles S. Egad, this is a whimsical old fellow! But hark'ee, Premium, you'll prepare lodgings for these gentlemen?

Sir O. Yes, yes, I'll send for them in a day or two.

Charles S. But hold; do now send a genteel conveyance for them, for I assure you, they were most of them used to ride in their own carriages.

Sir O. I will, I will—for all but Oliver.

Charles S. Ay, all but the little nabob.

Sir O. You're fixed on that?

Charles S. Peremptorily.

Sir O. A dear extravagant rogue! [Aside.—Good day!—Come, Moses.—Let me hear now who dares call him profligate!

[Exeunt Sir OLIVER SURFACE and MOSES.]

Care. Why, this is the oddest genius of the sort I ever met with.

Charles S. Egad, he's the prince of brokers, I think. I wonder how the devil Moses got acquainted with so honest a fellow.—But hark! here's Rowley; do, Careless, say I'll join the company in a few moments.

Care. I will—don't let that old blockhead persuade you to squander any of that money on old musty debts, or any such nonsense; for tradesmen, Charles, are the most exorbitant fellows.

Charles S. Very true, and paying them is only encouraging them. Ay, ay, never fear.—[Exit CARELESS.]—Soh! this was an odd old fellow, indeed.—Let me see—two-thirds of this five hundred and thirty odd pounds are mine by right. 'Fore Heaven! I find one's ancestors are more valuable relations than I took them for!—Ladies and gentlemen, your most obedient and very grateful servant.—

[Enter ROWLEY.]

Hah! old Rowley! egad, your just come in time to take leave of your old acquaintance.

Row. Yes, I heard they were a going. But I wonder you can have such spirits under so many distresses.

Charles S. Why, there's the point! my distresses are so many, that I can't afford to part with my spirits; but I shall be rich and splenetic, all in good time. However, I suppose you are surprised that I am not more sorrowful at parting with so many near relations; to be sure, 'tis very affecting: but you see they never move a muscle, so why should I?

Row. There's no making you serious a moment.

Charles S. Yes, faith, I am so now. Here, my honest Rowley, here, get me this changed directly, and take a hundred pounds of it immediately to old Stanley.

Row. A hundred pounds! Consider only—

Charles S. Gad's life, don't talk about it: poor Stanley's wants are pressing, and if you don't make haste, we shall have some one call that has a better right to the money.

Row. Ah! there's the point! I never will cease dunning you with the old proverb—

Charles S. "Be just before you're generous."—Why, so I would if I could; but Justice is an old hobbling beldame, and I can't get her to keep pace with Generosity for the soul of me.

Row. Yet, Charles, believe me, one hour's reflection—

Charles S. Ay, ay, it's very true; but, hark'ee, Rowley, while I have, by Heaven I'll give; so damn your economy, and away to old Stanley with the money. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Saloon.

Enter MOSES and Sir OLIVER SURFACE.

Moses. Well, sir, I think, as Sir Peter said, you have seen Mr. Charles in high glory; 'tis great pity he's so extravagant.

Sir O. But he would not sell my picture.

Moses. And loves wine and women so much.

Sir O. But he would not sell my picture.

Moses. And games so deep.

Sir O. But he would not sell my picture.—O, here's Rowley.

Enter ROWLEY.

Row. So, Sir Oliver, I find you have made a purchase—

Sir O. Yes, yes, our young rake has parted with his ancestors like old tapestry

Row. And here has he commissioned me to redeliver you part of the purchase-money—I mean, though, in your necessary character of old Stanley.

Moses. Ah! there is the pity of all; he is so damned charitable.

Row. And I left a hosier and two tailors in the hall, who, I'm sure, won't be paid, and this hundred would satisfy them.

Sir O. Well, well, I'll pay his debts, and his benevolence too.—But now I am no more a broker, and you shall introduce me to the elder brother as old Stanley.

Row. Not yet awhile; Sir Peter, I know, means to call there about this time.

Enter TRIP.

Trip. O, gentlemen, I beg pardon for not showing you out; this way.—Moses, a word.

[Exeunt TRIP and MOSES.]

Sir O. There's a fellow for you—would you believe it, that puppy intercepted the Jew on our coming, and wanted to raise money before he got to his master.

Row. Indeed!

Sir O. Yes, they are now planning an annuity business.—Ah! master Rowley, in my days servants were content with the follies of their masters, when they were worn a little threadbare; but now, they have their vices, like their birth-day clothes, with the gloss on. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Library, a large Screen, Pembroke Table, with a book on it; two Chairs.

JOSEPH SURFACE and a Servant discovered.

Joseph S. No letter from Lady Teazle.

Serv. No, sir.

Joseph S. I am surprised she has not sent, if she is prevented from coming. Sir Peter certainly does not suspect me. Yet, I wish I may not lose the heiress, through the scrape I have drawn myself into with the wife; however, Charles's imprudence and bad character are great points in my favour. [Knocking heard without]

Serv. I believe that must be Lady Teazle.

Joseph S. Hold!—See whether it is or not before you go to the door: I have a particular message for you, if it should be my brother.

Serv. 'Tis her ladyship, sir; she always leaves her chair at the milliner's in the next street.

Joseph S. Stay, stay; draw that screen before the window—[Servant does so.]—that will do; my opposite neighbour is a lady of curious temper.—[Servant exit.]—I have a difficult hand to play in this affair. Lady Teazle has lately suspected my views on Maria; but she must by no means be let into that secret,—at least, till I have her more in my power.

Enter Lady TEAZLE.

Lady T. What! sentiment in soliloquy now? Have you been very impatient?—O lud! don't pretend to look grave.—I vow I could not come before.

Joseph S. O madam, punctuality is a species of constancy very unfashionable in a lady of quality.

Lady T. Upon my word you ought to pity me. Do you know Sir Peter is grown so ill-natured to me of late, and so jealous of Charles too—that's the best of the story, isn't it?

Joseph S. I am glad my scandalous friends keep that up. [Aside.]

Lady T. I am sure I wish he would let Maria marry him, and then perhaps he would be convinced; don't you, Mr. Surface?

Joseph S. Indeed I do not. [Aside.]—Oh certainly I do! for then my dear Lady Teazle would also be convinced how wrong her suspicions were, of my having any design on the silly girl.

Lady T. Well, well, I'm inclined to believe you. But, isn't it provoking, to have the most ill-natured things said of one?—And there's my friend, Lady Sneerwell, has circulated I don't know how many scandalous tales of me, and all without any foundation too—that's what vexes me.

Joseph S. Ay, madam, to be sure, that is the provoking circumstance—without foundation; yes, yes, there's the mortification, indeed; for when a scandalous story is believed against one, there certainly is no comfort like the consciousness of having deserved it.

Lady T. No, to be sure, then I'd forgive their malice; but to attack me, who am really so innocent, and who never say an ill-natured thing of any body—that is, of any friend; and then Sir Peter too, to have him so peevish, and so suspicious, when I know the integrity of my own heart—indeed, 'tis monstrous!

Joseph S. But, my dear Lady Teazle, 'tis your own fault if you suffer it. When a husband entertains a groundless suspicion of his wife, and withdraws his confidence from her, the original compact is broken, and she owes it to the honour of her sex to endeavour to outwit him.

Lady T. Indeed!—so that if he suspects me without cause, it follows, that the best way of curing his jealousy is to give him reason for't.

Joseph S. Undoubtedly—for your husband should never be deceived in you,—and in that case it becomes you to be frail in compliment to his discernment.

Lady T. To be sure, what you say is very reasonable; and when the consciousness of my innocence—

Joseph S. Ah! my dear madam, there is the great mistake: 'tis this very conscious innocence that is of the greatest prejudice to you. What is it makes you negligent of forms, and careless of the world's opinion?—why, the consciousness of your own innocence. What makes you thoughtless in your conduct, and apt to run into a thousand little imprudences?—why, the consciousness of your own innocence. What makes you impatient of Sir Peter's temper, and outrageous at his suspicions?—why, the consciousness of your innocence.

Lady T. 'Tis very true!

Joseph S. Now, my dear Lady Teazle, if you would but once make a trifling faux pas, you can't conceive how cautious you would grow, and how ready to humour and agree with your husband.

Lady T. Do you think so?

Joseph S. Oh! I am sure on't; and then you would find all scandal would cease at once; for, in short, your character at present is like a person in a plethora, absolutely dying from too much health.

Lady T. So, so; then I perceive your prescription is, that I must sin in my own defence, and part with my virtue to preserve my reputation.

Joseph S. Exactly so, upon my credit, ma'am.

Lady T. Well, certainly this is the oddest doctrine, and the newest receipt for avoiding calumny!

Joseph S. An infallible one, believe me. Prudence, like experience, must be paid for.

Lady T. Why, if my understanding were once convinced—

Joseph S. O, certainly, madam, your understanding should be convinced.—Yes, yes—Heaven forbid I should persuade you to do anything you thought wrong. No, no, I have too much honour to desire it.

Lady T. Don't you think we may as well leave honour out of the argument?

Joseph S. Ah! the ill effects of your country education, I see, still remain with you.

Lady T. I doubt they do, indeed; and I will fairly own to you, that if I could be persuaded to do wrong, it would be by Sir Peter's ill usage, sooner than your honourable logic after all.

Joseph S. Then, by this hand, which he is unworthy of—[Taking her hand.]

Enter Servant.

'Sdeath, you blockhead—what do you want?

Serv. I beg your pardon, sir, but I thought you would not choose Sir Peter to come up without announcing him.

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. III.

Joseph S. Sir Peter!—Oons—the devil!

Lady T. Sir Peter! O lud—I'm ruined—I'm ruined!

Serv. Sir, 'twasn't I let him in.

Lady T. Oh! I'm quite undone! What will become of me? Now, Mr. Logic—Oh! mercy, sir, he's on the stairs—I'll get behind here—and if ever I'm so imprudent again—

[Goes behind the screen.]

Joseph S. Give me that book. [Sits down.]

Enter Sir PETER.

Sir P. Ay, ever improving himself—Mr. Surface, Mr. Surface!

Joseph S. Oh! my dear Sir Peter, I beg your pardon—I have been dosing over a stupid book.—Well, I am much obliged to you for this call. You haven't been here, I believe, since I fitted up this room.—Books, you know, are the only things I am a coxcomb in.

Sir P. 'Tis very neat indeed.—Well, well, that's proper; and you can make even your screen a source of knowledge—hung, I perceive, with maps?

[Walking up towards the screen.]

Joseph S. O, yes, I find great use in that screen.

[Turning Sir PETER away from the screen.]

Sir P. I dare say you must, certainly, when you want to find anything in a hurry.

Joseph S. Aye, or to hide anything in a hurry either. [Aside.]

Sir P. Well, I have a little private business—

Joseph S. You need not stay. [Exit Servant.]

Here's a chair, Sir Peter—I beg—
Sir P. Well, now we are alone, there is a subject, my dear friend, on which I wish to unburden my mind to you—a point of the greatest moment to my peace; in short, my good friend, Lady Teazle's conduct of late has made me very unhappy.

Joseph S. Indeed! I am very sorry to hear it.

Sir P. Yes, 'tis but too plain she has not the least regard for me; but, what's worse, I have pretty good authority to suppose she has formed an attachment to another.

Joseph S. Indeed! you astonish me!

Sir P. Yes; and, between ourselves, I think I've discovered the person.

Joseph S. How! you alarm me exceedingly.

Sir P. Ay, my dear friend, I knew you would sympathize with me!

Joseph S. Yes—believe me, Sir Peter, such a discovery would hurt me just as much as it would you.

Sir P. I am convinced of it.—Ah! it is a happiness to have a friend whom we can trust even with one's family secrets. But have you no guess who I mean?

Joseph S. I haven't the most distant idea. It can't be Sir Benjamin Backbite?

Sir P. Oh, no! What say you to Charles?

Joseph S. My brother! impossible!

Sir P. Oh! my dear friend, the goodness of your own heart misleads you. You judge of others by yourself.

Joseph S. Certainly, Sir Peter, the heart that is conscious of its own integrity is ever slow to credit another's treachery.

Sir P. True—but your brother has no sentiment—you never hear him talk so.

Joseph S. Yet, I can't but think Lady Teazle herself has too much principle.

Sir P. Ay,—but what is principle against the flattery of a handsome, lively, young fellow?

Joseph S. That's very true.

Sir P. And then, you know, the difference of our ages makes it very improbable that she should have any very great affection for me; and if she were to be frail, and I were to make it public, why the town would only laugh at me, the foolish old bachelor, who had married a girl.

Joseph S. That's true, to be sure—they would laugh.

Sir P. Laugh—ay, and make ballads, and paragraphs, and the devil knows what, of me.

Joseph S. No—you must never make it public.

Sir P. But then again—that the nephew of my old friend Sir Oliver, should be the person to attempt such a wrong, hurts me more nearly.

Joseph S. Ay, there's the point.—When ingratitude bars the dart of injury, the wound has double danger in it.

Sir P. Ay—I, that was in a manner, left his guardian; in whose house he had been so often entertained; who never in my life denied him—any advice.

Joseph S. O, 'tis not to be credited. There may be a man capable of such baseness, to be sure; but for my part, till you can give me positive proofs, I cannot but doubt it. However, if it should be proved on him, he is no longer a brother of mine—I disclaim kindred with him: for the man who can break through the laws of hospitality, and tempt the wife of his friend, deserves to be branded as the pest of society.

Sir P. What a difference there is between you! what noble sentiments!

Joseph S. Yet, I cannot suspect Lady Teazle's honour.

Sir P. I am sure I wish to think well of her, and to remove all ground of quarrel between us. She has lately reproached me more than once with having made no settlement on her; and, in our last quarrel, she almost hinted that she should not break her heart if I was dead. Now, as we seem to differ in our ideas of expense, I have resolved she shall have her own way, and be her own mistress, in that respect, for the future; and if I were to die, she will find I have not been inattentive to her interest while living. Here, my friend, are the drafts of two deeds, which I wish to have your opinion on.—By one, she will enjoy eight hundred a year independent while I live; and, by the other, the bulk of my fortune after my death.

Joseph S. This conduct, Sir Peter, is indeed truly generous.—I wish it may not corrupt my pupil.

[Aside.]

Sir P. Yes, I am determined she shall have no cause to complain, though I would not have her acquainted with the latter instance of my affection yet awhile.

Joseph S. Nor I, if I could help it. [Aside.]

Sir P. And now, my dear friend, if you please, we will talk over the situation of your hopes with Maria.

Joseph S. O, no, Sir Peter; another time, if you please.

Sir P. I am sensibly chagrined at the little progress you seem to make in her affections.

Joseph S. I beg you will not mention it, sir. What are my disappointments when your happiness is in debate!—'Sdeath! I shall be ruined every way.

[Aside.]

Sir P. And though you are so averse to my acquainting Lady Teazle with your passion, I'm sure she's not your enemy in the affair.

Joseph S. Pray, Sir Peter, now oblige me. I am really too much affected by the subject we have been speaking of, to bestow a thought on my own concerns. The man who is intrusted with his friend's distresses can never—

Enter Servant.

Well, sir?

Serv. Your brother, sir, is speaking to a gentleman in the street, and says he knows you are within.

Joseph S. 'Sdeath, blockhead, I'm not within—I'm out for the day.

Sir P. Stay—hold—a thought has struck me:—you shall be at home.

Joseph S. Well, well, let him up. [Exit Servant.] He'll interrupt Sir Peter, however. [Aside.]

Sir P. Now, my good friend, oblige me, I entreat you.—Before Charles comes, let me conceal myself somewhere—then do you tax him on the point we have been talking, and his answer may satisfy me at once.

Joseph S. O fie, Sir Peter! would you have me join in so mean a trick!—To trepan my brother, too!

Sir P. Nay, you tell me you are sure he is innocent; if so, you do him the greatest service by giving him an opportunity to clear himself, and you will set my heart at rest. Come, you shall not refuse me: [Going up] here, behind this screen will be—Hey! what the devil! there seems to be one listener here already—I'll swear I saw a petticoat.

Joseph S. Ha! ha! ha! Well this is ridiculous enough. I'll tell you, Sir Peter, though I hold a man of intrigue to be a most despicable character, yet, you know, it does not follow that one is to be an absolute Joseph either! Hark'ee, 'tis a little French milliner—a silly rogue that plagues me,—and having some character to lose, on your coming, sir, she ran behind the screen.

Sir P. Ah! Joseph! Joseph! Did I ever think that you—But, egad, she has overheard all I have been saying of my wife.

Joseph S. O, 'twill never go any farther, you may depend upon it.

Sir P. No! then, faith, let her hear it out—Here's a closet will do as well.

Joseph S. Well, go in there.

Sir P. Sly rogue! sly rogue!

[Going into the closet.]

Joseph S. A narrow escape, indeed! and a curious situation I'm in, to part man and wife in this manner.

Lady T. Couldn't I steal off?

Joseph S. Keep close, my angel!

Sir P. Joseph, tax him home.

Joseph S. Back, my dear friend!

Lady T. Couldn't you lock Sir Peter in?

Joseph S. Be still, my life!

Sir P. You're sure the little milliner won't blab?

Joseph S. In, in, my dear Sir Peter—Fore gad, I wish I had a key to the door.

Enter CHARLES SURFACE.

Charles S. Holla! brother, what has been the matter? Your fellow would not let me up at first. What! have you had a Jew or a wench with you?

Joseph S. Neither, brother, I assure you?

Charles S. But what has made Sir Peter steal off? I thought he had been with you.

Joseph S. He was, brother; but hearing you were coming, he did not choose to stay.

Charles S. What! was the old gentleman afraid I wanted to borrow money of him?

Joseph S. No, sir: but I am sorry to find, Charles, that you have lately given that worthy man grounds for great uneasiness.

Charles S. Yes, they tell me I do that to a great many worthy men—But how so, pray?

Joseph S. To be plain with you, brother—he thinks you are endeavouring to gain Lady Teazle's affections from him.

Charles S. Who, I? O lud! not I, upon my word.—Ha, ha, ha, ha! So the old fellow has found out that he has got a young wife, has he?

Joseph S. This is no subject to jest on, brother. He who can laugh—

Charles S. True, true, as you were going to say—then, seriously, I never had the least idea of what you charge me with, upon my honour.

Joseph S. Well, it will give Sir Peter great satisfaction to hear this. [Aloud.]

Charles S. To be sure, I once thought the lady seemed to have taken a fancy to me; but, upon my soul, I never gave her the least encouragement: besides, you know my attachment to Maria.

Joseph S. But sure, brother, even if Lady Teazle had betrayed the fondest partiality for you—

Charles S. Why, look'ee, Joseph, I hope I shall never deliberately do a dishonourable action; but if a pretty woman was purposely to throw herself in my way—and that pretty woman married to a man old enough to be her father—

Joseph S. Well—

Charles S. Why, I believe I should be obliged to—Joseph S. What?

Charles S. To borrow a little of your morality, that's all.—But, brother, do you know now, that you surprise me exceedingly, by naming me with Lady Teazle; for, faith, I always understood you were her favourite.

Joseph S. O, for shame, Charles! This retort is foolish.

Charles S. Nay, I swear I have seen you exchange such significant glances—

Joseph S. Nay, nay, sir, this is no jest.

Charles S. Egad, I'm serious.—Don't you remember one day when I called here—

Joseph S. Nay, prythee, Charles—

Charles S. And found you together—

Joseph S. Zounds, sir! I insist—

Charles S. And another time when your servant—

Joseph S. Brother, brother, a word with you! Gad, I must stop him. [Aside.]

Charles S. Informed, I say, that—

Joseph S. Hush! I beg your pardon, but Sir Peter has heard all we have been saying. I knew you would clear yourself, or I should not have consented.

Charles S. How, Sir Peter! Where is he?

Joseph S. Softly; there! [Points to the closet.]

Charles S. O, 'fore heaven, I'll have him out.

Sir Peter, come forth! [Trying to get to the closet.]

Joseph S. No, no— [Preventing him.]

Charles S. I say, Sir Peter, come into court—[Pulls in Sir PETER.] What! my old guardian—What! turn inquisitor, and take evidence incog? O, fie! O, fie!

Sir P. Give me your hand, Charles—I believe I have suspected you wrongfully; but you musn't be angry with Joseph—'twas my plan!

Charles S. Indeed!

Sir P. But I acquit you. I promise you I don't think near so ill of you as I did: what I have heard has given me great satisfaction.

Charles S. Egad, then, 'twas lucky you didn't hear any more—wasn't it, Joseph?

[Apart to JOSEPH.]

Sir P. Ah! you would have retorted on him.

Charles S. Ay, ay, that was a joke.

Sir P. Yes, yes, I know his honour too well.

Charles S. But you might as well have suspected him as me in this matter, for all that—mightn't he, Joseph? [Apart to JOSEPH.]

Sir P. Well, well, I believe you.

Joseph S. Would they were both out of the room? [Aside.]

Sir P. And in future, perhaps, we may not be such strangers.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Lady Sneerwell is below, and says she will come up.

Joseph S. Lady Sneerwell! Gads life! she must not come here! Gentlemen, I beg pardon—I must wait on you down stairs: here is a person come on particular business.

Charles S. Well, you can see him in another room. Sir Peter and I have not met a long time, and I have something to say to him.

Joseph S. They must not be left together. [Aside.] I'll send Lady Sneerwell away, and return directly.—Sir Peter, not a word of the French milliner. [Apart to Sir PETER.]

Sir P. I! not for the world!—[Apart to JOSEPH.]—Ah! Charles, if you associated more with your brother, one might indeed hope for your reformation. He is a man of sentiment—Well, there is nothing in the world so noble as a man of sentiment!

Charles S. Pshaw! he is too moral by half—and so apprehensive of his good name, as he calls it, that he would as soon let a priest into his house as a wench.

Sir P. No, no.—Come, come,—you wrong him.—No, no! Joseph is no rake, but he is no such saint either, in that respect.—I have a great mind to tell him—we should have such a laugh at Joseph. [Aside.]

Charles S. Oh, hang him! He's a very anchorite, a young hermit.

Sir P. Hark'ee—you must not abuse him: he may chance to hear of it again, I promise you.

Charles S. Why, you won't tell him?

Sir P. No—but—this way. Egad, I'll tell him.—[Aside.] Hark'ee—have you a mind to have a good laugh at Joseph?

Charles S. I should like it of all things.

Sir P. Then, i'faith, we will—I'll be quit with him for discovering me—He had a girl with him when I called. [Whispers.]

Charles S. What! Joseph?—you jest.

Sir P. Hush!—a little French milliner—and the best of the jest is—she's in the room now.

Charles S. The devil she is! [Looking at closet.]

Sir P. Hush! I tell you! [Points to screen.]

Charles S. Behind the screen! 'Slife, let us unveil.

Sir P. No, no—he's coming—you shant, indeed!

Charles S. O, egad, we'll have a peep at the little milliner! [Endeavouring to get towards screen, Sir PETER preventing.]

Sir P. Not for the world, Joseph will never forgive me—

Charles S. I'll stand by you—

Sir P. Odds, here he is! [JOSEPH S. enters just as CHARLES S. throws down the screen.]

Charles S. Lady Teazle! by all that's wonderful!

Sir P. Lady Teazle! by all that's damnable!

Charles S. Sir Peter, this is one of the smartest French milliners I ever saw. Egad, you seem all to have been diverting yourselves here at hide and seek, and I don't see who is out of the secret.—Shall I beg your ladyship to inform me? Not a word!—Brother, will you be pleased to explain this matter? What! is Morality dumb too?—Sir Peter, though I found you in the dark, perhaps you are not so now! All mute!—Well—though I can make nothing of the affair, I suppose you perfectly understand one another—so I'll leave you to yourselves. Brother, I'm sorry to find you have given that worthy man grounds for so much uneasiness.—Sir Peter! there's nothing in the world so noble as a man of sentiment. [Exit CHARLES.]

Joseph S. Sir Peter—notwithstanding—I confess—that appearances are against me—if you will afford me your patience—I make no doubt—but I shall explain every thing to your satisfaction.

Sir P. If you please, sir.

Joseph S. The fact is, sir, that Lady Teazle, knowing my pretensions to your ward Maria—I say, sir, Lady Teazle, being apprehensive of the jealousy of your temper—and knowing my friendship to the family—she, sir, I say,—called here—in order that—I might explain these pretensions—but on your coming—being apprehensive—as I said—of your jealousy—she withdrew—and this, you may depend on it, is the whole truth of the matter.

Sir P. A very clear account, upon my word; and I dare swear the lady will vouch for every article of it.

Lady T. For not one word of it, Sir Peter!

Sir P. How! don't you think it worth while to agree in the lie?

Lady T. There is not one syllable of truth in what that gentleman has told you.

Sir P. I believe you, upon my soul, ma'am?

Joseph S. [Aside.]—Sdeath, madam, will you betray me?

Lady T. Good, Mr. Hypocrite, by your leave, I'll speak for myself.

Sir P. Ay, let her alone, sir; you'll find she'll make out a better story than you, without prompting.

Lady T. Hear me, Sir Peter!—I came hither on no matter relating to your ward, and even ignorant of this gentleman's pretensions to her. But I came seduced by his insidious arguments, at least to listen to his pretended passion, if not to sacrifice your honour to his baseness.

Sir P. Now, I believe, the truth is coming, indeed!

Joseph S. The woman's mad!

Lady T. No, sir,—she has recovered her senses, and your own arts have furnished her with the means.—Sir Peter, I do not expect you to credit me—but the tenderness you expressed for me, when I am sure you could not think I was a witness to it, has penetrated to my heart, that had I left the place without the shame of this discovery, my future life should have spoken the sincerity of my gratitude. As for that smooth-tongued hypocrite, who would have seduced the wife of his too credulous friend, while he affected honourable addresses to his ward—I behold him now in a light so truly despicable, that I shall never again respect myself for having listened to him.

[Exit LADY TEAZLE.]

Joseph S. Notwithstanding all this, Sir Peter, Heaven knows—

Sir P. That you are a villain! and so I leave you to your conscience.

Joseph S. You are too rash, Sir Peter; you shall hear me.—The man who shuts out conviction by refusing to—

Sir P. O, damn your sentiments!

[Exit Sir PETER and SURFACE.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Library.

Enter JOSEPH SURFACE and Servant.

Joseph S. Mr. Stanley!—and why should you think I would see him? You must know he comes to ask something.

Serv. Sir, I should not have let him in, but that Mr. Rowley came to the door with him.

Joseph S. Pshaw! blockhead! to suppose that I should now be in a temper to receive visits from poor relations!—Well, why don't you show the fellow up!

Serv. I will, sir.—Why, sir, it was not my fault that Sir Peter discovered my lady—

Joseph S. Go, fool! [Exit Servant.]—Sure Fortune never played a man of my policy such a trick before. My character with Sir Peter, my hopes with Maria, destroyed in a moment! I'm in a rare humour to listen to other people's distresses! I shan't be able to bestow even a benevolent sentiment on Stanley.—So! here he comes, and Rowley with him. I must try to recover myself, and put a little charity into my face, however.

[Exit.]

Enter Sir OLIVER SURFACE and ROWLEY.

Sir O. What! does he avoid us!—That was he, was it not?

Row. It was, sir. But I doubt you are come a little too abruptly. His nerves are so weak, that the sight of a poor relation may be too much for him. I should have gone first to break it to him.

Sir O. O, plague of his nerves! Yet this is he whom Sir Peter extols as a man of the most benevolent way of thinking!

Row. As to his way of thinking, I cannot pretend to decide; for, to do him justice, he appears to have as much speculative benevolence as any private gentleman in the kingdom, though he is seldom so sensual as to indulge himself in the exercise of it.

Sir O. Yet he has a string of charitable sentiments, I suppose, at his fingers' ends.

Row. Or rather, at his tongue's end, Sir Oliver; for I believe there is no sentiment he has such faith in as that "Charity begins at home."

Sir O. And his, I presume, is of that domestic sort which never stirs abroad at all.

Row. I doubt you'll find it so;—but he's coming. I mustn't seem to interrupt you; and you know immediately as you leave him, I come in to announce your arrival in your real character.

Sir O. True; and afterwards you'll meet me at Sir Peter's.

Row. Without losing a moment. [Exit.]

Sir O. I don't like the complaisance of his features.

Enter JOSEPH SURFACE.

Joseph S. Sir, I beg you ten thousand pardons for keeping you a moment waiting—Mr. Stanley, I presume.—

Sir O. At your service.

Joseph S. Sir, I beg you will do me the honour to sit down—I entreat you, sir!—

Sir O. Dear sir—there's no occasion—too civil by half!

[Aside.
Joseph S. I have not the pleasure of knowing you, Mr. Stanley; but I am extremely happy to see you look so well. You were nearly related to my mother, Mr. Stanley, I think?

Sir O. I was, sir;—so nearly that my present poverty, I fear, may do discredit to her wealthy children, else I should not have presumed to trouble you.

Joseph S. Dear sir, there needs no apology:—he that is in distress, though a stranger, has a right to claim kindred with the wealthy. I am sure I wish I was one of that class, and had it in my power to offer you even a small relief.

Sir O. If your uncle, Sir Oliver, were here, I should have a friend.

Joseph S. I wish he was, sir, with all my heart: you should not want an advocate with him, believe me, sir.

Sir O. I should not need one—my distresses would recommend me. But I imagined his bounty would enable you to become the agent of his charity.

Joseph S. My dear sir, you were strangely misinformed. Sir Oliver is a worthy man, a very worthy man; but avarice, Mr. Stanley, is the vice of age. I will tell you, my good sir, in confidence, what he has done for me has been a mere nothing; though people, I know, have thought otherwise; and, for my part, I never chose to contradict the report.

Sir O. What! has he never transmitted to you bullion—rupees—pagodas?

Joseph S. O, dear sir, nothing of the kind:—No, no—a few presents now and then—china, shawls, congou tea, avadavats, and Indian crackers—little more, believe me.

Sir O. Here's gratitude for twelve thousand pounds!—Avadavats and Indian crackers!

[Aside.
Joseph S. Then, my dear sir, you have heard, I doubt not, of the extravagance of my brother: there are very few would credit what I have done for that unfortunate young man.

Sir O. Not I, for one?

[Aside.
Joseph S. The sums I have lent him!—Indeed, I have been exceedingly to blame; it was an amiable weakness: however, I don't pretend to defend it,—and now I feel it doubly culpable, since it has deprived me of the pleasure of serving you, Mr. Stanley, as my heart dictates.

Sir O. Dissembler? [Aside.]—Then, sir, you can't assist me?

Joseph S. At present, it grieves me to say, I cannot; but, whenever I have the ability, you may depend upon hearing from me.

Sir O. I am extremely sorry—

Joseph S. Not more than I, believe me;—to pity, without the power to relieve, is still more painful than to ask and be denied.

Sir O. Kind sir, your most obedient humble servant.

Joseph S. You leave me deeply affected, Mr. Stanley.—William, be ready to open the door.

Sir O. O, dear sir, no ceremony.

Joseph S. Your very obedient.

Sir O. Sir, your most obsequious.

Joseph S. You may depend upon hearing from me, whenever I can be of service.

Sir O. Sweet sir, you are too good!

Joseph S. In the mean time, I wish you health and spirits.

Sir O. Your ever grateful and perpetual humble servant.

Joseph S. Sir, yours as sincerely.

Sir O. Now I am satisfied!

[Aside: Exit.
Sir O. This is one bad effect of a good character: it invites application from the unfortunate, and there needs no small degree of address to gain the reputation of benevolence without incurring the expense. The silver ore of pure charity is an expensive article in the catalogue of a man's good qualities; whereas the sentimental French plate I use instead of it, makes just as good a show, and pays no tax.

Enter ROWLEY.

Row. Mr. Surface, your servant: I was apprehensive of interrupting you, though my business demands immediate attention, as this note will inform you.

Joseph S. Always happy to see Mr. Rowley,—a rascal! [Aside.—Reads the letter.]—Sir Oliver Surface! My uncle is arrived!

Row. He is, indeed: we have just parted with him—quite well, after a speedy voyage, and impatient to embrace his worthy nephew.

Joseph S. I am astonished!—William! stop Mr. Stanley, if he's not gone.

Row. Oh! he's out of reach, I believe.

Joseph S. Why did you not let me know this when you came in together?

Row. I thought you had particular business;—but I must begone to inform your brother, and appoint him here to meet your uncle. He will be with you in a quarter of an hour.

Joseph S. So he says. Well, I am strangely overjoyed at his coming.—Never, to be sure, was any thing so damned unlucky.

[Aside.
Row. You will be delighted to see how well he looks.

Joseph S. Oh! I am overjoyed to hear it—Just at this time!

[Aside.
Row. I'll tell him how impatiently you expect him.

[Exit.
Joseph S. Do, do; pray give my best duty and affection, I cannot express the sensations I feel at the thought of seeing him—Certainly his coming just at this time is the cruellest piece of ill-fortune!

SCENE II.—SIR PETER TEAZLE'S.

Enter Maid and Mrs. CANDOUR.

Maid. Indeed, ma'am, my lady will see nobody at present.

Mrs. C. Did you tell her it was her friend, Mrs. Candour.

Maid. Yes ma'am; but she begs you will excuse her.

Mrs. C. Do go again,—I shall be glad to see her, if it be only for a moment, for I am sure she must be in great distress. [Exit Maid.] Dear heart, how provoking! I'm not mistress of half the circumstances! We shall have the whole affair in the newspapers, with the names of the parties at length, before I have dropped the story at a dozen houses.

Enter Sir BENJAMIN BACKBITE.

Oh, dear Sir Benjamin! you have heard, I suppose—

Sir B. Of Lady Teazle and Mr. Surface—

Mrs. C. And Sir Peter's discovery—

Sir B. O! the strangest piece of business, to be sure!

Mrs. C. Well, I never was so surprised in my life. I am so sorry for all parties, indeed.

Sir B. Now I don't pity Sir Peter at all: he was so extravagantly partial to Mr. Surface.

Mrs. C. Mr. Surface! Why, 'twas with Charles Lady Teazle was detected.

Sir B. No such thing, I tell you—Mr. Surface is the gallant.

Mrs. C. No, no, Charles is the man. 'Twas Mr. Surface brought Sir Peter on purpose to discover them.

Sir B. I tell you I had it from one—

Mrs. C. And I have it from one—

Sir B. Who had it from one, who had it—

Mrs. C. From one immediately—but here comes Lady Sneerwell; perhaps she knows the whole affair.

Enter Lady SNEERWELL.

Lady S. So, my dear Mrs. Candour, here's a sad affair of our friend Teazle.

Mrs. C. Ay, my dear friend, who would have thought—

Lady S. Well, there is no trusting appearances; though, indeed, she was always too lively for me.

Mrs. C. To be sure, her manners were a little too free: but then she was so young!

Lady S. And had, indeed, some good qualities.

Mrs. C. So she had, indeed. But have you heard the particulars?

Lady S. No; but everybody says that Mr. Surface—

Sir B. Ay, there; I told you Mr. Surface was the man.

Mrs. C. No, no: indeed the assignation was with Charles.

Lady S. With Charles! You alarm me, Mrs. Candour!

Mrs. C. Yes, yes, he was the lover. Mr. Surface, to do him justice, was only the informer.

Sir B. Well, I'll not dispute with you, Mrs. Candour; but, be it which it may, I hope that Sir Peter's wound will not—

Mrs. C. Sir Peter's wound! O, mercy! I didn't hear a word of their fighting.

Lady S. Nor I, a syllable.

Sir B. No! what, no mention of the duel?

Mrs. C. Not a word.

Sir B. O, yes: they fought before they left the room.

Lady S. Pray, let us hear.

Mrs. C. Ay, do oblige us with the duel.

Sir B. "Sir," says Sir Peter, immediately after the discovery, "you are a most ungrateful fellow."

Mrs. C. Ay, to Charles.

Sir B. No, no—to Mr. Surface—"a most ungrateful fellow; and old as I am, sir," says he, "I insist on immediate satisfaction."

Mrs. C. Ay, that must have been to Charles; for 'tis very unlikely Mr. Surface should fight in his own house.

Sir B. Gad's life ma'am, not at all—"Giving me immediate satisfaction." On this, ma'am, Lady Teazle, seeing Sir Peter in such danger, ran out of the room in strong hysterics, and Charles after her, calling out for hartshorn and water; then, madam, they began to fight with swords—

Enter CRABTREE.

Crab. With pistols, nephew—pistols; I have it from undoubted authority.

Mrs. C. O, Mr. Crabtree, then it is all true!

Crab. Too true, indeed, madam, and Sir Peter is dangerously wounded—

Sir B. By a thrust in seagoon quite through his left side—

Crab. By a bullet lodged in the thorax.

Mrs. C. Mercy on me! Poor Sir Peter.

Crab. Yes, madam; though Charles would have avoided the matter, if he could.

Mrs. C. I told you who it was; I knew Charles was the person.

Sir B. My uncle, I see, knows nothing of the matter.

Crab. But Sir Peter taxed him with the basest ingratitude.

Sir B. That I told you, you know—

Crab. Do, nephew, let me speak!—and insisted on immediate—

Sir B. Satisfaction! Just as I said—

Crab. Odds life, nephew, allow others to know something too. A pair of pistols lay on the bureau (for Mr. Surface, it seems, had come home the night before late from Salthill, where he had been to see the Montem with a friend, who has a son at Eton), so, unluckily, the pistols were left charged.

Sir B. I heard nothing of this.

Crab. Sir Peter forced Charles to take one; and they fired, it seems, pretty nearly together. Charles's shot took effect, as I tell you, and Sir Peter's missed; but, what is very extraordinary, the ball struck against a little bronze Shakspeare that stood over the fire-place, grazed out of the window at a right angle, and wounded the postman, who was just coming to the door with a double letter from Northamptonshire.

Sir B. My uncle's account is more circumstantial, I confess; but I believe mine is the only true one, for all that.

Lady S. I am more interested in this affair than they imagine, and must have better information.—

Aside. [Exit Lady SNEERWELL.]

Sir B. Ah! Lady Sneerwell's alarm is very easily accounted for.

Crab. Yes, yes, they certainly do say—but that's neither here nor there.

Mrs. C. But, pray, where is Sir Peter at present?

Crab. Oh! they brought him home, and he is now in the house, though the servants are ordered to deny him.

Mrs. C. I believe so, and Lady Teazle, I suppose, attending him.

Crab. Yes, yes; and I saw one of the faculty enter just before me.

Sir B. Hey! who comes here?

Crab. O, this is he: the physician, depend on't.

Mrs. C. O, certainly, it must be the physician; and now we shall know.

Enter Sir OLIVER SURFACE.

Crab. Well, doctor, what hopes?

Mrs. C. Ay, doctor, how's your patient?

Sir B. Now, doctor, isn't it a wound with a small-sword?

Crab. A bullet lodged in the thorax, for a hundred.

Sir O. Doctor! a wound with a small-sword! and a bullet in the thorax Oons, are you mad, good people?

Sir B. Perhaps, sir, you are not a doctor?

Sir O. Truly I am to thank you for my degree, if I am.

Crab. Only a friend of Sir Peter's, then, I presume. But, sir, you must have heard of his accident?

Sir O. Not a word!

Crab. Not of his being dangerously wounded?

Sir O. The devil he is!

Sir B. Run through the body—

Crab. Shot in the breast—

Sir B. By one Mr. Surface—

Crab. Ay, the younger.

Sir O. Hey! what the plague! you seem to differ strangely in your accounts: however, you agree that Sir Peter is dangerously wounded.

Sir B. O yes, we agree in that.

Crab. Yes, yes, I believe there can be no doubt of that.

Sir O. Then, upon my word, for a person in that situation, he is the most imprudent man alive; for here he comes walking as if nothing at all were the matter.

Enter Sir PETER TEAZLE.

Odd's heart, Sir Peter, you are come in good time, I promise you; for we had just given you over.

Sir B. Egad, uncle, this is the most sudden recovery.

Sir O. Why, man, what do you do out of bed with a small-sword through your body, and a bullet lodged in your thorax?

Sir P. A small-sword, and a bullet!

Sir O. Ay, these gentlemen would have killed you without law or physic, and wanted to dub me a doctor, to make me an accomplice.

Sir P. Why, what is all this?

Sir B. We rejoice, Sir Peter, that the story of the duel is not true, and are sincerely sorry for your other misfortune.

Sir P. So, so; all over the town already.

[Aside.

Crab. Though, Sir Peter, you were certainly vastly to blame to marry at your years.

Sir P. Sir, what business is that of yours?

Mrs. C. Though, indeed, as Sir Peter made so good a husband, he is very much to be pitied.

Sir P. Plague on your pity, ma'am! I desire none of it.

Sir B. However, Sir Peter, you must not mind the laughing and jests you will meet with on the occasion.

Sir P. Sir, sir, I desire to be master in my own house.

Crab. 'Tis no uncommon case, that's one comfort.

Sir P. I insist on being left to myself: without ceremony—I insist on your leaving my house directly.

Mrs. C. Well, well, we are going, and depend on't we'll make the best report of it we can.

Sir P. Leave my house!

Crab. And tell how hardly you've been treated.

Sir P. Leave my house!

Sir B. And how patiently you bear it.

[Exeunt Mrs. CANDOUR, Sir BENJAMIN, and CRABTREE.]

Sir P. Leave my house!—Fiends! vipers! furies! O, that their own venom would choke them!

Sir O. They are very provoking, indeed, Sir Peter.

Enter ROWLEY.

Row. I heard high words; what has ruffled you sir?

Sir P. Pshaw! what signifies asking? Do I ever pass a day without my vexations?

Row. Well, I am not inquisitive.

Sir O. Well, I am not inquisitive; I come only to tell you that I have seen both my nephews in the manner we proposed.

Sir P. A precious couple they are!

Row. Yes, and Sir Oliver is convinced that your judgment was right, Sir Peter.

Sir O. Yes, I find Joseph is indeed the man, after all.

Row. Ay, as Sir Peter says, he is a man of sentiment.

Sir O. And acts up to the sentiments he professes.

Row. It certainly is edification to hear him talk.

Sir O. Oh, he's a model for the young men of the age!—But how's this, Sir Peter? You don't join us in your friend Joseph's praise, as I expected.

Sir P. Sir Oliver, we live in a damned wicked world, and the fewer we praise the better.

Row. What! do you say so, Sir Peter, who were never mistaken in your life?

Sir P. Pshaw! Plague on you both! I see by your sneering you have heard the whole affair. I shall go mad among you!

Row. Then, to fret you no longer, Sir Peter, we are indeed acquainted with it all. I met Lady Teazle coming from Mr. Surface's so humble, that she deigned to request me to be her advocate with you.

Sir P. And does Sir Oliver know all this?

Sir O. Every circumstance.

Sir P. What of the closet and the screen, hey?

Sir O. Yes, yes, and the little French milliner. O, I have been vastly diverted with the story! Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. 'Twas very pleasant.

Sir O. I never laughed more in my life, I assure you: Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. O, vastly diverting! Ha! ha! ha!

Row. To be sure, Joseph with his sentiments: Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. Yes, yes, his sentiments! Ha! ha! ha! Hypocritical villain!

Sir O. Ay, and that rogue Charles to pull Sir Peter out of the closet: Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. Ha! ha! 'Twas devilish entertaining, to be sure!

Sir O. Ha! ha! ha! Egad, Sir Peter, I should like to have seen your face when the screen was thrown down. Ha! ha!

Sir P. Yes, yes, my face when the screen was thrown down: Ha, ha, ha! Oh, I must never show my head again!

Sir O. But come, come; it isn't fair to laugh at you neither, my old friend; though, upon my soul, I can't help it.

Sir P. O pray don't restrain your mirth on my account: it does not hurt me at all! I laugh at the whole affair myself. Yes, yes, I think being a standing jest for all one's acquaintance a very happy situation. O yes, and then of a morning to read the paragraphs about Mr. S—, Lady T—, and Sir P—, will be so entertaining! I shall certainly leave town to-morrow, and never look mankind in the face again.

Row. Without affectation, Sir Peter, you may despise the ridicule of fools: but I see Lady Teazle going towards the next room; I am sure you must desire a reconciliation as earnestly as she does.

Sir O. Perhaps my being here prevents her coming to you. Well, I'll leave honest Rowley to mediate between you; but he must bring you all presently to Mr. Surface's, where I am now returning, if not to reclaim a libertine, at least to expose hypocrisy. [Exit.]

Sir P. Ah, I'll be present at your discovering yourself there with all my heart; though 'tis a vile unlucky place for discoveries. She is not coming here, you see, Rowley.

Row. No, but she has left the door of that room open, you perceive. See, she is in tears.

Sir P. Certainly a little mortification appears very becoming in a wife. Don't you think it will do her good to let her pine a little?

Row. Oh, this is ungenerous in you!

Sir P. Well, I know not what to think. You remember the letter I found of hers, evidently intended for Charles?

Row. A mere forgery, Sir Peter, laid in your way on purpose. This is one of the points which I intend Snake shall give you conviction of.

Sir P. I wish I were once satisfied of that. She looks this way. What a remarkably elegant turn of the head she has! Rowley, I'll go to her.

Row. Certainly.

Sir P. Though when it is known that we are reconciled, people will laugh at me ten times more.

Row. Let them laugh, and retort their malice only by showing them you are happy in spite of it.

Sir P. Faith, so I will! and, if I'm not mistaken, we may yet be the happiest couple in the county.

Row. Nay, Sir Peter, he who once lays aside suspicion—

Sir P. Hold, master Rowley! If you have any regard for me, never let me hear you utter anything like a sentiment: I have had enough of them to serve me the rest of my life.

SCENE III.—The Library.

Enter Lady SNEERWELL and JOSEPH SURFACE.

Lady S. Impossible! Will not Sir Peter immediately be reconciled to Charles, and of consequence no longer oppose his union with Maria? The thought is distraction to me.

Joseph S. Can passion furnish a remedy?

Lady S. No, nor cunning neither. O! I was a fool, an idiot, to league with such a blunderer!

Joseph S. Sure, Lady Sneerwell, I am the greatest sufferer; yet you see I bear the accident with calmness. Well, I admit I have been to blame. I confess I deviated from the direct road of wrong, but I don't think we're so totally defeated neither.

Lady S. No!

Joseph S. You tell me you have made a trial of Snake since we met, and that you still believe him faithful to us.

Lady S. I do believe so.

Joseph S. And that he has undertaken, should it be necessary, to swear and prove, that Charles is at this time contracted by vows and honour to your ladyship, which some of his former letters to you will serve to support.

Lady S. This, indeed, might have assisted.

Joseph S. Come, come; it is not too late yet. [Knocking at the door.] But hark! this is probably my uncle, Sir Oliver: retire to that room; we'll consult further when he is gone.

Lady S. Well, but if he should find you out, too?
Joseph S. Oh, I have no fear of that. Sir Peter will hold his tongue for his own credit's sake—and you may depend on it, I shall soon discover Sir Oliver's weak side!

Lady S. I have no diffidence of your abilities! only be constant to one rigour at a time.

[Exit Lady SNEERWELL.]

Joseph S. I will, I will. So! 'tis confounded hard, after such bad fortune, to be baited by one's confederate in evil. Well, at all events, my character is so much better than Charles's, that I certainly—Hey!—what!—this is not Sir Oliver, but old Stanley again. Plague on't! that he should return to tease me just now—I shall have Sir Oliver come and find him here—and—

Enter Sir OLIVER SURFACE.

Gad's life, Mr. Stanley, why have you come back to plague me at this time? You must not stay now, upon my word.

Sir O. Sir, I hear your uncle Oliver is expected here, and though he has been so penurious to you, I'll try what he'll do for me.

Joseph S. Sir, 'tis impossible for you to stay now, so I must beg—Come any other time, and I promise you, you shall be assisted.

Sir O. No: Sir Oliver and I must be acquainted.

Joseph S. Zounds, sir! then I insist on your quitting the room directly.

Sir O. Nay, sir—

Joseph S. Sir, I insist on't: here, William! show this gentleman out. Since you compel me, sir,—not one moment—this is such insolence!

[Going to push him out.]

Enter CHARLES SURFACE.

Charles S. Hey day! what's the matter now! What the devil, have you got hold of my little broker here? Zounds, brother, don't hurt little Premium. What's the matter, my little fellow?

Joseph S. So! he has been with you too, has he?

Charles S. To be sure he has. Why, he's as honest a little—But sure, Joseph, you have not been borrowing money too, have you?

Joseph S. Borrowing! No! But, brother, you know we expect Sir Oliver here every—

Charles S. O Gad, that's true! Noll mustn't find the little broker here, to be sure!

Joseph S. Yet Mr. Stanley insists—

Charles S. Stanley! why his name's Premium.

Joseph S. No, sir, Stanley.

Charles S. No, no, Premium.

Joseph S. Well, no matter which—but—

Charles S. Ay, ay, Stanley or Premium, 'tis the same thing, as you say; for I suppose he goes by half a hundred names, besides A.B. at the coffee-house.

Joseph S. 'Sdeath, here's Sir Oliver at the door. Now I beg, Mr. Stanley—

Charles S. Ay, ay, and I beg, Mr. Premium—

Sir O. Gentlemen—

Joseph S. Sir, by heaven you shall go!

Charles S. Ay, out with him, certainly!

Sir O. This violence—

Joseph S. Sir, 'tis your own fault.

Charles S. Out with him, to be sure.

[Both forcing Sir Oliver out.]

Enter Lady TEAZLE and Sir PETER, MARIA, and ROWLEY.

Sir P. My old friend, Sir Oliver—hey! What in the name of wonder—here are dutiful nephews—assault their uncles at a first visit!

Lady T. Indeed, Sir Oliver, 'twas well we came in to rescue you.

Row. Truly, it was; for I perceive, Sir Oliver, the character of old Stanley was no protection to you.

Sir O. Nor of Premium either; the necessities of the former could not extort a shilling from that benevolent gentleman; and with the other, I stood a chance of faring worse than my ancestors, and being knocked down without being bid for.

Joseph S. Charles!

Charles S. Joseph!

Joseph S. 'Tis now complete!

Charles S. Very!

Sir O. Sir Peter, my friend, and Rowley too—look on that elder nephew of mine. You know what he has already received from my bounty; and you also know how gladly I would have regarded half my fortune as held in trust for him: judge then my disappointment in discovering him to be destitute of truth, charity, and gratitude.

Sir P. Sir Oliver, I should be more surprised at this declaration, if I had not myself found him to be selfish, treacherous, and hypocritical.

Lady T. And if the gentleman pleads not guilty to these, pray let him call me to his character.

Sir P. Then, I believe, we need add no more: if he knows himself, he will consider it as the most perfect punishment, that he is known to the world.

Charles S. If they talk this way to honesty, what will they say to me, by and by? [Aside.]

[Sir PETER, Lady TEAZLE, and MARIA, retire.]

Sir O. As for that prodigal, his brother, there—

Charles S. Ay, now comes my turn: the damned family pictures will ruin me. [Aside.]

Joseph S. Sir Oliver—uncle, will you honour me with a hearing?

Charles S. Now if Joseph would make one of his long speeches, I might recollect myself a little. [Aside.]

Sir O. I suppose you would undertake to justify yourself? [To Joseph.]

Joseph S. I trust I could.

Sir O. Nay, if you desert your roguery in its distress, and try to be justified—you have even less principle than I thought you had.—[To Charles.] Well, sir! you could justify yourself too, I suppose?

Charles S. Not that I know of, Sir Oliver.

Sir O. What!—Little Premium has been let too much into the secret, I suppose?

Charles S. True, sir; but they were family secrets, and should not be mentioned again, you know.

Row. Come, Sir Oliver, I know you cannot speak of Charles's follies with anger.

Sir O. Odd's heart, no more I can; nor with gravity either. Sir Peter, do you know, the rogue bargained with me for all his ancestors; sold me judges and generals by the foot, and maiden aunts as cheap as broken china.

Charles S. To be sure, Sir Oliver, I did make a little free with the family canvass, that's the truth on't. My ancestors may certainly rise up in judgment against me; there's no denying it; but believe me sincere when I tell you—and upon my soul I would not say so if I was not—that if I do not appear mortified at the exposure of my follies, it is because I feel at this moment the warmest satisfaction in seeing you, my liberal benefactor.

Sir O. Charles, I believe you; give me your hand again; the ill-looking little fellow over the settee has made your peace.

Charles S. Then, sir, my gratitude to the original is still increased.

Lady T. [Advancing, MARIA on her left hand.] Yet, I believe, Sir Oliver, here is one whom Charles is still more anxious to be reconciled to.

Sir O. Oh, I have heard of his attachment there; and, with the young lady's pardon, if I construe right—that blush—

Sir P. Well, child, speak your sentiments!

Maria. Sir, I have little to say, but that I shall rejoice to hear that he is happy; for me—what-ever claim I had to his attention, I willingly resign to one who has a better title.

Charles S. How, Maria!

Sir P. Hey-day! what's the mystery now?—While he appeared an incorrigible rake, you would give your hand to no one else; and now that he is likely to reform, I'll warrant you won't have him.

Maria. His own heart and Lady Sneerwell know the cause.

Charles S. Lady Sneerwell!

Joseph S. Brother, it is with great concern I am obliged to speak on this point, but my regard to justice compels me, and Lady Sneerwell's injuries can no longer be concealed. [Opens the door.]

Enter Lady SNEERWELL.

Sir P. So! another French milliner! Egad, he has one in every room in the house, I suppose.

Lady S. Ungrateful Charles! Well may you be surprised, and feel for the indelicate situation your perfidy has forced me into.

Charles S. Pray, uncle, is this another plot of yours? For, as I have life, I don't understand it.

Joseph S. I believe, sir, there is but the evidence of one person more necessary to make it extremely clear.

Sir P. And that person, I imagine, is Mr. Snake. Rowley, you were perfectly right to bring him with us, and pray let him appear.

Row. Walk in, Mr. Snake.

Enter SNAKE.

I thought his testimony might be wanted: however, it happens unluckily, that he comes to confront Lady Sneerwell, not to support her.

Lady S. A villain! Treacherous to me at last!—Speak, fellow; have you, too, conspired against me?

Snake. I beg your ladyship ten thousand pardons: you paid me extremely liberally for the lie in question; but I, unfortunately, have been offered double to speak the truth.

Sir P. Plot and counter-plot! I wish your ladyship joy of your negotiation.

Lady S. The torments of shame and disappointment on you all!

Lady T. Hold, Lady Sneerwell: before you go, let me thank you for the trouble you and that gentleman have taken, in writing letters from me to Charles, and answering them yourself; and let me also request you to make my respects to the scandalous college, of which you are president, and inform them, that Lady Teazle, licentiate, begs leave to return the diploma they granted her, as she leaves off practice, and kills characters no longer.

Lady S. You, too, madam—provoking—insolent.—May your husband live these fifty years! [Exit.]

Sir P. Oons! what a fury!

Lady T. A malicious creature, indeed!

Sir P. What! Not for her last wish?

Lady T. O no!

Sir O. Well, sir, and what have you to say now?

Joseph S. Sir, I am so confounded, to find that Lady Sneerwell could be guilty of suborning Mr. Snake in this manner, to impose on us all, that I know not what to say: however, lest her revengeful spirit should prompt her to injure my brother, I had certainly better follow her directly. For the man who attempts to—

[Exit.]

Sir P. Moral to the last!

Sir O. Ay, and marry her,—Joseph, if you can. Egad! you'll do very well together.

Row. I believe we have no more occasion for Mr. Snake, at present.

Snake. Before I go, I beg pardon once for all, for whatever uneasiness I have been the humble instrument of causing to the parties present.

Sir P. Well, well, you have made atonement by a good deed at last.

Snake. But I must request of the company, that it shall never be known.

Sir P. Hey—What the plague!—Are you ashamed of having done a right thing once in your life?

Snake. Ah, sir, consider,—I live by the badness of my character; and if it were once known that I had been betrayed into an honest action, I should lose every friend I have in the world. [Exit.]

Sir O. Well, well; we'll not traduce you by saying anything in your praise, never fear.

Lady T. See, Sir Oliver, there needs no persuasion now to reconcile your nephew and Maria.

Sir O. Ay, ay, that's as it should be; and, egad, we'll have the wedding to-morrow morning.

Charles S. Thank you, dear uncle!

Sir P. What, you rogue! don't you ask the girl's consent first!

Charles S. Oh, I have done that a long time—a minute ago—and she has looked yes.

Maria. For shame, Charles!—I protest, Sir Peter, there has not been a word.

Sir O. Well, then, the fewer the better;—may your love for each other never know abatement!

Sir P. And may you live as happily together as Lady Teazle and I intend to do!

Charles S. Rowley, my old friend, I am sure you congratulate me; and I suspect that I owe you much.

Sir P. Ay, honest Rowley always said you would reform.

Charles S. Why, as to reforming, Sir Peter, I'll make no promises, and that I take to be a proof that I intend to set about it; but here shall be my monitor—my gentle guide.—Ah! can I leave the virtuous path those eyes illumine?

Though thou, dear maid, should'st wave thy beauty's sway,

Thou still must rule, because I will obey:

A humble fugitive from folly view,

No sanctuary near but Love and you;

[To the audience.]

You can, indeed, each anxious fear remove,

For even Scandal dies, if you approve.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Breakfast-table, with coffee-equipage, two chairs, Mr. and Mrs. DANGLE discovered at breakfast, reading newspapers.

Dan. [Reading.] Pshaw!—Nothing but politics—and I hate all politics but theatrical politics.—Where's the Morning Chronicle?

Mrs. D. Yes, that's your Gazette.

Dan. So, here we have it.—

"Theatrical intelligence extraordinary."—"We hear there is a new tragedy in rehearsal at Drury-lane Theatre, called the 'Spanish Armada,' said to be written by Mr. Puff, a gentleman well known in the theatrical world: if we may allow ourselves to give credit to the report of the performers, who, truth to say, are in general but indifferent judges, this piece abounds with the most striking and received beauties of modern composition."—So! I am very glad my friend Puff's tragedy is in such forwardness.—Mrs. Dangle, my dear, you will be very glad to hear that Puff's tragedy—

Mrs. D. Lord, Mr. Dangle, why will you plague me about such nonsense?—Now the plays are begun I shall have no peace.—Isn't it sufficient to make yourself ridiculous by your passion for the theatre, without continually teasing me to join you? Why can't you ride your hobbyhorse without desiring to place me on a pillion behind you, Mr. Dangle?

Dan. Nay, my dear, I was only going to read—

Mrs. D. No, no, you will never read anything that's worth listening to:—havn't you made yourself the jest of all your acquaintance by your interference in matters where you have no business? Are you not call'd a theatrical quidnunc, and a mock Mæcenas to second-hand authors?

Dan. True; my power with the managers is pretty notorious; but is it no credit to have applications from all quarters for my interest?—From lords to recommend fiddlers, from ladies to get boxes, from authors to get answers, and from actors to get engagements.

Mrs. D. Yes, truly; you have contrived to get a share in all the plague and trouble of theatrical property, without the profit, or even the credit of the abuse that attends it.

Dan. I am sure, Mrs. Dangle, you are no loser by it, however: you have all the advantages of it:—mightn't you, last winter, have had the reading of the new pantomime a fortnight previous to its performance? And doesn't Mr. Notter let you take places for a play before it is advertis'd, and set you down for a box for every new piece through the season? And didn't my friend, Mr. Smatter, dedicate his last farce to you at my particular request, Mrs. Dangle?

Mrs. D. [Rising.] Yes, but wasn't the farce damn'd, Mr. Dangle? And to be sure it is extremely pleasant to have one's house made the motley rendezvous of all the lackeys of literature.

Dan. Mrs. Dangle, Mrs. Dangle, you will not easily persuade me that there is no credit or importance in being at the head of a band of critics, who take upon them to decide for the whole town, whose opinion and patronage all writers solicit, and whose recommendation no manager dares refuse?

Mrs. D. Ridiculous!—Both managers and authors of the least merit laugh at your pretensions.—The Public is their Critic—without whose fair approbation they know no play can rest on the stage, and with whose applause they welcome such attacks as yours, and laugh at the malice of them, where they can't at the wit.

Dan. Very well, madam—very well.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Sneer, sir, to wait on you.

Dan. O, show Mr. Sneer up. [Exit Servant.] Plague on't, now we must appear loving and affectionate, or Sneer will hitch us into a story.

Mrs. D. With all my heart; you can't be more ridiculous than you are.

Dan. You are enough to provoke—

Enter Mr. SNEER.

—Ha! my dear Sneer, I am vastly glad to see you. My dear, here's Mr. Sneer; Mr. Sneer, my dear; my dear, Mr. Sneer.

Mrs. D. Good morning to you, sir.

Dan. Mrs. Dangle and I have been diverting ourselves with the papers.—Pray, Sneer, won't you go to Drury-lane Theatre the first night of Puff's tragedy?

Sneer. Yes; but I suppose one shan't be able to get in, for on the first night of a new piece they always fill the house with orders to support it. But here, Dangle, I have brought you two pieces, one of which you must exert yourself to make the managers accept; I can tell you that, for 'tis written by a person of consequence.

[Gives DANGLE two manuscripts.]

Dan. [Reading.] "Bursts into tears, and exit." What, is this a tragedy?

Sneer. No; that's genteel comedy, not a translation—only taken from the French; it is written in a style which they have lately tried to run down; the true sentimental, and nothing ridiculous in it from the beginning to the end.

Mrs. D. Well, if they had kept to that, I should not have been such an enemy to the stage; there was some edification to be got from those pieces, Mr. Sneer.

Sneer. I am quite of your opinion, Mrs. Dangle.

Dan. [Looking at the other MS.] But what have we here?—This seems a very odd—

Sneer. O, that's a comedy, on a very new plan; replete with wit and mirth, yet of a most serious moral! You see it is call'd "The Reformed Housebreaker;" where, by the mere force of humour, housebreaking is put into so ridiculous a light, that if the piece has its proper run, I have no doubt but that bolts and bars will be entirely useless by the end of the season.

Dan. Egad, this is new, indeed!

Sneer. Yes; it is written by a particular friend of mine, who has discovered that the follies and foibles of society are subjects unworthy of the notice of the Comic Muse, who should be taught to stoop only at the greater vices and blacker crimes of humanity—gibbeting capital offences in five acts, and pillorying petty larcenies in two.—In short, his idea is to dramatize the penal laws, and make the stage a court of ease to the Old Bailey.

Dan. That is to unite poetry and justice indeed!

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir Fretful Plagiary, sir.

Dan. Beg him to walk up.—[Exit Servant.] Now, Mrs. Dangle, Sir Fretful Plagiary is an author to your own taste.

Mrs. D. I confess he is a favourite of mine, because everybody else abuses him.

Sneer. Very much to the credit of your charity, madam, if not of your judgment.

Dan. But, egad, he allows no merit to any author but himself; that's the truth on't, though he's my friend.

Sneer. Never.—He's as envious as an old maid verging on the desperation of six-and-thirty.

Dan. Very true, egad—though he's my friend.

Sneer. Then his affected contempt of all newspaper strictures; though, at the same time, he is the sorest man alive, and shrinks like scorch'd parchment from the fiery ordeal of true criticism.

Dan. There's no denying it—though he is my friend.

Sneer. You have read the tragedy he has just finished, haven't you?

Dan. O, yes; he sent it to me yesterday.

Sneer. Well, and you think it execrable, don't you?

Dan. Why, between ourselves, egad I must own—though he's my friend—that it is one of the most—He's here [Aside—finished and admirable performance—

[Sir FRETFUL without.] Mr. Sneer with him, did you say?

Enter Sir FRETFUL.

Dan. Ah, my dear friend!—Egad, we were just speaking of your tragedy.—Admirable, Sir Fretful, admirable!

Sneer. You never did anything beyond it, Sir Fretful—never in your life.

Sir F. You make me extremely happy; for, without a compliment, my dear Sneer, there isn't a man in the world whose judgment I value as I do yours—and Mr. Dangle's.

Mrs. D. They are only laughing at you, Sir Fretful, for it was but just now that—

Dan. Mrs. Dangle! Ah, Sir Fretful, you know Mrs. Dangle.—My friend Sneer was rallying just now—He knows how she admires you, and—

Sir F. O Lord, I am sure Mr. Sneer has more taste and sincerity than to—[Aside.] A damn'd double-faced fellow!

Dan. Yes, yes,—Sneer will jest—but a better humour'd—

Sir F. O, I know—

Dan. He has a ready turn for ridicule—his wit costs him nothing.—

Sir F. No, egad,—or I should wonder how he came by it. [Aside.]

Dan. But, Sir Fretful, have you sent your play to the managers yet?—or can I be of any service to you?

Sir F. No, no, I thank you; I sent it to the manager of Covent-garden Theatre this morning.

Sneer. I should have thought now, that it might have been cast (as the actors call it) better at Drury-lane.

Sir F. O lud! no—never send a play there while I live—harkee!

[Whispers SNEER.]

Sneer. "Writes himself!" I know he does—

Sir F. I say nothing—I take away from no man's merit—am hurt at no man's good fortune—I say nothing—But this I will say—through all my knowledge of life, I have observed—that there is not a passion so strongly rooted in the human heart as envy!

Sneer. I believe you have reason for what you say, indeed.

Sir F. Besides—I can tell you it is not always so safe to leave a play in the hands of those who write themselves.

Sneer. What, they may steal from them, hey, my dear Plagiary?

Sir F. Steal!—to be sure they may; and, egad, serve your best thoughts as gypsies do stolen children, disfigure them to make 'em pass for their own.

Sneer. But your present work is a sacrifice to Melpomene, and he you know never—

Sir F. That's no security.—A dext'rous plagiarist may do anything.—Why, sir, for aught I know, he might take out some of the best things in my tragedy, and put them into his own comedy.

Sneer. That might be done, I dare be sworn.

Sir F. And then, if such a person gives you the least hint or assistance, he is devilish apt to take the merit of the whole—

Dan. If it succeeds.

Sir F. Aye,—but with regard to this piece, I think I can hit that gentleman, for I can safely swear he never read it.

Sneer. I'll tell you how you may hurt him more—

Sir F. How?

Sneer. Swear he wrote it.

Sir F. Plague on't now, Sneer, I shall take it ill.—I believe you want to take away my character as an author!

Sneer. Then I am sure you ought to be very much oblig'd to me.

Sir F. Hey!—Sir!

Dan. O you know he never means what he says.

Sir F. Sincerely, then—you do like the piece?

Sneer. Wonderfully!

Sir F. But come now, there must be something that you think might be mended, hey?—Mr. Dangle, has nothing struck you?

Dan. Why, faith, it is but an ungracious thing, for the most part, to—

Sir F. With most authors it is just so indeed; they are in general strangely tenacious!—But, for my part, I am never so well pleased as when a judicious critic points out any defect to me; for what is the purpose of showing a work to a friend, if you don't mean to profit by his opinion?

Sneer. Very true. Why then, though I seriously admire the piece upon the whole, yet there is one small objection; which, if you'll give me leave, I'll mention.

Sir F. Sir, you can't oblige me more.

Sneer. I think it wants incident.

Sir F. Good God!—you surprise me!—wants incident!

Sneer. Yes; I own I think the incidents are too few.

Sir F. Good God!—Believe me, Mr. Sneer, there is no person for whose judgment I have a more implicit deference.—But I protest to you, Mr. Sneer, I am only apprehensive that the incidents are too crowded.—My dear Dangle, how does it strike you?

Dan. Really, I can't agree with my friend Sneer.—I think the plot quite sufficient; and the four first acts by many degrees the best I ever read or saw in my life. If I might venture to suggest anything, it is that the interest rather falls off in the fifth.

Sir F. Rises, I believe you mean, sir—

Dan. No; I don't, upon my word.

Sir F. Yes, yes, you do, upon my soul—it certainly don't fall off, I assure you—No, no, it don't fall off.

Dan. Now, Mrs. Dangle, didn't you say it struck you in the same light?

Mrs. D. No, indeed, I did not—I did not see a fault in any part of the play from the beginning to the end.

Sir F. Upon my soul, the women are the best judges after all!

Mrs. D. Or, if I made any objection, I am sure it was to nothing in the piece! but that I was afraid it was, on the whole, a little too long.

Sir F. Pray, madam, do you speak as to duration of time; or do you mean that the story is tediously spun out?

Mrs. D. O lud! no.—I speak only with reference to the usual length of acting plays.

Sir F. Then I am very happy—very happy indeed—because the play is a short play, a remarkably short play: I should not venture to differ with a lady on a point of taste; but, on these occasions, the watch, you know, is the critic.

Mrs. D. Then, I suppose, it must have been Mr. Dangle's drawing manner of reading it to me.

Sir F. O, if Mr. Dangle read it! that's quite another affair!—But I assure you, Mrs. Dangle, the first evening you can spare me three hours and a half, I'll undertake to read you the whole from beginning to end, with the Prologue and Epilogue, and allow time for the music between the acts.

Mrs. D. I hope to see it on the stage next. [Exit.]

Dan. Well, Sir Fretful, I wish you may be able to get rid as easily of the newspaper criticisms as you do of ours.

Sir F. The newspapers!—Sir, they are the most villanous—licentious—abominable—infernal—Not that I ever read them! No! I make it a rule never to look into a newspaper.

Dan. You are quite right—for it certainly must hurt an author of delicate feelings to see the liberties they take.

Sir F. No!—quite the contrary;—their abuse is, in fact, the best panegyric—I like it of all things. An author's reputation is only in danger from their support.

Sneer. Why, that's true—and that attack now on you the other day—

Sir F. What? where?

Dan. Aye, you mean in a paper of Thursday; it was completely ill-natur'd, to be sure.

Sir F. O, so much the better—Ha! ha! ha!—I wouldn't have it otherwise.

Dan. Certainly, it is only to be laugh'd at; for—

Sir F. You don't happen to recollect what the fellow said, do you?

Sneer. Pray, Dangle—Sir Fretful seems a little anxious!

Sir F. O lud, no!—anxious,—not I,—not the least. I—But one may as well hear, you know.

Dan. Sneer, do you recollect?—Make out something. [Aside.]

Sneer. I will. [To DANGLE.] Yes, yes, I remember perfectly.

Sir F. Well, and pray now—not that it signifies—what might the gentleman say?

Sneer. Why, he roundly asserts that you have not the slightest invention or original genius whatever: though you are the greatest traducer of all other authors living.

Sir F. Ha! ha! ha! Very good!

Sneer. That, as to comedy, you have not one idea of your own, he believes, even in your common-place-book, where stray jokes and pilfered witticisms are kept with as much method as the ledger of the Lost and Stolen Office.

Sir F. Ha! ha! ha! Very pleasant!

Sneer. Nay, that you are so unlucky as not to have the skill even to steal with taste: but that you glean from the refuse of obscure volumes, where more judicious plagiarists have been before you; so that the body of your work is a composition of dregs and sediments, like a bad tavern's worst wine.

Sir F. Ha! ha!

Sneer. In your more serious efforts, he says, your bombast would be less intolerable, if the thoughts were ever suited to the expression; but the homeliness of the sentiment stares through the fantastic encumbrance of it's fine language, like a clown in one of the new uniforms!

Sir F. Ha! ha!

Sneer. That your occasional tropes and flowers suit the general coarseness of your style, as tambour sprigs would a ground of linsey-wolsey; while your imitations of Shakspeare resemble the mimicry of Falstaff's page, and about as near the standard of the original.

Sir F. Ha!

Sneer. In short, that even the finest passages you steal are of no service to you; for the poverty of your own language prevents their assimilating; so that they lie on the surface like lumps of marl on a barren moor, encumbering what it is not in their power to fertilize!

Sir F. [After great agitation.] Now, another person would be vex'd at this.

Sneer. Oh! but I wouldn't have told you, only to divert you.

Sir F. I know it—I am diverted,—Ha! ha! ha!—not the least invention!—Ha! ha! ha! very good! very good!

Sneer. Yes—no genius! Ha! ha! ha!

Dan. A severe rogue! ha! ha! But you are quite right, Sir Fretful, never to read such nonsense.

Sir F. To be sure—for, if there is anything to one's praise, it is a foolish vanity to be gratified at it; and if it is abuse,—why, one is always sure to hear of it from one damn'd good-natur'd friend or another!

Enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Puff, sir, has sent word that the last rehearsal is to be this morning, and that he'll call on you presently.

Dan. That's true—I shall certainly be at home. [Exit Servant.] Now, Sir Fretful, if you have a mind to have justice done you in the way of answer—Egad, Mr. Puff's your man.

Sir F. Pshaw! sir, why should I wish to have it answered, when I tell you I am pleased at it?

Dan. True, I had forgot that.—But I hope you are not fretted at what Mr. Sneer—

Sir F. Zounds! no, Mr. Dangle, don't I tell you these things never fret me in the least,

Dan. Nay, I only thought—

Sir F. And let me tell you, Mr. Dangle, 'tis damn'd affronting in you to suppose that I am hurt, when I tell you I am not.

Sneer. But why so warm, Sir Fretful?

Sir F. Gadslife! Mr. Sneer, you are as absurd as Dangle: how often must I repeat it to you, that nothing can vex me but your supposing it possible for me to mind the damn'd nonsense you have been repeating to me!—And let me tell you, if you continue to believe this, you must mean to insult me, gentlemen—and then your disrespect will affect me no more than the newspaper criticisms—and I shall treat it with exactly the same calm indifference and philosophic contempt—and so your servant. [Exit.]

Sneer. Ha! ha! ha! Poor Sir Fretful! Now will he go and vent his philosophy in anonymous abuse of all modern critics and authors. But, Dangle, you must get your friend Puff to take me to the rehearsal of his tragedy.

Dan. I'll answer for't, he'll thank you for desiring it.

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Puff, sir.

Dan. My dear Puff!

Enter PUFF.

Puff. My dear Dangle, how is it with you?

Dan. Mr. Sneer, give me leave to introduce Mr. Puff to you.

Puff. Mr. Sneer is this? Sir, he is a gentleman whom I have long panted for the honour of knowing—a gentleman, whose critical talents and transcendend judgment—

Sneer. Dear sir—

Dan. Nay, don't be modest, Sneer; my friend Puff only talks to you in the style of his profession.

Sneer. His profession!

Puff. Yes, sir; I make no secret of the trade I follow—among friends and brother authors, Dangle knows I love to be frank on the subject, and to advertise myself viva voce.—I am, sir, a Practitioner in Panegyric, or, to speak more plainly—a Professor of the Art of Puffing, at your service—or anybody else's.

Sneer. Sir, you are very obliging!—I believe, Mr. Puff, I have often admired your talents in the daily prints.

Puff. Yes, sir, I flatter myself I do as much business in that way as any six of the fraternity in town—Devilish hard work all the summer—Friend Dangle never work'd harder!—But harkee,—the winter managers were a little sore, I believe.

Dan. No! I believe they took it all in good part.

Puff. Aye!—Then that must have been affectation in them; for, egad, there were some of the attacks which there was no laughing at!

Sneer. Aye, the humorous ones. But I should think, Mr. Puff, that authors would in general be able to do this sort of work for themselves.

Puff. Why, yes—but in a clumsy way. Besides, we look on that as an encroachment, and so take the opposite side. I dare say now you conceive half the very civil paragraphs and advertisements you see, to be written by the parties concerned, or their friends? No such thing. Nine out of ten, manufactured by me in the way of business.

Sneer. Indeed!

Puff. Even the auctioneers now—the auctioneers, I say, though the rogues have lately got some credit for their language—not an article of the merit theirs!—Take them out of their pulpits, and they are as dull as catalogues!—No, sir; 'twas I first enriched their style—'twas I first taught them to crowd their advertisements with panegyric superlatives, each epithet rising above the other—like the bidders in their own auction-rooms! From ME they learn'd to enlay their phraseology with variegated chips of exotic metaphor; by ME, too, their inventive faculties were called forth. Yes, sir, by ME they were instructed to clothe ideal walls with gratuitous fruit—to insinuate obsequious rivulets into visionary groves—to teach courteous shrubs to nod their approbation of the grateful soil! or, on emergencies, to raise upstart oaks, where there had never been an acorn; to create a delightful vicinage, without the assistance of a neighbour; or fix the temple of Hygeia in the fens of Lincolnshire!

Dan. I am sure you have done them infinite service; for now, when a gentleman is ruined, he parts with his house with some credit.

Sneer. Service! if they had any gratitude, they would erect a statue to him. But pray, Mr. Puff, what first put you on exercising your talents in this way?

Puff. Egad, sir—sheer necessity—the proper parent of an art so nearly allied to invention; you must know, Mr. Sneer, that from the first time I tried my hand at an advertisement, my success was such, that, for some time after, I led a most extraordinary life indeed!

Sneer. How, pray?

Puff. Sir, I supported myself two years entirely by my misfortunes.

Sneer. By your misfortunes?

Puff. Yes, sir, assisted by long sickness, and other occasional disorders; and a very comfortable living I had of it.

Sneer. From sickness and misfortune!

Puff. Harkee!—By advertisements—"To the charitable and humane!" and "To those whom Providence hath blessed with affluence!"

Sneer. Oh,—I understand you.

Puff. And, in truth, I deserved what I got; for I suppose never man went through such a series of calamities in the same space of time!—Sir, I was five times made a bankrupt, and reduced from a state of affluence, by a train of unavoidable misfortunes! Then, sir, though a very industrious tradesman, I was twice burnt out, and lost my little all, both times! I lived upon those fires a month. I soon after was confined by a most excruciating disorder, and lost the use of my limbs! That told very well; for I had the case strongly attested, and went about to collect the subscriptions myself.

Dan. Egad, I believe that was when you first called on me—

Puff. What, in November last?—O no! When I called on you I was a close prisoner in the Marshalsea, for a debt benevolently contracted to serve a friend! I was afterwards twice tapped for a dropsy, which declined into a very profitable consumption! I was then reduced to—O no—then, I became a widow with six helpless children,—after having had eleven husbands pressed, and being left every time eight months gone with child, and without money to get me into an hospital!

Sneer. And you bore all with patience, I make no doubt?

Puff. Why, yes,—though I made some occasional attempts at jelo de se; but as I did not find those rash actions answer, I left off killing myself very soon.—Well, sir,—at last, what with bankruptcies, fires, gout, dropsies, imprisonments, and other valuable calamities, having got together a pretty handsome sum, I determined to quit a business which had always gone rather against my conscience, and in a more liberal way still to indulge my talents for fiction and embellishments, through my favourite channels of diurnal communication—and so, sir, you have my history.

Sneer. Most obligingly communicative, indeed. But surely, Mr. Puff, there is no great mystery in your present profession?

Puff. Mystery! Sir, I will take upon me to say the matter was never scientifically treated, nor reduced to rule, before.

Sneer. Reduced to rule?

Puff. O lud, sir! you are very ignorant, I am afraid.—Yes, sir,—Puffing is of various sorts:—the principal are—the Puff direct—the Puff preliminary—the Puff collateral—the Puff collusive—and the Puff oblique, or Puff by implication. These all assume, as circumstances require, the various forms of—Letter to the Editor—Occasional Anecdote—Impartial Critique—Observation from Correspondent—or Advertisements from the Party.

Sneer. The Puff direct, I can conceive—

Puff. O yes, that's simple enough,—for instance—A new Comedy or Farce is to be produced at one of the Theatres (though, by the by, they don't bring out half what they ought to do): the author, suppose Mr. Smatter, or Mr. Dapper, or any particular friend of mine—very well; the day before it is to be performed, I write an account of the manner in which it was received—I have the plot from the author,—and only add—Characters strongly drawn—highly coloured—hand of a master—fund of genuine humour—mine of invention—neat dialogue—attic salt!—Then for the performance—Mr. Baker was astonishingly great in the character of Sir Harry! That universal and judicious actor, Mr. Egerton, perhaps never appeared to more advantage than in the Colonel: but it is not in the power of language to do justice to Mr. Jones!—Indeed, he more than merited those repeated bursts of applause which he drew from a most brilliant and judicious audience! In short, we are at a loss which to admire most,—the unrivalled genius of the author, the great attention and liberality of the managers, the wonderful abilities of the painter, or the incredible exertions of all the performers!

Sneer. That's pretty well, indeed, sir.

Puff. O cool, quite cool, to what I sometimes do.

Sneer. And do you think there are any who are influenced by this?

Puff. O, lud! yes, sir; the number of those who undergo the fatigue of judging for themselves is very small indeed!

Dan. Ha! ha! ha!—'gad, I know it is so.

Puff. As to the Puff oblique, or Puff by implication, it is too extensive, and branches into so many varieties, that it is impossible to be illustrated by an instance;—it is the last principal class of the Art of Puffing—an art which I hope you will now agree with me, is of the highest dignity.

Sneer. Sir, I am completely a convert both to the importance and ingenuity of your profession; and now, sir, there is but one thing which can possibly increase my respect for you, and that is, your permitting me to be present this morning at the rehearsal of your new tragedy—

Puff. Hush, for Heaven's sake—My tragedy!—Egad, Dangle, I take this very ill; you know how apprehensive I am of being known to be the author.

Dan. 'Faith, I would not have told; but it's in the papers, and your name at length—in the Morning Chronicle.

Puff. Ah! those damn'd editors never can keep a secret! Well, Mr. Sneer, no doubt you will do me great honour—I shall be infinitely happy—highly flattered.

Dan. I believe it must be near the time—shall we go together?

Puff. No; it will not be yet this hour, for they are always late at that theatre: besides, I must meet you there, for I have some little matters to send to the papers, and a few paragraphs to scribble before I go. [Looking at memorandums.] Here is 'a Conscientious Baker, on the subject of the Army Bread,' and 'a Detester of visible Brick-work, in favour of the new-invented Stucco;' both in the style of Junius, and promised for to-morrow.—Here is an invention for the running our mail-coaches by steam, and lighting them by gas.—I have also a very ingenious design for a self-acting air-pump, to be fixed in the confined streets, which is to supersede the necessity of country excursions for the benefit of the health. Here are likewise many other valuable memorandums, most of which I have no doubt but I shall render equally practicable, and of the greatest importance to the nation. So, egad, I have not a moment to lose.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Theatre.

Enter DANGLE, PUFF, and SNEER, as before the Curtain. Three chairs on.

Puff. No, no, sir; what Shakspeare says of actors may be better applied to the purpose of plays; they ought to be 'the abstract and brief chronicles of the times.' Therefore when history, and particularly the history of our own country, furnishes anything like a case in point, to the time in which an author writes, if he knows his own interest, he will take advantage of it; so, sir, I call my tragedy the 'Spanish Armada;' and have laid the scene before Tilbury Fort.

Sneer. A most happy thought, certainly!

Dan. Egad, it was; I told you so. But pray, now, I don't understand how you have contrived to introduce any love into it.

Puff. Love!—Oh, nothing so easy: for it is a received point among poets, that, where history gives you a good heroic outline for a play, you may fill up with a little love at your own discretion: in doing which, nine times out of ten, you only make up a deficiency in the private history of the times. Now I rather think I have done this with some success.

Sneer. No scandal about Queen Elizabeth, I hope?

Puff. O lud! no, no. I only suppose the governor of Tilbury Fort's daughter to be in love with the son of the Spanish admiral.

Sneer. Oh, is that all?

Dan. Excellent, 'faith! I see it at once. But won't this appear rather improbable?

Puff. To be sure it will—but what the plague! a play is not to show occurrences that happen every day, but things just so strange, that though they never did, they might happen.

Sneer. Certainly, nothing is unnatural, that is not physically impossible.

Puff. Very true—and for that matter, DonjFerrolo Whiskerandos—for that's the lover's name—might have been over here in the train of the Spanish ambassador; or Tilburina, for that is the lady's name, might have been in love with him, from having heard his character, or seen his picture; or from knowing that he was the last man in the world she ought to be in love with, or for any other good female reason. However, sir, the fact is, that though she is but a knight's daughter, egad! she is in love like any princess!

Dan. Poor young lady! I feel for her already!

Puff. O amazing!—her poor susceptible heart is swayed to and fro, by contending passions, like—

Enter Under Prompter.

Under P. Sir, the scene is set, and everything is ready to begin, if you please.

Puff. Egad, then we'll lose no time.

Under P. Though I believe, sir, you will find it very short, for all the performers have profited by the kind permission you granted them.

Puff. Hey! what!

Under P. You know, sir, you gave them leave to cut out or omit whatever they found heavy or unnecessary to the plot, and I must own they have taken very liberal advantage of your indulgence.

[Exit.]

Puff. Well, well. They are in general very good judges, and I know I am luxuriant. Gentlemen, be seated. [SNEER AND DANGLE sit.] Now, Mr. Wodarch [To Leader of the Band], please to play a few bars of something soft, just to prepare the audience for the curtain's rising.

[The Band strike 'Bobbing Joan,' very forte.]

Puff. [Having stopped them with much difficulty.] Now, really, gentlemen, this is unkind. I ask you to play a soothing air, and you strike up Bobbing Joan. [To SNEER, &c.] These gentlemen will have their joke at rehearsal, you see. [To Orchestra.] Come, gentlemen, oblige me. [The Band play a few bars of soft music.] Aye, that's right,—for we have the scenes, and dresses; egad, we'll go to it, as if it was the first night's performance; but you need not mind stopping between the acts. Soh! stand clear, gentlemen. Now you know there will be a cry of down!—down!—hats off!—silence! Then up curtain,—and let us see what our painters have done for us.

SCENE II.—The Curtain rises, and discovers Tilbury Fort. Two Sentinels asleep on the ground.

Dan. Tilbury Fort!—very fine, indeed!

Puff. Now, what do you think I open with?

Sneer. Faith, I can't guess—

Puff. A clock.

Sneer. A clock!

Puff. Hark!—[Clock strikes four.] I open with a clock striking, to beget an awful attention in the audience—it also marks the time, which is four o'clock in the morning, and saves a description of the rising sun, and a great deal about gilding the eastern hemisphere.

Dan. But, pray, are the sentinels to be asleep?

Puff. Fast as watchmen.

Sneer. Isn't that odd though, at such an alarming crisis?

Puff. To be sure it is:—but smaller things must give way to a striking scene at the opening; that's a rule.—And the case is, that two great men are coming to this very spot to begin the piece; now, it is not to be supposed they would open their lips, if these fellows were watching them; so, egad, I must either have them sent off their posts, or set them asleep.

Sneer. O, that accounts for it!—But tell us, who are these coming?—

Puff. These? They are—Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Christopher Hatton. You'll know Sir Christopher, by his turning out his toes,—famous, you know, for his dancing. I like to preserve all the little traits of character. Now attend.

Enter Sir CHRISTOPHER HATTON and Sir WALTER RALEIGH.

'Sir C. True, gallant Raleigh!'

Dan. What, had they been talking before?

Puff. O yes; all the way as they came along. I beg pardon, gentlemen [To the Actors], but these are particular friends of mine. Mr. Sneer and Mr. Dangle, Mr. Keeley and Mr. Meadows, both very promising gentlemen in their profession, I assure you. [The Actors take off their hats, and bow very low.] I know it's against the rule to introduce strangers at a rehearsal, but as they are particular friends of mine, I thought you would excuse. Don't mind interrupting these fellows whenever anything strikes you. [To SNEER and DANGLE.

'Sir C. True, gallant Raleigh!'

'But O, thou champion of thy country's fame,

'There is a question which I yet must ask;

'A question, which I never ask'd before.

'What mean these mighty armaments?

'This general muster? and this throng of chiefs?'

Sneer. Pray, Mr. Puff, how came Sir Christopher Hatton never to ask that question before?

Puff. What, before the play began? How the plague could he?

Dan. That's true, 'efaith!

Puff. But you will hear what he thinks of the matter.

'Sir C. Alas, my noble friend, when I behold—'

Puff. [Interrupts him.] My good friend, you entirely forget what I told you the last rehearsal,—that there was a particular trait in Sir Christopher's character—that he was famous, in Queen Elizabeth's time, for his dancing—pray, turn your toes out. [With his foot, he pushes Sir C.'s feet out, until they are nearly square.] That will do—now, sir, proceed.

'Sir C. Alas, my noble friend, when I behold

'Yon tented plains in martial symmetry

'Array'd—when I count o'er you glittering lines

'Of crested warriors—

'When briefly all I hear or see bears stamp

'Of martial preparation, and stern defence,

'I cannot but surmise—Forgive, my friend,

'If the conjecture's rash'—

Puff. [Interrupting.] A little more freedom,—if you please. Remember that Sir Christopher and Sir Walter were on the most familiar footing. Now, as thus—[Quotes the line flippantly.

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. V.

'Sir C. [Imitates his manner.] I cannot but surmise. Forgive, my friend,

'If the conjecture's rash—I cannot but

'Surmise—the state some danger apprehends!'

Sneer. A very cautious conjecture that.

Puff. Yes, that's his character; not to give an opinion, but on secure grounds.—Now then.

'Sir W. O, most accomplished Christopher.'

Puff. Keep up the Christopher! 'O most accomplished Christopher.' He calls him by his Christian name, to show that they are on the most familiar terms.

'Sir W. O, most accomplished Christopher, I find

'Thy fears are just.

'Sir C. But where, whence, when, what, which, and whose,

'The danger is—methinks, I fain would learn.

'Sir W. You know, my friend, scarce two revolving suns'—

Puff. [Stopping him.] Suit the word to the action, and the action to the word.

'You know, my friend, scarce two revolving suns.'

[Passes his hands one over the other, with a circular motion.]

'Sir W. [Using the same action.] You know, my friend, scarce two revolving suns,

'And three revolving moons,'—

Puff. No, no: send your moons the other way, or you'll bring about an eclipse!

[Repeats the same lines again the second time, turning his hands the contrary way.]

'Sir W. [Using PUFF's action.] You know, my friend, scarce two revolving suns,

'And three revolving moons, have closed their course,

'Since haughty Philip, in despite of peace,

'With hostile hand hath struck at England's trade.

'Sir C. I know it well.

'Sir W. Philip, you know, is proud Iberia's king!

'Sir C. He is.

'Sir W. You know, beside, his boasted armament,

'The fam'd Armada, by the Pope baptized,

'With purpose to invade these realms——'

'Sir C. Is sail'd:

'Our last advices so report.

'Sir W. While the Spanish admiral's chief hope,

'His darling son, by chance a prisoner has been taken,

'And in this fort of Tilbury'—

Puff. [Mocking his tone.] 'Tilbury!' Don't speak of Tilbury Fort as if it was a gin-shop! Keep up its consequence. 'And in this fort of Tilbury!'

[Sir WALTER repeats the line after PUFF's manner.

'Sir C. Is now confin'd.

'Sir W. You also know'—

Dan. Mr. Puff, as he knows all this, why does Sir Walter go on telling him?

Puff. But the audience are not supposed to know anything of the matter, are they?

Sneer. True, but I think you manage ill: for there certainly appears no reason why Sir Walter should be so communicative.

Puff. Foregod now, that is one of the most ungrateful observations I ever heard; for the less inducement he has to tell all this, the more I think you ought to be obliged to him; for, I am sure, you'd know nothing of the matter without it.

Dan. That's very true, upon my word.

Puff. But you will find he was not going on.

'Sir C. Enough, enough,—'tis plain,—and I no more

'Am in amazement lost!'

Puff. Here, now you see, Sir Christopher did not in fact ask any one question for his own information.

Sneer. No, indeed: his has been a most disinterested curiosity!

Dan. Really, I find, we are very much obliged to them both.

Puff. To be sure you are. Now then for the commander-in-chief, the Earl of Leicester! who, you know, was no favourite but of the Queen's. We left off—'in amazement lost!'

'Sir C. Am in amazement lost.

'But see where noble Leicester comes! supreme in honours and command.'

Sneer. But who are these with him?

Puff. O! very valiant knights; one is the governor of the fort, the other the master of the horse. And now, I think you shall hear some better language: I was obliged to be plain and intelligible in the first scene, because there was so much matter of fact in it; but now, efaith, you have trope, figure, and metaphor, as plenty as noun-substantives.

Enter Earl of LEICESTER, Governor, and Master of the Horse.

'Lei. How's this, my friends! is't thus your new-fledg'd zeal

'And plumed valour moulds in roosted sloth?

'Why dimly glimmers that heroic flame,

'Whose redd'ning blaze, by patriot spirit fed,

'Should be the beacon of a kindling realm?

'Can the quick current of a patriot heart

'Thus stagnate in a cold and weedy converse,

'Or freeze in tideless inactivity?

'No! rather let the fountain of your valour

'Spring through each stream of enterprize,

'Each petty channel of conducive daring,

'Till the full torrent of your foaming wrath

'O'erwhelm the flats of sunk hostility!'

Puff. [Runs up and embraces him.] Allow me to introduce Mr. Horrebrow to you—Mr. Dangle and Mr. Sneer. [Returns.

'Sir W. No more! the fresh'ning breath of thy rebuke

'Hath fill'd the swelling canvass of our souls!

'And thus, though fate should cut the cable of [All take hands.

'Our topmost hopes, in friendship's closing line

'We'll grapple with despair, and if we fall,

'We'll fall in Glory's wake! [They part hands.

'Lei. [Slowly.] There spoke Old England's genius!'

Puff. No, no, sir; Old England's genius never spoke in that way. She must be a devilish queer genius if she did. No, sir, keep it up. [Quotes with heroic bombast.] 'There spoke Old England's genius.'

'Lei. [With PUFF's manner.] There spoke Old England's genius!

'Then, are we all resolv'd?

'All. We are—all resolv'd.

'Lei. To conquer—or be free.

'All. To conquer—or be free.

'Lei. All?

'All. All.'

Dan. Nem. con. egad!

Puff. O yes, where they do agree on the stage, their unanimity is wonderful.

'Lei. Then, let's embrace,—[They embrace.]—and now'— [Kneels.

Sneer. What the plague, is he going to pray?

Puff. Yes, hush! In great emergencies, there is nothing like a prayer!

'Lei. O mighty Mars!'

Puff. Stop, my dear sir. You do not expect to find Mars there. No, sir, whenever you address the gods, always look into the upper gallery.

'Lei. [Looking up to the gallery.] O mighty Mars!'

Dan. But why should he pray to Mars?

Puff. Hush!

'Lei. O mighty Mars, if in thy homage bred,

'Each point of discipline I've still observ'd;

'Nor but by due promotion, and the right

'Of service, to the rank of Major-general

'Have ris'n;'

Puff. Keep up the Major-general! [Repeats the line with force.] 'To the rank of Major-general have ris'n!' Tip them the Major-general, pray.

'Lei. [After PUFF's manner.] To the rank of Major-general

'Have ris'n; assist thy votary now!

'Gov. [Kneels.] Yet do not rise—hear me!

'Mast. of H. [Kneels.] And me!

'Sir W. [Kneels.] And me!

'Sir C. [Kneels.] And me!'

Puff. [Kneels.] And me! Now, mind your hits; pray altogether.

'All. Behold thy votaries submissive beg,

'That thou wilt deign to grant them all they ask;'

Puff. No, no, gentlemen, the emphasis is upon the word all. Thus:

'Behold thy votaries submissive beg,

'That thou wilt deign to grant them all they ask;'

Now, gentlemen.

'All. Behold thy votaries submissive beg,

'That thou wilt deign to grant them all they ask;

'Assist them to accomplish all their ends,

'And sanctify whatever means they use

'To gain them!'

Sneer. A very orthodox quintetto!

Puff. Vastly well, gentlemen, indeed, for persons who are not much in the habit of praying. Is that well managed or not? I believe you haven't such a prayer as that on the stage.

Sneer. Not exactly.

Lei. [To PUFF.] But, sir, you haven't settled how we are to get off here.

Puff. You could not go off kneeling, could you?

Lei. O no, sir, impossible!

Puff. It would have a good effect, efaith, if you could! "exeunt praying!" Yes, and would vary the established mode of springing off with a glance at the pit.

Sneer. O never mind, so as you get them off, I'll answer for it, the audience won't care how.

Puff. Well, then, repeat the last line standing, and go off the old way.

'All. And sanctify whatever means we use to gain them.' [Exeunt.

Dan. Bravo! a fine exit.

Sneer. Stay a moment.

The Sentinels get up.

'1st Sen. All this shall to Lord Burleigh's ear.

'2d Sen. 'Tis meet it should.' [Exeunt Sentinels.
Dan. Hey!—why, I thought those fellows had been asleep?

Puff. Only a pretence; there's the art of it; they were spies of Lord Burleigh's. But take care, my dear Dangle, the morning gun is going to fire.

Dan. Well, that will have a fine effect.

Puff. I think so, and helps to realize the scene. [Cannon, three times from battery.] What the plague!—three morning guns!—there never is but one! Aye, this is always the way at the theatre—give these fellows a good thing, and they never know when to have done with it. You have no more cannon to fire?

Prompt. [From within.] No, sir.

Puff. Now, then, for soft music.

Sneer. Pray what's that for?

Puff. It shows that Tilburina is coming; nothing introduces you a heroine like soft music.—Here she comes.

Dan. And her confidant, I suppose?

Puff. To be sure: here they are—inconsolable—to the minuet in Ariadne!

[Soft music in Orchestra.]

Enter TILBURINA and Confidant.

'Til. Now flowers unfold their beauties to the sun,
 'And blushing, kiss the beam he sends to wake them.

'The strip'd carnation, and the guarded rose,
 'The vulgar wall-flow'r, and smart gilly-flower,
 'The polyanthus mean—the dapper daisy,
 'Sweet William, and sweet marjorum,—and all
 'The tribe of single and of double pinks!
 'Now, too, the feather'd warblers tune their notes
 'Around, and charm the list'ning grove—The lark!
 'The linnet! chaffinch! bullfinch! goldfinch!
 'greenfinch!

'—But O to me, no joy can they afford!
 'Nor rose, nor wall-flow'r, nor smart gilly-flower,
 'Nor polyanthus mean, nor dapper daisy,
 'Nor William sweet, nor marjorum—nor lark,
 'Linnet, nor all the finches of the grove!'

Puff. [Holding his handkerchief to his eyes.] Your white handkerchief, madam—there, if you please.

Til. I thought, sir, I was't to use that 'till "heart-rending woe."

Puff. O yes, madam—at 'the finches of the grove,' if you please.

'Til. —Nor lark,

'Linnet, nor all the finches of the grove!' [Weeps.

Puff. Vastly well, madam!

Dan. Vastly well, indeed!

'Til. For, O too sure, heart-rending woe is now
 'The lot of wretched Tilburina!'

Dan. O! 'tis too much.

Sneer. Oh!—it is, indeed.

'Con. Be comforted, sweet lady—for whoknows,
 'But Heav'n has yet some milk-white day in store.

'Til. Alas, my youthful—gentle Nora,
 'Thy tender youth as yet hath never mourn'd
 'Love's fatal dart.

'Con. But see where your stern father comes;
 'It is not meet that he should find you thus.'

Puff. Hey, what the plague! what a cut is here!
 —why, what is become of the description of her first meeting with Don Whiskerandos? his gallant behaviour in the sea-fight, and the simile of the canary-bird?

Til. Indeed, sir, you'll find they will not be miss'd.

Puff. Very well.—Very well!

Til. The cue, ma'am, if you please.

'Con. It is not meet that he should find you thus.

'Til. Thou counsel'st right, but 'tis no easy task
 'For barefac'd grief to wear a mask of joy.

Enter Governor.

'Gov. How's this—in tears?—O—'

Puff. There's a round O! for you.

Sneer. A capital O!

'Gov. Tilburina, shame!

'Is this a time for maudling tenderness,
 'And Cupid's baby woes?—hast thou not heard

'That haughty Spain's Pope-consecrated fleet

'Advances to our shores, while England's fate,

'Like a clipp'd guinea, trembles in the scale!

'Til. [Seizing Governor's hand.] Then, is the crisis of my fate at hand!

'I see the fleet's approach—I see—'

Puff. Now, pray, gentlemen, mind. This is one of the most useful figures we tragedy-writers have, by which a hero or heroine, in consideration of their being often obliged to overlook things that are on the stage, is allowed to hear and see a number of things that are not.

Sneer. Yes; a kind of poetical second-sight!

Puff. Yes.—Now then, madam.

'Til. —I see their decks

'Are clear'd!—I see the signal made!

'The line is form'd!—a cable's-length asunder!

'I see the frigates station'd in the rear;

'And now, I hear the thunder of the guns!

'I hear the victor's shouts—I also hear

'The vanquish'd groan—and now 'tis smoke—and now

'I see the loose sails shiver in the wind!

'I see—I see—what soon you'll see—'

[Swoons in the Governor's arms.

Puff. [In rapture, taking TILBURINA's hand.] Mrs. Gibbs, allow me to introduce you to Mr. Dangle and Mr. Sneer. This is Mrs. Gibbs, one of the very best actresses on the stage, I assure you, gentlemen.

'Gov. Hold, daughter! peace! this love hath turn'd thy brain:

'The Spanish fleet thou can'st not see—because,

'—It is not yet in sight!'

Dan. Egad, though, the Governor seems to make no allowance for this poetical figure you talk of.

Puff. No; a plain matter-of-fact man; that's his character.

'Til. But will you then refuse his offer?

'Gov. I must—I will—I can—I ought—I do.

'Til. His liberty is all he asks.'

Puff. His liberty is all he asks.

Sneer. All who asks, Mr. Puff? Who is—he?

Puff. Egad, sir, I can't tell. Here has been such cutting and slashing, I don't know where they have got to, myself.

Til. Indeed, sir, you will find it connect very well.

'Til. A retreat in Spain!

'Gov. Outlawry here!

'Til. Your daughter's prayer!

'Gov. Your father's oath!

'Til. My lover!

'Gov. My country!

'Til. Tilburina!

'Gov. England!

'Til. A title!
'Gov. Honour!
'Til. A pension!
'Gov. Conscience!
'Til. A thousand pounds!
'Gov. [Starts.] Hah! thou hast touch'd me nearly!

'Til. Canst thou—
'Reject the suppliant, and the daughter too?
'Gov. No more; I would not hear thee plead in vain;

'The father softens—but the governor
'Is resolv'd!' [Exit.]
Puff. My dear sir, give that a little more force, if you please—but the governor's resolv'd!

'Gov. [Imitating PUFF's manner.] The father softens—but the governor

'Is resolv'd!' [Exit quickly.]
'Til. 'Tis well,—hence then, fond hopes,—fond passion, hence;

'Duty, behold I am all overthine—
'Whis. [Without.] Where is my love—my—behind!

Puff. My what!—What's that, Mr. Pension?

Enter WHISKERANDOS.

Have the goodness to let me hear that line again?

'Whis. Where is my love—my behind?'

Puff. No, no, sir.—"Where is my love—my—behind the scenes"—spoken behind the scenes.

Whis. Oh, I beg pardon, sir, but I assure you it is written so in my part. [Exit.]

Enter WHISKERANDOS.

'Whis. Where is my love—my—beauteous enemy.

'My conquering Tilburina! How! is't thus
'We meet? Why are thy looks averse! What means

'That falling tear—that frown of boding woe?
'Hah! now indeed I am a prisoner!
'Yes, now I feel the galling weight of these 'Disgraceful chains—which, cruel Tilburina!
'Thy doating captive gloried in before.
'But thou art false, and Whiskerandos is undone!
'Til. O no; how little dost thou know thy Tilburina.

'Whis. Art thou, then, true? Begone cares, doubts, and fears,
'I make you all a present to the winds;
'And if the winds reject you—try the waves.'

Puff. The wind, you know, is the established receiver of all stolen sighs, and cast-off griefs, and apprehensions.

'Til. Yet must we part?—Stern duty seals our doom:

'Though here I call yon conscious clouds to witness,

'Could I pursue the bias of my soul,
'All friends, all rights of parents, I'd disclaim,
'And thou, my Whiskerandos, should'st be father
'And mother, brother, cousin, uncle, aunt,
'And friend to me!

'Whis. O matchless excellence!—And must we part?

'Well, if—we must—we must—and in that case
'The less is said the better.'

Puff. Hey-dey!—here's a cut!—What! are all the mutual protestations out?

Til. Now, pray, sir, don't interrupt us just here; you ruin our feelings.

Puff. Your feelings!—but zounds, my feelings, ma'am!

'Whis. One last embrace.

'Til. Now,—farewell, for ever!

'Whis. For ever!

'Til. Aye, for ever!'

[Going.]
Puff. S'death and fury!—Gadslife! Sir! Madam, I really can't suffer this—if you go out without the parting look, you might as well dance out. Here!

'For ever! Aye, for ever.'

[Holding forth his arms, as to embrace.] Give them the last puff of your tragedy bellows!

'Whis. [With arms extended.] For ever! Oh!

'Til. Aye, for ever, Oh!'

[They rush into each other's arms, then reluctantly part, and exeunt WHISKERANDOS and TILBURINA.]

Con. But pray, sir, how am I to get off here?

Puff. You, pshaw! what the devil signifies how you get off!

[Pushes the Confidant off.]

[Drop-scene lowers; SNEER and DANGLE rise.]

Dan. O, charming!

Puff. Hey!—'tis pretty well, I believe.—You see, I don't attempt to strike out anything new—but I take it I improve on the established modes.

Enter Under Prompter.

Under P. Sir, the carpenter says it is impossible you can go to the Park scene yet.

Puff. The Park scene! No—I mean the description scene here, in the wood.

Under P. Sir, the performers have cut it out.

Puff. Cut it out!

Under P. Yes, sir.

Puff. What! the whole account of Queen Elizabeth?

Under P. Yes, sir.

Puff. And the description of her horse and side-saddle.

Under P. Yes, sir.

Puff. So, so, this is very fine, indeed! Mr. Prompter, how the plague could you suffer this?

Prompter. [From within.] Sir, indeed, the pruning knife—

Puff. The pruning knife—zounds! the axe! Why, here has been such lopping and topping, I shan't have the bare trunk of my play left presently.—Very well, sir—the performers must do as they please; but, upon my soul, I'll print it every word.

Sneer. That I would, indeed.

Puff. Very well—sir—then we must go on. [Exit Under Prompter.] Well, now, if the scene is ready—we'll go on.

[The drop-scene rises, and discovers a wood scene. A carpet spread on the stage, and a chair in the centre.]

So, now for my mysterious yeoman.

Enter a Beefeater.

'Beef. Perdition catch my soul, but I do love thee!

Sneer. Haven't I heard that line before?

Puff. No, I fancy not.—Where, pray?

Dan. Yes, I think there is something like it in "Othello."

Puff. Gad! now you put me in mind on't, I believe there is—but that's of no consequence—all that can be said is, that two people happened to hit on the same thought—and Shakspeare made use of it first, that's all.

Sneer. Very true.

Puff. Now, sir, your soliloquy—but speak more to the pit, if you please—the soliloquy always to the pit—that's a rule.

'Beef. Tho' hopeless love finds comfort in despair,

'It never can endure a rival's bliss!

'But soft.'

Puff. Put your finger to your head when you say that—and don't gallop off—steal cautiously off.

'Beef. But soft—I am observed.'

[Exit Beefeater stealthily.]

Dan. That's a very short soliloquy.

Puff. Yes—but it would have been a great deal longer if he had not been observed.

Sneer. A most sentimental Beefeater that, Mr. Puff.

Puff. Hark ye—I would not have you to be too sure that he is a Beefeater.

Sneer. What, a hero in disguise?

Puff. No matter—I only give you a hint.—But now for my principal character—here he comes—Lord Burleigh in person! Pray, gentlemen, step this way—softly—I only hope the Lord High Treasurer is perfect—if he is but perfect!

Enter BURLEIGH, goes slowly to the chair and sits.

Sneer. Mr. Puff!

Puff. Hush! vastly well, sir! vastly well! a most interesting gravity!

Dan. What, isn't he to speak at all?

Puff. Egad, I thought you'd ask me that.—Yes, it is a very likely thing, that a minister in his situation, with the whole affairs of the nation on his head, should have time to talk! But hush! or you'll put him out.

Sneer. Put him out! how the plague can that be, if he's not going to say anything?

Puff. There's a reason! Why, his part is to think: and how the plague do you imagine he can think, if you keep talking?

Dan. That's very true, upon my word!

[BURLEIGH comes forward, shakes his head.]

Puff. Shake your head more—more—damn it, man, shake your head as if there was something in it. [BURLEIGH shakes his head extravagantly, and exit.]

Sneer. He is very perfect, indeed. Now, pray what did he mean by that?

Puff. You don't take it?

Sneer. No; I don't, upon my soul.

Puff. Why, by that shake of the head he gave you to understand, that even though they had more justice in their cause, and wisdom in their measures, yet, if there was not a greater spirit shown on the part of the people, the country would at last fall a sacrifice to the hostile ambition of the Spanish monarchy.

Sneer. The devil!—Did he mean all that by shaking his head?

Puff. Every word of it—if he shook his head as I taught him.

Sneer. O here are some of our old acquaintance.

Enter HATTON and RALEIGH.

'Sir C. My niece, and your niece too?

'By Heav'n! there's witchcraft in't. He could not else

'Have gain'd their hearts. But see where they approach;

'Some horrid purpose low'ring on their brows!

'Sir W. Let us withdraw and mark them.'

[They retire.]

Enter the two Nieces.

'1st Nie. Ellena here!

'But see the proud destroyer of my peace.

'Revenge is all the good I've left. [Aside.]

'2nd Nie. He comes, the false disturber of my quiet.

'Now vengeance do thy worst.' [Aside.]

Enter WHISKERANDOS.

'Whis. O hateful liberty—if thus in vain

'I seek my Tilburina!

'Both Nie. And ever shalt!

[Sir CHRISTOPHER and Sir WALTER come forward.]

'Sir C. and Sir W. Hold! we will avenge you.

'Whis. Hold you—or see your nieces bleed!

[The two Nieces draw their two daggers to strike WHISKERANDOS; the two Uncles, at the instant, with their two swords drawn, catch their two Nieces' arms, and turn the points of their swords to WHISKERANDOS, who immediately draws two daggers, and holds them to the two Nieces' bosoms.]

Puff. There's situation for you! there's an heroic group! You see, the ladies can't stab Whiskerandos—he durst not strike them for fear of their uncles—the uncles durst not kill him because of their nieces. I have them all at a dead lock! for every one of them is afraid to let go first.

Sneer. Why, then, they must stand there for ever.

Puff. So they would, if I had'n't a very fine contrivance for't. Now, mind—Beef!

Enter Beefeater, with his Halberd.

'Beef. In the Queen's name, I charge you all to drop

'Your swords and daggers!'

[They drop their swords and daggers.]

Sneer. That is a contrivance, indeed.

Puff. Aye—in the Queen's name.

'Sir C. Come, niece!

'Sir W. Come, niece!

[Exeunt with the two Nieces.]

'Whis. What's he, who bids us thus renounce our guard?

'Beef. Thou must do more! renounce thy love!

'Whis. Thou liest, base Beefeater!

'Beef. Ha! Hell! the lie!

'By Heav'n, thou'st rous'd the lion in my heart!

'Off, yeoman's habit! base disguise! off! off!

[Discovers himself, by throwing off his upper dress, and appearing in a very fine shape dress.]

'Am I a Beefeater now?

'Or beams my crest as terrible as when

'In Biscay's Bay I took thy captive sloop.

'Whis. I thank thee, fortune! that hast thus bestow'd

'A weapon to chastise this insolent.

[Takes up one of the swords.]

'Beef. I take thy challenge, Spaniard, and I thank

'Thee, fortune, too! [Takes up the other sword.]

'Whis. Vengeance and Tilburina!

'Beef. Exactly so.

[They fight, and, after the usual number of wounds given, WHISKERANDOS falls.]

'Whis. O cursed parry! The last thrust in tierce

'Was fatal! Captain, thou hast fenced well!

'And Whiskerandos quits this bustling scene

'For all eter—

'Beef. —nity, he would have added, but stern death—

Puff. O, my dear sir, you are too slow: no mind me. Sir, shall I trouble you to die again?

Whis. Certainly, sir? 'And Whiskerandos quits this bustling scene

For all eter— [Rolls himself up in the carpet.

'Beef. —nity, he would have added'—

Puff. No, sir, that's not it: once more, if you please, and I'll kill you myself.

Whis. [Unrolling himself.] I wish, sir, you would practice this without me: I can't stay dying here all night. [Exit.

Puff. Very well, we'll go over it by and by. I must humour these gentlemen!

'Beef. Farewell, brave Spaniard! and when next'—

Puff. Dear sir, you needn't speak that speech, as the body has walked off.

Beef. That's true, sir; then I'll join the fleet.

Puff. If you please. [Exit Beefeater.] Now enter Tilburina!

Sneer. Egad, the business comes on quick here.

Puff. Yes, sir, now she comes in stark mad, in white satin.

Sneer. Why in white satin?

Puff. O Lord, sir, when a heroine goes mad, she always goes into white satin—don't she, Dangle?

Dan. Always—it's a rule.

Puff. Yes, here it is, [Looking at the book.] 'Enter 'Tilburina, stark mad, in white satin, and her Confidant, stark mad, in white linen.'

Enter TILBURINA and Confidant, mad, according to custom.

Sneer. But what the deuce! is the Confidant to be mad too?

Puff. To be sure she is: the Confidant is always to do whatever her mistress does; weep when she weeps, smile when she smiles, go mad when she goes mad. Now, madam Confidant—but keep your madness in the back-ground, if you please.

'Til. The wind whistles—the moon rises— [screams]—see

'They have kill'd my squirrel in his cage!—

[Kneels.

'Is this a grasshopper!—Ha! no, it is my

'Whiskerandos.—You shall not keep him—

'I know you have him in your breeches pocket—

'An oyster may be crossed in love!—Who says

'A whale's a bird?—Ha! did you call my love?—

'He's here!—He's there!—He's everywhere!—

'Ah me! he's no where.' [Exit.

[The Confidant imitates TILBURINA, and exit.

Puff. There! do you ever desire to see anybody madder than that?

Sneer. Never, while I live! And pray what becomes of her?

Puff. She is gone to throw herself into the sea, to be sure—and that brings us at once to the scene of action, and so to my catastrophe—my sea-fight, I mean.

Sneer. What, you bring that in at last?

Puff. Yes, yes; you know my play is called the Spanish Armada, otherwise, egad, I have no occasion for the battle at all. Now then for my magnificence! my battle! my noise! and my procession! You are all ready?

Prompt. [Within.] Yes, sir.

Puff. Very well. Now, then, change the scene, and then for our grand display.

[The scene changes to a view of the Spanish Armada in close action with the British fleet.

Music plays "Britons strike home," Spanish fleet destroyed by fireships, &c. English fleet advances,—Music plays "Rule Britannia." During this scene, PUFF directs and applauds everything: then]

Well, pretty well—but not quite perfect; so, ladies and gentlemen, if you please, we'll rehearse this piece again on the first opportunity.

[Curtain drops.

PERSONS REPRESENTED.

SIR ANTHONY ABSOLUTE.
SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.
FAULKLAND.
CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.
ACRES.
FAG.
DAVID.
Coachman.

MRS. MALAPROP.
LYDIA LANGUISH.
JULIA.
LUCY.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street in Bath.

Coachman and FAG meeting.

Fag. What! Thomas!—Sure, 'tis he!—What, Thomas, Thomas!

Coach. Hey? odds life!—Mr. Fag, give us your hand, my old fellow-servant!

Fag. Excuse my glove, Thomas; I'm devilish glad to see you, my lad! why, my prince of charioteers, you look as hearty! but who the deuce thought of seeing you in Bath?

Coach. Sure, master, madam, Julia, Harry, Mrs. Kate, and the postilion, be all come.

Fag. Indeed!

Coach. Ay: master thought another fit of the gout was coming to make him a visit, so he'd a mind to gi't the slip—an whip! we were all off at an hour's warning.

Fag. Ay, ay; hasty in everything, or it would not be Sir Anthony Absolute.

Coach. But tell us, Mr. Fag, how does young master? Odds! Sir Anthony will stare to see the captain here!

Fag. I do not serve Captain Absolute now.

Coach. Why, sure!

Fag. At present, I am employed by Ensign Beverley.

Coach. I doubt, Mr. Fag, you ha'n't chang'd for the better.

Fag. I have not chang'd, Thomas.

Coach. No! why, didn't you say you had left young master?

Fag. No.—Well, honest Thomas, I must puzzle you no further;—briefly then—Captain Absolute and Ensign Beverley are one and the same person.

Coach. The devil they are: do tell us, Mr. Fag, the meaning on't.

Fag. Why, then, the cause of all this is love—love, Thomas, who has been a masquerader ever since the days of Jupiter.

Coach. But, pray, why does your master pass only for ensign?—now, if he had shammed general, indeed—

Fag. Ah, Thomas, there lays the mystery o' the matter!—Hark ye, Thomas, my master is in love with a lady of a very singular taste—a lady who likes him better as a half-pay ensign, than if she knew he was son and heir to Sir Anthony Absolute, a baronet, of three thousand a year.

Coach. That is an odd taste, indeed!—But has she got the stuff, Mr. Fag? is she rich, eh?

Fag. Rich! why, I believe she owns half the stocks:—Z—s, Thomas, she could pay the national debt as easily as I could my washerwoman! She has a lap-dog that eats out of gold—she feeds her parrot with small pearls, and all her thread-papers are made of bank-notes!

Coach. Bravo, faith—Odd! I warrant she has a set of thousands at least; but does she draw kindly with the captain?

Fag. As fond as pigeons.

Coach. May one hear her name?

Fag. Miss Lydia Languish:—but there is an old tough aunt in the way, though, by the by, she has never seen my master—for he got acquainted with miss while on a visit to Gloucestershire.

Coach. Well, I wish they were once harnessed together in matrimony. But pray, Mr. Fag, what kind of a place is this Bath? I ha' heard a great deal of it;—here's a mort o' merry-making, eh?

Fag. Pretty well, Thomas, pretty well—'tis a good lounge—but damn the place, I'm tired of it: their regular hours stupify me—not a fiddle or a card after eleven! however, Mr. Faulkland's gentleman and I keep it up a little in private parties; I'll introduce you there, Thomas, you'll like him much. But, Thomas, you must polish a little—indeed you must:—Here, now, this wig; what the devil do you do with a wig, Thomas? none of the London whips, of any degree of ton, wear wigs now.

Coach. More's the pity, more's the pity, I say, Mr. Fag—Odds life! when I heard how the lawyers and doctors had took to their own hair, I thought how 'twould go next. Odd rabbit it! when the fashion had got foot on the bar, I guessed 'twould mount to the box! but 'tis all out of character, believe me, Mr. Fag: and look ye, I'll never give up mine, the lawyers and doctors may do as they will.

Fag. Well, Thomas, we'll not quarrel about that. But hold, mark—mark, Thomas.

Coach. Zooks, 'tis the captain! Is that the lady with him?

Fag. No, no, that is madam Lucy, my master's mistress's maid: they lodge at that house—but I must after him, to tell him the news.

Coach. Odd, he's giving her money! —Well, Mr. Fag—

Fag. Good bye, Thomas; I have an appointment in Gyde's porch, this evening, at eight; meet me there, and we'll make a little party.—But Thomas—Thomas—damn the wig!

[Exit THOMAS and FAG.]

SCENE II.—A Dressing-room in Mrs. Malaprop's Lodgings.

LYDIA LANGUISH sitting on a sofa, with a book in her hand; LUCY, as just returned from a message.

Lucy. Indeed, ma'am, I traversed half the town in search of it: I don't believe there's a circulating library in Bath I ha'n't been at.

Lyd. And could not you get "The Reward of Constasy?"

Lucy. No, indeed, ma'am.

Lyd. Nor "The Fatal Connexion?"

Lucy. No, indeed, ma'am.

Lyd. Nor "The Mistakes of the Heart?"

Lucy. Ma'am, as ill luck would have it, Mr. Bull said, Miss Sukey Saunter had just fetched it away.

Lyd. Heigho! Did you inquire for "The Delicate Distress?"

Lucy. Or, "The Memoirs of Lady Woodford?"—Yes, indeed, ma'am, I asked everywhere for it; and I might have brought it from Mr. Frederick's, but Lady Slattern Lounger, who had just sent it home, had so soiled and dog's-eared it, it wa'n't fit for a Christian to read.

Lyd. Heigho! Yes, I always know when Lady Slattern has been before me; she has a most observing thumb, and, I believe, cherishes her nails for the convenience of making marginal notes. Well, child, what have you brought me?

Lucy. Oh, here, ma'am! [Taking books from under her cloak, and from her pockets.] This is "The Man of Feeling," and this "Peregrine Pickle."—Here are "The Tears of Sensibility," and "Humphrey Clinker."

Lyd. Hold! here's some one coming—quick, see who it is—[Exit LUCY.]—Surely I heard my cousin Julia's voice!

Re-enter LUCY.

Lucy. Lud, ma'am! here is Miss Neville!

Lyd. Is it possible!

Enter JULIA.

Lyd. My dearest Julia, how delighted I am!—

[They embrace.] How unexpected was this happiness!

Jul. True, Lydia, and our pleasure is the greater; but what has been the matter? you were denied to me at first.

Lyd. Ah, Julia, I have a thousand things to tell you! but first inform me what has conjured you to Bath?—Is Sir Anthony here?

Jul. He is; we are arrived within this hour, and I suppose he will be here to wait on Mrs. Malaprop as soon as he is dressed.

Lyd. Then before we are interrupted, let me impart to you some of my distress; I know your gentle nature will sympathize with me, though your prudence may condemn me: my letters have informed you of my whole connexion with Beverley; but I have lost him, Julia;—my aunt has discovered our intercourse, by a note she intercepted, and has confined me ever since: Yet, would you believe it? she has fallen absolutely in love with a tall Irish baronet, she met one night, since we have been here, at Lady Macshuffie's rout.

Jul. You jest, Lydia.

Lyd. No, upon my word!—She really carries on a kind of correspondence with him, under a feigned name, though, till she chooses to be known to him; but it is a Delia, or a Celia, I assure you.

Jul. Then, surely, she is now more indulgent to her niece?

Lyd. Quite the contrary. Since she has discovered her own frailty, she is become ten times more suspicious of mine. Then I must inform you of another plague; that odious Acres is to be in Bath to-day, so that, I protest, I shall be teased out of all spirits!

Jul. Come, come, Lydia, hope for the best. Sir Anthony shall use his interest with Mrs. Malaprop.

Lyd. But you have not heard the worst. Unfortunately I had quarrelled with my poor Beverley, just before my aunt made the discovery, and I have not seen him since to make it up.

Jul. What was his offence?

Lyd. Nothing at all; but I don't know how it was, as often as we had been together, we had never had a quarrel; and, somehow, I was afraid he would never give me an opportunity; so, last Thursday, I wrote a letter to myself, to inform myself that Beverley was, at that time, paying his addresses to another woman. I signed it, "Your unknown friend," showed it to Beverley, charged him with his falsehood, put myself in a violent passion, and vow'd I'd never see him more.

Jul. And you let him depart so, and have not seen him since?

Lyd. 'Twas the next day my aunt found the matter out; I intended only to have teased him three days and a half, and now I've lost him for ever.

Jul. If he is as deserving and sincere as you have represented him to me, he will never give you up so.—Yet consider, Lydia, you tell me he is but an ensign: and you have thirty thousand pounds!

Lyd. But, you know, I lose most of my fortune, if I marry, without my aunt's consent, till of age; and that is what I have determined to do ever since I knew the penalty; nor could I love the man who would wish to wait a day for the alternative.

Jul. Nay, this is caprice!

Lydia. What, does Julia tax me with caprice? I thought her lover Faulkland had injured her to it.

Julia. I do not love even his faults.

Lydia. But you have sent to him, I suppose?

Julia. Not yet, upon my word! nor has he the least idea of my being in Bath:—Sir Anthony's resolution was so sudden I could not inform him of it.

Lydia. Well, Julia, you are your own mistress, though under the protection of Sir Anthony; yet have you, for this long year, been a slave to the caprice, the whim, the jealousy of this ungrateful Faulkland, who will ever delay assuming the right of a husband, while you suffer him to be equally imperious as a lover.

Julia. Nay, you are wrong entirely. We were contracted before my father's death: that, and some consequent embarrassments, have delayed what I know to be my Faulkland's most ardent wish. He is too generous to trifle on such a point; and, for his character, you wrong him there too. No, Lydia, he is too proud, too noble, to be jealous; if he is captious, 'tis without dissembling; if fretful, without rudeness. Unused to the fopperies of love, he is negligent of the little duties expected from a lover; but, being unhacknied in the passion, his affection is ardent and sincere; and as it engrosses his whole soul, he expects every look and emotion of his mistress to move in unison with his. Yet, though his pride calls for this full return, his humility makes him undervalue those qualities in him, which would entitle him to it; and not feeling why he should be loved to the degree he wishes, he still suspects that he is not loved enough. This, I must own, has cost me many unhappy hours; but I have learned to think myself his debtor for those imperfections which arise from the ardour of his attachment.

Lydia. Well, I cannot blame you for defending him; but, tell me candidly, Julia, had he never saved your life, do you think you should have been attached to him as you are? Believe me, the rude blast that overset your boat was a prosperous gale of love to him.

Julia. Gratitude may have strengthened my attachment to Mr. Faulkland, but I loved him before he had preserved me;—yet, surely, that alone were an obligation sufficient—

Lydia. Obligation! why, a water-spaniel would have done as much! Well, I should never think of giving my heart to a man because he could swim!—What's here?

Enter Lucy, in a hurry.

Lucy. O, ma'am, here is Sir Anthony Absolute, just come home with your aunt!

Lydia. They'll not come here:—Lucy, do you watch. [Exit Lucy.]

Julia. Yet I must go; Sir Anthony does not know I am here, and if we meet, he'll detain me, to show me the town. I'll take another opportunity of paying my respects to Mrs. Malaprop, when she shall treat me, as long as she chooses, with her select words, so ingeniously misapplied, without being mispronounced.

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. O lud, ma'am! they are both coming up stairs.

Lydia. Well, I'll not detain you. Adieu, my dear Julia! I'm sure you are in haste to send to Faulk-land. There—through my room you'll find another staircase.

Julia. Adieu!

[Exit.]

Lydia. Here, my dear Lucy, hide these books. Quick, quick. Fling "Peregrine Pickle" under the toilet—throw "Roderick Random" into the closet—put "The Innocent Adultery" in'o "The Whole Duty of Man"—thrust "Lord Aimworth" under the sofa—cram "Ovid" behind the bolster—there—put "The Man of Feeling" into your pocket. Now for them!

[Exit Lucy.]

Enter Mrs. MALAPROP and Sir ANTHONY ABSOLUTE.

Mrs. M. There, Sir Anthony, there stands the deliberate simpleton, who wants to disgrace her family, and lavish herself on a fellow not worth a shilling.

Lydia. Madam, I thought you once—

Mrs. M. You thought, miss! I don't know any business you have to think at all; thought does not become a young woman. But the point we would request of you is, that you would promise to forget this fellow—to illiterate him, I say, from your memory.

Lydia. Ah! madam! our memories are independent of our wills. It is not so easy to forget.

Mrs. M. But I say it is, miss! there is nothing on earth so easy as to forget, if a person chooses to set about it. I'm sure I have as much forgot your poor dear uncle, as if he had never existed; and I thought it my duty so to do; and let me tell you, Lydia, these violent memories don't become a young woman.

Lydia. What crime, madam, have I committed, to be treated thus?

Mrs. M. Now don't attempt to extirpate yourself from the matter; you know I have proof controvertible of it. But, tell me, will you promise me to do as you're bid? Will you take a husband of your friends' choosing?

Lydia. Madam, I must tell you plainly, that, had I no preference for any one else, the choice you have made would be my aversion.

Mrs. M. What business have you, miss, with preference and aversion? They don't become a young woman; and you ought to know, that, as both always wear off, 'tis safest, in matrimony, to begin with a little aversion. I am sure I hated your poor dear uncle, before marriage, as if he'd been a black-a-moor; and yet, miss, you are sensible what a wife I made; and, when it pleased Heaven to release me from him, 'tis unknown what tears I shed! But, suppose we were going to give you another choice, will you promise us to give up this Beverley?

Lydia. Could I belie my thoughts so far as to give that promise, my actions would certainly as far belie my words.

Mrs. M. Take yourself to your room. You are fit company for nothing but your own ill humours.

Lydia. Willingly, ma'am; I cannot change for the worse. [Exit.]

Mrs. M. There's a little intricate hussy for you!

Sir Anth. It is not to be wondered at, ma'am; all that is the natural consequence of teaching girls to read. In my way hither, Mrs. Malaprop, I observed your niece's maid coming forth from a circulating library: she had a book in each hand—they were half-bound volumes, with marble covers: from that moment, I guessed how full of duty I should see her mistress!

Mrs. M. Those are vile places, indeed!

Sir Anth. Madam, a circulating library in a town is, as an evergreen tree of diabolical knowledge!—It blossoms through the year! And, depend on it, Mrs. Malaprop, that they who are so fond of handling the leaves, will long for the fruit at last.

Mrs. M. Fie, fie, Sir Anthony; you surely speak laconically.

Sir Anth. Why, Mrs. Malaprop, in moderation, now, what would you have a woman know?

Mrs. M. Observe me, Sir Anthony—I would by no means wish a daughter of mine to be a progeny of learning; I don't think so much learning becomes a young woman:—for instance—I would never let her meddle with Greek, or Hebrew, or algebra, or simony, or fluxions, or paradoxes, or such inflammatory branches of learning; nor will it be necessary for her to handle any of your mathematical, astronomical, diabolical instruments; but, Sir Anthony, I would send her, at nine years old, to a boarding-school, in order to learn a little ingenuity and artifice. Then, sir, she should have a supercilious knowledge in accounts; and, as she grew up, I would have her instructed in geometry, that she might know something of the contagious countries: above all, she should be taught orthodoxy. This, Sir Anthony, is what I would have a woman know; and I don't think there is a superstitious article in it.

Sir Anth. Well, well, Mrs. Malaprop, I will dispute the point no further with you: though I must confess, that you are a truly moderate and polite arguer, for almost every third word you say is on my side of the question. But, to the more important point in debate—you say you have no objection to my proposal?

Mrs. M. None, I assure you. I am under no positive engagement with Mr. Acres; and as Lydia is so obstinate against him, perhaps your son may have better success.

Sir Anth. Well, madam, I will write for the boy directly. He knows not a syllable of this yet, though I have for some time had the proposal in my head. He is at present with his regiment.

Mrs. M. We have never seen your son, Sir Anthony; but I hope no objection on his side.

Sir Anth. Objection!—Let him object if he dare!—No, no, Mrs. Malaprop; Jack knows, that the least demur puts me in a frenzy directly. My process was always very simple—in his younger days, 'twas, "Jack, do this,"—if he demurred, I knocked him down; and, if he grumbled at that, I always sent him out of the room.

Mrs. M. Ay, and the properest way, o' my conscience!—Nothing is so conciliating to young people as severity. Well, Sir Anthony, I shall give Mr. Acres his discharge, and prepare Lydia to receive your son's invocations; and I hope you will represent her to the captain as an object not altogether illegible.

Sir Anth. Madam, I will handle the subject prudently. I must leave you; and, let me beg you, Mrs. Malaprop, to enforce this matter roundly to the girl—take my advice, keep a tight hand—if she rejects this proposal, clap her under lock and key; and, if you were just to let the servants forget to bring her dinner for three or four days, you can't conceive how she'd come about. [Exit.]

Mrs. M. Well, at any rate, I shall be glad to get her from under my intuition—she has somehow discovered my partiality for Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Sure, Lucy can't have betray'd me!—No, the girl is such a simpleton, I should have made her confess it. Lucy! Lucy! [Calls.] Had she been one of your artificial ones, I should never have trusted her.

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. Did you call, ma'am?

Mrs. M. Yes, girl. Did you see Sir Lucius while you was out?

Lucy. No, indeed, ma'am, not a glimpse of him.

Mrs. M. You are sure, Lucy, that you never mentioned—

Lucy. O gemini! I'd sooner cut my tongue out!

Mrs. M. Well, don't let your simplicity be imposed on.

Lucy. No, ma'am.

Mrs. M. So, come to me presently, and I'll give you another letter to Sir Lucius—but mind, Lucy, if ever you betray what you are intrusted with (unless it be other people's secrets to me), you forfeit my malevolence for ever; and your being a simpleton shall be no excuse for your locality. [Exit.]

Lucy. Ha! ha! ha! So, my dear simplicity, let me give you a little respite: [Altering her manner]—let girls in my station be as fond as they please of being expert and knowing in their trust, commend me to a mask of silliness, and a pair of sharp eyes for my own interest under it!—Let me see to what account have I turned my simplicity lately: [Looks at a paper] "For abetting Miss Lydia Languish in a design of running away with an ensign! in money, sundry times, twelve pound twelve—gowns, five; hats, ruffles, caps, &c. &c. numberless. From the said ensign, within this last month, six guineas and a half. Item, from Mrs. Malaprop, for betraying the young people to her"—when I found matters were likely to be discovered—"two guineas and a French shawl. Item, from Mr. Acres, for carrying divers letters"—which I never delivered—"two guineas and a pair of buckles. Item, from Sir Lucius O'Trigger, three crowns, two gold pocket pieces, and a silver snuff-box!"—Well done, simplicity! yet I was forced to make my Hibernian believe, that he was corresponding, not with the aunt, but with the niece; for, though not over rich, I found he had too much pride and delicacy to sacrifice the feelings of a gentleman to the necessities of his fortune. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Captain Absolute's Lodgings.

Enter Captain ABSOLUTE and FAG.

Fag. Sir, while I was there, Sir Anthony came in; I told him you had sent me to inquire after his health, and to know if he was at leisure to see you.

Capt. A. And what did he say on hearing I was at Bath?

Fag. Sir, in my life, I never saw an elderly gentleman more astonished!

Capt. A. Well, sir, and what did you say?

Fag. O, I lied, sir—I forget the precise lie, but you may depend on't he got no truth from me. Yet, with submission, for fear of blunders in future, I should be glad to fix what has brought us to Bath, in order that we may lie a little consistently. Sir Anthony's servants were curious, sir, very curious, indeed.

Capt. A. You have said nothing to them?

Fag. O, not a word, sir—not a word. Mr. Thomas, indeed, the coachman (whom I take to be the discreetest of whips)—

Capt. A. 'Sdeath!—you rascal! you have not trusted him?

Fag. Oh, no, sir,—no—no—not a syllable, upon my veracity!—He was, indeed, a little inquisitive; but I was sly, sir—devilish sly!—My master (said I), honest Thomas (you know, sir, one says honest to one's inferiors) is come to Bath to recruit—yes, sir—I said to recruit—and whether for men, money, or constitution, you know, sir, is nothing to him, nor any one else.

Capt. A. Well—recruit will do—let it be so—

Fag. Oh, sir, recruit will do surprisingly:—indeed, to give the thing an air, I told Thomas, that your honour had already enlisted five disbanded chairmen, seven minority waiters, and thirteen billiard-markers.

Capt. A. You blockhead, never say more than is necessary.

Fag. I beg pardon, sir—I beg pardon. But, with submission, a lie is nothing unless well supported. Sir, whenever I draw on my invention for a good current lie, I always forge endorsements as well as the bill.

Capt. A. Well, take care you don't hurt your credit by offering too much security. Is Mr. Faulkland returned?

Fag. He is above, sir, changing his dress.

Capt. A. Can you tell whether he has been informed of Sir Anthony's and Miss Melville's arrival?

Fag. I fancy not, sir; he has seen no one since he came in, but his gentleman, who was with him at Bristol. I think, sir, I hear Mr. Faulkland coming down—

Capt. A. Go, tell him I am here.

Fag. Yes, sir. [Going.] I beg pardon, sir, but should Sir Anthony call, you will do me the favour to remember that we are recruiting, if you please.

Capt. A. Well, well.

Fag. And in tenderness to my character, if your honour could bring in the chairmen and waiters, I shall esteem it as an obligation; for, though I never scruple a lie to serve my master, yet it hurts one's conscience to be found out. [Exit.]

Capt. A. Now for my whimsical friend:—If he does not know that his mistress is here, I'll tease him a little before I tell him—

Enter Fag.

Fag. Mr. Faulkland, sir.

[Exit.]

Re-enter Fag., introduces Mr. FAULKLAND, and exit.

Capt. A. Faulkland, you're welcome to Bath again: you are punctual in your return.

Faulk. Yes; I had nothing to detain me when I had finished the business I went on. Well, what news since I left you? How stand matters between you and Lydia?

Capt. A. 'Faith, much as they were.

Faulk. Nay, then, you trifle too long—if you are sure of her, propose to the aunt, in your own character, and write to Sir Anthony for his consent.

Capt. A. Softly, softly, for though I am convinced my little Lydia would elope with me as Ensign Beverley, yet am I by no means certain that she would take me with the impediment of our friends' consent, a regular humdrum wedding, and the reversion of a good fortune on my side. Well, but Faulkland, you'll dine with us to-day at the hotel?

Faulk. Indeed, I cannot; I am not in spirits to be of such a party.

Capt. A. By heavens! I shall forswear your company. You are the most teasing, captious, incorrigible lover!—Do love like a man.

Faulk. Ah! Jack, your heart and soul are not like mine, fixed immutably on one only object. You throw for a large stake, but, losing, you could stake and throw again; but I have set my sum of happiness on this cast, and not to succeed were to be stripped of all.

Capt. A. But, for Heaven's sake! what grounds for apprehension can your whimsical brain conjure up at present?

Faulk. What grounds for apprehension, did you say? Heavens! are there not a thousand? I fear for her spirits—her health—her life—O! Jack, when delicate and feeling souls are separated, there is not a feature in the sky, not a movement of the elements, not an aspiration of the breeze, but hints some cause for a lover's apprehension!

Capt. A. Ay, but we may choose whether we will take the hint or not. So then, Faulkland, if you were convinced that Julia were well, and in spirits, you would be entirely content?

Faulk. I should be happy beyond measure—I am anxious only for that.

Capt. A. Then cure your anxiety at once—Miss Melville is in perfect health, and is at this moment in Bath.

Faulk. Nay, Jack—don't trifle with me.

Capt. A. She is arrived here with my father, within this hour.

Faulk. Can you be serious?

Capt. A. I thought you knew Sir Anthony better than to be surprised at a sudden whim of this kind.—Seriously then, it is as I tell you, upon my honour.

Faulk. My dear Jack—now nothing on earth can give me a moment's uneasiness.

Enter Fag.

Fag. Sir, Mr. Acres, just arrived, is below.

Capt. A. Stay, Faulkland, this Acres lives within a mile of Sir Anthony, and he shall tell you how your mistress has been ever since you left her. [Exit Fag.]

Faulk. What, is he much acquainted in the family?

Capt. A. Oh, very intimate; he is likewise a rival of mine—that is, of my other self's, for he does not think his friend, Captain Absolute, ever saw the lady in question; and it is ridiculous enough to hear him complain to me of one Beverley, a conceited, skulking rival, who—Faulk. Hush!—He's here!

Enter Acres.

Acres. Hah! my dear friend, noble captain, and honest Jack, how dost thou? Just arrived, 'faith, as you see.—Sir, your humble servant. Warm work on the roads, Jack—odds whips and wheels! I've travelled like a comet, with a tail of dust all the way as long as the Mall.

Capt. A. Ah! Bob, you are indeed an eccentric planet, but we know your attraction hither; give me leave to introduce Mr. Faulkland to you; Mr. Faulkland, Mr. Acres.

Acres. Sir, I am most heartily glad to see you : sir, I solicit your connexions.—Hey, Jack—what this is Mr. Faulkland, who—

Capt. A. Ay, Bob, Miss Melville's Mr. Faulkland.

Acres. Ah ! Mr. Faulkland, you are indeed a happy man !

Faulk. I have not seen Miss Melville yet, sir ; I hope she enjoyed full health and spirits in Devonshire !

Acres. Never knew her better in my life, sir ; never better. Odds blushes and blooms ! she has been as healthy as the German Spa.

Faulk. Indeed ! I did hear that she had been a little indisposed.

Acres. False, false, sir ; only said to vex you : quite the reverse, I assure you.

Faulk. There, Jack, you see she has the advantage of me ; I had almost fretted myself ill.

Capt. A. Now are you angry with your mistress for not having been sick.

Faulk. No, no, you misunderstand me : yet surely a little trifling indisposition is not an unnatural consequence of absence from those we love. Now, confess—isn't there something unkind in this violent, robust, unfeeling health ?

Capt. A. Oh, it was very unkind of her to be well in your absence, to be sure !

Acres. Good apartments, Jack.

Faulk. Well, sir, but you were saying that Miss Melville has been so exceedingly well—what then, she has been merry and gay, I suppose ?—always in spirits, hey ?

Acres. Merry ! odds crickets ! she has been the belle and spirit of the company wherever she has been—so lively and entertaining ! so full of wit and humour !

Faulk. By my soul ! there is an innate levity in woman that nothing can overcome !—What ! happy, and I away !

Capt. A. Just now, you were only apprehensive for your mistress's spirits.

Faulk. Why, Jack, have I been the joy and spirit of the company ?

Capt. A. No, indeed, you have not.

Faulk. Have I been lively and entertaining ?

Capt. A. Oh, upon my word, I acquit you.

Faulk. Have I been full of wit and humour ?

Capt. A. No, 'faith, to do you justice, you have been confoundedly stupid, indeed.

Acres. What's the matter with the gentleman ?

Capt. A. He is only expressing his great satisfaction at hearing that Julia has been so well and happy—that's all—hey, Faulkland ?

Faulk. Yes, yes, she has a happy disposition !

Acres. That she has, indeed—then she is so accomplished—so sweet a voice—so expert at her harpsichord—such a mistress of flat and sharp ; squallant, rumbly, and quiverant !—there was this time month—odds a minims and crochets ! how she did chirrup at Mrs. Piano's concert ! [Sings.] My heart's my own, my will is free. That's very like her.

Faulk. Fool ! fool that I am ! to fix all my happiness on such a trifle ! 'Sdeath ! to make herself the pipe and ballad-monger of a circle ! to soothe her light heart with catches and glees ! What can you say to this, sir ?

Capt. A. Why, that I should be glad to hear my mistress had been so merry, sir.

Faulk. Nay, nay, nay—I'm not sorry that she has been happy ; no, I am glad of that—but she has been dancing too, I doubt not.

Acres. What does the gentleman say about dancing ?

Capt. A. He says the lady we speak of dances as well as sings.

Acres. Ay, truly does she—there was at our last race-ball—

Faulk. Hell and the devil ! There ! there—I told you so ! I told you so ! oh ! she thrives in my absence ! Dancing !

Capt. A. For Heaven's sake, Faulkland, don't expose yourself so ! Suppose she has danced, what then ? does not the ceremony of society often oblige—

Faulk. Well, well, I'll contain myself—perhaps, as you say—for form's sake. I say Mr.—Mr.—What's his d—d name ?

Capt. A. Acres, Acres.

Faulk. O ay, Mr. Acres, you were praising Miss Melville's manner of dancing a minuet—hey ?

Acres. Oh, I dare insure her for that—but what I was going to speak of, was her country dancing : odds swimings ! she has such an air with her !

Faulk. Now, disappointment on her ! defend this, Absolute ! why don't you defend this ? country dances ! jigs and reels ! am I to blame now ? A minuet I could have forgiven—I should not have minded that—I say, I should not have regarded a minuet—but country dances ! Z—ds, had she made one in a cotillion—I believe I could have forgiven even that—but to be monkey-led for a night ! to run the gauntlet through a string of amorous palming puppies ! to show paces, like a managed filly ! Oh, Jack, there never can be but one man in the world whom a truly modest and delicate woman ought to pair with in a country dance ; and, even then, the rest of the couples should be her great uncles and aunts !

Capt. A. Ay, to be sure ! grandfathers and grandmothers !

Faulk. If there be but one vicious mind in the set, it will spread like a contagion—the action of their pulse beats to the lascivious movement of the jig—their quivering, warm-breathed sighs impregnate the air—the atmosphere becomes electrical to love, and each amorous spark darts through every link of the chain !—I must leave you—I own I am somewhat flurried—and that confounded looby has perceived it. [Going.]

Capt. A. Nay, but stay, Faulkland, and thank Mr. Acres for his good news.

Faulk. D—n his news !

[Exit.]

Capt. A. Ha ! ha ! ha ! poor Faulkland ! Five minutes since—"nothing on earth could give him a moment's uneasiness !"

Acres. The gentleman wasn't angry at my praising his mistress, was he ?

Capt. A. A little jealous, I believe, Bob.

Acres. You don't say so ? Ha ! ha ! jealous of me ?—that's a good joke !

Capt. A. There's nothing strange in that, Bob ; let me tell you, that sprightly grace and insinuating manner of yours will do some mischief among the girls here.

Acres. Ah ! you joke—ha ! ha ! mischief—ha ! ha ! but you know I am not my own property ! my dear Lydia has forestalled me. She could never abide me in the country, because I used to dress so badly—but, odds frogs and tambours ! I sha'n't take matters so here—now ancient madam has no voice in it—I'll make my old clothes know who's master—I shall straightway cashier the hunting-frock, and render my leather breeches incapable—My hair has been in training some time.

Capt. A. Indeed!

Acres. Ah—and tho' the side-curls are a little restive, my hind part takes it very kindly.

Capt. A. Oh, you'll polish, I doubt not.

Acres. Absolutely I propose so—then if I can find out this Ensign Beverley, odds triggers and flints! I'll make him know the difference o't.

Capt. A. Spoke like a man—but pray, Bob, I observe you have got an odd kind of a new method of swearing—

Acres. Ha! ha! you have taken notice of it—'tis genteel, isn't it?—I did'n't invent it myself though; but a commander in our militia, a great scholar, I assure you, says that there is no meaning in the common oaths, and that nothing but their antiquity makes them respectable; because, he says, the ancients would never stick to an oath or two, but would say, by Jove! or by Bacchus! or by Mars! or by Venus! or by Pallas! according to the sentiment;—so that to swear with propriety, says my little major, the "oath should be an echo to the sense;" and this we call the oath referential, or sentimental swearing—ha! ha! ha! 'tis genteel, isn't it?

Capt. A. Very genteel, and very new, indeed—and I dare say will supplant all other figures of imprecation.

Acres. Ay, ay, the best terms will grow obsolete—Damns have had their day.

Enter FAG.

Fag. Sir, there is a gentleman below desires to see you—Shall I show him into the parlour?

Capt. A. Ay—you may.

Acres. Well, I must be gone—

Capt. A. Stay: who is it, Fag?

Fag. Your father, sir.

Capt. A. You puppy, why didn't you show him up directly? [Exit FAG.]

Acres. You have business with Sir Anthony—I expect a message from Mrs. Malaprop, at my lodgings; I have sent also to my dear friend, Sir Lucius O'Trigger.—Adieu, Jack, we must meet at night, when you shall give me a dozen bumpers to little Lydia. [Exit.]

Capt. A. That I will, with all my heart. Now for a parental lecture—I hope he has heard nothing of the business that has brought me here—I wish the gout had held him fast in Devonshire, with all my soul!

Enter Sir ANTHONY.

Sir, I am delighted to see you here, and looking so well!—your sudden arrival at Bath made me apprehensive for your health.

Sir Anth. Very apprehensive, I dare say, Jack.—What, you are recruiting here, hey?

Capt. A. Yes, sir. I am on duty.

Sir Anth. Well, Jack, I am glad to see you, though I did not expect it; for I was going to write to you on a little matter of business.—Jack, I have been considering that I grow old and infirm, and shall probably not trouble you long.

Capt. A. Pardon me, sir, I never saw you look more strong and hearty, and I pray fervently that you may continue so.

Sir Anth. I hope your prayers may be heard with all my heart. Well then, Jack, I have been considering that I am so strong and hearty, I may continue to plague you a long time.—Now, Jack, I am sensible that the income of your commission, and what I have hitherto allowed you, is but a small pittance for a lad of your spirit.

Capt. A. Sir, you are very good.

Sir Anth. And it is my wish, while yet I live, to have my boy make some figure in the world.—I have resolved, therefore, to fix you at once in a noble independence.

Capt. A. Sir, your kindness overpowers me.—Yet, sir, I presume you would not wish me to quit the army?

Sir Anth. Oh! that shall be as your wife chooses.

Capt. A. My wife, sir?

Sir Anth. Ay, ay, settle that between you—settle that between you.

Capt. A. A wife, sir, did you say?

Sir Anth. Ay, a wife—why, did I not mention that before?

Capt. A. Not a word of her, sir.

Sir Anth. Odd so!—I musn't forget her though—Yes, Jack, the independence I was talking of is by a marriage—the fortune is saddled with a wife; but I suppose that makes no difference?

Capt. A. Sir! sir! you amaze me!

Sir Anth. Why, what the devil's the matter with the fool? Just now you were all gratitude and duty.

Capt. A. I was, sir.—You talked to me of independence and a fortune, but not a word of a wife.

Sir Anth. Why, what difference does that make?—Odds life, sir! if you have the estate, you must take it with the live stock on it, as it stands.

Capt. A. Pray, sir, who is the lady?

Sir Anth. What's that to you, sir?—Come, give me your promise to love and to marry her directly.

Capt. A. Sure, sir, this is not very reasonable; to summon my affections for a lady I know nothing of.

Sir Anth. I am sure, sir, 'tis more unreasonable in you to object to a lady you know nothing of.

Capt. A. You must excuse me, sir, if I tell you, once for all, that in this point I cannot obey you.

Sir Anth. Hark ye, Jack;—I have heard you for some time with patience—I have been cool—quite cool; but take care—you know I am compliance itself, when I am not thwarted; no one more easily led, when I have my own way;—but don't put me in a frenzy.

Capt. A. Sir, I must repeat it—in this I cannot obey you.

Sir Anth. Now d—n me! if ever I call you Jack again while I live!

Capt. A. Nay, sir, but hear me.

Sir Anth. Sir, I won't hear a word—not a word; not one word! so give me your promise by a nod. And I'll tell you what, Jack—I mean, you dog—if you don't, by—

Capt. A. What, sir, promise to link myself to some mass of ugliness!

Sir Anth. Z—ds, sirrah! the lady shall be as ugly as I choose: she shall have a hump on each shoulder: she shall be as crooked as the crescent; her one eye shall roll like the bull's in Cox's Museum. She shall have a skin like a mummy, and the beard of a Jew. She shall be all this, sirrah! yet I'll make you ogle her all day, and sit up all night to write sonnets on her beauty.

Capt. A. This is reason and moderation, indeed!

Sir Anth. None of your sneering, puppy! no grinning, jackanapes.

Capt. A. Indeed, sir, I never was in a worse humour for mirth in my life.

Sir Anth. 'Tis false, sir; I know you are laughing in your sleeve; I know you'll grin when I am gone, sirrah!

Capt. A. Sir, I hope I know my duty better.

Sir Anth. None of your passion, sir! none of your violence, if you please—it won't do with me, I promise you.

Capt. A. Indeed, sir, I was never cooler in my fe.

Sir Anth. 'Tis a confounded lie!—I know you are in a passion in your heart; I know you are, you hypocritical young dog—but it won't do.

Capt. A. Nay, sir, upon my word—

Sir Anth. So you will fly out! can't you be cool, like me? What the devil good can passion do? Passion is of no service, you impudent, insolent, over-bearing reprobate!—There, you sneer again!—don't provoke me! but you rely upon the mildness of my temper—you do, you dog! you play upon the meekness of my disposition! Yet, take care—the patience of a saint may be overcome at last!—but mark! I give you six hours and a half to consider of this: if you then agree, without any condition, to do everything on earth that I choose, why—confound you! I may in time forgive you,—if not, z—ds! don't enter the same hemisphere with me; don't dare to breathe the same air, or use the same light with me; but get an atmosphere and a sun of your own! I'll strip you of your commission; I'll lodge a five-and-threepence in the hands of trustees, and you shall live on the interest. I'll disown you, I'll disinherit you, I'll unget you! and d—n me! if ever I call you Jack again! [Exit.]

Capt. A. Mild, gentle, considerate father! I kiss your hands.

Enter FAG.

Fag. Assuredly, sir, your father is wroth to a degree; he comes down stairs eight or ten steps at a time, muttering, growling, and thumping the banisters all the way; I, and the cook's dog, stand bowing at the door—rap! he gives me a stroke on the head with his cane; bids me carry that to my master; then kicking the poor turnspit into the area, d—ns us all for a puppy triumvirate!—Upon my credit, sir, were I in your place, and found my father such very bad company, I should certainly drop his acquaintance.

Capt. A. Cease your impertinence, sir—did you come in for nothing more? Stand out of the way.

[Pushes him aside, and exit.]

Fag. So! Sir Anthony trims my master: he is afraid to reply to his father, then vents his spleen on poor Fag! When one is vexed by one person, to revenge one's self on another, who happens to come in the way, shows the worst of tempers, the basest—

Enter Errand Boy.

Boy. Mr. Fag! Mr. Fag! your master calls you.

Fag. Well! you little, dirty puppy, you needn't bawl so—the meanest disposition, the—

Boy. Quick! quick! Mr. Fag.

Fag. Quick, quick! you impudent jackanapes! am I to be commanded by you too, you little, impertinent, insolent, kitchen-bred— [Kicks him off.]

SCENE II.—The North Parade.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. So. I shall have another rival to add to my mistress's list—Captain Absolute; however, I shall not enter his name till my purse has received due notice in form. Sir Lucius is generally more punctual, when he expects to hear from his dear Dalia, as he calls her:—I wonder he's not here!

Enter Sir LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

Sir L. Hah! my little ambassadress; upon my conscience I have been looking for you; I have been on the South Parade this half hour.

Lucy. [Speaking simply.] O gemini; and I have been waiting for your worship here on the North.

Sir L. 'Faith! may be, that was the reason we did not meet; and it is very comical too, how you could go out, and I not see you—for I was only taking a nap at the Parade Coffee-house, and I chose the window, on purpose that I might not miss you.

Lucy. My stars! Now I'd wager a sixpence I went by while you were asleep.

Sir L. Sure enough it must have been so; and I never dreamt it was so late, till I waked. Well, but my little girl, have you got nothing for me?

Lucy. Yes, but I have—I've got a letter for you in my pocket.

Sir L. 'Faith! I guessed you weren't come empty-handed; well, let me see what the dear creature says.

Lucy. There, Sir Lucius. [Gives him a letter.]

Sir L. [Reads.] "Sir,—There is often a sudden incentive impulse in love, that has a greater induction than years of domestic combination: such was the commotion I felt at the first superfluous view of Sir Lucius O'Trigger." Very pretty upon my word! "Female punctuation forbids me to say more! yet, let me add, that it will give me joy infallible to find Sir Lucius worthy the last criterion of my affections.

"Yours, while meretricious,

"DALIA."

Upon my conscience! Lucy, your lady is a great mistress of language! 'Faith! she's quite the queen of the dictionary; for the devil a word dare refuse coming at her call, though one would think it was quite out of hearing.

Lucy. Ay, sir, a lady of her experience.

Sir L. Experience! what, at seventeen?

Lucy. O, true, sir—but then she reads so—my stars! how she will read off hand!

Sir L. 'Faith she must be very deep read, to write this way, though she is rather an arbitrary writer, too; for here are a great many poor words pressed into the service of this note, that would get their habeas corpus from any court in Christendom. However, when affection guides the pen, he must be a brute who finds fault with the style.

Lucy. Ah! Sir Lucius, if you were to hear how she talks of you!

Sir L. Oh, tell her, I'll make her the best husband in the world, and Lady O'Trigger into the bargain! But we must get the old gentlewoman's consent, and do everything fairly.

Lucy. Nay, Sir Lucius, I thought you wa'n't rich enough to be so nice.

Sir L. Upon my word, young woman, you have hit it: I am so poor, that I can't afford to do a dirty action. If I did not want money, I'd steal your mistress and her fortune with a great deal of pleasure. However, my pretty girl, [Giving her money] here's a little something to buy you a ribband; and meet me in the evening, and I will give you an answer to this. So, hussy, take a kiss beforehand, to put you in mind. [Kisses her.]

Lucy. O lud! Sir Lucius—I never see such a gentleman! My lady won't like you if you are so impudent.

Sir L. 'Faith she will, Lucy—that same—ho! what's the name of it!—modesty!—is a quality in a lover more praised by the women than liked: so, if your mistress asks you whether Sir Lucius ever gave you a kiss, tell her fifty, my dear.

Lucy. What, would you have me tell her a lie?

Sir L. Ah, then, you baggage! I'll make it a truth presently.

Lucy. For shame now; here is some one coming.

Sir L. O 'faith, I'll quiet your conscience!

[Sees Fag.—Exit, singing.]

Enter Fag.

Fag. So, so, ma'am; I humbly beg pardon.

Lucy. O lud! now, Mr. Fag—you flurry one so.

Fag. Come, come, Lucy, here's no one by—so a little less simplicity, with a grain or two more sincerity, if you please. You play false with us, madam. I saw you give the baronet a letter. My master shall know this; and if he don't call him out—I will.

Lucy. Ha! ha! ha! you gentlemen's gentlemen are so hasty! That letter was from Mrs. Malaprop, simpleton. She is taken with Sir Lucius's address.

Fag. How! what taste some people have! Why, I suppose I have walked by her window an hundred times. But what says our young lady!—any message to my master!

Lucy. Sad news, Mr. Fag! A worse rival than Acra! Sir Anthony Absolute has proposed his son.

Fag. What, Captain Absolute?

Lucy. Even so.—I overheard it all.

Fag. Ha! ha! ha! very good, 'faith! Good by, Lucy: I must away with this news.

Lucy. Well, you may laugh, but it is true, I assure you. [Going.] But, Mr. Fag, tell your master not to be cast down by this.

Fag. Oh, he'll be so disconsolate!

Lucy. And charge him not to think of quarrelling with young Absolute.

Fag. Never fear—never fear.

Lucy. Be sure, bid him keep up his spirits.

Fag. We will—we will. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The North Parade.

Enter Captain ABSOLUTE.

Capt. A. 'Tis just as Fag told me, indeed! Whimsical enough, 'faith! My father wants to force me to marry the very girl I am plotting to run away with! He must not know of my connexion with her yet awhile. He has too summary a method of proceeding in these matters; however, I'll read my recantation instantly. My conversion is something sudden, indeed; but I can assure him, it is very sincere. So, so, here he comes: he looks plaguy gruff. [Steps aside.]

Enter Sir ANTHONY.

Sir Anth. No—I'll die sooner than forgive him!

Die, did I say! I'll live these fifty years to plague him. At our last meeting, his impudence had almost put me out of temper—an obstinate—passionate—self-willed boy! Whom can he take after? This is my return for getting him before all his brothers and sisters! for putting him at twelve years old into a marching regiment, and allowing him fifty pounds a year, besides his pay, ever since! But I have done with him—he's anybody's son for me—I never will see him more—never—never—never.

Capt. A. Now for a penitential face!

[Comes forward.]

Sir Anth. Fellow, get out of my way!

Capt. A. Sir, you see a penitent before you.

Sir Anth. I see an impudent scoundrel before me.

Capt. A. A sincere penitent. I am come, sir, to acknowledge my error, and to submit entirely to your will.

Sir Anth. What's that?

Capt. A. I have been revolving, and reflecting, and considering on your past goodness, and kindness, and condescension to me.

Sir Anth. Well, sir?

Capt. A. I have been likewise weighing, and balancing, what you were pleased to mention, concerning duty, and obedience, and authority.

Sir Anth. Why, now you talk sense, absolute sense! I never heard anything more sensible in my life. Confound you! you shall be Jack again.

Capt. A. I am happy in the appellation.

Sir Anth. Why then, Jack, my dear Jack, I will now inform you who the lady really is. Nothing but your passion and violence, you silly fellow, prevented me telling you at first. Prepare, Jack, for wonder and rapture—prepare. What think you of Miss Lydia Languish?

Capt. A. Languish! What the Languishes of Worcestershire?

Sir Anth. Worcestershire! No. Did you never meet Mrs. Malaprop and her niece, Miss Languish, who came into our country just before you were last ordered to your regiment?

Capt. A. Malaprop! Languish! I don't remember ever to have heard the names before. Yet stay, I think I do recollect something—Languish—Languish—She squints, don't she? A little red-haired girl?

Sir Anth. Squints! A red-haired girl! Z—ds! no!

Capt. A. Then I must have forgot! it can't be the same person.

Sir Anth. Jack! Jack! what think you of blooming, love-breathing seventeen?

Capt. A. As to that, sir, I am quite indifferent; if I can please you in the matter, 'tis all I desire.

Sir Anth. Nay, but Jack, such eyes! such eyes! so innocently wild! so bashfully irresolute! Not a glance but speaks and kindles some thought of love! Then, Jack, her cheeks! her cheeks! Jack! so deeply blushing at the insinuations of her tell-tale eyes! Then, Jack, her lips! O, Jack, lips, smiling at their own discretion! and, if not smiling, more sweetly pouting—more lovely in sullenness! Then, Jack, her neck! O, Jack! Jack!

Capt. A. And which is to be mine, sir, the niece or the aunt?

Sir Anth. Why, you unfeeling, insensible puppy, I despise you. When I was of your age, such a description would have made me fly like a rocket! the aunt, indeed! Odds life! when I ran away with your mother, I would not have touched anything old or ugly to gain an empire.

Capt. A. Not to please your father, sir?

Sir Anth. To please my father—Z—ds! not to please—O, my father—Odso!—yes, yes; if my father, indeed, had desired—that's quite another matter.—Though he wasn't the indulgent father that I am, Jack.

Capt. A. I dare say not, sir?

Sir Anth. But, Jack, you are not sorry to find your mistress is so beautiful?

Capt. A. Sir, I repeat it, if I please you in this affair, 'tis all I desire. Not that I think a woman the worse for being handsome; but, sir, if you please to recollect you before hinted something about a hump or two, one eye, and a few more graces of that kind—now, without being very nice, I own I should rather choose a wife of mine to have the usual number of limbs, and a limited quantity of back; and, though one eye may be very agreeable, yet, as the prejudice has always run in favour of two, I would not wish to affect a singularity in that article.

Sir Anth. What a phlegmatic sot it is! Why, sirrah, you are an anchorite! A vile, insensible stock! You a soldier! you're a walking block, fit only to dust the company's regimentals on! Odds life, I have a great mind to marry the girl myself!

Capt. A. I am entirely at your disposal, sir; if you should think of addressing Miss Languish yourself, I suppose you would have me marry the aunt; or if you should change your mind, and take the old lady, 'tis the same to me, I'll marry the niece.

Sir Anth. Upon my word, Jack, thou art either a very great hypocrite, or—but, come, I know your indifference on such a subject must be all a lie—I'm sure it must—come now, d—n your demure face; come, confess, Jack, you have been lying—ha'n't you? You have been playing the hypocrite, hey? I'll never forgive you, if you ha'n't been lying and playing the hypocrite.

Capt. A. I'm sorry, sir, that the respect and duty which I bear to you should be so mistaken.

Sir Anth. Hang your respect and duty! But, come along with me. I'll write a note to Mrs. Malaprop, and you shall visit the lady directly. Her eyes shall be the Promethean torch to you—come along, I'll never forgive you, if you don't come back stark mad with rapture and impatience—if you don't, 'egad, I'll marry the girl myself.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Julia's Dressing-room.

Enter FAULKLAND.

Faulk. They told me Julia would return directly: I wonder she is not yet come!—How mean does this captious, unsatisfied temper of mine appear to my cooler judgment! What tender, honest joy sparkled in her eyes when we met! How delicate was the warmth of her expressions!—I was ashamed to appear less happy, though I had come resolved to wear a face of coolness and upbraiding. Sir Anthony's presence prevented my proposed expostulations: yet I must be satisfied that she has not been so very happy in my absence. She is coming—yes, I know the nimbleness of her tread, when she thinks her impatient Faulkland counts the moments of her stay.

Enter JULIA.

Jul. I had not hoped to see you again so soon.

Faulk. Could I, Julia, be contented with my first welcome, restrained, as we were, by the presence of a third person?

Jul. Oh, Faulkland! when your kindness can make me thus happy, let me not think that I have discovered something of coolness in your first salutation.

Faulk. 'Twas but your fancy, Julia. I was rejoiced to see you—to see you in such health: sure I had no cause for coldness.

Jul. Nay, then, I see you have taken something ill; you must not conceal from me what it is.

Faulk. Well, then, shall I own to you, that my joy at hearing of your health and arrival here, by your neighbour Acres, was somewhat damped, by his dwelling much on the high spirits you had enjoyed in Devonshire: on your mirth—your singing—dancing—and I know not what: for such is my temper, Julia, that I should regard every mirthful moment in your absence, as a treason to constancy. The mutual tear, that steals down the cheek of parting lovers, is a compact, that no smile shall live there till they meet again.

Jul. Must I never cease to tax my Faulkland with this teasing, minute caprice! Can the idle reports of a silly boor weigh in your breast against my tried affection?

Faulk. They have no weight with me, Julia: no, no, I am happy, if you have been so—yet only say that you did not sing with mirth—say that you thought of Faulkland in the dance.

Jul. I never can be happy in your absence. If I wear a countenance of content, it is to show that my mind holds no doubt of my Faulkland's truth. Believe me, Faulkland, I mean not to upbraid you, when I say, that I have often dressed sorrow in smiles, lest my friends should guess whose unkindness had caused my tears.

Faulk. You were ever all goodness to me! Oh, I am a brute, when I but admit a doubt of your true constancy!

Jul. If ever without such cause from you, as I will not suppose possible, you find my affections veering but a point, may I become a proverbial scoff for levity and base ingratitude!

Faulk. Ah, Julia! that last word is grating to me! I would I had no title to your gratitude! Search your heart, Julia: perhaps what you have mistaken for love, is but a warm effusion of a too thankful heart!

Jul. For what quality must I love you?

Faulk. For no quality: to regard me for any quality of mind or understanding, were only to esteem me! And for person—I have often wished myself deformed, to be convinced that I owed no obligation there for any part of your affection.

Jul. Where nature has bestowed a show of nice attention in the features of a man, he should laugh at it as misplaced. I have seen men, who in this vain article, perhaps, might rank above you; but my heart has never asked my eyes if it were so or not.

Faulk. Now, this is not well from you, Julia. I despise person in a man, yet, if you love me as I wish, though I were an Æthiop, you'd think none so fair.

Jul. I s-e-e you are determined to be unkind.—The contract, which my poor father bound us in, gives you more than a lover's privilege.

Faulk. Again, Julia, you raise ideas that feed and justify my doubts. How shall I be sure, had you remained unbound in thought or promise, that I should still have been the object of your persevering love?

Jul. Then try me now—Let us be free as strangers as to what is past: my heart will not feel more liberty.

Faulk. There, now! so hasty, Julia! so anxious to be free! If your love for me were fixed and ardent, you would not loose your hold, even though I wished it!

Jul. Oh, you torture me to the heart! I cannot bear it!

Faulk. I do not mean to distress you: if I loved you less, I should never give you an uneasy moment. I would not boast, yet let me say, that I have neither age, person, nor character, to found dislike on; my fortune such, as few ladies could be charged with indiscretion in the match. O, Julia! when love receives such countenance from prudence, nice minds will be suspicious of its birth.

Jul. I know not whither your insinuations would tend; but as they seem pressing to insult me, I will spare you the regret of having done so—I have given no cause for this! [Exit, crying.]

Faulk. In tears! stay, Julia—stay, but for a moment—The door is fastened! Julia! my soul! but for one moment!—I hear her sobbing! 'Sdeath! what a brute am I to use her thus!—yet stay—Ay, she is coming now: how little resolution there is in woman! how a few soft words can turn them! [Sits down, and sings.] No, Z—ds! she's not coming, nor don't intend it, I suppose! This is not steadiness, but obstinacy! Yet I deserve it. What, after so long an absence, to quarrel with her tenderness! 'twas barbarous and unmanly!—I should be ashamed to see her now.—I'll wait till her just resentment is abated, and when I distress her so again, may I lose her for ever. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Mrs. Malaprop's Lodgings.

Enter Mrs. MALAPROP, with a letter in her hand, Captain ABSOLUTE following.

Mrs. M. Your being Sir Anthony's son, captain, would itself be a sufficient accommodation; but from the ingenuity of your appearance, I am convinced you deserve the character here given of you.

Capt. A. Permit me to say, madam, that as I have never yet had the pleasure of seeing Miss Languish, my principal inducement in this affair, at present, is the honour of being allied to Mrs. Malaprop, of whose intellectual accomplishments, elegant manners, and unaffected learning, no tongue is silent.

Mrs. M. Sir, you do me infinite honour! I beg, captain, you'll be seated.—[Both sit.]—Ah! few gentlemen, now-a-days, know how to value the ineffectual qualities in a woman! few think how a little knowledge becomes a gentlewoman! Men have no sense, now, but for the worthless flower of beauty.

Capt. A. It is but too true, indeed, ma'am; yet I fear our ladies should share the blame; they think our admiration of beauty so great, that knowledge, in them, would be superfluous. Thus, like garden trees, they seldom show fruit, till time has robbed them of the more specious blossoms: few, like Mrs. Malaprop, and the orange-tree, are rich in both at once.

Mrs. M. Sir, you overpower me with good breeding—He is the very pine-apple of politeness! You are not ignorant, captain, that this giddy girl has, somehow, contrived to fix her affections on a beggarly, strolling, eves-dropping ensign, whom none of us have seen, and nobody knows anything of.

Capt. A. Oh, I have heard the silly affair before. I'm not at all prejudiced against her on that account. But it must be very distressing, indeed, to you, ma'am.

Mrs. M. Oh, it gives me the hydrostatics to such a degree!—I thought she had persisted from corresponding with him; but behold, this very day, I have interceded another letter from the fellow—I believe I have it in my pocket.

Capt. A. O, the devil! my last note! [Aside.]

Mrs. M. Ay, here it is.

Capt. A. Ay, my note, indeed! O, the little traitress, Lucy! [Aside.]

Mrs. M. There, perhaps you may know the writing. [Gives him the letter.]

Capt. A. I think I have seen the hand before—yes, I certainly must have seen this hand before.

Mrs. M. Nay, but read it, captain.

Capt. A. [Reads.] "My soul's idol, my adored Lydia!"—Very tender, indeed.

Mrs. M. Tender! ay, and profane too, o' my conscience!

Capt. A. "I am excessively alarmed at the intelligence you send me, the more so as my new rival"

Mrs. M. That's you, sir.

Capt. A. "Has universally the character of being an accomplished gentleman, and a man of honour." Well, that's handsome enough.

Mrs. M. Oh, the fellow has some design in writing so.

Capt. A. That he had, I'll answer for him, ma'am.

Mrs. M. But go on, sir—you'll see presently.

Capt. A. "As for the old weather-beaten shepherd, who guards you"—Who can he mean by that?

Mrs. M. Me, sir—me—he means me there—what do you think now?—but go on a little further.

Capt. A. Impudent scoundrel!—"it shall go hard but I will elude her vigilance; as I am told that the same ridiculous vanity, which makes her dress up her coarse features, and deck her dull chat with hard words which she don't understand"

Mrs. M. There, sir, an attack upon my language!—what do you think of that?—an aspersion upon my parts of speech! was ever such a brute! Sure if I reprehend anything in this world, it is the use of my oracular tongue, and a nice derangement of epitaphs.

Capt. A. He deserves to be hanged and quartered! let me see—"same ridiculous vanity!"

Mrs. M. You need not read it again, sir!

Capt. A. I beg pardon, ma'am—"does also lay her open to the grossest deceptions from flattery and pretended admiration"—an impudent scoundrel—"so that I have a scheme to see you shortly, with the old harridan's consent, and even to make her a go-between in our interviews."—Was ever such assurance!

Mrs. M. Did you ever hear anything like it! [They rise.] He'll elude my vigilance, will he?—yes, yes!—ha! ha! he's very likely to enter these doors!—we'll try who can plot best!

Capt. A. So we will, ma'am—so we will.—Ha! ha! ha! a conceited puppy! ha! ha! ha!—Well, but Mrs. Malaprop, as the girl seems so infatuated by this fellow, suppose you were to wink at her corresponding with him for a little time—let her even plot an elopement with him—then do you connive at her escape—while I, just in the nick, will have the fellow laid by the heels, and fairly contrive to carry her off in his stead.

Mrs. M. I am delighted with the scheme; never was anything better perpetrated.

Capt. A. But, pray, could I not see the lady for a few minutes now?—I should like to try her temper a little.

Mrs. M. Why, I don't know; I doubt she is not prepared for a visit of this kind. There is a decorum in these matters.

Capt. A. O Lord, she won't mind me!—only tell her, Beverley—

Mrs. M. Sir!

Capt. A. Gently, good tongue!

[Aside.]

Mrs. M. What did you say of Beverley?

Capt. A. Oh, I was going to propose that you should tell her, by way of jest, that it was Beverley who was below—she'd come down fast enough then—ha! ha! ha!

Mrs. M. 'Twould be a trick she well deserves; besides, you know the fellow tells her he'll get my consent to see her—ha! ha! Let him, if he can, I say again. Lydia, come down here! [Calling.] He'll make me a go-between in their interviews!—ha! ha! ha! Come down, I say, Lydia! I don't wonder at your laughing—ha! ha! ha! his impudence is truly ridiculous.

Capt. A. 'Tis very ridiculous, upon my soul, ma'am!—ha! ha! ha!

Mrs. M. The little hussy won't hear. Well, I'll go and tell her at once who it is—she shall know that Captain Absolute is come to wait on her. And I'll make her behave as becomes a young woman.

Capt. A. As you please, ma'am.

Mrs. M. For the present, captain, your servant—Ah, you've not done laughing yet, I see—elude my vigilance! yes, yes—Ha! ha! ha! [Exit.]

Capt. A. Ha! ha! ha! one would think, now, that I might throw off all disguise at once, and seize my prize with security; but such is Lydia's caprice, that, to undeceive, were probably to lose her. I'll see whether she knows me.

[Walks aside, surveying the pictures.]

Enter LYDIA.

Lyd. What a scene am I now to go through! surely nothing can be more dreadful than to be obliged to listen to the loathsome addresses of a stranger to one's heart. I have heard of girls persecuted, as I am, who have appealed in behalf of their favoured lover to the generosity of his rival: suppose I were to try it—there stands the hated rival—an officer, too! but, oh, how unlike my Beverley! I wonder he don't begin—truly, he seems a very negligent wooer!—quite at his ease, upon my word! I'll speak first—Mr. Absolute!

Capt. A. Ma'am.

[Turns round.]

Lyd. O heavens! Beverley!

Capt. A. Hush! hush, my life! softly! be not surprised!

Lyd. I am so astonished! and so terrified! and so overjoyed! For Heaven's sake, how came you here?

Capt. A. Briefly. I have deceived your aunt. I was informed that my new rival was to visit here this evening, and, contriving to have him kept away, have passed myself on her for Captain Absolute.

Lyd. Oh, charming!—and she really takes you for young Absolute?

Capt. A. Oh, she's convinced of it.

Lyd. Ha! ha! ha! I can't forbear laughing, to think how her sagacity is over-reached.

Capt. A. But we trifle with our precious moments—such another opportunity may not occur; then let me now conjure my kind, my condescending angel, to fix the time when I may rescue her from undeserved persecution, and, with a licensed warmth, plead for my reward.

Lyd. Will you then, Beverley, consent to forfeit that portion of my paltry wealth—that burden of the wings of love?

Capt. A. Oh, come to me—rich only thus—in loveliness! Bring no portion to me but thy love; 'twill be generous in you, Lydia; for well you know, it is the only dower your poor Beverley can repay.

Lyd. How persuasive are his words! how charming will poverty be with him!

[Aside.]

Capt. A. By heavens, I would flog all goods of fortune from me with a prodigal hand, to enjoy the scene where I might clasp my Lydia to my bosom, and say, the world affords no smile to me but here. [Embracing her.] If she holds out now, the devil is in it.

[Aside.]

Lyd. Now could I fly with him to the Antipodes—but my persecution is not yet come to a crisis.

[Aside.]

Enter MRS. MALAPROP, listening.

Mrs. M. I am impatient to know how the little hussy deports herself.

[Aside.]

Capt. A. So pensive, Lydia!—is then your warmth abated?

Mrs. M. Warmth abated?—so?—she has been in a passion, I suppose.

[Aside.]

Lyd. No; nor ever can while I have life.

Mrs. M. An ill-temper'd little devil!—She'll be in a passion all her life, will she?

[Aside.]

Lyd. Let her choice be Captain Absolute, but Beverley is mine.

Mrs. M. I am astonished at her assurance!—to his face—this is his face!

[Aside.]

Capt. A. Thus, then, let me enforce my suit.

[Kneeling.]

Mrs. M. Ay—poor young man!—down on his knees, entreating for pity!—I can contain no longer. [Aside.]—Why, thou vixen!—I have overheard you.

Capt. A. Oh, confound her vigilance!

[Aside.]

Mrs. M. Captain Absolute—I know not how to apologize for her shocking rudeness.

Capt. A. So, all's safe I find. [Aside.]—I have hopes, madam, that time will bring the young lady—

Mrs. M. O, there's nothing to be hoped for from her! she's as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile.

Lyd. Nay, madam, what do you charge me with now?

Mrs. M. Why, thou unblushing rebel—didn't you tell this gentleman to his face, that you loved another better?—didn't you say you never would be his?

Lyd. No, madam, I did not.

Mrs. M. Good heavens, what assurance!—Lydia, you ought to know that lying don't become a young woman! Didn't you boast that Beverley—that stroller, Beverley—possessed your heart? Tell me that, I say.

Lyd. 'Tis true, ma'am, and none but Beverley—
Mrs. M. Hold!—hold, assurance!—you shall not be so rude.

Capt. A. Nay, pray, Mrs. Malaprop, don't stop the young lady's speech:—she's very welcome to talk thus—it does not hurt me in the least, I assure you.

Mrs. M. You are too good, captain—too amiably patient:—but come with me, miss—let us see you again soon, captain—remember what we have fixed.

Capt. A. I shall, ma'am.

Mrs. M. Come, take a graceful leave of the gentleman.

Lyd. May every blessing wait on my Beverley, my loved Bev— [Mrs. M. prevents her speaking.]

Mrs. M. Hussy!—Come along—come along.

[Exeunt Capt. Absolute, kissing his hand to LYDIA—Mrs. MALAPROP and LYDIA.]

SCENE IV.—Acres' Lodgings.

ACRES and DAVID discovered; ACRES just dressed.

Acres. Indeed, David—dress does make a difference, David.

Dav. 'Tis all in all, I think—difference? why, an' you were to go now to Clod Hall, I am certain the old lady wouldn't know you: master Butler wouldn't believe his own eyes, and Mrs. Pickle would cry, "Lard preserve me!" our dairy-maid would come giggling to the door, and I warrant Dolly Tester, your honour's favourite, would blush like my waistcoat. Oons! I'll hold a gallon, there an't a dog in the house but would bark, and I question whether Phillis would wag a hair of her tail?

Acres. Ay, David, there's nothing like polishing.

Dav. So I says of your honour's boots; but the boy never heeds me!

Acres. But David, has Mr. de la Grace been here? I must rub up my balancing, and chasing, and boring.

Dav. I'll call again, sir.

Acres. Do; and see if there are any letters for me at the Post-office.

Dav. I will. By the mass, I can't help looking at your head! if I hadn't been at the cooking, I wish I may die if I should have known the dish again myself.

[Exit.]

[ACRES comes forward with a dancing step.]

Acres. Sink, slide—coupee—Confound the first inventors of cotillions, say I!—they are as bad as algebra to us country gentlemen—I can walk a minuet easy enough, when I am forced—and I have been accounted a good stick in a country dance. Odds jigs and tabors!—I never valued your cross-over to couple—figure in—right and left—and I'd foot it with e'er a captain in the country!—but these outlandish heathen allemandes and cotillions are quite beyond me!—I shall never prosper at them, that's sure—mine are true-born English legs—they don't understand their cursed French lingo!—their pas this, and pas that, and pas t'other! damn me! my feet don't like to be called paws!

Enter Servant.

Serv. Here is Sir Lucius O'Trigger to wait on you, sir.

Acres. Show him in.

[Exit Servant.]

Enter Sir LUCIUS.

Sir L. Mr. Acres. I am delighted to see you.

Acres. My dear Sir Lucius, I kiss your hands.

Sir L. Pray, my friend, what has brought you so suddenly to Bath?

Acres. 'Faith, I have followed Cupid's jack-a-lantern, and find myself in a quagmire at last!—In short, I have been very ill-used, Sir Lucius. I don't choose to mention names, but look on me as a very ill-used gentleman.

Sir L. Pray, what is the cause?—I ask no names.

Acres. Mark me, Sir Lucius; I fall as deep as need be in love with a young lady—her friends take my part—I follow her to Bath—send word of my arrival; and receive answer, that the lady is to be otherwise disposed of. This, Sir Lucius, I call being ill-used.

Sir L. Very ill, upon my conscience!—Pray, can you divine the cause of it?

Acres. Why, there's the matter: she has another lover, one Beverley, who, I am told, is now in Bath.—Odds slanders and lies, he must be at the bottom of it.

Sir L. A rival in the case, is there? and you think he has supplanted you unfairly?

Acres. Unfairly! to be sure he has. He never could have done it fairly.

Sir L. Then sure you know what is to be done?

Acres. Not I, upon my soul!

Sir L. We wear no swords here, but you understand me?

Acres. What! fight him!

Sir L. Ay, to be sure: what can I mean else?

Acres. But he has given me no provocation.

Sir L. Now, I think he has given you the greatest provocation in the world. Can a man commit a more heinous offence against another, than to fall in love with the same woman? Oh, by my soul, it is the most unpardonable breach of friendship.

Acres. Breach of friendship! Ay, ay; but I have no acquaintance with this man. I never saw him in all my life.

Sir L. That's no argument at all—he has the less right then to take such a liberty.

Acres. 'Gad, that's true—I grow full of anger, Sir Lucius!—I fire apace; odds hilts and blades! I find a man may have a deal of valour in him, and not know it!—But couldn't I contrive to have a little right on my side?

Sir L. What the devil signifies right when your honour is concerned? do you think Achilles, or my little Alexander the Great, ever inquired where the right lay? No, by my soul, they drew their broad swords, and left the lazy sons of peace to settle the justice of it.

Acres. Your words are a grenadier's march to my heart! I believe courage must be catching!—I certainly do feel a kind of valour arising, as it were—a kind of courage, as I may say—Odds flints, pans, and triggers! I'll challenge him directly.

Sir L. Ah! my little friend! if we had Blunderbuss Hall here—I could show you a range of ancestry, in the O'Trigger line, that would furnish the New Room, every one of whom had killed his man!—For though the mansion-house and dirty acres have slipped through my fingers, I thank Heaven, our honour and the family pictures are as fresh as ever.

Acres. Oh, Sir Lucius, I have had ancestors too!

— every man of them colonel or captain in the militia!—odds balls and barrels! say no more—I'm braced for it. The thunder of your words has soured the milk of human kindness in my breast!—Z—ds! as the mag in the play says, "I could do such deeds!"

Sir L. Come, come, there must be no passion at all in the case—these things should always be done civilly.

Acres. I must be in a passion, Sir Lucius—I must be in a rage—Dear Sir Lucius, let me be in a rage, if you love me. Come, here's pen and paper. [Sits.] I would the ink were red!—Indite, I say, indite!—How shall I begin? Odds bullets and blades! I'll write a good bold hand, however.

Sir L. Pray compose yourself. [Sits down.]

Acres. Come—now, shall I begin with an oath? Do, Sir Lucius, let me begin with a damme?

Sir L. Pho! pho! do the thing decently, and like a Christian. Begin now—"Sir,"—

Acres. That's too civil by half.

Sir L. "To prevent the confusion that might arise!"—

Acres. Well—

Sir L. "From our both addressing the same lady!"—

Acres. Ay—"both undressing the same lady!"—there's the reason—"same lady!"—Well—

Sir L. "I shall expect the honour of your company!"—

Acres. Z—ds! I'm not asking him to dinner!—

Sir L. Pray, be easy.

Acres. Well, then, "honour of your company."—Does company begin with a C or a K?

Sir L. "To settle our pretensions!"—

Acres. Well.

Sir L. Let me see—ay, King's Mead-fields will do—"in King's Mead-fields."

Acres. So, that's done. Well, I'll fold it up presently; my own crest, a hand and dagger, shall be the seal.

Sir L. You see, now, this little explanation will put a stop at once to all confusion or misunderstanding that might arise between you.

Acres. Ay, we fight to prevent any misunderstanding.

Sir L. Now, I'll leave you to fix your own time. Take my advice, and you'll decide it this evening, if you can; then, let the worst come of it, 'twill be off your mind to-morrow.

Acres. Very true.

Sir L. So I shall see nothing more of you, unless it be by letter, till the evening—I would do myself the honour to carry your mes-age; but, to tell you a secret, I believe I shall have just such another affair on my own hands. There is a gay captain here who put a jest on me lately at the expense of my country, and I only want to fall in with the gentleman to call him out.

Acres. By my valour, I should like to see you fight first! Odds life, I should like to see you kill him, if it was only to get a little lesson!

Sir L. I shall be very proud of instructing you. Well, for the present—but remember now, when you meet your antagonist, do everything in a mild and agreeable manner. Let your courage be as keen, but at the same time as polished as your sword. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Acres' Lodgings.

ACRES and DAVID discovered.

Dav. Then, by the mass, sir, I would do no such thing! ne'er a Sir Lucius O'Trigger in the kingdom should make me fight when I wasn't so minded. Oons! what will the old lady say when she hears o't?

Acres. But my honour, David, my honour! I must be very careful of my honour.

Dav. Ay, by the mass, and I would be very careful of it, and I think in return my honour couldn't do less than to be very careful of me.

Acres. Odds blades! David, no gentleman will ever risk the loss of his honour!

Dav. I say, then, it would be but civil in honour never to risk the loss of a gentleman.—Look ye, master, this honour seems to me to be a marvellous false friend; ay, truly, a very courtier-like servant. Put the case; I was a gentleman (which, thank Heaven, no one can say of me); well—my honour makes me quarrel with another gentleman of my acquaintance. So—we fight.—(Pleasant enough that.) Boh! I kill him—(the more's my luck.) Now, pray, who gets the profit of it?—why, my honour. But, put the case that he kills me! by the mass! I go to the worms, and my honour whips over to my enemy.

Acres. No, David, in that case!—Odds crowns and laurels! your honour follows you to the grave!

Dav. Now, that's just the place where I could make a shift to do without it.

Acres. Z—ds! David, you are a coward!—It doesn't become my valour to listen to you.—What, shall I disgrace my ancestors!—Think of that, David—think what it would be to disgrace my ancestors!

Dav. Under favour, the surest way of not disgracing them, is to keep as long as you can out of their company. Look ye, now, master, to go to them in such haste—with an ounce of lead in your brains—I should think it might as well be let alone. Our ancestors are very good kind of folks; but they are the last people I should choose to have a visiting acquaintance with.

Acres. But, David, now, you don't think there is such very, very—great danger, hey?—Odds life! people often fight without any mischief done!

Dav. By the mass, I think 'tis ten to one against you! Oons! here to meet some lion-headed fellow, I warrant, with his d—d double-barrell'd swords and cut-and-thrust pistols!—Lord bless us! it makes me tremble to think on't—those be such desperate bloody-minded weapons! well, I never could abide them!—from a child I never could fancy them!—I suppose there an't been so merciless a beast in the world as your loaded pistol!

Acres. Z—ds! I won't be afraid—odds fire and fury! you shan't make me afraid.—Here is the challenge, and I have sent for my dear friend, Jack Absolute, to carry it for me.

Dav. Ay, i' the name of mischief, let him be the messenger.—For my part, I wouldn't lend a hand to it, for the best horse in your stable. By the mass! it don't look like another letter!—it is, as I may say, a designing and malicious-looking letter! and I warrant smells of gunpowder. Like a soldier's pouch! Oons! I wouldn't swear it mayn't go off!

Acres. Out, you poltroon!—you ha'n't the valour of a grasshopper.

Dav. Well, I say no more—'twill be sad news, to be sure, at Clod-Hall!—but I ha' done.—How Phillis will howl when she hears of it!—ay, poor bitch, she little thinks what shooting her master's going after!—and I warrant old Crop, who has carried your honour, field and road, these ten years, will curse the hour he was born!—[Whimpering.]

Acres. It won't do, David—I am determined to fight, so get along, you coward, while I'm in the mind.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Captain Absolute, sir.

Acres. O! show him up.

[Exit Servant.]

David. Well, Heaven send we be all alive this time to-morrow.

Acres. What's that?—Don't provoke me, David!

Dav. Good bye, master.

[Sobbing.]

Acres. Get along, you cowardly, dastardly, croaking raven.

[Exit David.]

Enter Captain Absolute.

Capt. A. What's the matter, Bob?

Acres. A vile, sheep-hearted blockhead!—If I hadn't the valour of St. George, and the dragon to boot—

Capt. A. But what did you want with me, Bob?

Acres. Oh!—there—[Gives him the challenge.]

Capt. A. [To Ensign BEVERLEY.] So—what's going on now? [Aside.] Well, what's this!

Acres. A challenge!

Capt. A. Indeed!—Why, you won't fight him, will you, Bob?

Acres. 'Egad, but I will, Jack.—Sir Lucius has brought me to it. He has left me full of rage, and I'll fight this evening, that so much good passion mayn't be wasted.

Capt. A. But what have I to do with this?

Acres. Why, as I think you know something of this fellow, I want you to find him out for me, and give him this mortal defiance.

Capt. A. Well, give it me, and trust me he gets it.

Acres. Thank you, my dear friend, my dear Jack; but it is giving you a great deal of trouble.

Capt. A. Not in the least—I beg you won't mention it. No trouble in the world, I assure you.

Acres. You are very kind.—What it is to have a friend!—you couldn't be my second—could you, Jack?

Capt. A. Why, no, Bob—not in this affair—it would not be quite so proper.

Acres. Well, then, I must get my friend, Sir Lucius. I shall have your good wishes, however, Jack?

Capt. A. Whenever he meets you, believe me.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir Anthony Absolute is below, inquiring for the captain.

Capt. A. I'll come instantly. [Exit Servant.]

Well, my little hero, success attend you. [Going.]
Acres. Stay, stay, Jack. If Beverley should ask you what kind of a man your friend Acres is, do tell him I am a devil of a fellow—will you, Jack?

Capt. A. To be sure I shall. I'll say you are a determined dog—hey, Bob?

Acres. Ay, do, do—and if that frightens him, egad, perhaps he mayn't come. So tell him I generally kill a man a week; will you, Jack?

Capt. A. I will; I will; I'll say you are call'd in the country, "Fighting Bob."

Acres. Right, right—'tis all to prevent mischief; for I don't want to take his life, if I clear my honour.

Capt. A. No!—that's very kind of you.

Acres. Why, you don't wish me to kill him, do you, Jack?

Capt. A. No, upon my soul, I do not. But a devil of a fellow, hey?

[Going.]

Acres. True, true.—But, stay—stay, Jack—you may add, that you never saw me in such a rage before—a most devouring rage.

Capt. A. I will, I will.

Acres. Remember, Jack—a determined dog.

Capt. A. Ay, ay, "Fighting Bob." [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Mrs. Malaprop's Lodgings.

Enter Mrs. MALAPROP and LYDIA.

Mrs. M. Why, thou perverse one!—tell me what you can object to in him?—Isn't he a handsome man?—tell me that. A genteel man? A prett figure of a man?

Lyd. She little thinks whom she is praising. [Aside.] So is Beverley, ma'am.

Mrs. M. No caparisons, miss, if you please. Caparisons don't become a young woman. No! Captain Absolute is indeed a fine gentleman.

Lyd. Ay, the Captain Absolute you have seen. [Aside.]

Mrs. M. Then he's so well bred;—so full of alacrity and adulation!—He has so much to say for himself, in such good language, too. His physiognomy so grammatical; then his presence so noble! I protest, when I saw him, I thought of what Hamlet says in the play:—"Hesperian curls—the front of Job himself! an eye, like March, to threaten at command!—a station, like Harry Mercury, new!"—Something about kissing—on a bill—however, the similitude struck me directly.

Lyd. How enraged she'll be presently, when she discovers her mistake! [Aside.]

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir Anthony and Captain Absolute are below, ma'am.

Mrs. M. Show them up here. [Exit Servant.]
Now, Lydia, I insist on your behaving as becomes a young woman. Show your good breeding, at least, though you have forgot your duty.

Lyd. Madam, I have told you my resolution—I shall not only give him no encouragement, but I won't even speak to, or look at him.

[Flings herself into a chair, with her face from the door.]

Enter Sir ANTHONY and Captain Absolute.

Sir Anth. Here we are, Mrs. Malaprop; come to mitigate the frowns of unrelenting beauty,—and difficulty enough I had to bring this fellow. I don't know what's the matter, but if I had not held him by force, he'd have given me the slip.

Mrs. M. You have infinite trouble, Sir Anthony, in the affair. I am ashamed for the cause! Lydia, Lydia, rise, I beseech you!—pay your respects! [Aside to her.]

Sir Anth. I hope, madam, that Miss Languish has reflected on the worth of this gentleman, and the regard due to her aunt's choice, and my alliance. Now, Jack, speak to her. [Aside to him.]

Capt. A. What the devil shall I do? [Aside.]

You see, sir, she won't even look at me whilst you are here, I knew she wouldn't!—I told you so—Let me entreat you, sir, to leave us together!

[Capt. A. seems to expostulate with his father.]

Sir Anth. I say, sir, I won't stir a foot yet.

Mrs. M. I am sorry to say, Sir Anthony, that my affluence over my niece is very small. Turn round, Lydia, I blush for you!

[Aside to her.]

Sir Anth. May I not flatter myself, that Miss Languish will assign what cause of dislike she can have to my son?—why don't you begin, Jack?

Speak, you puppy—speak!

[Aside to him.]

Mrs. M. It is impossible, Sir Anthony, she can have any. She will not say she has. Answer, hussy! why don't you answer?

[Aside to her.]

Sir Anth. Then, madam, I trust that a childish and hasty predilection will be no bar to Jack's happiness. Z—ds! sirrah! why don't you speak?

[Aside to him.]

Capt. A. Hem! hem! Madam—hem! [Capt. A. Absolute attempts to speak, then returns to Sir Anth.] 'Faith! sir, I am so confounded!—and so—so confounded! I told you I should be so, sir,—I knew it. The—the tremour of my passion entirely takes away my presence of mind.

Sir Anth. But it don't take away your voice, fool, does it? Go up, and speak to her directly! [Capt. Absolute makes signs to Mrs. MALAPROP to leave them together.] What the devil are you at? unlock your jaws, sirrah, or—

[Aside to him.]

Capt. A. [Draws near LYDIA.] Now, Heaven send she may be too sullen to look round! I must disguise my voice. [Aside. Speaks in a low tone.] Will not Miss Languish lend an ear to the mild accents of true love? Will not—

Sir Anth. What the devil ails the fellow? Why don't you speak out?—not stand croaking like a frog in a quinsy!

Capt. A. The—the excess of my awe, and my—my modesty, quite choke me!

Sir Anth. Ah! your modesty again! I'll tell you what, Jack: if you don't speak out directly and glibly too, I shall be in such a rage! Mrs. Malaprop, I wish the lady would favour us with something more than a side-front.

[Mrs. MALAPROP seems to chide LYDIA.]
Capt. A. So! all will out, I see! [Goes up to LYDIA, speaks softly.] Be not surprised, my Lydia, suppress all surprise at present.

Lyd. [Aside.] Heavens! 'tis Beverley's voice! [Looks round by degrees, then starts up.] Is this possible?—my Beverley! how can this be?—my Beverley!

Capt. A. Ah! 'tis all over! [Aside.]

Sir Anth. Beverley!—the devil—Beverley! What can the girl mean? This is my son, Jack Absolute.

Mrs. M. For shame, hussy! for shame! your head runs so on that fellow, that you have him always in your eyes! beg Captain Absolute's pardon directly.

Lyd. I see no Captain Absolute, but my loved Beverley!

Sir Anth. Z—ds, the girl's mad! her brain's turned by reading!

Mrs. M. O my conscience, I believe so!—what do you mean by Beverley, hussy?—you saw Captain Absolute before to-day, there he is—your husband that shall be.

Lyd. With all my soul, ma'am; when I refuse my Beverley—

Sir Anth. Oh! she's as mad as Bedlam!—or has this fellow been playing us a rogue's trick! Come here, sirrah, who the devil are you?

Capt. A. 'Faith, sir, I am not quite clear myself; but I'll endeavour to recollect.

Sir Anth. Are you my son, or not?—answer for your mother, you dog, if you won't for me.

Capt. A. Ye powers of impudence, befriend me!

[Aside.]—Sir Anthony, most assuredly I am your wife's son; and that I sincerely believe myself to be yours also, I hope my duty has always shown. Mrs. Malaprop, I am your most respectful admirer, and shall be proud to add affectionate nephew; I need not tell my Lydia that she sees her faithful Beverley, who knowing the singular generosity of her temper, assumed that name, and a station, which has proved a test of the most disinterested love, which he now hopes to enjoy in a more elevated character.

Lyd. So!—there will be no elopement after all!

[Sullenly.]

Sir Anth. Upon my soul, Jack, thou art a very impudent fellow! To do you justice, I think I never saw a piece of more consummate assurance!

Capt. A. Oh, you flatter me, sir; you compliment; 'tis my modesty, you know, sir; modesty, that has stood in my way.

Sir Anth. Well, I am glad you are not the dull, insensible varlet you pretended to be, however! I'm glad you have made a fool of your father, you dog, I am. So this was your penitence, your duty, and obedience; I thought it was d—n'd sudden. You never heard their names before, not you! What the Languishes of Worcestershire, hey? if you could please me in this affair, 'twas all you desired! Ah! you dissembling villain! What! [Pointing to LYDIA.] she squints, don't she? a little red-haired girl! hey? Why, you hypocritical young rascal—I wonder you an't ashamed to hold up your head!

Capt. A. 'Tis with difficulty, sir—I am confused—very much confused, as you must perceive.

Mrs. M. O lud! Sir Anthony!—a new light breaks in upon me! hey! how! what! captain, did you write the letters then? What!—am I to thank you for the elegant compilation of an "old weather-beaten she-dragon," hey? O mercy—was it you that reflected on my parts of speech?

Capt. A. Dear sir! my modesty will be overpowered at last, if you don't assist me. I shall certainly not be able to stand it.

Sir Anth. Come, come, Mrs. Malaprop, we must forget and forgive; odds life! matters have taken so clever a turn all of a sudden, that I could find in my heart to be so good-humoured! and so gallant!—hey! Mrs. Malaprop! Come, we must leave them together; Mrs. Malaprop, they long to fly into each other's arms, I warrant! Jack—isn't the cheek as I said, hey?—and the eye—you rogue!—and the lip, hey! Come, Mrs. Malaprop, we'll not disturb their tenderness—theirs is the time of life for happiness! Youth's the season made for joy. [Sings.] Hey! Odd's life! I'm in such spirits—I don't know what I could not do! Permit me, ma'am—[Gives his hand to Mrs. MALAPROP.] [Sings.]—Tol de rol—'gad I should like to have a little fooling myself—Tol de rol! de rol!

[Exit, singing, and handing Mrs. MALAPROP off, LYDIA sits sullenly in her chair.]

Capt. A. So much thought bodes me no good, [Aside.] So grave, Lydia!

Lyd. Sir!

Capt. A. So! 'egad! I thought as much! That d—n'd monosyllable has froze me! [Aside.] What,

Lydia, now that we are as happy in our friends' consent as in our mutual vows.

Lyd. Friends' consent, indeed! [Peevishly.]

Capt. A. Come, come, we must lay aside some of our romance; a little wealth and comfort may be endured after all. And for your fortune, the lawyers shall make such settlements as—

Lyd. Lawyers! I hate lawyers!

Capt. A. Nay then we will not wait for their lingering forms, but instantly procure the license, and—

Lyd. The license! I hate licenses!

Capt. A. Oh, my love, be not so unkind—thus let me entreat— [Kneeling]

Lyd. Pshaw! what signifies kneeling, when you know I must have you!

Capt. A. [Rising.] Nay, madam, there shall be no constraint upon your inclinations, I promise you. If I have lost your heart, I resign the rest. Gad, I must try what a little spirit will do.

[Aside.]

Lyd. [Rising.] Then, sir, let me tell you, the interest you had there was acquired by a mean, unmanly imposition, and deserves the punishment of fraud.—What, you have been treating me like a child!—humouring my romance; and, laughing, I suppose, at your success!

Capt. A. You wrong me, Lydia, you wrong me—only hear—

Lyd. So, while I fondly imagined we were deceiving my relations, and flattered myself that I should outwit and incense them all—behold, my hopes are to be crushed at once, by my aunt's consent and approbation—and I am myself the only dupe at last! [Walking about in a heat.]—But here, sir, here is the picture—Beverley's picture! [Taking a miniature from her bosom] which I have worn, night and day, in spite of threats and entreaties!—There, sir [Flinging it to him]—and be assured, I throw the original from my heart as easily.

Capt. A. Nay, nay, ma'am, we will not differ as to that—here—[Taking out a picture]—here is Miss Lydia Languish. What a difference!—ay, there is the heavenly assenting smile, that first gave soul and spirit to my hopes!—those are the lips which sealed a vow, as yet scarce dry in Cupid's calendar!—and there the half-resentful blush, that would have checked the ardour of my thanks. Well, all that's past; all over, indeed! There, madam, in beauty, that copy is not equal to you, but, in my mind, its merit over the original, in being still the same, is such—that—I'll put it in my pocket.

[Puts it up again.]

Lyd. [Softening.] 'Tis your own doing, sir—I, I suppose you are perfectly satisfied.

Capt. A. Oh, most certainly: sure now, this is much better than being in love! ha! ha! ha!—there's some spirit in this! What signifies breaking some scores of solemn promises; all that's of no consequence, you know. To be sure people will say, that miss didn't know her own mind—but never mind that: or, perhaps, they may be ill-natured enough to hint, that the gentleman grew tired of the lady, and forsook her—but don't let that fret you.

Lyd. There's no bearing his insolence!

[Bursts into tears.]

Enter Mrs. MALAPROP and Sir ANTHONY.

Mrs. M. [Entering.] Come, we must interrupt your billing and cooing awhile.

Lyd. This is worse than your treachery and deceit, you base ingrate! [Subbing.]

Sir Anth. What the devil's the matter now! Z—ds! Mrs. Malaprop, this is the oddest billing and cooing I ever heard! but what the deuce is the meaning of it? I'm quite astonished!

Capt. A. Ask the lady, sir.

Mrs. M. Oh, mercy! I'm quite analys'd, for my part! Why, Lydia, what is the reason of this?

Lyd. Ask the gentleman, ma'am.

Sir Anth. Z—ds! I shall be in a frenzy! Why, Jack, you are not come out to be any one else, are you?

Mrs. M. Ay, sir, there's no more trick, is there?—you are not, like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once, are you?

Capt. A. You'll not let me speak—I say the lady can account for this much better than I can.

Lyd. Ma'am, you once commanded me never to think of Beverley again; there is the man—I now obey you: for, from this moment, I renounce him for ever.

[Exit.]

Mrs. M. O mercy and miracles! what a turn here is! Why sure, captain, you haven't behaved disrespectfully to my niece?

Sir Anth. Ha! ha! ha!—ha! ha! ha!—now I see it—Ha! ha! ha!—now I see it—you have been too lively, Jack.

Capt. A. Nay, sir, upon my word—

Sir Anth. Come, no lying, Jack—I'm sure 'twas so. Come, no excuses, Jack; why, your father, your rogue, was so before you; the blood of the Absolutes was always impatient.

Capt. A. By all that's good, sir—

Sir Anth. Z—ds! say no more, I tell you—Mrs. Malaprop shall make your peace. You must make his peace, Mrs. Malaprop; you must tell her, 'tis Jack's way—tell her, 'tis all our ways—it runs in the blood of our family! Come away, Jack, ha! ha! ha! Mrs. Malaprop—a young villain!

[Pushes him out.]

Mrs. M. Oh, Sir Anthony! O, fie, captain!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The North Parade.

Enter Sir LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

Sir L. I wonder where this Captain Absolute hides himself. Upon my conscience these officers are always in one's way in love affairs; I remember I might have married Lady Dorothy Carmine, if it had not been for a little rogue of a major, who ran away with her before she could get a sight of me! And I wonder too what it is the ladies can see in them to be so fond of them—unless it be a touch of the old serpent in them, that makes the little creatures be caught, like vipers, with a bit of red cloth. Hah, isn't this the captain coming?—'faith, it is! There is a probability of succeeding about that fellow, that is mighty provoking! who the devil is he talking to? [Retires.]

Enter Captain ABSOLUTE.

Capt. A. To what fine purposes have I been plotting! a noble reward for all my schemes, upon my soul! A little gipsy! I did not think her romance could have made her so d—n'd absurd either. 'Sdeath, I never was in a worse humour in my life! I could cut my own throat, or any other person's, with the greatest pleasure in the world!

Sir L. O, 'faith! I'm in the luck of it. I never would have found him in a sweeter temper for my purpose—to be sure I'm just come in the nick! now to enter into conversation with him, and so quarrel genteelly.—[Aside. Advances to Capt. Ansolute.] With regard to that matter, captain, I must beg leave to differ in opinion with you.

Capt. A. Upon my word, then, you must be a very subtle disputant; because, sir, I happened just then to be giving no opinion at all.

Sir L. That's no reason; for give me leave to tell you, a man may think an untruth as well as speak one.

Capt. A. Very true, sir; but if a man never utters his thoughts, I should think they might stand a chance of escaping controversy.

Sir L. Then, sir, you differ in opinion with me, which amounts to the same thing.

Capt. A. Hark ye, Sir Lucius, if I had not before known you to be a gentleman, upon my soul, I should not have discovered it at this interview; for, what you can drive at, unless you mean to quarrel with me, I cannot conceive!

Sir L. I humbly thank you, sir, for the quickness of your apprehension—[Bowing]; you have named the very thing I would be at.

Capt. A. Very well, sir—I shall certainly not baulk your inclinations—but I should be glad if you would be pleased to explain your motives.

Sir L. Pray, sir, be easy—the quarrel is a very pretty quarrel, as it stands—we should only spoil it by trying to explain it. However, your memory is very short—or you could not have forgot an affront you passed on me within this week. So, no more, but name your time and place.

Capt. A. Well, sir, since you are so bent on it, he sooner the better; let it be this evening—here by the Spring Gardens. We shall scarcely be interrupted.

Sir L. Faith! that same interruption, in affairs of this nature, shows very great ill-breeding. I don't know what's the reason, but in England, if a thing of this kind gets wind, people make such a pother, that a gentleman can never fight in peace and quietness. However, if it's the same to you, captain, I should take it as a particular kindness, if you'd let us meet in King's Mead-fields, as a little business will call me there about six o'clock, and I may despatch both matters at once.

Capt. A. 'Tis the same to me, exactly. A little after six, then, we will discuss this matter more seriously.

Sir L. If you please, sir; there will be very pretty small-sword light, though it won't do for a long shot. So that matter's settled; and my mind's at ease. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Julia's Dressing-room.

Enter JULIA.

Jul. How this message has alarmed me! what dreadful accident can be meant? why such charge to be alone? O Faulkland! how many unhappy moments, how many tears, you have cost me!

Enter FAULKLAND.

What means this? why this caution, Faulkland?

Faulk. Alas, Julia! I am come to take a long farewell!

Jul. Heav'n's! what do you mean?

Faulk. You see before you a wretch whose life is forfeited:—Nay, start not; the infirmity of my temper has drawn all this misery on me: I left you fretful and passionate—an untoward accident drew me into a quarrel—the event is, that I must fly this kingdom instantly!—Oh, Julia, had I been so fortunate as to have called you mine entirely, before this mischance had fallen on me, I should not so deeply dread my banishment!

Jul. My soul is oppressed with sorrow at the nature of your misfortune: had these adverse circumstances arisen from a less fatal cause, I should have felt strong comfort in the thought, that I could now chase from your bosom every doubt of the warm sincerity of my love. My heart has long known no other guardian: I now intrust my person to your honour—we will fly together: when safe from pursuit, my father's will may be fulfilled, and I receive a legal claim to be the partner of your sorrows, and your tenderest comforter.

Faulk. O Julia! I am bankrupt in gratitude!—Would you not wish some hours to weigh the advantages you forego, and what little compensation poor Faulkland can make you, beside his solitary love?

Jul. I ask not a moment—No, Faulkland, I have loved you for yourself; and if I now, more than ever, prize the solemn engagement which so long has pledged us to each other, it is because it leaves no room for hard aspersions on my fame, and puts the seal of duty to an act of love. But let us not linger—perhaps this delay—

Faulk. 'Twill be better I should not venture out again till dark: yet I am grieved to think what numberless distresses will press heavy on your gentle disposition!

Jul. Perhaps your fortune may be forfeited by this unhappy act? I know not whether 'tis so, but sure that alone can never make us unhappy.—The little I have will be sufficient to support us, and exile never should be splendid.

Faulk. Ay, but in such an abject state of life my wounded pride, perhaps, may increase the natural fretfulness of my temper, till I become a rude morose companion, beyond your patience to endure.

Jul. If your thoughts should assume so unhappy a bent, you will the more want some mild and affectionate spirit to watch over and console you; one who, by bearing your infirmities with gentleness and resignation, may teach you so to bear the evils of your fortune.

Faulk. Julia, I have proved you to the quick! and with this useless device, I throw away all my doubts. How shall I plead to be forgiven this last unworthy effect of my restless, unsatisfied disposition?

Jul. Has no such disaster happened as you related?

Faulk. I am ashamed to own that it was all pretended. Let me to-morrow, in the face of Heaven, receive my future guide and mistress, and expiate my past folly, by years of tender adoration.

Jul. Hold, Faulkland! that you are free from a crime, which I before feared to name, Heaven knows how sincerely I rejoice! These are tears of thankfulness for that! But, that your cruel doubts should have urged you to an imposition that has wrung my heart, gives me now a pang more keen than I can express!

Faulk. By heavens! Julia—

Jul. Yet hear me!—My father loved you, Faulkland! and you preserved the life that tender parent gave me. in his presence I pledged my hand—joyfully pledged it, where before I had given my heart. When, soon after, I lost that parent, it seemed to me that Providence had, in Faulkland, shown me whether to transfer, without a pause, my gratified duty as well as my affection: hence I have been content to bear from you, what pride and delicacy would have forbid me from another. I will not upbraid you by repeating how you have trifled with my sincerity.

Faulk. I confess it all! yet, hear—

Jul. After such a year of trial, I might have flattered myself that I should not have been insulted with a new probation of my sincerity, as cruel as unnecessary! I now see that it is not in your nature to be content, or confident in love. With this conviction I never will be yours.

Faulk. Nay, but Julia, by my soul and honour!—If, after this—

Jul. But one word more. As my faith has once been given to you, I will never barter it with another. I shall pray for your happiness with the truest sincerity; and the dearest blessing I can ask of Heaven to send you, will be to charm you from that unhappy temper which alone has prevented the performance of our solemn engagement. All I request of you is, that you will yourself reflect on this infirmity; and, when you number up the many delights it has deprived you of, let it not be your least regret, that it lost you the love of one who would have followed you in beggary through the world. [Exit.]

Faulk. She's gone!—for ever!—There was an awful resolution in her manner that rivetted me to my place. O, fool!—dolt!—barbarian! Cursed as I am, with more imperfections than my fellow wretches, kind fortune sent a heaven-gifted cherub to my aid, and, like a ruffian, I have driven her from my side! I must now hasten to my appointment. Well, my mind is turned for such a scene! I shall wish only to become a principal in it, and reverse the tale my cursed folly put me upon forging here. O love! tormentor! fiend! whose influence, like the moon's, acting on dull souls, makes idiots of them, but meeting subtler spirits, betrays their course, and urges sensibility to madness! [Exit.]

Enter Maid and LYDIA.

Maid. My mistress, ma'am, I know, was here just now; perhaps she is only in the next room. [Exit.]

Lyd. Heigho! Though he has used me so, this fellow runs strangely in my head. I believe one lecture from my grave cousin will make me recall him.

Enter JULIA.

Oh, Julia, I am come to you with such an appetite for consolation! Lud, child! what's the matter with you! You have been crying!—I'll be hanged if that Faulkland has not been tormenting you!

Jul. You mistake the cause of my uneasiness: something has hurried me a little. Nothing that you can guess at.

Lyd. Ah! whatever vexations you may have, I can assure you mine surpass them. You know who Beverley proves to be?

Jul. I will now own to you, Lydia, that Mr. Faulkland had before informed me of the whole affair.

Lyd. So, then, I see I have been deceived by every one! but I don't care, I'll never have him.

Jul. Nay, Lydia—

Lyd. Why, is it not provoking, when I thought we were coming to the prettiest distress imaginable, to find myself made a mere Smithfield bargain of at last?—There had I planned one of the most sentimental elopements! so becoming a disguise! so amiable a ladder of ropes! conscious moon—four horses—Scotch parson—with such surprise to Mrs. Malaprop! and such paragraphs in the newspapers!—Oh, I shall die with disappointment!

Jul. I don't wonder at it.

Lyd. Now—sad reverse!—what have I to expect, but, after a deal of flimsy preparation, with a bishop's license, and my aunt's blessing, to go simpering up to the altar! or, perhaps, be cried three times in a country church, and have an unmannerly fat clerk ask the consent of every butcher in the parish to join John Absolute and Lydia Languish, spinster.—Oh, that I should live to hear myself called spinster!

Jul. Melancholy, indeed!

Lyd. How mortifying, to remember the dear, delicious shifts I used to be put to, to gain half a minute's conversation with this fellow! How often have I stole forth in the coldest night in January, and found him in the garden, stuck like a dripping statue!—There would he kneel to me in the snow, and sneeze and cough so pathetically!—he shivering with cold, and I with apprehension!—and, while the freezing blast numbed our joints, how warmly would he press me to pity his flame, and glow with mutual ardour!—Ah, Julia, that was something like being in love!

Jul. If I were in spirits, Lydia, I could chide you only by laughing heartily at you; but it suits more the situation of my mind at present earnestly to entreat you, not to let a man, who loves you with sincerity, suffer that unhappiness from your caprice, which I know too well caprice can inflict.

[Mrs. MALAPROP speaks within.]

Lyd. Oh, lud! what has brought my aunt here!

Enter Mrs. MALAPROP and DAVID.

Mrs. M. So! so! here's fine work! here's fine suicide, paracide, and simulation, going on in the fields! and Sir Anthony not to be found to prevent the antistrophe!

Jul. For Heav'n's sake, madam, what is the matter?

Mrs. M. That gentleman can tell you, 'twas he enveloped the affair to me.

Lyd. Oh, patience!—Do, ma'am, for Heaven's sake, tell us what is the matter!

Mrs. M. Why, murder's the matter! slaughter's the matter! killing's the matter! But he can tell you the perpendiculars. [Pointing to DAVID.]

Jul. Do speak, my friend. [To DAVID.]

Dav. Lookye, my lady—by the mass, there's mischief going on. Folks don't use meet for amusement with fire-arms, fire-locks, fire-engines, fire-screens, fire-office, and the devil knows what other crackers beside!—This, my lady, I say, has an angry favour.

Jul. But who's engaged?

Dav. My poor master—under favour for mentioning him first. You know me, my lady—I am David—and my master of course is, or was, Squire Acres—and Captain Absolute. Then comes Squire Faulkland.

Jul. Do, ma'am, let us instantly endeavour to prevent mischief.

Mrs. M. Oh, fie! it would be very inelegant in us—we should only participate things.

Lyd. Do, my dear aunt, let us hasten to prevent them.

Dav. Ah, do, Mrs. Aunt, save a few lives!—they are desperately given, believe me. Above all, there is that blood-thirsty Philistine, Sir Lucius O'Trigger.

Mrs. M. Sir Lucius O'Trigger!—Oh, mercy! have they drawn poor little dear Sir Lucius into the scrape! [Aside.]—Why, how you stand, girl! you have no more feeling than one of the Derbyshire putrefactions!

Lyd. What are we to do, madam?

Mrs. M. Why, fly with the utmost felicity, to be sure, to prevent mischief.—Come, girls, this gentleman will exhort us. Come, sir, you're our envoy, lead the way, and we'll precede. You're sure you know the spot.

Dav. Oh, never fear! and one good thing is, we shall find it out by the report of the pistols.

All the Ladies. The pistols! Oh, let us fly.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—King's Mead-Fields.

Enter Sir LUCIUS and ACRES, with pistols.

Acres. By my valour, then, Sir Lucius, forty yards is a good distance. Odds levels and aims! I say it is a good distance.

Sir L. It is for muskets, or small field-pieces; upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, you must leave these things to me. Stay now, I'll show you. [Measures paces along the stage.] There, now, that is a very pretty distance—a pretty gentleman's distance.

Acres. Z—ds! we might as well fight in a sentry-box! I tell you, Sir Lucius, the farther he is off the cooler I shall take my aim.

Sir L. Faith, then, I suppose you would aim at him best of all if he was out of sight!

Acres. No, Sir Lucius, but I should think forty, or eight-and-thirty yards—

Sir L. Pho! pho! nonsense! three or four feet between the mouths of your pistols is as good as a mile.

Acres. Odds bullets, no! by my valour, there is no merit in killing him so near! Do, my dear Sir Lucius, let me bring him down at a long shot: a long shot, Sir Lucius, if you love me.

Sir L. Well, the gentleman's friend and I must settle that. But tell me now, Mr. Acres, in case of an accident, is there any little will or commission I could execute for you?

Acres. I am much obliged to you, Sir Lucius, but I don't understand—

Sir L. Why, you may think there's no being shot at without a little risk; and, if an unlucky bullet should carry a quietus with it, I say, it will be no time then to be bothering you about family matters.

Acres. A quietus!

Sir L. For instance, now, if that should be the case, would you choose to be pickled and sent home? or would it be the same thing to you to lie here in the Abbey? I'm told there is very snug lying in the Abbey.

Acres. Pickled!—Snug lying in the Abbey!—Odds tremors! Sir Lucius, don't talk so!

Sir L. I suppose, Mr. Acres, you never were engaged in an affair of this kind before?

Acres. No, Sir Lucius, never before.

Sir L. Ah, that's a pity; there's nothing like being used to a thing. Pray, now, how would you receive the gentleman's shot?

Acres. Odds files! I've practised that—there, Sir Lucius, there—[Put himself into an attitude]—a side-front, hey! Odd, I'll make myself small enough; I'll stand edgeways.

Sir L. Now, you're quite out; for if you stand so when I take my aim— [Levelling at him.]

Acres. Z—ds, Sir Lucius, are you sure it is not cocked?

Sir L. Never fear.

Acres. But—but—you don't know—it may go off, of its own head!

Sir L. Pho! be easy. Well, now, if I hit you in the body, my bullet has a double chance; for if it misses a vital part on your right side, 'twill be very hard if it don't succeed on the left.

Acres. A vital part!

Sir L. But there—fix yourself so—[Placing him]—let him see the broadside of your full front—there—now a ball or two may pass clean through your body, and never do you any harm at all.

Acres. Clean through me! a ball or two clean through me!

Sir L. Ay, may they; and it is much the gentlest attitude into the bargain.

Acres. Lookye, Sir Lucius; I'd just as lieve be shot in an awkward posture as a genteel one; so, by my valour! I will stand edgeways.

Sir L. [Looking at his watch.] Sure they don't mean to disappoint us—hah!—no faith—I think I see them coming.

Acres. Hey!—what!—coming!

Sir L. Ay, who are those coming yonder, getting over the stile?

Acres. There are two of them, indeed!—well, let them come—hey, Sir Lucius!—we—we—we—we—won't run!

Sir L. Run!

Acres. No, I say—we won't run, by my valour! Sir L. What the devil's the matter with you?

Acres. Nothing, nothing, my dear friend—my dear Sir Lucius—but I—I—I don't feel quite so bold somehow as I did.

Sir L. O fie! consider your honour.

Acres. Ay, true—my honour—do, Sir Lucius, edge in a word or two, every now and then, about my honour.

Sir L. Well, here they're coming. [Looking.]

Acres. Sir Lucius, if I wasn't with you I should almost think I was afraid—if my valour should leave me! valour will come and go.

Sir L. Then pray keep it fast while you have it.

Acres. Sir Lucius—I doubt it is going—yes, my valour is certainly going! it is sneaking off!—I feel it oozing out, as it were, at the palms of my hands!

Sir L. Your honour—your honour—Here they are.

Acres. Oh, that I was safe at Clod Hall! or could be shot before I was aware!

Enter FAULKLAND and Captain ABSOLUTE.

Sir L. Gentlemen, your most obedient—hah!—what, Captain Absolute! So, I suppose, sir, you are come here, just like myself—to do a kind office, first for your friend, then to proceed to business on your own account?

Acres. What, Jack!—my dear Jack!—my dear friend!

Capt. A. Harkye, Bob, Beverley's at hand.

Sir L. Well, Mr. Acres—I don't blame your saluting the gentleman civilly. So, Mr. Beverley, [To FAULKLAND] if you will choose your weapons, the captain and I will measure the ground.

Faulk. My weapons, sir!

Acres. Odds life! Sir Lucius, I'm not going to fight Mr. Faulkland; these are my particular friends!

Sir L. What, sir, did you not come here to fight Mr. Acres?

Faulk. Not I, upon my word, sir!

Sir L. Well, now, that's mighty provoking! But I hope, Mr. Faulkland, as there are three of us come on purpose for the game—you won't be so cantankerous as to spoil the party, by sitting out.

Capt. A. Oh pray, Faulkland, fight to oblige Sir Lucius.

Faulk. Nay, if Mr. Acres is so bent on the matter.

Acres. No, no, Mr. Faulkland; I'll bear my disappointment like a Christian. Lookye, Sir Lucius, there's no occasion at all for me to fight; and if it is the same to you, I'd as lieve let it alone.

Sir L. Observe me, Mr. Acres—I must not be trifled with. You have certainly challenged somebody, and you came here to fight him. Now if that gentleman is willing to represent him, I can't see, for my soul, why it isn't just the same thing.

Acres. Why, no, Sir Lucius, I tell you, 'tis one Beverley I've challenged—a fellow, you see, that dare not show his face! If he were here, I'd make him give up his pretensions directly!

Capt. A. Hold, Bob—let me set you right—there is no such man as Beverley in the case. The person who assumed that name is before you; and as his pretensions are the same in both characters, he is ready to support them in whatever way you please.

Sir L. Well, this is lucky. Now you have an opportunity—

Acres. What, quarrel with my dear friend, Jack Absolute!—not if he were fifty Beverleys! Z—ds! Sir Lucius, you would not have me so unnatural!

Sir L. Upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, your valour has oozed away with a vengeance!

Acres. Not in the least! odds backs and abettors! I'll be your second with all my heart—and if you should get a quietus, you may command me entirely. I'll get you snug lying in the Abbey here; or pickle you, and send you over to Blunde-buss Hall, or any thing of the kind, with the greatest pleasure.

Sir L. Pho! pho! you are little better than a coward.

Acres. Mind, gentlemen, he calls me a coward; coward was the word, by my valour!

Sir L. Well, sir?

Acres. Lookye, Sir Lucius, 'tisn't that I mind the word coward—Coward may be said in a j. ke—But if you had called me a poltroon, odds daggers and balls—

Sir L. Well, sir?

Acres. I should have thought you a very ill-bred man.

Sir L. Pho! you are beneath my notice.

Capt. A. Nay, Sir Lucius, you can't have a better second than my friend Acres. He is a most determined dog—called in the country, fighting Bob. He generally kills a man a week—don't you, Bob?

Sir L. Well, then, captain, 'tis we must begin—so come out, my little counsellor [Draws his sword], and ask the gentleman, whether he will resign the lady without forcing you to proceed against him?

Capt. A. Come on then, sir, [Draws] since you won't let it be an amicable suit, here's my reply.

Enter Sir ANTHONY, DAVID, and the Ladies.

Dav. Knock 'em all down, sweet Sir Anthony; knock down my master in particular—and bind his hands over to their good behaviour.

Sir Anth. Put up, Jack, put up, or I shall be in a frenzy—how came you in a duel, sir?

Capt. A. 'Faith, sir, that gentleman can tell you better than I; 'twas he called on me, and you know, sir, I serve his majesty.

Sir Anth. Here's a pretty fellow! I catch him going to cut a man's throat, and he tells me he serves his majesty! Z—ds! sirrah, then how durst you draw the king's sword against one of his subjects?

Capt. A. Sir, I tell you, that gentleman called me out, without explaining his reasons.

Sir Anth. 'Gad, sir! how came you to call my son out, without explaining your reasons?

Sir L. Your son, sir, insulted me in a manner which my honour could not brook.

Sir Anth. Z—ds, Jack! how durst you insult the gentleman in a manner which his honour could not brook?

Mrs. M. Come, come, let's have no honour before ladies—Captain Absolute, come here—How could you intimate us so? Here's Lydia has been terrified to death for you.

Capt. A. For fear I should be killed, or escape, ma'am?

Mrs. M. Nay, no delusions to the past—Lydia is convinced: speak, child.

Sir L. With your leave, ma'am, I must put in a word here. I believe I could interpret the young lady's silence. Now mark—

Lyd. What is it you mean, sir?

Sir L. Come, come, Dalia, we must be serious now; this is no time for trifling.

Lyd. 'Tis true, sir; and your reproof bids me offer this gentleman my hand, and solicit the return of his affections.

Capt. A. Oh, my little angel, say you so? Si Lucius, I perceive there must be some mistake here. With regard to the affront which you affirm I have given you, I can only say that it could not have been intentional; and as you must be convinced, that I should not fear to support a real injury, you shall now see that I am not ashamed to atone for an inadvertency—I ask your pardon. But for this lady, while honoured with her approbation, I will support my claim against any man whatever.

Sir Anth. Well said, Jack; and I'll stand by you, my boy.

Acres. Mind, I give up all my claim—I make no pretensions to any thing in the world; and if I can't get a wife without fighting for her, by my valour! I'll live a bachelor.

Sir L. Captain, give me your hand—an affront handsomely acknowledged becomes an obligation; and as for the lady, if she chooses to deny her own hand-writing, here— [Takes out letters].

Mrs. M. Oh, he will dissolve my mystery! Sir Lucius, perhaps there is some mistake. Perhaps I can illuminate—

Sir L. Pray, old gentlewoman, don't interfere where you have no business. Miss Languish, are you my Dalia, or not?

Lyd. Indeed, Sir Lucius, I am not!

[LYDIA and ABSOLUTE walk aside.]

Mrs. M. Sir Lucius O'Trigger—ungrateful as you are—I own the soft impeachment—pardon my camelion blushes, I am Delia.

Sir L. You Dalia!—pho! pho! be asy.

Mrs. M. Why, thou barbarous Vandyke—those letters are mine. When you are more sensible of my benignity, perhaps I may be brought to encourage your addresses.

Sir L. Mrs. Malaprop, I am extremely sensible of your condescension: and whether you or Lucy have put this trick upon me, I am equally beholden to you. And to show you I am not ungrateful, Captain Absolute, since you have taken that lady from me, I'll give you my Dalia into the bargain.

Capt. A. I am much obliged to you, Sir Lucius; but here's my friend, fighting Bob, unprovided for.

Sir L. Hah! little valour—here, will you make your fortune!

Acres. Odds wrinkles! No.—But give me your hand, Sir Lucius; forget and forgive: but if ever I give you a chance of pickling me again, say Bob Acres is a dunce, that's all.

Sir Anth. Come, Mrs. Malaprop, don't be cast down—you are in your bloom yet.

Mrs. M. O, Sir Anthony! men are all barbarians!

[All retire but JULIA and FAULKLAND.]

Jul. He seems dejected and unhappy—not sullen:—there was some foundation, however, for the tale he told me—O woman! how true should be your judgment, when your resolution is so weak!

Faulk. Julia!—how can I sue for what I so little deserve? I dare not presume—yet hope is the child of penitence.

Jul. Oh! Faulkland, you have not been more faulty in your unkind treatment of me, than I am now in wanting inclination to resent it. As my heart honestly bids me place my weakness to the account of love, I should be ungenerous not to admit the same plea for yours.

[Sir ANTHONY comes forward between them.]

Faulk. Now I shall be blest, indeed.

Sir Anth. What's going on here?—So you have been quarrelling too, I warrant.—Come, Julia, I never interfered before; but let me have a hand in the matter at last.—All the faults I have ever seen in my friend Faulkland, seemed to proceed from what he calls the delicacy and warmth of his affection for you.—There, marry him directly, Julia; you'll find he'll mend surprisingly.

[The rest of the characters come forward.]

Sir L. Come now, I hope there is no dissatisfied person but what is content; for as I have been disappointed myself, it will be very hard if I have not the satisfaction of seeing other people succeed better.

Acres. You are right, Sir Lucius—So, Jack, I wish you joy.—Mr. Faulkland the same.—Ladies,—come now, to show you I'm neither vexed nor angry, odds tabors and pipes! I'll order the fiddles in half an hour to the New Rooms—and I insist on your all meeting me there.

Sir A. 'Gad! sir, I like your spirit; and at night we single lads will drink a health to the young couples, and a good husband to Mrs. Malaprop.

Faulk. Our partners are stolen from us, Jack—I hope to be congratulated by each other—yours for having checked in time the errors of an ill-directed imagination, which might have betrayed an innocent heart; and mine for having by her gentleness and candour reformed the unhappy temper of one, who by it made wretched whom he loved most, and tortured the heart he ought to have adored.

Capt. A. True, Faulkland, we have both tasted the bitters, as well as the sweets, of love—with this difference only, that you always prepared the bitter cup for yourself, while I—

Lyd. Was always obliged to me for it, hey, Mr. Modesty?—But come, no more of that—our happiness is now as unalloyed as general.

Jul. Then let us study to preserve it so; and while hope pictures to us a flattering scene of future bliss, let us deny its pencil those colours which are too bright to be lasting.—When hearts deserving happiness would unite their fortunes, virtue would crown them with an unfading garland of modest, hurtless flowers; but ill-judging passion will force the gaudier rose into the wreath, whose thorn offends them when its leaves are dropt!

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in an Inn.

Enter YOUNG FASHION and LORY, Postilion following with a portmanteau.

Young F. Lory, pay the post-boy, and take the portmanteau.

Lory. Faith, sir, we had better let the post-boy take the portmanteau and pay himself.

Young F. Why, sure there's something left in it.

Lory. Not a rag, upon my honour, sir—we eat the last of your wardrobe at New Malton—and, if we had twenty miles farther to go, our next meal must have been of the cloak-bag.

Young F. Why, 'sdeath! it appears full.

Lory. Yes, sir; I made bold to stuff it with hay, to save appearances, and look like baggage.

Young F. What the devil shall I do?—harkee, boy, what's the chaise?

Pos. Thirteen shillings, please your honour.

Young F. Can you give me change for a guinea?

Pos. O yes, sir.

Lory. Soh, what will he do now?—Lord, sir, you had better let the boy be paid below.

Young F. Why, as you say, Lory, I believe it will be as well.

Lory. Yes, yes; I'll tell them to discharge you below, honest friend.

Pos. Please your honour, there are the turnpikes, too.

Young F. Ay, ay, the turnpikes, by all means.

Pos. And I hope your honour will order me something for myself.

Young F. To be sure; bid them give you a crown.

Lory. Yes, yes—my master doesn't care what you charge them—so get along, you—

Pos. And there's the ostler, your honour.

Lory. Psha! damn the ostler—would you impose upon the gentleman's generosity? [Pushes him out.] A rascal, to be so cursed ready with his change!

Young F. Why, faith! Lory, he had nearly pos'd me.

Lory. Well, sir, we are arrived at Scarborough, not worth a guinea. I hope you'll own yourself a happy man—you have outlived all your cares.

Young F. How so, sir!

Lory. Why, you have nothing left to take care of.

Young F. Yes, sirrah, I have myself and you to take care of still.

Lory. Sir, if you could prevail with somebody else to do that for you, I fancy we might both fare the better for it. But now, sir, for my Lord Foppington, your elder brother.

Young F. Damn my eldest brother.

Lory. With all my heart; but get him to redeem your annuity, however. Look you, sir, you must wheedle him, or you must starve.

Young F. Look you, sir, I will neither wheedle him nor starve.

Lory. Why, what will you do, then?

Young F. Cut his throat, or get some one to do it for me.

Lory. 'Gad so, sir, I'm glad to find I was not so well acquainted with the strength of your conscience as with the weakness of your purse.

Young F. Why, art thou so impenetrable a blockhead as to believe he'll help me to a farthing!

Lory. Not if you treat him de haut en bas, as you used to do.

Young F. Why, how wouldst thou have me treat him?

Lory. Like a trout—tickle him.

Young F. I can't flatter.

Lory. Can you starve?

Young F. Yes.

Lory. I can't—good by t'ye, sir.

Young F. Stay—thou'lt distract me. But who comes here—my old friend, Colonel Townly.

Enter Colonel Townly.

My dear colonel, I am rejoiced to meet you here.

Col. T. Dear Tom, this is an unexpected pleasure—what, are you come to Scarborough to be present at your brother's wedding?

Lory. Ah, sir, if it had been his funeral, we should have come with pleasure.

Col. T. What, honest Lory, are you with your master still?

Lory. Yes, sir, I have been starving with him ever since I saw your honour last.

Young F. Why, Lory is an attached rogue—there's no getting rid of him.

Lory. True, sir, as my master says, there's no seducing me from his service—till he's able to pay me my wages.

[Aside.]

Young F. Go, go, sir—and take care of the baggage.

Lory. Yes, sir—the baggage! O Lord! [Takes up the portmanteau.] I suppose, sir, I must charge the landlord to be very particular where he stows this?

Young F. Get along, you rascal. [Exit Lory with the portmanteau.] But, colonel, are you acquainted with my proposed sister-in-law?

Col. T. Only by character—her father, Sir Tunbelly Clumsy, lives within a quarter of a mile of this place, in a lonely old house, which nobody comes near. She never goes abroad, nor sees company at home; to prevent all misfortunes, she has her breeding within doors; the parson of the parish teaches her to play upon the dulcimer, the clerk to sing, her nurse to dress, and her father to dance;—in short, nobody has free admission there but our old acquaintance, Mother Coupler, who has procured your brother this match, and is, I believe, a distant relation of Sir Tunbelly's.

Young F. But is her fortune so considerable?

Col. T. Three thousand a year, and a good sum of money independent of her father, beside.

Young F. 'Sdeath! that my old acquaintance, Dame Coupler, could not have thought of me, as well as my brother, for such a prize.

Col. T. Egad, I wouldn't swear that you are too late—his lordship, I know, hasn't yet seen the lady—and, I believe, has quarrelled with his patroness.

Young F. My dear colonel, what an idea have you started?

Col. T. Pursue it if you can, and I promise you you shall have my assistance; for beside my natural contempt for his lordship, I have at present the enmity of a rival towards him.

Young F. What, has he been addressing your old flame, the widow Berinthia?

Col. T. Faith, Tom, I am at present most whimsically circumstanced. I came here a month ago to meet the lady you mention; but, she failing in her promise, I, partly from pique, and partly from idleness, have been diverting my chagrin by offering up incense to the beauties of Amanda, our friend Loveless's wife.

Young F. I never have seen her, but have heard her spoken of as a youthful wonder of beauty and prudence.

Col. T. She is so, indeed; and Loveless being too careless and insensible of the treasure he possesses—my lodging in the same house has given me a thousand opportunities of making my assiduities acceptable: so that in less than a fortnight, I began to bear my disappointment from the widow with the most Christian resignation.

Young F. And Berinthia has never appeared?

Col. T. Oh, there's the perplexity; for just as I began not to care whether I ever saw her again or not, last night she arrived.

Young F. And instantly resumed her empire?

Col. T. No, faith—we met—but, the lady not condescending to give me any serious reasons for having fool'd me for a month, I left her in a huff.

Young F. Well, well, I'll answer for it she'll soon resume her power, especially as friendship will prevent your pursuing the other too far—But my coxcomb of a brother is an admirer of Amanda, too, is he?

Col. T. Yes, and, I believe, is most heartily displeased by her—but come with me, and you shall see her and your old friend Loveless.

Young F. I must pay my respects to his lordship—perhaps you can direct me to his lodging.

Col. T. Come with me; I shall pass by it.

Young F. I wish you could pay this visit for me, or could tell me what I should say to him.

Col. T. Say nothing to him—apply yourself to his bag, his sword, his feather, his snuff-box; and when you are well with him, desire him to lend you a thousand pounds, and I'll engage you prosper.

Young F. 'Sdeath and furies! Why was that coxcomb thrust into the world before me? O fortune, fortune, thou art a jilt, by Gad! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Dressing-room.

Enter Lord FOPPINGTON, in his dressing-gown, and LA VAROLE.

Lord F. Well, 'tis an unspeakable pleasure to be a man of quality—strike me dumb—even the boors of this northern spa have learned the respect due to a title. [Aside.] La Varole!

La Var. Mi lor—

Lord F. You ha'n't yet been at Muddymoat-hall, to announce my arrival, have you?

La Var. Not yet, mi lor.

Lord F. Then you need not go till Saturday. [Exit LA VAROLE.] As I am in no particular haste to view my intended sposa, I shall sacrifice a day or two more to the pursuit of my friend Loveless's wife.—Amanda is a charming creature—strike me ugly: and if I have any discernment in the world, she thinks no less of my Lord Foppington.

Re-enter LA VAROLE.

La Var. Mi lor, de shoemaker, de tailor, de hosier, de sempstress, de peru, be all ready, if your lordship please to dress.

Lord F. 'Tis well; admit them.

La Var. Hey, messieurs, entrez.

Enter Tailor, Shoemaker, &c., and stand.—Servants stand about the dressing-table.

Lord F. So, gentlemen, I hope you have all taken pains to show yourselves masters in your professions.

Tai. I think I may presume, sir—

La Var. My lor, you clown, you.

Tai. My lord, I ask your lordship's pardon, my lord. I hope, my lord, your lordship will be pleased to own I have brought your lordship as accomplished a suit of clothes as ever per of England wore, my lord; will your lordship please to view 'em now?

Lord F. Ay; but let my people dispose the glasses so that I may see myself before and behind; for I love to see myself all round.

[Servants place around him several large glasses.]

Whilst he puts on his coat, enter YOUNG FASHION and LORY.

Young F. Hey-day! what the devil have we here?—Sure my gentleman's grown a favourite at court, he has got so many people at his levee.

[Apart.]

Lory. Sir, these people come in order to make him a favourite at court—they are to establish him with the ladies.

[Apart.]

Young F. Good heaven! to what an ebb of taste are women fallen, that it should be in the power of a laced coat to recommend a gallant to them!

[Apart.]

Lory. Sir, tailors and hair-dressers debauch all the women.

[Apart.]

Young F. Thou say'st true.—But now for my reception.

[Apart.]

Lord F. [To Tailor.] Death and eternal tortures! Sir—I say the coat is too wide here by a foot.

Tai. My lord, if it had been tighter, 'twould neither have looked nor buttoned.

Lord F. Rat the hooks and buttons, sir! Can any thing be worse than this? As Gad shall jedge me, it hangs on my shoulders like a chairman's sirtout.

Tai. 'Tis not for me to dispute your lordship's fancy.

Lory. There, sir, observe what respect does.

[Apart.]

Young F. Respect! D—n him for a coxcomb—but let's accost him. [Apart.] Brother, I'm your humble servant.

Lord F. O Lard, Tam, I did not expect you in England—brother, I'm glad to see you—but what has brought you to Scarborough, Tam?—Look you sir, [to the Tailor] I shall never be reconciled to this nauseous wrapping-gown; therefore pray get me another suit with all possible expedition; for this is my eternal aversion. [Exit Tailor.] Well, but Tam, you don't tell me what has driven you to Scarborough.—Mrs. Calico, are not you of my mind?

Sem. Directly, my lord.—I hope your lordship is pleased with your ruffles?

Lord F. [Sits.] In love with them, stab my vitals. Bring me my bill; you shall be paid to-morrow.

Sem. I humbly thank your lordship. [Exit.]

Lord F. Hark thee, shoemaker, these shoes a'n't ugly, but they don't fit me.

Shoe. My lord, I think they fit you very well.

Lord F. They hurt me just below the instep.

Shoe. [Kneels, and feels his foot.] No, my lord, they don't hurt you there.

Lord F. I tell thee, they pinch me execrably.

Shoe. [Rising.] Why, then, my lord, if those shoes pinch you, I'll be d—d.

Lord F. Why, wilt thou undertake to persuade me I cannot feel?

Shoe. Your lordship may please to feel what you think fit, but that shoe does not hurt you. I think I understand my trade.

Lord F. Now, by all that's good and powerful, thou art an incompre-hensive coxcomb—but thou makest good shoes, and so I'll bear with thee.

Shoe. My lord, I have worked for half the people of quality in this town these twenty years, and 'tis very hard I shouldn't know when a shoe hurts and when it don't.

Lord F. Well, prithee begone about thy business. [Exit Shoemaker.] Mr. Mendlegs, a word with you. The calves of these stockings are thickened a little too much; they make my legs look like a porter's.

Men. My lord, methinks they look mighty well.

Lord F. Ay; but you are not so good a judge of those things as I am—I have studied them all my life—therefore, pray let the next be the thickness of a crown-piece less.

Men. Indeed, my lord, they are the same kind I had the honour to furnish your lordship with in town.

Lord F. Very possibly, Mr. Mendlegs: but that was in the beginning of the winter, and you should always remember, Mr. Hosier, that, if you make a nobleman's spring-legs as robust as his autumnal calves, you commit a monstrous impropriety, and make no allowance for the fatigues of the winter.

[Rises—exit Hosier.]

Jew. I hope, my lord, those buckle have had the unspeakable satisfaction of being honoured with your lordship's approbation?

Lord F. Why, they are of a pretty fancy; but don't you think them rather of the smallest?

Jew. My lord, they could not well be larger, to keep on your lordship's shoe.

Lord F. My good sir, you forget that these matters are not as they used to be; formerly, indeed, the buckle was a sort of machine, intended to keep on the shoe; but the case is now quite reversed, and the shoe is of no earthly use, but to keep on the buckle. Now give me my watches [Servant fetches the watches], my chapeau [Servant brings a dress hat], my handkerchief [Servant pours some scented liquid on a handkerchief, and brings it], my snuff-box [Servant brings snuff-box]: there, now the business of the morning is pretty well over.

[Exit Jeweller.]

Young F. Well, Lory, what don't think on't? a very friendly reception from a brother, after three years' absence!

[Apart.]

Lory. Why, sir, 'tis your own fault—here you have stood ever since you came in, and have not commended any one thing that belongs to him.

[Apart.]

Young F. [Servants all go off] Nor ever shall, while they belong to a coxcomb. [Apart.] Now your people of business are gone, brother, I hope I may obtain a quarter of an hour's audience of you.

Lord F. Faith, Tam, I must beg you'll excuse me at this time, for I have an engagement which I would not break for the salvation of mankind. Hey! the-e is my carriage at the door? You'll excuse me, brother.

Young F. Shall you be back to dinner?

Lord F. As Gad shall jedge me, I can't tell; for it is possible I may dine with some friends at Donner's.

Young F. Shall I meet you there? for I must needs talk with you.

Lord F. That I'm afraid mayn't be quite so proper; for those I commonly eat with are a people of nice conversation; and you know, Tam, your education has been a little at large—but there are other ordinaries in town—very good beef ordinaries—I suppose, Tam, you can eat beef? However, dear Tam, I'm glad to see thee in England, stab my vitals! [Exit.]

Young F. Hell and furies! is this to be borne? Lory. Faith, sir, I could almost have given him a knock o' the pate myself.

Young F. 'Tis enough; I will now show you the excess of my passion, by being very calm. Come, Lory, lay your loggerhead to mine, and, in cold blood, let us contrive his destruction.

Lory. Here comes a head, sir, would contrive it better than both our loggerheads, if she would but join the confederacy.

Young F. By this light, Madame Coupler—she seems dissatisfied at something; let us observe her. [Theu retire.]

Enter Mrs. COUPLER.

Mrs. C. So! I am likely to be well rewarded for my services, truly; my suspicions, I find, were but too just.—What! I refuse to advance me a petty sum, when I am upon the point of making him master of a galleon! But let him look to the consequences, an ungrateful, narrow-minded coxcomb.

Young F. So he is, upon my soul, old lady; it must be my brother you speak of.

Mrs. C. Ha! stripling, how came you here? What'st hast spent all, eh? And art thou come to dun his lordship for assistance?

Young F. No; I want somebody's assistance to cut his lordship's throat, without the risk of being hanged for him.

Mrs. C. Egad! sirrah, I could help thee to do him almost as good a turn, without the danger of being burned in the hand for't.

Young F. How—how, old Mischief?

Mrs. C. Why, you must know I have done you the kindness to make up a match for your brother.

Young F. I'm very much beholden to you, truly!

Mrs. C. You may, before the wedding-day, yet: the lady is a great heiress, the match is concluded, the writings are drawn, and his lordship is come hither to put the finishing hand to the business.

Young F. I understand as much.

Mrs. C. Now, you must know, stripling, your brother's a knave.

Young F. Good.

Mrs. C. He has given me a bond of a thousand pounds for helping him to this fortune, and has promised me as much more, in ready money, upon the day of the marriage; which, I understand by a friend, he never designs to pay me; and his just now refusing to pay me a part is a proof of it. If, therefore, you will be a generous young rogue, and secure me five thousand pounds, I'll help you to the lady.

Young F. And how the devil wilt thou do that?

Mrs. C. Without the devil's aid, I warrant thee. Thy brother's face not one of the family ever saw: the whole business has been managed by me, and all his letters go through my hands. Sir Tumbelly Clumsey, my relation—for that's the old gentleman's name—is apprized of his lordship's being down here, and expects him to-morrow to receive his daughter's hand; but the peer, I find, means to bait here a few days longer,—to recover the fatigue of his journey, I suppose. Now you shall go to Muddymoor Hall in his place—I'll give you a letter of introduction: and, if you don't marry the girl before sunset, you deserve to be hanged before morning.

Young F. Agreed, agreed; and for thy reward—

Mrs. C. Well, well;—though I warrant thou hast not a farthing of money in thy pocket now—one may see it in thy face.

Young F. Not a souse, by Jupiter.

Mrs. C. Must I advance, then? Well, be at my lodgings, next door, this evening, and I'll see what may be done—we'll sign and seal, and, when I have given thee some further instructions, thou shalt hoist sail and begone. [Exit.]

Young F. So, Lory, fortune, thou seest, at last takes care of merit: we are in a fair way to be great people.

Lory. Ay, sir, if the devil don't step between the cup and the lip, as he used to do.

Young F. Why, faith! he has played me many a damned trick to spoil my fortune; and, egad! I am almost afraid he's at work about it again now; but if I should tell thee how, thou'dst wonder at me.

Lory. Indeed, sir, I should not.

Young F. How dost know?

Lory. Because, sir, I have wondered at you so often, I can wonder at you no more.

Young F. No!—What would'st thou say, if a qualm of conscience should spoil my design?

Lory. I would eat my words, and wonder more than ever.

Young F. Why, faith! Lory, though I have played many a roguish trick, this is so full-grown a cheat, I find I must take pains to come up to't—I have scruples.

Lory. They are strong symptoms of death. If you find they increase, sir, pray nake up your will.

Young F. No, my conscience shan't starve me, neither; but thus far I'll listen to it. Before I execute this project, I'll try my br-ther to the bottom. If he has yet so much humanity about him as to assist me—though with a moderate aid—I'll drop my project at his feet, and show him how I can do for him much more than what I'd ask he'd do for me. This one conclusive trial of him I resolve to make:

Succeed or fail, still vict'ry is my lot:

If I subdue his heart, 'tis well—if not,

I will subdue my conscience to my plot.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Drawing-room.

Enter LOVELESS and AMANDA.

Lov. How do you like these lodgings, my dear? For my part, I am so pleased with them, I shall hardly remove whilst we stay here, if you are satisfied.

Ama. I am satisfied with every thing that pleases you; else I had not come to Scarborough at all.

Lov. O! a little of the noise and folly of this place will sweeten the pleasures of our retreat; we shall find the charms of our retirement doubled when we return to it.

Ama. That pleasing prospect will be my chiefest entertainment, whilst, much against my will, I engage in those empty pleasures which 'tis so much the fashion to be fond of.

Lov. I own most of them are, indeed, but empty;

yet there are delights of which a private life is destitute, which may divert an honest man, and be a harmless entertainment to a virtuous woman: good music is one; and truly (with some small allowance) the plays, I think, may be esteemed another.

Ama. Plays, I must confess, have some small charms. What do you think of that you saw last night?

Lov. To say truth, I did not mind it much—my attention was for some time taken off to admire the workmanship of nature, in the face of a young lady who sat some distance from me; she was so exquisitely handsome.

Ama. So exquisitely handsome!

Lov. Why do you repeat my words, my dear?

Ama. Because you seem'd to speak them with such pleasure; I thought I might oblige you with their echo.

Lov. Then you are alarmed, Amanda?

Ama. It is my duty to be so when you are in danger.

Lov. You are too quick in apprehending for me. I viewed her with a world of admiration, but not one glance of love.

Ama. Take heed of trusting to such nice distinctions. But were your eyes the only things that were inquisitive? Had I been in your place, my tongue, I fancy, had been curious too. I should have asked her where she lived—yet still without design—who was she, pray?

Lov. Indeed I cannot tell.

Ama. You will not tell.

Lov. Upon my honour, then, I did not ask.

Ama. Nor do you know what company was with her?

Lov. I do not. But why are you so earnest?

Ama. I thought I had cause.

Lov. But you thought wrong, Amanda; for turn the case, and let it be your story: should you come home, and tell me you had seen a handsome man, should I grow jealous because you had eyes?

Ama. But, should I tell you he was exquisitely so, and that I had gazed on him with admiration, should you not think 'twere possible I might go one step further, and inquire his name?

Lov. She has reason on her side; I have talked too much; but I must turn off another way. [Aside.] Will you, then, make no difference, Amanda, between the language of our sex and yours? There is a modesty restrains your tongues, which makes you speak by halves when you commend; but roving flattery gives a loose to ours, which makes us still speak double what we think.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, there is a lady at the door in a chair desires to know whether your ladyship sees company? Her name is Berinthia.

Ama. Oh, dear! 'tis a relation I have not seen these five years; pray her walk in. [Exit Servant.] Here's another beauty for you; she was, when I saw her last, reckoned extremely handsome.

Lov. Don't be jealous now; for I shall gaze upon her too.

Enter BERINTHIA.

Ha! by heavens, the very woman!

[Aside.]

Ber. Dear Amanda, I did not expect to meet you in Scarborough.

Ama. Sweet cousin, I'm overjoyed to see you.—

ACT, DRAMA—NO. IX.

Mr. Loveless, here's a relation and a friend of mine, I desire you'll be better acquainted with.

Lov. If my wife never desires a harder thing, madam, her request will be easily granted.

Re-enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, my Lord Foppington presents his humble service to you, and desires to know how you do. He's at the next door; and, if it be not inconvenient to you, he'll come and wait upon you.

Lov. Give my compliments to his lordship, and I shall be glad to see him. [Exit Servant.] If you are not acquainted with his lordship, madam, you will be entertained with his character.

Ama. Now it moves my pity more than my mirth to see a man, whom nature has made no fool, be so very industrious to pass for an ass.

Lov. No, there you are wrong, Amanda: you should never bestow your pity upon those who take pains for your contempt; pity those whom nature abuses, never those who abuse nature.

Enter Lord FOPPINGTON.

Lord F. Dear Loveless, I am your most humble servant.

Lov. My lord, I'm yours.

Lord F. Madam, your ladyship's very obedient slave.

Lov. My lord, this lady is a relation of my wife's.

Lord F. [Kisses her hand.] The beautifullest race of people upon earth, rat me. Dear Loveless, I am overjoyed that you think of continuing here. I am, stap my vitals. For Gad's sake, madam, how has your ladyship been able to subsist thus long, under the fatigue of a country life? [To AMANDA.]

Ama. My life has been very far from that, my lord,—it has been a very quiet one.

Lord F. Why, that's the fatigue I speak of, madam; for 'tis impossible to be quiet without thinking: now thinking is to me the greatest fatigue in the world.

Ama. Does not your lordship love reading, then?

Lord F. Oh, passionately, madam; but I never think of what I read. For example, madam, my life is a perpetual stream of pleasure, that glides through with such a variety of entertainments, I believe the wisest of our ancestors never had the least conception of any of 'em. I rise, madam, when in tawn, about twelve o'clock. I don't rise sooner, because it is the worst thing in the world for the complexion: nat that I pretend to be a beau; but a man must endeavour to look decent, lest he makes so odious a figure in the side-bax, the ladies should be compelled to turn their eyes upon the play. So, at twelve o'clock, I say, I rise. Now, if I find it is a good day, I resolve to take the exercise of riding; so drink my chocolate, and draw on my boots, by two. On my return, I dress; and, after dinner, lounge, perhaps, to the Opera.

Ber. Your lordship, I suppose, is fond of music?

Lord F. Oh, passionately! on Tuesdays and Saturdays; for then there is always the best company, and one is not expected to undergo the fatigue of listening.

Ama. Does your lordship think that the case at the Opera?

Lord F. Most certainly, madam. There is my Lady Tattle, my Lady Prate, my Lady Titter, my Lady Sneer, my Lady Giggle, and my Lady Gripe—these have boxes in the front, and, while any favourite air is singing, are the prettiest company in the wauld, stap my vitals! Mayn't we hope for the honour to see you added to our society, madam?

K

Ama. Alas! my lord, I am the worst company in the world at a concert; I'm so apt to attend to the music.

Lord F. Why, madam, that is very pardonable in the country or at church, but a monstrous inattention in a polite assembly. But I am afraid I tire the company.

Lov. Not at all. Pray go on.

Lord F. Why, then, ladies, there only remains to add, that I generally conclude the evening at one or other of the clubs; nat that I ever play deep; indeed, I have been tied up for some time from losing above five thousand pounds at a sitting.

Lov. But isn't your lordship sometimes obliged to attend to the weighty affairs of the nation?

Lord F. Sir, as to weighty affairs, I leave them to weighty heads; I never intend mine shall be a burden to my body.

Ber. Nay, my lord, but you are a pillar of the state.

Lord F. An ornamental pillar, madam; for, sooner than undergo any part of the fatigue, rat me, but the whole building should fall plump to the ground.

Ama. But, my lord, a fine gentleman spends a great deal of his time in his intrigues; you have given us no account of them yet.

Lord F. Soh! She would inquire into my amours—that's jealousy, poor soul! I see she's in love with me. [Aside.] Oh Lord! madam, I like to have forgot a secret I must needs tell your ladyship.—Ned, you must not be so jealous now as to listen.

Lov. [Leading BERINTIA up the stage.] Not I, my lord,—I am too fashionable a husband to pry into the secrets of my wife.

Lord F. [Squeezing AMANDA's hand.] I am in love with you to desperation, strike me speechless!

[Apert.]

Ama. [Strikes him on the ear.] Then thus I return your passion, impudent fool!

Lord F. Gad's curse! madam, I am a peer of the realm.

Lov. [Hastily returning.] Hey! what the devil, do you affront my wife? Nay, then—

[Draws.—They fight.]

Ama. What has my folly done? Help! murder! help! Part them, for Heaven's sake!

Lord F. [Falls back, and leans on his sword.] Ah! quite through my body, stap my vitals!

Enter Servants.

Lov. [Runs to Lord FOPPINGTON.] I hope I ha'n't killed the fool, however. Bear him up—Call a surgeon, there.

Lord F. Ay, pray make haste.

[They set him in a chair.]

Lov. This mischief you may thank yourself for.

Lord F. I may so; love's the devil indeed, Ned.

Enter PROBE and Servant.

Serv. Here's Mr. Probe, sir, was just going by the door.

Lord F. He's the welcomest man alive.

Probe. Stand by, stand by, stand by; pray, gentlemen, stand by. Lord have mercy upon us, did you never see a man run through the body before?—Pray stand by.

Lord F. Ah, Mr. Probe, I'm a dead man.

Probe. A dead man, and I by! I should laugh to see that, 'gad!

Lov. Pr'ythee, don't stand prating, but look upon his wound.

Probe. Why, what if I don't look upon his wound this hour, sir?

Lov. Why, then, he'll bleed to death, sir.

[Ladies stand in the background.]

Probe. Why then I'll fetch him to life again, sir.

Lov. 'Slife! he's run through the body, I tell thee!

Probe. I wish he was run through the heart, and I should get the more credit by his cure. Now, I hope, you are satisfied? Come, now let me come at him—now let me come at him. [Viewing his wound.] Oons! what a gash is here! Why, sir, a man may drive a coach and six horses into your body.

Lord F. Oh!

Probe. Why, what the devil, have you run the gentleman through with a scythe?—A little scratch between the skin and the ribs, that's all. [Aside.]

Lov. Let me see his wound.

Probe. Then you shall dress it, sir; for, if anybody looks upon it, I won't.

Lov. Why thou art the veriest coxcomb I ever saw.

Probe. I am not master of my trade for nothing.

Lord F. Surgeon!

Probe. Sir.

Lord F. Are there any hopes?

Probe. Hopes! I can't tell. What are you willing to give for a cure?

Lord F. Five hundred pounds with pleasure.

Probe. Why, then, perhaps there may be hopes; but we must avoid a further delay.—Here, help, help the gentleman into a chair, and carry him to my house presently—that's the properest place—to bubble him out of his money. [Aside.] Come, come—there, in with him.

Lord F. [As he is borne away.] Dear Loveless, adieu: if I die, I forgive thee; and, if I live, I hope thou wilt do as much by me. I am sorry you and I should quarrel, but I hope here's an end on't; for, if you are satisfied, I am.

Lov. I shall hardly think it worth my prosecuting any further; so you may be at rest, sir.

Lord F. Thou art a generous fellow, strike me dumb!—but thou hast an impertinent wife, stap my vitals!

[Aside.]

Probe. So—carry him off—carry him off—we shall have him prate himself into a fever by and by—carry him off. [Exeunt with Lord FOPPINGTON.]

Enter Colonel TOWNLY.

Col. T. So, so, I am glad to find you all alive—I met a wounded peer carrying off. For Heaven's sake, what was the matter?

Lov. Oh, a trifle—he would have made love to my wife before my face; so she obliged him with a box o' the ear, and I ran him through the body, that was all.

Col. T. Bagatelle on all sides. But pray, madam, how long has this noble lord been an humble servant of yours?

Ama. This is the first I have heard on't—so, I suppose, 'tis his quality more than his love has brought him into this adventure. He thinks his title an authentic passport to every woman's heart below the degree of a peeress.

Col. T. He's coxcomb enough to think anything; but I would not have you brought into trouble for him. I hope there's no danger of his life?

Lov. None at all—he's fallen into the hands of a roguish surgeon, who, I perceive, designs to frighten a little money out of him—but I saw his wound—'tis nothing—he may go to the ball to-night if he pleases.

Col. T. I am glad you have corrected him without further mischief, or you might have deprived me of the pleasure of executing a plot against his lordship, which I have been contriving with an old acquaintance of yours.

Lov. Explain—

Col. T. His brother, Tom Fashion, is come down here, and we have it in contemplation to save him the trouble of his intended wedding; but we want your assistance. Tom would have called, but he is preparing for his enterprise, so I promised to bring you to him—so, sir, if these ladies can spare you—

Lov. I'll go with you, with all my heart—[Aside]—though I could wish, methinks, to stay and gaze a little longer on that creature.—Good gods! how engaging she is—but what have I to do with beauty! I have already had my portion, and must not covet more.

Ama. Mr. Loveless, pray one word with you before you go. [Exit Colonel TOWNLY.]

Lov. What would my dear?

Ama. Only a woman's foolish question—how do you like my cousin, here?

Lov. Jealous already, Amanda?

Ama. Not at all.—I ask you for another reason.

Lov. What'er her reason be, I must not tell her true. [Aside.] Why, I confess, she's handsome: but you must not think I slight your kinswoman, if I own to you, of all the women who may claim that character, she is the last that would triumph in my heart.

Ama. I am satisfied.

Lov. Now tell me why you ask'd.

Ama. At night I will—adieu.

Lov. I'm yours. [Kissing her.—Exit.]

Ama. I am glad to find he does not like her, for I have a great mind to persuade her to come and live with me. [Aside.]

Ber. [Aside.] So! I find my colonel continues in his airs; there must be something more at the bottom of this than the provocation he pretends from me. [Aside.]

Ama. For Heaven's sake, Berinthia, tell me what way I shall take to persuade you to come and live with me!

Ber. Why one way in the world there is—and but one.

Ama. And pray what is that?

Ber. It is to assure me—I shall be very welcome.

Ama. If that be all, you shall e'en sleep here to-night.

Ber. To-night!

Ama. Yes, to-night.

Ber. Why, the people where I lodge will think me mad.

Ama. Let 'em think what they please.

Ber. Say you so, Amanda?—Why then they shall think what they please—for I'm a young widow, and I care not what anybody thinks.—Ah! Amanda, it's a delicious thing to be a young widow,

Ama. You'll hardly make me think so.

Ber. Poh! because you are in love with your husband.

Ama. Pray, 'tis, with a world of innocence, I would inquire whether you think those we call women of reputation, do really escape all other men as they do those shadows of beaux?

Ber. Oh, no, Amanda; there are a sort of men make dreadful work amongst 'em—men that may be called beaux' antipathy—for they agree in nothing but walking on two legs. These have brains—the beau has none. These are in love with their mistresses—the beau with himself. They take care of their reputation—the beau is industrious to destroy it. They are decent—he's a fop; in short, they are men—he's an ass.

Ama. If this be their character, I fancy we had here, e'en now, a pattern of 'em both.

Ber. His lordship and Colonel Townly?

Ama. The same.

Ber. As for the lord, he is eminently so; and for the other, I can assure you there's not a man in the town who has a better interest with the women, that are worth having an interest with.

Ama. He answers the opinion I had ever of him. [Takes her hand.] I must acquaint you with a secret—'tis not that fool alone that has talked to me of love. Townly has been tampering too.

Ber. So, so! here the mystery comes out!

[Aside.] Colonel Townly! impossible, my dear!

Ama. 'Tis true, indeed; though he has done it in vain; nor do I think that all the merit of mankind combined could shake the tender love I bear my husband; yet I will own to you, Berinthia, I did not start at his addresses, as when they came from one whom I contemned.

Ber. Oh, this is better and better. [Aside.] Well said, innocence: and you think, my dear, that nothing could abate your constancy and attachment to your husband?

Ama. Nothing, I am convinced.

Ber. What if you found he lov'd another woman better?

Ama. Well!

Ber. Well!—why, were I that thing they call a slighted wife, somebody should run the risk of being that thing they call—a husband. Don't I talk madly?

Ama. Madly, indeed!

Ber. Yet I am very innocent.

Ama. That I dare swear you are. I know how to make allowances for your humour—but you resolve, then, never to marry again?

Ber. Oh, no!—I resolve I will.

Ama. How so?

Ber. That I never may.

Ama. You banter me.

Ber. Indeed I don't—but I consider I'm a woman, and form my resolutions accordingly.

Ama. Well, my opinion is, form what resolution you will, matrimony will be the end on't.

Ber. I don't it—but a—Heavens! I have business at home, and am half an hour too late.

Ama. As you are to return with me, I'll just give some orders, and walk with you.

Ber. Well, make haste, and we'll finish this subject as we go. [Exit AMANDA.] Ah, poor Amanda, you have led a country life. Well, this discovery is lucky! Base Townly!—at once false to me and treacherous to his friend! and my innocent and demure cousin, too! I have it in my power to be revenged on her, however. Her husband, if I have any skill in countenance, would be as happy in my smiles as Townly can hope to be in hers. I'll make the experiment, come what will on't. The woman who can forgive the being robb'd of a favoured lover, must be either an idiot or something worse.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Drawing-room.

Enter Lord POPPINGTON and LA VAROLE.

Lord F. Hey, fellow, let my vis-a-vis come to the door.

La Var. Will your lordship venture so soon to expose yourself to the weather?

Lord F. Sir, I will venture as soon as I can to expose myself to the ladies.

La Var. I wish your lordship would please to keep house a little longer; I'm afraid your honour does not well consider your wound.

Lord F. My wound!—I would not be in eclipse another day, though I had as many wounds in my body as I have had in my heart. So mind, Varole, let these cards be left as directed; for this evening I shall wait on my future father-in-law, Sir Tunbelly, and I mean to commence my devoirs to the lady, by giving an entertainment at her father's expense; and bark thee, tell Mr. Loveless I request he and his company will honour me with their presence, or I shall think we are not friends.

La Var. I will be sure, mi lor. [Exit.

Enter Young FASHION.

Young F. Brother, your servant; how do you find yourself to-day?

Lord F. So well that I have ordered my coach to the door—so there's no danger of death this bout, Tam.

Young F. I'm very glad of it

Lord F. That I believe's a lie. [Aside.] Pr'ythee, Tam, tell me one thing—did not your heart cut a caper up to your mouth, when you heard I was run through the body?

Young F. Why do you think it should?

Lord F. Because I remember mine did so, when I heard my uncle was shot through the head.

Young F. It then did very ill.

Lord F. Pr'ythee, why so?

Young F. Because he used you very well.

Lord F. Well!—naw strike me dumb, he starv'd me; he has let me want a thousand women, for want of a thousand pawnd.

Young F. Then he hinder'd you from making a great many ill bargains; for I think no woman worth money that will take money.

Lord F. If I was a younger brother, I should think so too.

Young F. Then you are seldom much in love?

Lord F. Never, stap my vitals.

Young F. Why then did you make all this bustle about Amanda?

Lord F. Because she's a woman of insolent virtue, and I thought myself piqued, in honour, to debauch her.

Young F. Very well.—Here's a rare fellow for you, to have the spending of ten thousand pounds a year. But now for my business with him. [Aside.]—Brother, though I know to talk of any business (especially that of money) is a theme not quite so entertaining to you as that of the ladies, my necessities are such, I hope you'll have patience to hear me—

Lord F. The greatness of your necessities, Tam, is the worst argument in the waurld for your being patiently heard. I do believe you are going to make a very good speech, but strike me dumb, it has the worst beginning of any speech I have heard this twelvemonth.

Young F. I'm sorry you think so.

Lord F. I do believe thou art—but come, let's know the affair quickly.

Young F. Why, then, my case in a word is this.—The necessary expenses of my travels have so much exceeded the wretched income of my annuity, that I have been forced to mortgage it for five hundred pounds, which is spent. So, unless you are so kind as to assist me in redeeming it, I know no remedy but to take a purse.

Lord F. Why, faith, Tam, to give you my sense of the thing, I do think taking a purse the best remedy in the waurld—for if you succeed you are relieved that way, if you are taken [Drawing his hand round his neck]—you are relieved t'other.

Young F. I'm glad to see you are in so pleasant a humour; I hope I shall find the effects on't.

Lord F. Why, do you then really think it a reasonable thing, that I should give you five hundred pawnds?

Young F. I do not ask it as a due, brother; I am willing to receive it as a favour.

Lord F. Then thou art willing to receive it any how, strike me speechless! But these are d—n'd times to give money in; taxes are so great, repairs so exorbitant, tenants such rogues, and bouquets so dear, that, the devil take me, I am reduced to that extremity in my cash, I have been forced to retrench in that one article of sweet powder, till I have brought it down to five guineas a maunth—now judge, Tam, whether I can spare you five hundred pawnds?

Young F. If you can't, I must starve, that's all.—Damn him! [Aside.]

Lord F. All I can say is, you should have been a better husband.

Young F. Ouns!—If you can't live upon ten thousand a year, how do you think I should do't upon two hundred?

Lord F. Don't be in a passion, Tam, for passion is the most unbecoming thing in the waurld—to the face. Look you, I don't love to say anything to you to make you melancholy, but, upon this occasion, I must take leave to put you in mind, that a running-horse does require more attendance than a coach-horse.—Nature has made some difference 'twixt you and me.

Young F. Yes—she has made you older.—Plague take her! [Aside.]

Lord F. That is not all, Tam.

Young F. Why, what is there else?

Lord F. [Looks first on himself, and then on his brother.] Ask the ladies.

Young F. Why, thou essence-bottle, thou musk-cat!—dost thou then think thou hast any advantage over me but what fortune has given thee?

Lord F. I do, stap my vitals!

Young F. Now, by all that's great and powerful, thou art the prince of coxcombs!

Lord F. Sir, I am proud at being at the head of so prevailing a party.

Young F. Will nothing provoke thee?—Draw, coward.

Lord F. Look you, Tam, you know I have always taken you for a mighty dull fellow, and here is one of the foolishlest plats broke out that I have seen a lang time. Your poverty makes life so burdensome to you, you would provoke me to a quarrel, in hopes either to slip through my lungs into my estate, or to get yourself run through the guts, to put an end to your pain, but I will disappoint you in both your designs; far, with the temper of a philosopher, and the discretion of a statesman—I shall leave the room with my sword in the scabbard. [Exit.]

Young F. So! farewell, brother; and now, conscience, I defy thee.—Lory!

Enter LORY.

Lory. Sir.

Young F. Here's rare news, Lory; his lordship has given me a pill has purged off all my scruples.

Lory. Then my heart's at ease again. For I have been in a lamentable fright, sir, ever since your conscience had the impudence to intrude into your company.

Young F. Be at peace; it will come there no more: my brother has given it a wring by the nose, and I have kick'd it down stairs. So run away to the inn, get the chaise ready quickly, and bring it to Dame Coupler's without a moment's delay.

Lory. Then, sir, you are going straight about the fortune?

Young F. I am.—Away—fly, Lory!

Lory. The happiest day I ever saw. I'm upon the wing already; now then I shall get my wages. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Garden.

Enter LOVELESS and Servant.

Lov. Is my wife within?

Serv. No, sir, she has gone out this half-hour.

Lov. Well, leave me. [Exit Servant.] How strangely does my mind run on this widow—never was my heart so suddenly seized on before—that my wife should pick out her, of all womankind, to be her playfellow. But, what fate does, let fate answer for—I sought it not—soh!—by heav'ns!—hero she comes!

Enter BERINTHIA.

Ber. What makes you look so thoughtful, sir? I hope you are not ill!

Lov. I was debating, madam, whether I was so or not, and that was it which made me look so thoughtful.

Ber. Is it, then, so hard a matter to decide? I thought all people were acquainted with their own bodies, though few people know their own minds.

Lov. What, if the distemper I suspect be in the mind?

Ber. Why, then, I'll undertake to prescribe you a cure.

Lov. Alas! you undertake you know not what.

Ber. So far, at least, then, you allow me to be a physician.

Lov. Nay, I'll allow you to be so yet further: for I have reason to believe, should I put myself into your hands, you would increase my distemper.

Ber. How?

Lov. Oh, you might betray me to my wife.

Ber. And so lose all my practice.

Lov. Will you then keep my secret?

Ber. I will.

Lov. Well—but swear it.

Ber. I swear by woman!

Lov. Nay, that's swearing by my deity; swear by your own, and I shall believe you.

Ber. Well, then, I swear by man!

Lov. I'm satisfied. Now hear my symptoms, and give me your advice. The first were these: when I saw you at the play, a random glance you threw at first alarm'd me. I could not turn my eyes from whence the danger came—I gaz'd upon you till my heart began to pant—nay, even now, on your approaching me, my illness is so increased, that, if you do not help me, I shall, whilst you look on, consume to ashes.

[Takes her hand.

Ber. Oh, Lord! let me go! 'tis the plague, and we shall be infected. [Breaking from him.

Lov. Then we'll die together, my charming angel.

Ber. Oh, 'gad! the devil's in you. Lord, let me go—here's somebody coming.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, my lady's come home, and desires to speak with you.

Lov. Tell her I'm coming. [Exit Servant.] But before I go, one glass of nectar to drink her health.

[To BERINTHIA.

Ber. Stand off, or I shall hate you, by heavens!

Lov. [Kissing her.] In matters of love, a woman's oath is no more to be minded than a man's. [Exit.

Ber. Um!

Enter Colonel TOWNLY.

Col. T. Soh! what's here—Berinthia and Loveless—and in such close conversation!—I cannot now wonder at her indifference in excusing herself to me!—Oh, rare woman—well, then, let Loveless look to his wife, 'twill be but the retort courteous on both sides. Your servant,—madam, I need not ask you how you do, you have got so good a colour.

Ber. No better than I used to have, I suppose.

Col. T. A little more blood in your cheeks.

Ber. I have been walking!

Col. T. Is that all? Pray was it Mr. Loveless went from here just now?

Ber. Oh, yes—he has been walking with me.

Col. T. He has!

Ber. Upon my word, I think he is a very agreeable man!—and there is certainly something particularly insinuating in his address!

Col. T. So! so! she hasn't even the modesty to dissemble! [Aside.] Pray, madam, may I, without impertinence, trouble you with a few serious questions?

Ber. As many as you please; but pray let them be as little serious as possible.

Col. T. Is it not near two years since I have presumed to address you?

Ber. I don't know exactly—but it has been a tedious long time.

Col. T. Have I not, during that period, had every reason to believe that my assiduities were far from being unacceptable?

Ber. Why, to do you justice, you have been extremely troublesome—and I confess I have been more civil to you than you deserved.

Col. T. Did I not come to this place at your express desire, and for no purpose but the honour of meeting you?—and, after waiting a month in disappointment, have you condescended to explain, or, in the slightest way, apologize for your conduct?

Ber. Oh, heavens! apologize for my conduct!—apologize to you!—Oh, you barbarian!—But pray, now, my good serious colonel, have you anything more to add?

Col. T. Nothing, madam, but that, after such behaviour, I am less surprised at what I saw just now: it is not very wonderful that the woman who can trifle with the delicate addresses of an honourable lover, should be found coquetting with the husband of her friend.

Ber. Very true—no more wonderful than it was for this honourable lover to divert himself, in the absence of this coquette, with endeavouring to seduce his friend's wife! Oh, colonel, colonel, don't talk of honour or your friend, for Heaven's sake!

Col. T. 'Sdeath! how came she to suspect this? [Aside.] Really, madam, I don't understand you.

Ber. Nay—nay—you saw I did not pretend to misunderstand you. But here comes the lady: perhaps you would be glad to be left with her for an explanation.

Col. T. Oh, madam, this recrimination is a poor resource; and, to convince you how much you are mistaken, I beg leave to decline the happiness you propose me. Madam, your servant.

Enter AMANDA.—Colonel TOWNLY whispers AMANDA, and exit.

Ber. He carries it off well, however—upon my word—very well!—how tenderly they part.—[Aside.]—So, cousin—I hope you have not been chiding your admirer for being with me—I assure you we have been talking of you.

Ama. Fy, Berinthia!—my admirer—will you never learn to talk in earnest of anything?

Ber. Why, this shall be in earnest, if you please; for my part, I only tell you matter of fact.

Ama. I'm sure there's so much of jest and earnest in what you say to me on this subject, I scarce know how to take it. I have just parted with Mr. Loveless—perhaps it is fancy, but I think there is an alteration in his manner which alarms me.

Ber. And so you are jealous? is that all?

Ama. That all!—is jealousy, then, nothing?

Ber. It should be nothing, if I were in your case.

Ama. Why, what would you do?

Ber. I'd cure myself.

Ama. How?

Ber. Care as little for my husband as he did for me. Look you, Amanda, you may build castles in the air, and fume and fret, and grow thin, and lean, and pale, and ugly, if you please; but I tell you, no man worth having is true to his wife, or ever was, or ever will be so.

Ama. Do you then really think he's false to me? for I did not suspect him.

Ber. Think so! I am sure of it.

Ama. You are sure on't?

Ber. Positively—he fell in love at the play.

Ama. Right—the very same—but who could have told you this?

Ber. Um—oh—Townly!—I suppose your husband has made him his confidant.

Ama. Oh, base Loveless! and what did Townly say on't?

Ber. So, so—why should she ask that? [Aside.] Say! why he abused Loveless extremely, and said all the tender things of you in the world.

Ama. Did he?—Oh! my heart!—I'm very ill—dear Berinthia, don't leave me a moment. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Outside of Sir Tunbely's House.

Enter Young FASHION and LORY.

Young F. So—here's our inheritance, Lory, if we can but get into possession—but, methinks, the seat of our family looks like Noah's ark, as if the chief part on't were designed for the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field.

Lory. Pray, sir, don't let your head run upon the orders of building here—get but the heirless, let the devil take the house.

Young F. Get but the house! let the devil take the heirless, I say—but come, we have no time to squander; knock at the door. [Lory knocks two or three times at the gate.] What the devil, have they no ears in this house?—Knock harder.

Lory. 'Egad, sir, this will prove some enchanted castle—we shall have the giant come out, by and by, with his club, and beat our brains out.

[Knocks again.]

Young F. Hush, they come.

Serv. [Within.] Who is there?

Lory. Open the door, and see—is that your country breeding?

Serv. Ay, but two words to that bargain—Tum-mus, is the blunderbuss prim'd?

Young F. Ouns! give 'em good words, Lory—or we shall be shot here a fortune-catching.

Lory. 'Egad, sir, I think you're in the right on't—ho!—Mr. What-d'ye-call-em—will you please to let us in? or are we to be left to grow like willows by your moat-side?

[Servant looks over the wall with a blunderbuss in his hand.]

Serv. Well, naw, what's ya're business?

Young F. Nothing, sir, but to wait upon Sir Tunbely, with your leave.

Serv. To wait upon Sir Tunbely? Why, you'll find that's just as Sir Tunbely pleases.

Young F. But will you do me the favour, sir, to learn whether Sir Tunbely pleases or not?

Serv. Why, look you, d'ye see, with good words much may be done. Ralph, go thy ways, and ask Sir Tunbely if he pleases to be waited upon—and, dost hear, call to Nurse, that she may lock up Miss Hoyden before the gates open.

Young F. D'ye hear that, Lory?

Gates open.—Enter Sir TUNBELLY CLUMSY, M. D., with Servants, armed with guns, clubs, pitchforks, &c.

Lory. O! [Runs behind his master.] O Lord! O Lord! we are both dead men!

Young F. Fool! thy fear will ruin us.

[Apart to LORY.]

Lory. My fear, sir! 'Sdeath, sir, I fear nothing.

—[Apart.] Would I were well up to the chin in a horse-pond. [Aside.]

Sir T. Who is it here hath any business with me?

Young F. Sir, 'tis I, 'if your name is Sir Tunbelly Clumsy.

Sir T. Sir, my name is Sir Tunbelly Clumsy, whether you have any business with me or not.—So you see I am not ashamed of my name, nor my face, either.

Young F. Sir, you have no cause that I know of.

Sir T. Sir, you have no cause either. I desire to know who you are; for, till I know your name, I shan't ask you to come into my house; and, when I do know your name, 'tis six to four I don't ask you then.

Young F. Sir, I hope you'll find this letter an authentic passport. [Gives him a letter.]

Sir T. Cod's my life, from Mrs. Coupler!—I ask your lordship's pardon ten thousand times. [To his Servant.] Here, run in a-doors quickly; get a Scotch coal fire in the parlour, set all the Turkey-work chairs in their places, get the brass candlesticks out, and be sure stick the sockets full of laurel—run—[Turns to Young FASHION.] My lord, I ask your lordship's pardon. [To the Servant.] And, do you hear, run away to Nurse, bid her let Miss Hoyden loose again. [Exit Servant.] I hope your honour will excuse the disorder of my family.—We are not used to receive men of your lordship's great quality every day. Pray where are your coaches and servants, my lord?

Young F. Sir, that I might give you and your daughter a proof how impatient I am to be nearer akin to you, I left my equipage to follow me, and came away post with only one servant.

Sir T. Your lordship does me too much honour—it was exposing your person to too much fatigue and danger.—I protest it was; but my daughter shall endeavour to make you what amends she can; and, though I say it that should not say it, Hoyden has charms.

Young F. Sir, I am not a stranger to them, though I am to her: common fame has done her justice.

Sir T. My lord, I am common fame's very grateful, humble servant. My lord, my girl's young—Hoyden is young, my lord: but this I must say for her, what she wants in art, she has in breeding: and what's wanting in her age, is made good in her constitution.—So pray, my lord, walk in; pray my lord, walk in.

Young F. Sir, I wait upon you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—An Apartment in Sir TUNBELLY CLUMSY'S House.

Miss HOYDEN discovered.

Miss H. Sure, nobody was ever used as I am. I know well enough what other girls do, for all they think to make a fool o' me. It's well I have a husband a coming, or, iced! I'd marry the baker, I would so. Nobody can knock at the gate, but presently I must be locked up; and here's the young greyhound can run loose about the house all the day long, so she can.—'Tis very well—

Nurse. [Without, opening the door.] Miss Hoyden, miss, miss, miss! Miss Hoyden!

Enter Nurse.

Miss H. Well, what do you make such a noise for, ha?—What do you din a body's ears for? Can't one be quiet for you?

Nurse. What do I din your ears for? Here's one come will din your ears for you.

Miss H. What care I who's come? I care not a fig who comes or who goes, as long as I must be lock'd up like the ale-cellar.

Nurse. That, miss, is for fear you should be drunk before you are ripe.

Miss H. Oh, don't trouble your head about that; I'm as ripe as you, though not so mellow.

Nurse. Very well, now I have a good mind to lock you up again, and not let you see my lord to-night.

Miss H. My lord! why, has my husband come?

Nurse. Yes, marry, is he, and a goodly person, too.

[Flinging away her knife, loaf, and butter.]

Miss H. [Hugs Nurse.] Oh, my dear Nurse, forgive me this once, and I'll never misuse you again; no, if I do, you shall give me three thumps on the back, and a great pinch by the cheek.

Nurse. Ah, the poor thing! see how it melts: its as full of good nature as an egg's full of meat.

Miss H. But, my dear Nurse, don't lie, now—is he come, by your troth?

Nurse. Yes, by my truly, is he.

Miss H. Oh, Lord! I'll go and put on my laced tucker, though I'm lock'd up for a month for't.

[Exeunt—Miss HOYDEN goes off capering and twirling her doll by its leg.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Sir TUNBELLY CLUMSY'S.

Enter Miss HOYDEN and Nurse.

Nurse. Well, miss, how do you like your husband that is to be?

Miss H. Oh, Lord, Nurse, I'm so overjoyed, I can scarce contain myself.

Nurse. Oh, but you must have a care of being too fond; for men, now-a-days, hate a woman that loves 'em.

Miss H. Love him! why, do you think I love him, Nurse? 'Ecod, I would not care if he was hang'd, so I were but once married to him. No, that which pleases me is, to think what work I'll make when I get to London; for, when I'm a wife and a lady both, 'ecod, I'll flaunt it with the best of 'em. Ay, and I shall have money enough to do so, too, Nurse.

Nurse. Ah, there's no knowing that, miss; for, though these lords have a power of wealth, indeed, yet, as I have heard say, they give it all to their sluts and their trulls, who joggle it about in their coaches, with a murrain to 'em, whilst poor madam sits sighing and wishing, and has not a spare half-crown to buy her a "Practice of Piety."

Miss H. Oh, but for that, don't deceive yourself, Nurse; for this I must say of my lord, he's as free as an open house at Christmas; for this very morning he told me I should have six hundred a year to buy pins. Now, if he gives me six hundred a year to buy pins, what do you think he'll give me to buy petticoats?

Nurse. Ah, my dearest, he deceives thee foully, and he's no better than a rogue for his pains,

These Londoners have got a gibberish with 'em would confound a gipsy. That which they call pin-money is to buy everything in the versal world, down to their very shoe-knots. Nay, I have heard some folks say that some ladies, if they'll have gallants, as they call 'em, are forced to find them out of their pin-money, too. But look, look, if his honour be not coming to you! Now, if I were sure you would behave yourself handsomely, and not disgrace me that have brought you up, I'd leave you alone together.

Miss H. That's my best Nurse, do as you'd be done by. Trust us together this once, and, if I don't show my breeding, I wish I may never be married, but die an old maid.

Nurse. Well, this once I'll venture you. But, if you disparage me—

Miss H. Never fear.

[Exit Nurse.]

Enter Young FASHION.

Young F. Your servant, madam: I'm glad to find you alone, for I have something of importance to speak to you about.

Miss H. Sir—my lord, I meant—you may speak to me about what you please, I shall give you a civil answer.

Young F. You give so obliging a one, it encourages me to tell you, in a few words, what I think, both for your interest and mine. Your father, I suppose you know, has resolved to make me happy in being your husband; and I hope I may obtain your consent to perform what he desires.

Miss H. Sir, I never disobey my father, in anything but eating green gooseberries.

Young F. So good a daughter must needs be an admirable wife; I am therefore impatient till you are mine, and hope you will so far consider the violence of my love, that you won't have the cruelty to defer my happiness so long as your father designs it.

Miss H. Pray, my lord, how long is that?

Young F. Madam, a thousand years—a whole week.

Miss H. Why, I thought it was to be to-morrow morning, as soon as I was up. I'm sure Nurse told me so.

Young F. And it shall be to-morrow morning, if you'll consent.

Miss H. If I'll consent? Why, I thought I was to obey you as my husband?

Young F. That's when we are married. Till then, I'm to obey you.

Miss H. Why, then, if we are to take it by turns, it's the same thing. I'll obey you now, and, when we are married, you shall obey me.

Young F. With all my heart. But I doubt we must get Nurse on our side, or we shall hardly prevail with the chaplain.

Miss H. No more we sha'n't, indeed; for he loves her better than he loves his pulpit, and would always be a preaching to her by his good will.

Young F. Why, then, my dear, if you'll call her hither, we'll persuade her presently.

Miss H. Oh, lud! I'll tell you a way how to persuade her to anything.

Young F. How's that?

Miss H. Why, tell her she's a handsome, comely woman, and give her half-a-crown.

Young F. Nay, if that will do, she shall have half a score of them.

Miss H. Oh! gemini! for half that she'd marry you herself. I'll run and call her.

[Exit.]

Young F. So! matters go on swimmingly. This is a rare girl, i'faith. I shall have a fine time on't with her at London.

Enter LORY.

So, Lory, what's the matter?

Lory. Here, sir,—an intercepted letter from the enemy; your brother's postillion brought it.—I knew the livery, pretended to be a servant of Sir Tunbely's, and so got possession of the letter.

Young F. [Looks at the letter.] Ouns! he tells Sir Tunbely, here, that he will be with him this evening, with a large party, to supper. 'Egad, I must marry the girl directly.

Lory. Oh, zounds, sir, directly, to be sure. Here she comes. [Exit.]

Young F. And the old jesabel with her.

Re-enter Miss HOYDEN and Nurse.

How do you do, good Mrs. Nurse? I desired your young lady would give me leave to see you, that I might thank you for your extraordinary care and kind conduct in her education: pray accept of this small acknowledgment for it, at present, and depend upon my further kindness when I shall be that happy thing, her husband. [Gives her money.]

Nurse. Gold, by the maakins! [Aside.] Your honour's goodness is too great. Alas! all I can boast of is, I have given her pure good milk, and so your honour would have said, an' had you seen how the poor thing thrived, and how it would look up in my face—and crow and laugh, it would.

Miss H. [To Nurse, taking her angrily aside.] Pray, one word with you. Pr'ythee, Nurse, don't stand ripping up old stories, to make one ashamed before one's love. Do you think such a fine proper gentleman as he is, cares for a fiddle-come tale of a child? If you have a mind to make him have a good opinion of a woman, don't tell him what one did then, tell him what one can do now. [Goes to FASHION.] I hope your honour will excuse my mis-manners to whisper before you; it was only to give some orders about the family.

Young F. Oh, everything, madam, is to give way to business; beside, good housewifery is a very commendable quality in a young lady.

Miss H. Pray, sir, are young ladies good housewives at London town? Do they darn their own linen?

Young F. Oh, no, they study how to spend money, not to save.

Miss H. 'Ecod, I don't know but that may be the better sport! ha, Nurse!

Young F. Well, you shall have your choice when you come there.

Miss H. Shall I?—Then, by my troth, I'll get there as fast as I can. His honour desires you'll be so kind as to let us be married to-morrow.

[To Nurse.]

Nurse. To-morrow, my dear madam!

Young F. Ay, faith, Nurse, you may well be surprised at my's wanting to put it off so long. To-morrow! no, no; 'tis now, this very hour, I would have the ceremony performed.

Miss H. 'Ecod, with all my heart!

Nurse. Oh, mercy! worse and worse!

Young F. Yes, sweet Nurse, now, and privately; for, all things being signed and sealed, why should Sir Tunbely make us stay a week for a wedding-dinner?

Nurse. But if you should be married now, what will you do when Sir Tunbely calls for you to be married?

Miss H. Why, then we will be married again.

Nurse. What, twice, my child?

Miss H. 'Ecod! I don't care how often I'm married, not I.

Nurse. Well, I'm such a tender-hearted fool, I find I can refuse you nothing. So you shall e'en follow your own inventions.

Miss H. Shall I?—Oh, Lord, I could leap over the moon.

Young F. Dear Nurse, this goodness of yours shall be still more rewarded. But you must employ your power with the chaplain, that he may do his friendly office too, and then we shall all be happy. Do you think you can prevail with him?

Nurse. Prevail with him? or he shall never prevail with me, I can tell him that.

Young F. I'm glad to hear it; however, to strengthen your interest with him, you may let him know I have several fat livings in my gift, and that the first that falls shall be in your disposal.

Nurse. Nay, then, I'll make him marry more folks than one, I'll promise him.

Miss H. Faith, do, Nurse! make him marry you too; I'm sure he'll do it for a fat living.

Young F. Well, Nurse, while you go and settle matters with him, your lady and I will go and take a walk in the garden. [Exit Nurse.] Come, madam, dare you venture yourself alone with me?

[Takes Miss HOYDEN by the hand.]

Miss H. Oh dear, yes, sir! I don't think you'll do anything to me I need be afraid of. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Garden. Moonlight.

Enter LOVELESS.

Lov. Now, does she mean to make a fool of me, or not? I shan't wait much longer, for my wife will soon be inquiring for me to set out on our supping-party. Suspense is at all times the devil—but of all modes of suspense, the watching for a loitering mistress is the worst. But let me accuse her no longer; she approaches with one smile, to o'erpay the anxieties of a year!

Enter BERINTHIA.

O, Berinthia, what a world of kindness are you in my debt! Had you stayed five minutes longer—

Ber. You would have gone, I suppose?

Lov. 'Egad! she's right enough. [Aside.]

Ber. And I assure you, 'twas ten to one that I came at all. In short, I begin to think you are too dangerous a being to trifle with; and, as I shall probably only make a fool of you at last, I believe we had better let matters rest as they are.

Lov. You cannot mean it, sure?

Ber. What more would you have me give to a married man?

Lov. How doubly cruel to remind me of my misfortunes!

Ber. A misfortune to be married to so charming a woman as Amanda?

Lov. I grant all her merit, but—'Sdeath! now see what you have done by talking of her—she's here, by all that's unlucky, and Townly with her—I'll observe them.

Ber. O God, we had better get out of the way; for I should feel as awkward to meet her as you.

Lov. Ay, if I mistake not, I see Townly coming this way also. I must see a little into this matter.

[Steps aside.]

Ber. Oh, if that's your intention, I am no woman, if I suffer myself to be outdone in curiosity.

[Goes on the other side.]

Enter AMANDA.

Ama. Mr. Loveless come home, and walking on the lawn! I will not suffer him to walk so late, though perhaps it is to show his neglect of me. Mr. Loveless, I must speak with you. Ha! Townly again! How I am persecuted!

Enter Colonel TOWNLY.

Col. T. Madam, you seem disturbed.

Ama. Sir, I have reason.

Col. T. Whatever be the cause, I would to Heaven it were in my power to bear the pain, or to remove the malady.

Ama. Your interference can only add to my distress.

Col. T. Ah, madam, if it be the sting of unrequited love you suffer from, seek for your remedy in revenge: weigh well the strength and beauty of your charms, and rouse up that spirit a woman ought to bear. Disdain the false embraces of a husband. See at your feet a real lover; his zeal may give him title to your pity, although his merit cannot claim your love.

Lov. So, so, very fine, I faith. [Aside.]

Ama. Why do you presume to talk to me thus? Is this your friendship to Mr. Loveless? I perceive you will compel me at last to acquaint him with your treachery.

Col. T. He could not upbraid me if you were—he deserves it from me; for he has not been more false to you than faithless to me.

Ama. To you?

Col. T. Yes, madam: the lady for whom he now deserts those charms which he was never worthy of, was mine by right; and I imagined, too, by inclination.—Yes, Madam Berinthia, who now—

Ama. Berinthia! Impossible!

Col. T. 'Tis true, or may I never merit your attention. She is the deceitful sorceress who now holds your husband's heart in bondage.

Ama. I will not believe it.

Col. T. By the faith of a true lover, I speak from conviction. This very day I saw them together, and overheard—

Ama. Peace, sir, I will not even listen to such slander—this is a poor device to work on my resentment, to listen to your insidious addresses. No, sir, though Mr. Loveless may be capable of error, I am convinced I cannot be deceived so grossly in him, as to believe what you now report; and for Berinthia, you should have fixed on some more probable person for my rival, than she who is my relation and my friend: for, while I am myself free from guilt, I will never believe that love can beget injury, or confidence create ingratitude.

Col. T. If I do not prove to you—

Ama. You never shall have an opportunity. From the artful manner in which you first showed yourself to me, I might have been led, as far as virtue permitted, to have thought you less criminal than unhappy; but this last unmanly artifice merits at once my resentment and contempt. [Exit.]

Col. T. Sure, there's divinity about her; and she has dispensed some portion of honour's light to me: yet can I bear to lose Berinthia without revenge or compensation? Perhaps she is not so culpable as I thought her. I was mistaken when

I began to think lightly of Amanda's virtue, and may be in my censure of my Berinthia. Surely I love her still, for I feel I should be happy to find myself in the wrong. [Exit.]

Re-enter LOVELESS and BERINTHIA.

Ber. Your servant, Mr. Loveless.

Lov. Your servant, madam.

Ber. Pray what do you think of this?

Lov. Truly, I don't know what to say.

Ber. Don't you think we steal forth two contemptible creatures?

Lov. Why tolerably so, I must confess.

Ber. And do you conceive it possible for you ever to give Amanda the least uneasiness again?

Lov. No, I think we never should, indeed.

Ber. We!—Why, monster, you don't pretend that I ever entertained a thought?

Lov. Why, then, sincerely and honestly, Berinthia, there is something in my wife's conduct which strikes me so forcibly, that if it were not for shame, and the fear of hurting you in her opinion, I swear I would follow her, confess my error, and trust to her generosity for forgiveness.

Ber. Nay, pr'ythee, don't let your respect for me prevent you; for, as my object in trifling with you was nothing more than to pique Townly, and, as I perceive he has been actuated by a similar motive, you may depend on't I shall make no mystery of the matter to him.

Lov. By no means inform him; for though I may choose to pass by his conduct without resentment, how will he presume to look me in the face again?

Ber. How will you presume to look him in the face again?

Lov. He who has dared to attempt the honour of my wife.

Ber. You, who have dared to attempt the honour of his mistress! Come, come, be ruled by me, who affect more levity than I have, and don't think of anger in this cause. A readiness to resent injuries, is a virtue only in those who are slow to injure.

Lov. Then I will be ruled by you; and when you shall think proper to undeceive Townly, may your good qualities make as sincere a convert of him, as Amanda's have of me. When truth's extorted from us, then we own the robe of virtue is a sacred habit:

Could women but our secret counsels scan—

Could they but reach the deep reserve of man—

To keep our love they'd rate their virtue high.

They live together, and together die. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Sir TUNBELLY CLUMSY's House.

Enter Miss HOYDEN, Nurse, and Young FASHION.

Young F. This quick despatch of the chaplain's I take so kindly, it shall give him claim to my favour as long as I live, I assure you.

Miss H. And to mine, too, I promise you.

Nurse. I most humbly thank your honours; and may your children swarm about you like bees about a honeycomb.

Miss H. 'Cod, with all my heart—the more the merrier, I say—ha, Nurse!

Enter LORY.

Lory. One word with you, for Heaven's sake.

[Taking Young FASHION hastily aside.]

Young F. What the devil's the matter!

Lory. Sir, your fortune's ruin'd if you are not married. Yonder's your brother arrived, with two coaches and six horses, twenty footmen, and a coat worth fourscore pounds—so judge what will become of your lady's heart.

Young F. Is he in the house yet?

Lory. No, they are capitulating with him at the gate. Sir Tunbely luckily takes him for an impostor; and I have told him that we had heard of this plot before.

Young F. That's right. [Turning to Miss HOYDEN.] My dear, here's a troublesome business my man tells me of; but don't be frightened, we shall be too hard for the rogue. Here's an impudent fellow at the gate (not knowing I was come hither incognito), has taken my name upon him, in hopes to run away with you.

Miss H. Oh, the brazen-faced varlet, it's well we are married, or may be we might never have been so.

Young F. 'Egad, like enough. [Aside.] Pr'ythee, Nurse, run to Sir Tunbely, and stop him from going to the gate before I speak with him.

Nurse. An't please your honour, my lady and I had best lock ourselves up till the danger be over.

Young F. Do so, if you please.

Miss H. Not so fast; I won't be lock'd up any more, now I'm married.

Young F. Yes, pray, my dear, do, till we have seized this rascal.

Miss H. Nay, if you'll pray me, I'll do anything. [Exit Miss HOYDEN and Nurse.]

Young F. [To LORY.] Hark you, sirrah, things are better than you imagine. The wedding's over.

Lory. The devil it is, sir! [Capers about.]

Young F. Not a word—all's safe—but Sir Tunbely don't know it, nor must he yet. So I am resolved to brazen the brunt of the business out and have the pleasure of turning the impostor upon his lordship, which I believe may easily be done.

Enter Sir TUNBELLY CLUMSY.

Did you ever hear, sir, of so impudent an undertaking?

Sir T. Never, by the mass; but we'll tickle him, I'll warrant you.

Young F. They tell me, sir, he has a great many people with him, disguised like servants.

Sir T. Ay, ay, rogues enow, but we have mastered them. We only fired a few shot over their heads, and the regiment scowered in an instant. Here, Tummas, bring in your prisoner.

Young F. If you please, Sir Tunbely, it will be best for me not to confront the fellow yet, till you have heard how far his impudence will carry him.

Sir T. 'Egad, your lordship is an ingenious person. Your lordship then will please to step aside.

Lory. 'Fore heaven, I applaud my master's modesty. [Exit with Young FASHION.]

Enter Servants, with Lord FOPPINGTON disarmed.

Sir T. Come, bring him along, bring him along.

Lord F. What the plague do you mean, gentlemen? Is it fair time, that you are all drunk before supper?

Sir T. Drunk, sirrah! here's an impudent rogue for you now. Drunk or sober, bully, I'm a justice of the peace, and know how to deal with strollers.

Lord F. Strollers!

Sir T. Ay, strollers. Come, give an account of yourself. What's your name? where do you live?

do you pay scot and lot? Come, are you a freeholder or a copyholder?

Lord F. And why dost thou ask me so many impertinent questions?

Sir T. Because I'll make you answer 'em, before I have done with you, you rascal you.

Lord F. Before Gad, all the answers I can make to them is, that you are a very extraordinary old fellow, stap my vitals!

Sir T. Nay, if thou art joking, deputy lieutenants, we know how to deal with you. Here, draw a warrant for him immediately.

Lord F. A warrant! What the devil is't thou wouldst be at, old gentleman?

Sir T. I would be at you, sirrah (if my hands were not tied as a magistrate), and with these two double fists beat your teeth down your throat, you dog you.

[Driving him.

Lord F. And why wouldst thou spoil my face at that rate?

Sir T. For your design to rob me of my daughter, villain.

Lord F. Rab thee of thy daughter! Now do I begin to believe I am in bed and asleep, and that all this is but a dream. Pr'ythee, old father, wilt thou give me leave to ask thee one question?

Sir T. I can't tell whether I will or not, till I know what it is.

Lord F. Why, then, it is, whether thou didst not write to my Lord Foppington, to come down and marry thy daughter?

Sir T. Yes, marry, did I, and my Lord Foppington is come down, and shall marry my daughter before she's a day older.

Lord F. Now give me thy hand, old dad; I thought we should understand one another at last.

Sir T. The fellow's mad—here, bind him hand and foot.

[They bind him.

Lord F. Nay, pr'ythee, knight, leave fooling; thy jest begins to grow dull.

Sir T. Bind him, I say—he's mad; bread and water, a dark room, and a whip, may bring him to his senses again.

Lord F. Pr'ythee, Sir Tunbely, why should you take such an aversion to the freedom of my address, as to suffer the rascals thus to skewer down my arms like a rabbit? 'Egad, if I don't awake, by all that I can see, this is like to prove one of the most impertinent dreams that ever I dreamt in my life.

[Aside.

Re-enter Miss HOYDEN and Nurse.

Miss H. [Going up to him.] Is this he that would have run?—Fough, how he stinks of sweets. Pray, father, let him be dragged through the horse-pond.

Lord F. This must be my wife, by her natural inclination to her husband.

[Aside.

Miss H. Pray, father, what do you intend to do with him—hang him?

Sir T. That at least, child.

Nurse. Ay, and it's e'en too good for him, too.

Lord F. Madame la gouvernante, I presume: hitherto this appears to me to be one of the most extraordinary families that ever man of quality marched into.

[Aside.

Sir T. What's become of my lord, daughter?

Miss H. He's just coming, sir.

Lord F. My lord! What does he mean by that, now?

[Aside.

Re-enter Young FASHION and LORY.

Stap my vitals, Tam! now the dream's out.

Young F. Is this the fellow, sir, that designed to trick me of your daughter?

Sir T. This is he, my lord; how do you like him? Is not he a pretty fellow to get a fortune?

Young F. I find by his dress he thought your daughter might be taken with a beau.

Miss H. Oh, gemini! Is this a beau? Let me see him again. [Surveys him.] Ha! I find a beau is no such ugly thing, neither.

Young F. 'Egad, she'll be in love with him presently—I'll e'en have him sent away to gaol. [Aside.] Sir, though your undertaking shows you a person of no extraordinary modesty, I suppose you ha'n't confidence enough to expect much favour from me?

[To Lord FOPPINGTON.

Lord F. Strike me dumb, Tam, thou art a very impudent fellow.

Nurse. Look! if the varlet has not the effrontery to call his lordship, plain Thomas.

Lord F. My Lord Foppington, shall I beg one word with your lordship?

Nurse. Ho, ho, it's my lord with him now. See how afflictions will humble folks.

Miss H. Pray, my lord, [To FASHION] don't let him whisper too close, lest he bite your ear off.

Lord F. I am not altogether so hungry as your ladyship is pleased to imagine. Look you, Tam, I am sensible I have not been so kind to you as I ought, but I hope you'll forgive what's past, and accept of the five thousand pounds I offer—thou mayst live in extreme splendour with it, stap my vitals.

[Apart to Young FASHION.

Young F. It's a much easier matter to prevent a disease than to cure it. A quarter of that sum would have secured your mistress, twice as much cannot redeem her.

[Apart—leaving him.

Sir T. Well, what says he?

Young F. Only the rascal offered me a bribe to let him go.

Sir T. Ay, he shall go, with a plague to him—lead on, constable.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here is Muster Loveless, and Muster Colonel Townly, and some ladies to wait on you.

[To Young FASHION.

Lory. So, sir, what will you do now?

[Aside.

Young F. Be quiet; they are in the plot. [Aside to Lory.] Only a few friends, Sir Tunbely, whom I wish'd to introduce to you.

Lord F. Thou art the most impudent fellow, Tam, that ever nature yet brought into the world. Sir Tunbely, strike me speechless, but these are my friends and acquaintance, and my guests, and they will soon inform thee whether I am the true Lord Foppington or not.

Enter LOVELESS, COLONEL TOWNLY, AMANDA, and BERTINIA.—LORD FOPPINGTON accosts them as they pass, but none answer him.

Young F. So, gentlemen, this is friendly; I rejoice to see you.

Col. T. My lord, we are fortunate to be the witnesses of your lordship's happiness.

Lov. But your lordship will do us the honour to introduce us to Sir Tunbely Clumsy.

Ama. And us to your lady.

Lord F. [Amazed.] Ged take me, but they are all in a story.

Sir T. Gentlemen, you do me much honour; my Lord Foppington's friends will ever be welcome to me and mine.

Young F. My love, let me introduce you to these ladies.

Miss H. By goles they look so fine and so stiff, I am almost ashamed to come nigh 'em.

Ama. A most engaging lady, indeed!

Miss H. Thank ye, ma'am.

Ber. And, I doubt not, will soon distinguish herself in the beau monde.

Miss H. Where is that?

Young F. You'll soon learn, my dear.

Lov. But, Lord Foppington—

Lord F. Sir!

Lov. Sir! I was not addressing myself to you, sir! Pray, who is this gentleman? He seems rather in a singular predicament—

Col. T. For so well-dressed a person, a little oddly circumstanced, indeed.

Sir T. Ha, ha, ha! So these are your friends and your guests, ha! my adventurer?

Lord F. I am struck dumb with their impudence, and cannot positively say whether I shall ever speak again or not.

Sir T. Why, sir, this modest gentleman wanted to pass himself upon me as Lord Foppington, and carry off my daughter.

Lov. A likely plot to succeed, truly; ha, ha!

Lord F. As Gad shall judge me, Loveless, I did not expect this from thee. Come, pr'ythee, confess the joke: tell Sir Tunbely that I am the real Lord Foppington, who yesterday made love to thy wife, was honoured by her with a slap on the face, and afterwards pinked through the body by thee.

Sir T. A likely story, truly, that a peer would behave thus!

Lov. A pretty fellow, indeed, that would scandalize the character he wants to assume; but what will you do with him, Sir Tunbely?

Sir T. Commit him, certainly, unless the bride and bridegroom choose to pardon him.

Lord F. Bride and bridegroom! for Gad's sake, Sir Tunbely, 'tis torture to me to hear you call 'em so.

Miss H. Why, you ugly thing, what would you have him call us—dog and cat?

Lord F. By no means, miss; for that sounds ten times more like man and wife than 't'other.

Sir T. A precious rogue, this, to come a wooing!

Re-enter a Servant.

Serv. There are some gentlefolks below to wait upon Lord Foppington.

Col. T. 'Sdeath, Tom, what will you do now?

[Apart to Young FASHION.]

Lord F. Now, Sir Tunbely, here are witnesses, who, I believe, are not corrupted.

Sir T. Peace, fellow! Would your lordship choose to have your guests shown here, or shall they wait till we come to 'em?

Young F. I believe, Sir Tunbely, we had better not have these visitors here yet. 'Egad, all must out.

[Aside.]

Lov. Confess, confess; we'll stand by you.

[Apart to Young FASHION.]

Lord F. Nay, Sir Tunbely, I insist on your calling evidence on both sides—and, if I do not prove that fellow an impostor—

Young F. Brother, I will save you the trouble, by now confessing that I am not what I have passed myself for. Sir Tunbely, I am a gentleman, and, I flatter myself, a man of character; but, 'tis with great pride I assure you I am not Lord Foppington.

Sir T. Ouns!—what's this?—an impostor?—a cheat?—fire and faggots, sir, if you are not Lord Foppington, who the devil are you?

Young F. Sir, the best of my condition is, I am your son-in-law; and the worst of it is, I am brother to that noble peer.

Lord F. Impudent to the last, Gad demme.

Sir T. My son-in-law! Not yet, I hope.

Young F. Pardon me, sir; thanks to the goodness of your chaplain, and the kind offices of this old gentlewoman.

Lory. 'Tis true, indeed, sir; I gave your daughter away, and Mrs. Nurse, here, was clerk.

Sir T. Knock that rascal down! But speak, Jesabel, how's this?

Nurse. Alas! your honour, forgive me! I have been overreach'd in this business as well as you. Your worship knows, if the wedding-dinner had been ready, you would have given her away with your own hands.

Sir T. But how durst you do this, without acquainting me!

Nurse. Alas! if your worship had seen how the poor thing begg'd and pray'd, and clung and twin'd about me like ivy round an old wall, you would say, I, who had nurs'd it, and rear'd it, must have had a heart like stone to refuse it.

Sir T. Ouns! I shall go mad! Unloose my lord, there, you scoundrels!

Lord F. Why, when these gentlemen are at leisure, I should be glad to congratulate you on your son-in-law with a little more freedom of address.

Miss H. 'Egad, though, I don't see which is to be my husband, after all.

Lov. Come, come, Sir Tunbely, a man of your understanding must perceive, that an affair of this kind is not to be mended by anger and reproaches.

Col. T. Take my word for it, Sir Tunbely, you are only trick'd into a son-in-law you may be proud of; my friend, Tom Fashion, is as honest a fellow as ever breath'd.

Lov. That he is, depend on't; and will hunt or drink with you most affectionately; be generous, old boy, and forgive them—

Sir T. Never. The hussy!—when I had set my heart on getting her a title.

Lord F. Now, Sir Tunbely, that I am untruss'd, give me leave to thank thee for the very extraordinary reception I have met with in thy damn'd, execrable mansion; and, at the same time, to assure you, that, of all the bumpkins and block-heads I have had the misfortune to meet with, thou art the most obstinate and egregious, strike me ugly!

Sir T. What's this? I believe you are both rogues alike.

Lord F. No, Sir Tunbely, thou wilt find, to thy unspeakable mortification, that I am the real Lord Foppington, who was to have disgraced myself by an alliance with a clod; and that thou hast match'd thy girl to a beggarly younger brother of mine, whose title-deeds might be contained in thy tobacco-box.

Sir T. Puppy! puppy!—I might prevent their being beggars, if I choose it; for I could give them as good a rent-roll as your lordship.

Lord F. Ay, old fellow, but you will not do that—for that would be acting like a Christian, and thou art a barbarian, stap my vitals!

Sir T. Udzookers! Now six such words more, and I'll forgive them directly.

Lov. 'Slife, Sir Tunbelly, you should do it, and bless yourself: ladies, what say you?

Ama. Good Sir Tunbelly, you must consent.

Ber. Come, you have been young yourself, Sir Tunbelly,

Sir T. Well, then, if I must, I must; but turn—turn that sneering lord out, however, and let me be revenged on somebody. But first look whether I am a barbarian or not; there, children, I join your hands; and, when I'm in a better humour, I'll give you my blessing.

Lov. Nobly done, Sir Tunbelly; and we shall see you dance at a grandson's christening, yet.

Miss H. By goles, though, I don't understand this; what, a'nt I to be a lady, after all? only plain Mrs. — What's my husband's name, Nurse?

Nurse. Squire Fashion.

Miss H. Squire, is he?—Well, that's better than nothing.

Lord F. Now will I put on a philosophic air, and show these people that it is not possible to put a man of my quality out of countenance. [Aside.] Dear Tam, since things have fallen out, pr'ythee give me leave to wish thee joy; I do it de bon cœur, strike me dumb! You have married into a family of great politeness and uncommon elegance of manners, and your bride appears to be a lady beautiful in person, modest in her deportment, refined in her sentiments, and of nice morality, split my windpipe!

Miss H. By goles, husband, break his bones, if he calls me names.

Young F. Your lordship may keep up your spirits with your grimace, if you please; I shall support mine, by Sir Tunbelly's favour, with this lady and three thousand pounds a year.

Lord F. Well adieu, Tam. Ladies, I kiss your hands. Sir Tunbelly, I shall now quit this thy den; but, while I retain the use of my arms, I shall ever remember thou art a demn'd horrid savage; Ged demn me! [Exit.]

Sir T. By the mass, 'tis well he's gone—for I should have been provoked, by and by, to ha' dun un a mischief. Well, if this is a lord, I think Hoyden has luck on her side, in troth.

Col. T. She has, indeed, Sir Tunbelly.—But I hear the fiddles; his lordship, I know, had provided 'em.

Lov. Oh, a dance and a bottle, Sir Tunbelly, by all means.

Sir T. I had forgot the company below; well—what—we must be merry then, ha? and dance and drink, ha? Well, 'fore George, you sha'n't say I do these things by halves. Son-in-law, thee looks a hearty rogue, so we'll have a night on't: and which of these ladies will be the old man's partner, ha?—'Ecod, I don't know how I came to be in so good a humour.

Ber. Well, Sir Tunbelly, my friend and I both will endeavour to keep you so: you have done a generous action, and are entitled to our attention. If you should be at a loss to divert your new guests, we will assist you to relate to them the plot of your daughter's marriage, and his lordship's deserved mortification; a subject which, perhaps, may afford no bad evening's entertainment.

Sir T. 'Ecod! with all my heart; though I am a main bungler at a long story.

Ber. Never fear, we will assist you, if the tale is judged worth being repeated; but of this you may be assured, that, while the intention is evidently to please, British auditors will ever be indulgent to the errors of the performance.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter LOPEZ, with a dark Lantern.

Lopez. Past three o'clock! soh! a notable hour for one of my regular disposition to be strolling like a bravo through the streets of Seville! Well, of all services, to serve a young lover is the hardest—not that I am an enemy to love; but my love and my master's differ strangely;—Don Ferdinand is much too gallant to eat, drink, or sleep;—now, my love gives me an appetite;—then I am fond of dreaming of my mistress, and I love dearly to toast her—This cannot be done without good sleep and good liquor; hence my partiality to a feather-bed and a bottle. What a pity, now, that I have not further time for reflections! but my master expects thee, honest Lopez, to secure his retreat from Donna Clara's window, as I guess—[Music without]—Hey! sure I heard music! So, so! who have we here? Oh, Don Antonio, my master's friend, come from the masquerade, to serenade my young mistress, Donna Louisa, I suppose: soh! we shall have the old gentleman up presently. Lest he should miss his son, I had best lose no time in getting to my post. [Exit.]

Enter ANTONIO and LORENZO, with Masks and Music.

SONG.—ANTONIO.

Tell me, my lute, can thy soft strain
So gently speak thy master's pain?
So softly sing, so humbly sigh,
That, though my sleeping love shall know
Who sings—who sighs below,
Her rosy slumbers shall not fly!
Thus may some vision whisper more
Than ever I dare speak before.

1 Mask. Antonio, your mistress will never wake, while you sing so dolefully: love, like a cradled infant, is lulled by a sad melody.

Ant. I do not wish to disturb her rest.

1 Mask. The reason is, because you know she does not regard you enough to appear, if you awakened her.

Ant. Nay, then, I'll convince you. [Sings.]

The breath of morn bids hence the night;
Unveil those beauteous eyes, my fair,
For till the dawn of love is there,
I feel no day, I own no light.

LOUISA—replies from a Window.

Waking, I heard thy numbers chide,
Waking, the dawn did bless my sight;
'Tis Phæbus sure that woos, I cried,
Who speaks in song, who moves in light.

DON JEROME—from another Window.

What vagabonds are these I hear
Fiddling, fluting, rhyming, ranting,
Piping, scraping, whining, canting!
Fly, scurvy minstrels, fly!

TRIO.

Louisa. Nay, pr'ythee, father, why so rough?
Ant. An humble lover I.

Jerome. How durst you, daughter, lend an ear
To such deceitful stuff?

Quick from the window, fly!

Louisa. Adieu, Antonio!

Ant. Must you go?

Louisa. } We soon, perhaps, may meet again;

Ant. } For though hard fortune is our foe,
The god of love will fight for us.

Jerome. Reach me the blunderbuss.

Ant. & L. The god of love, who knows our pain,

Jerome. Hence, or these slugs are through your brain.

[Exeunt JEROME and LOUISA from the Window.
ANTONIO and LORENZO.

SCENE II.—A Piazza.

Enter FERDINAND and LOPEZ.

Lopez. Truly, sir, I think that a little sleep, once in a week, or so—

Ferd. Peace, fool! don't mention sleep to me.

Lopez. No, no, sir, I don't mention your lowbred, vulgar, sound sleep; but I can't help thinking that a gentle slumber, or half an hour's dozing, if it were only for the novelty of the thing—

Ferd. Peace, booby, I say!—Oh Clara, dear, cruel disturber of my rest!

Lopez. And of mine, too.

Ferd. 'Sdeath! to trifle with me at such a juncture as this—now to stand on punctilios—love me! I don't believe she ever did.

Lopez. Nor I either.

Ferd. Or is it, that her sex never know their desires for an hour together?

Lopez. Ah, they know them oftener than they'll own them?

Ferd. Is there, in the world, so inconstant a creature as Clara?

Lopez. I could name one.

Ferd. Yes; the tame fool who submits to her caprice.

Lopez. I thought he couldn't miss it. [Aside.

Ferd. Is she not capricious, teasing, tyrannical, obstinate, perverse, absurd? ay, a wilderness of faults and follies; her looks are scorn, and her very smiles—'sdeath! I wish I had'n't mentioned her smiles! for she does smile with such beaming loveliness, such fascinating brightness—Oh, death and madness! I shall die if I lose her.

Lopez. Oh, those damned smiles have undone all.

AIR.—FERDINAND.

Could I her faults remember,

Forgetting every charm,

Soon would impartial Reason

The tyrant Love disarm.

But when enraged I number

Each failing of her mind,

Love still suggests each beauty,

And sees—while Reason's blind.

Lopez. Here comes Don Antonio, sir.

Ferd. Well, go you home—I shall be there presently.

Lopez. Ah, those cursed smiles! [Exit.

Enter ANTONIO.

Ferd. Antonio, Lopez tells me he left you chanting before our door. Was my father waked?

Ant. Yes, yes; he has a singular affection for music, so I left him roaring at his barred window, like the print of Bajazet in the cage. And what brings you out so early?

Ferd. I believe I told you, that to-morrow was the day fixed by Don Pedro and Clara's unnatural step-mother, for her to enter a convent, in order that her brat might possess her fortune: made desperate by this, I procured a key to the door, and bribed Clara's maid to leave it unbolted; at two this morning, I entered unperceived, and stole to her chamber. I found her waking and weeping.

Ant. Happy Ferdinand!

Ferd. 'Sdeath! hear the conclusion. I was rated as the most confident ruffian, for daring to approach her room at that hour of night.

Ant. Ay, ay, this was at first?

Ferd. No such thing; she would not hear a word from me, but threatened to raise her mother, if I did not instantly leave her.

Ant. Well, but at last?—

Ferd. At last! why, I was forced to leave the house, as I came in.

Ant. And did you do nothing to offend her?

Ferd. Nothing, as I hope to be saved! I believe,
I might snatch a dozen or two of kisses.

Ant. Was that all? Well, I think I never heard of such assurance!

Ferd. Zounds! I tell you, I behaved with the utmost respect.

Ant. O Lord! I don't mean you, but in her—but hark ye, Ferdinand, did you leave your key with them?

Ferd. Yes, the maid, who saw me out, took it from the door.

Ant. Then, my life for it, her mistress elopes after you.

Ferd. Ay, to bless my rival, perhaps. I am in a humour to suspect every body. You loved her once, and thought her an angel, as I do now.

Ant. Yes, I loved her, till I found she wouldn't love me, and then I discovered that she had'n't a good feature in her face.

AIR.

I ne'er could any lustre see
In eyes that would not look on me;
I ne'er saw nectar on a lip,
But where my own did hope to sip.
Has the maid, who seeks my heart,
Cheeks of rose, untouch'd by art?
I will own the colour true,
When yielding blushes aid their hue.

Is her hand so soft and pure?

I must press it, to be sure;

Nor can I be certain then,

Till it, grateful, press again.

Must I, with attentive eye,

Watch her heaving bosom sigh?

I will do so, when I see

That heaving bosom sigh for me.

Besides, Ferdinand, you have full security in my love for your sister. Help me there, and I can never disturb you with Clara.

Ferd. As far as I can, consistently with the honour of our family, you know I will; but there must be no eloping.

Ant. And yet, now, you would carry off Clara?

Ferd. Ah, that's a different case. We never mean that others should act to our sisters and wives, as we do to others.—But, to-morrow, Clara is to be forced into a convent.

Ant. Well, and am not I so unfortunately cir-cumstanced? To-morrow, your father forces Louisa to marry Isaac, the Portuguese—but come with me, and we'll devise something, I warrant.

Ferd. I must go home.

Ant. Well, adieu!

Ferd. But, Antonio, if you did not love my sister, you have too much honour and friendship to supplant me with Clara.

AIR.—ANTONIO.

Friendship is the bond of reason;
But if beauty disapprove,
Heaven dissolves all other treason,
In the heart that's true to love.

The faith which to my friend I swore,
As a civil oath I view;
But, to the charms which I adore,
'Tis religion to be true.

[Exit.

Ferd. There is always a levity in Antonio's manner of replying to me on this subject, that is very alarming.—Sdeath! if Clara should love him, after all.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—A Room in Don Jerome's House.

Enter LOUISA and DUENNA.

Louisa. But, my dear Margaret, my charming Duenna, do you think we shall succeed?

Duenna. I tell you again, I have no doubt on't; but it must be instantly put to the trial. Everything is prepared in your room, and for the rest, we must trust to fortune.

Louisa. My father's oath was, never to see me till I had consented to—

Duenna. 'Twas thus I overheard him say to his friend, Don Guzman—"I will demand of her to-morrow, once for all, whether she will consent to marry Isaac Mendoza: if she hesitates, I will make a solemn oath never to see or speak to her, till she returns to her duty."—These were his words.

Louisa. And on his known obstinate adherence to what he has once said, you have formed this plan for my escape. But have you secured my maid in our interest?

Duenna. She is a party in the whole; but remember, if we succeed, you resign all right and title in little Isaac, the Jew, over to me.

Louisa. That I do, with all my soul: get him, if you can, and I shall wish you joy, most heartily. He is twenty times as rich as my poor Antonio.

AIR.—LOUISA.

Thou canst not boast of fortune's store,
My love, while me they wealthy call;
But I was glad to find thee poor,
For, with my heart, I'd give thee all.
And then the grateful youth shall own,
I loved him for himself alone.

But when his worth my hand shall gain,
No word or look of mine shall show
That I the smallest thought retain
Of what my bounty did bestow.
Yet still his grateful heart shall own,
I loved him for himself alone.

Duenna. I hear Don Jerome coming. Quick, give me the last letter I brought you from Antonio,—you know that is to be the ground of my dismission. I must slip out to seal it up, as undelivered.

[Exit.—JEROME speaking within.

Enter DON JEROME and FERDINAND.

Jerome. What, I suppose, you have been serenading, too! Eh, disturbing some peaceable neighbourhood with villanous catgut, and lascivious piping! Out on't! you set your sister, here, a vile example; but I come to tell you, madam, that I'll suffer no more of these midnight incantations—these amorous orgies, that steal the senses in the hearing; as, they say, Egyptian embalmers serve mummies, extracting the brain through the ears: however, there's an end of your frolics—Isaac Mendoza will be here presently, and to-morrow you shall marry him.

Louisa. Never, while I have life.

Ferd. Indeed, sir, I wonder how you can think of such a man for a son-in-law.

Jerome. Sir, you are very kind, to favour me with your sentiments:—and, pray, what is your objection to him?

Ferd. He is a Portuguese, in the first place.

Jerome. No such thing, boy: he has forsworn his country.

Louisa. He is a Jew.

Jerome. Another mistake: he has been a Christian these six weeks.

Ferd. Ay, he left his old religion for an estate, and has not had time to get a new one.

Louisa. But stands like a dead wall between church and synagogue, or like the blank leaves between the Old and New Testament.

Jerome. Anything more?

Ferd. But the most remarkable part of his character is, his passion for deceit and tricks of cunning.

Louisa. Though at the same time the fool predominates so much over the knave, that I am told he is generally the dupe of his own art.

Ferd. True, like an unskilful gunner, he usually misses his aim, and is hurt by the recoil of his own piece.

Jerome. Anything more?

Louisa. To sum up all, he has the worst fault a husband can have—he's not my choice.

Jerome. But you are his; and choice on one side is sufficient. Two lovers should never meet in marriage. Be you sour as you please, he is sweet-tempered, and for your good fruit, there's nothing like ingrafting on a crab. Anything more?

Louisa. I detest him as a lover, and shall ten times more as a husband.

Jerome. I don't know that. Marriage generally makes a great change—but, to cut the matter short, will you have him, or not?

Louisa. There is nothing else I could disobey you in.

Jerome. Do you value your father's peace?

Louisa. So much, that I will not fasten on him the regret of making an only daughter wretched.

Jerome. Very well, ma'am; then mark me—never more will I see or converse with you till you return to your duty. No reply! This and your chamber shall be your apartments; I never will stir out, without leaving you under lock and key; and when I'm at home, no creature can approach you but through my library. Well try who can be most obstinate. Out of my sight!—there remain, till you know your duty. [Pushes her out.

Ferd. Surely, sir, my sister's inclinations should be consulted in a matter of this kind, and some regard paid to Don Antonio, being my particular friend.

Jerome. That, doubtless, is a very great recommendation. I certainly have not paid sufficient respect to it.

Ferd. There is not a man living I would sooner choose for a brother-in-law.

Jerome. Very possible; and if you happen to have e'er a sister who is not at the same time a daughter of mine, I'm sure I shall have no objection to the relationship—but at present, if you please, we'll drop the subject.

Ferd. Nay, sir, 'tis only my regard for my sister makes me speak.

Jerome. Then pray, sir, in future, let your regard for your father make you hold your tongue.

Ferd. I have done, sir—I shall only add a wish, that you would reflect what at our age you would have felt, had you been crossed in your affection for the mother of her you are so severe to.

Jerome. Why, I must confess I had a great affection for your mother's ducats, but that was all, boy. I married her for her fortune, and she took me in obedience to her father, and a very happy couple we were. We never expected any love from one another, and so we were never disappointed. If we grumbled a little now and then, it was soon over, for we were never fond enough to quarrel; and when the good woman died, why, why—I had as lieve she had lived, and I wish every widower in Seville could say the same. I shall now go and get the key of this dressing-room—so, good son, if you have any lecture in support of disobedience to give your sister, it must be brief; so make the best of your time. D'ye hear? [Exit.]

Ferd. I fear, indeed, my friend Antonio has little to hope for: however, Louisa has firmness, and my father's anger will probably only increase her affection. In our intercourse with the world, it is natural for us to dislike those who are innocently the cause of our distress; but in the heart's attachment, a woman never likes a man with ar-dour till she has suffered for his sake. [Noise.] Soh! what bustle is here! between my father and the Duenna, too. I'll e'en get out of the way. [Exit.]

Enter Don JEROME with a letter, pulling in the Duenna.

Jerome. I'm astonish'd! I'm thunder-struck! here's treachery and conspiracy with a vengeance! You, Antonio's creature, and chief manager of this plot for my daughter's eloping!—you, that I placed here as a scarecrow?

Duenna. What?

Jerome. A scarecrow—to prove a decoy-duck! What have you to say for yourself?

Duenna. Well, sir, since you have forced that letter from me, and discovered my real sentiments, I scorn to renounce them. I am Antonio's friend, and it was my intention that your daughter should have served you as all such old tyrannical sots should be served. I delight in the tender passions, and would befriend all under their influence.

Jerome. The tender passions! yes, they would become those impenetrable features! Why, thou deceitful hag I placed thee as a guard to the rich blossoms of my daughter's beauty. I thought that dragon's front of thine would cry aloof to the sons of gallantry: steel traps and spring-guns seemed writ in every wrinkle of it. But you shall quit my house this instant. The tender passions, indeed! Go, thou wanton sibyl, thou amorous woman of Endor, go!

Duenna. You base, scurrilous, old—but I won't demean myself by naming what you are. Yes, savage, I'll leave your den; but I suppose you don't mean to detain my apparel. I may have my things, I presume?

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XI.

Jerome. I took you, mistress, with your wardrobe on. What have you pilfered, eh?

Duenna. Sir, I must take leave of my mistress; she has valuables of mine; besides, my cardinal and veil are in her room.

Jerome. Your veil, forsooth! What, do you dread being gazed at? or are you afraid of your complexion? Well, go, take your leave, and get your veil and cardinal! soh! you quit the house within these five minutes. In—in—quick! [Exit Duenna.] Here was a precious plot of mischief! These are the comforts daughters bring us!

AIR.

If a daughter you have, she's the plague of your life;
No peace shall you know, though you've buried your wife:

At twenty she mocks at the duty you taught her:
O what a plague is an obstinate daughter!

Sighing and whining,

Dying and pining;

O what a plague is an obstinate daughter!

When scarce in their teens, they have wit to perplex us;

With letters and lovers for ever they vex us;

While each still rejects the fair suitor you've brought her;

O what a plague is an obstinate daughter!

Wrangling and jangling,

Flouting and pouting;

O what a plague is an obstinate daughter!

Enter LOUISA, dressed as the Duenna, with cardinal and veil, seeming to cry.

Jerome. This way, mistress; this way. What, I warrant, a tender parting! Soh! tears of turpentine down those deal cheeks. Ay, you may well hide your head. Yes, whine till your heart breaks; but I'll not hear one word of excuse—so you are right to be dumb. This way. [Pushing her out.]

Enter Duenna.

Duenna. So, speed you well, sagacious Don Jerome! Oh, rare effects of passion and obstinacy! Now shall I try whether I can't play the fine lady as well as my mistress; and, if I succeed, I may be a fine lady for the rest of my life. I'll lose no time to equip myself. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The Court before Don Jerome's House.

Enter Don JEROME and LOUISA.

Jerome. Come, mistress, there is your way. The world lies before you, so troop, thou antiquated Eve, thou original sin. Hold, yonder is some fellow skulking; perhaps it is Antonio. Go to him, d'ye hear? and tell him to make you amends, and as he has got you turned away, tell him I say it is but just he should take you himself: go. [Exit LOUISA.] Soh! I am rid of her, thank Heaven! and now I shall be able to keep my oath, and confine my daughter with better security. [Exit.]

SCENE V.—The Piazza.

Enter CLARA and her Maïa.

Maid. But where, madam, is it you intend to go?
Clara. Any where to avoid the selfish violence of my mother-in-law, and Ferdinand's insolent importunity.

Maid. Indeed, ma'am, since we have profited by Don Ferdinand's key, in making our escape, I think we had best find him, if it were only to thank him.

Clara. No: he has offended me exceedingly.

[Retires.]

Enter LOUISA.

Louisa. So, I have succeeded in being turned out of doors—but how shall I find Antonio? I dare not inquire for him, for fear of being discovered. I would send to my friend Clara, but that I doubt her prudery would condemn me.

[Apart.]

Maid. Then suppose, ma'am, you were to try if your friend, Donna Louisa, would not receive you?

[Apart to CLARA.]

Clara. No: her notions of filial duty are so severe, she would certainly betray me.

[Apart.]

Louisa. Clara is of a cold temper, and would think this step of mine highly forward.

[Apart.]

Clara. Louisa's respect for her father is so great, she would not credit the unkindness of mine.

[Apart.]

[LOUISA turns, and sees CLARA and Maid.]

Louisa. Ha! who are those? Sure one is Clara. If it be, I'll trust her.

[Advances.]

Clara. Louisa! and in masquerade, too!

Louisa. You will be more surprised when I tell you, that I have run away from my father.

Clara. Surprised indeed! and I should certainly chide you most horribly, only that I have just run away from mine.

Louisa. My dear Clara!

[Embrace.]

Clara. Dear sister! and whither are you going?

Louisa. To find the man I love, to be sure. And, I presume, you would have no aversion to meet with my brother?

Clara. Indeed I should: he has behaved so ill to me, I don't believe I shall ever forgive him.

AIR.—CLARA.

When sable night, each drooping plant restoring,

Wept o'er the flowers her breath did cheer,

As some sad widow, o'er her babe deploring,

Wakes its beauty with a tear;

When all did sleep, whose weary hearts did borrow

One hour from love and care to rest,

Lo! as I press'd my couch in silent sorrow,

My lover caught me to his breast:

He vow'd he came to save me

From those who would enslave me!

Then kneeling,

Kisses stealing,

Endless faith he swore;

But soon I chid him thence,

For had his fond pretence

Obtain'd one favour then,

And he had press'd again,

I fear'd my treacherous heart might grant him more.

Louisa. Well, for all this, I would have sent him to plead his pardon, but that I would not yet awhile have him know of my flight. And where do you hope to find protection?

Clara. The Lady Abbess of the convent of St. Catherine is a relation and kind friend of mine. I shall be secure with her, and you had best go thither with me.

Louisa. No; I am determined to find Antonio first; and, as I live, here comes the very man I will employ to seek him for me.

Clara. Who is he? he's a strange figure!

Louisa. Yes; that sweet creature is the man whom my father has fixed on for my husband.

Clara. And will you speak to him? Are you mad?

Louisa. He is the fittest man in the world for my purpose; for, though I was to have married him to-morrow, he is the only man in Seville, who, I am sure, never saw me in his life.

Clara. And how do you know him?

Louisa. He arrived but yesterday, and he was shown to me from the window, as he visited my father.

Clara. Well, I'll begone.

Louisa. Hold, my dear Clara: a thought has struck me. Will you give me leave to borrow your name, as I see occasion?

Clara. It will but disgrace you—but use it as you please. I dare not stay—[Going]—but, Louisa, if you should see your brother, be sure you don't inform him that I have taken refuge with the Dame Prior of the convent of St. Catherine, on the left hand side of the Piazza, which leads to the church of St. Anthony.

Louisa. Ha! ha! ha! I'll be very particular in my directions where he may not find you. [Exeunt CLARA and Maid.] So! my swain, yonder has done admiring himself, and draws nearer.

Enter ISAAC and CARLOS, ISAAC with a pocket-glass.

Isaac. [Looking in the glass.] I tell you, friend Carlos, I will please myself in the habit of my chin.

Carlos. But, my dear friend, how can you think to please a lady with such a face?

Isaac. Why, what's the matter with the face? I think it is a very engaging face; and, I am sure, a lady must have very little taste, who could dislike my beard. [Sees LOUISA.] See now!—I'll die if here is not a little damsel struck with it already.

Louisa. Signior, are you disposed to oblige a lady, who greatly wants your assistance? [Unveils.]

Isaac. Egad, a very pretty black-eyed girl! She has certainly taken a fancy to me, Carlos. First, ma'am, I must beg the favour of your name.

Louisa. So! it's well I am provided. [Aside.] My name, sir, is Donna Clara d'Almanza.

Isaac. What!—Don Guzman's daughter? I faith, I just now heard she was missing.

Louisa. But sure, sir, you have too much gallantry and honour to betray me, whose fault is love?

Isaac. So! a passion for me! Poor girl! Why, ma'am, as for betraying you, I don't see how I could get anything by it; so you may rely on my honour; but as for your love, I am sorry your case is so desperate.

Louisa. Why so, signior?

Isaac. Because I am positively engaged to another—an't I, Carlos?

Louisa. Nay, but hear me.

Isaac. No, no; what should I hear for? It is impossible for me to court you in an honourable way; and, for anything else, if I were to comply now, I suppose you have some ungrateful brother, or cousin, who would want to cut my throat for my civility: so, truly, you had best go home again.

Louisa. Odious wretch! [Aside.] But, good signior, it is Antonio d'Ercilla, on whose account I have eloped.

Isaac. How! what! It is not with me, then, that you are in love?

Louisa. No, indeed, it is not.

Isaac. Then you are a forward, impertinent simpleton, and I shall certainly acquaint your father.

Louisa. Is this your gallantry?

Isaac. Yet, hold—Antonio d'Ercilla, did you say. Egad, I may make something of this—Antonio d'Ercilla?

Louisa. Yes; and if ever you hope to prosper in love, you will bring me to him.

Isaac. By St. Iago, and I will, too. Carlos, this Antonio is one who rivals me (as I have heard) with Louisa. Now, if I could hamper him with this girl, I should have the field to myself. Eh, Carlos! A lucky thought, isn't it?

Carlos. Yes, very good—very good.

Isaac. Ah! this little brain is never at a loss. Cunning Isaac! cunning rogue! Donna Clara, will you trust yourself awhile to my friend's discretion?

Louisa. May I rely on you, good signior?

Carlos. Lady, it is impossible I should deceive you.

AIR.

Had I a heart for falsehood framed,
I ne'er could injure you;
For though your tongue no promise claim'd,
Your charms would make me true.
To you no soul shall bear deceit,
No stranger offer wrong;
But friends in all the aged you'll meet,
And lovers in the young.

But when they learn that you have blest
Another with your heart,
They'll bid aspiring passions rest,
And act a brother's part.
Then, lady, dread not here deceit,
Nor fear to suffer wrong;
For friends in all the aged you'll meet,
And brothers in the young.

Isaac. Conduct the lady to my lodgings, Carlos: I must haste to Don Jerome. Perhaps you know Louisa, ma'am. She is divinely handsome, isn't she?

Louisa. You must excuse me not joining with you.

Isaac. Why, I have heard it on all hands.

Louisa. Her father is uncommonly partial to her; but I believe you will find she has rather a matronly air.

Isaac. Carlos, this is all envy: you pretty girls never speak well of one another. Hark ye, find out Antonio, and I'll saddle him with this scrape, I warrant! Oh, 'twas the luckiest thought! Donna Clara, your very obedient—Carlos, to your post.

DUET.

Isaac. My mistress expects me, and I must to her,

Or how can I hope for a smile?

Louisa. Soon may you return a prosperous wooer,
But think what I suffer the while:

Alone, and away from the man whom I love,

In strangers I'm forced to confide.

Isaac. Dear lady, my friend you may trust, and he'll prove,

Your servant, protector, and guide.

AIR.—CARLOS.

Gentle maid, ah! why suspect me?

Let me serve thee—then reject me.

Canst thou trust, and I deceive thee?
Art thou sad, and shall I grieve thee?
Gentle maid, ah! why suspect me?
Let me serve thee—then reject me.

TRIO.

Louisa. Never may'st thou happy be,
If in aught thou'rt false to me.

Isaac. Never may he happy be,
If in aught he's false to thee.

Carlos. Never may I happy be,
If in aught I'm false to thee.

Louisa. Never may'st thou, &c.

Isaac. Never may he, &c.

Carlos. Never may I, &c. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Library in Don JEROME's House.

Enter Don JEROME and ISAAC.

Jerome. Ha! ha! ha! Run away from her father! Has she given him the slip? Ha! ha! ha! Poor Don Guzman!

Isaac. Ay; and I am to conduct her to Antonio; by which means, you see, I shall hamper him so that he can give me no disturbance with your daughter. This is trap, isn't it? A nice stroke of cunning, eh?

Jerome. Excellent! excellent! Yes, yes, carry her to him; hamper him, by all means. Ha! ha! ha! poor Don Guzman! An old fool! imposed on by a girl!

Isaac. Nay, they have the cunning of serpents, that's the truth on't.

Jerome. Psha! they are cunning only when they have fools to deal with. Why don't my girl play me such a trick? Let her cunning overreach my caution, I say—eh! little Isaac!

Isaac. True, true; or let me see any of the sex make a fool of me. No, no, egad, little Solomon (as my aunt used to call me) understands tricking a little too well.

Jerome. Ay, but such a driveller as Don Guzman—

Isaac. And such a dupe as Antonio—

Jerome. True; sure never were seen such a couple of credulous simpletons; but come, 'tis time you should see my daughter. You must carry on the siege by yourself, friend Isaac.

Isaac. Sir, you'll introduce—

Jerome. No—I have sworn a solemn oath not to see or speak to her till she renounces her disobedience: win her to that, and she gains a father and a husband at once.

Isaac. 'Gad, I shall never be able to deal with her alone. Nothing keeps me in such awe as perfect beauty; now there is something consoling and encouraging in ugliness.

SONG.

Give Isaac the nymph who no beauty can boast,
But health and good-humour to make her his toast:
If straight, I don't mind whether slender or fat,
And six feet or four—we'll ne'er quarrel for that.

Whate'er her complexion, I vow I don't care ;
If brown it is lasting, more pleasing if fair ;
And though in her face I no dimples should see,
Let her smile, and each dell is a dimple to me.

Let her locks be the reddest that ever were seen,
And her eyes may be e'en any colour but green ;
Be they light, gray, or black, their lustre and hue,
I swear I've no choice, only let her have two.

Tis true, I'd dispense with a throne on her back ;
And white teeth, I own, are genteeler than black ;
A little round chin, too, 's a beauty, I've heard ;
But I only desire she may not have a beard.

Jerome. You will change your note, my friend, when you've seen Louisa.

Isaac. Oh, Don Jerome, the honour of your alliance—

Jerome. Ay, but her beauty will affect you. She is, though I say it, who am her father, a very prodigy. There you will see features ! with an eye like mine—yes, i'faith, there is a kind of wicked sparkling—something of a roguish brightness, that shows her to be my own.

Isaac. Pretty rogue !

Jerome. Then, when she smiles, you'll see a little dimple in one cheek only ; a beauty it is certainly, yet you shall not say which is prettiest, the cheek with the dimple or the cheek without.

Isaac. Pretty rogue !

Jerome. Then the roses 'on those cheeks are shaded with a sort of velvet down, that gives a delicacy to the glow of health.

Isaac. Pretty rogue !

Jerome. Her skin pure dimity, yet more fair, being spangled here and there with a golden freckle.

Isaac. Charming pretty rogue ! Pray how is the tone of her voice ?

Jerome. Remarkably pleasing—but if you could prevail on her to sing, you would be enchanted. She is a nightingale—a Virginia nightingale—but come, come ; her maid shall conduct you to her antechamber.

Isaac. Well, egad, I'll pluck up resolution, and meet her frowns intrepidly.

Jerome. Ay ! woo her briskly—win her, and give me a proof of your address, my little Solomon.

Isaac. But hold—I expect my friend Carlos to call on me here. If he comes, will you send him to me ?

Jerome. I will. Lauretta, come—she'll show you to the room. What ! do you droop ? here's a mournful face to make love with ! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—LOUISA'S Dressing-room.

Enter Maid and ISAAC.

Maid. Sir, my mistress will wait on you presently.

Isaac. When she's at leisure—don't hurry her. [Exit Maid.] I wish I had ever practised a love scene !—I doubt I shall make a poor figure. I couldn't be more afraid, if I was going before the Inquisition. So ! the door opens—yes, she's coming—the very rustling of her silk has a disdainful sound.

Enter Duenna, dressed as LOUISA.

Now dar'n't I look round, for the soul of me :—her beauty will certainly strike me dumb, if I do. I wish she'd speak first.

Duenna. Sir, I attend your pleasure.

Isaac. So ! the ice is broke, and a pretty civil beginning, too ! Hem ! madam—miss—I'm all attention.

Duenna. Nay, sir, 'tis I who should listen, and you propose.

Isaac. Egad, this isn't so disdainful, neither. I believe I may venture to look. No—I dar'n't—one glance of those roguish sparklers would fix me again.

Duenna. You seem thoughtful, sir. Let me persuade you to sit down.

Isaac. So, so ; she mollifies apace—she's struck with my figure ! This attitude has had its effect.

Duenna. Come, sir, here's a chair.

Isaac. Madam, the greatness of your goodness overpowers me. That a lady so lovely should deign to turn her beauteous eyes on me—

[She takes his hand—he turns, and sees her.]

Duenna. You seem surprised at my condescension.

Isaac. Why, yes, madam, I am a little surprised at it. Zounds ! this can never be Louisa :—she's as old as my mother ! [Aside.]

Duenna. But former prepossessions give way to my papa's commands.

Isaac. [Aside.] Her papa ! Yes, 'tis she, then. Lord ! Lord ! how blind some parents are !

Duenna. Signior Isaac.

Isaac. Truly, the little damsel was right :—she has rather a matronly air, indeed ! Ah ! 'tis well my affections are fixed on her fortune, and not her person.

Duenna. Signior, won't you sit ? [She sits.]

Isaac. Pardon me, madam ; I have scarce recovered my astonishment at—your condescension, madam. She has the devil's own dimples, to be sure ! [Aside.]

Duenna. I do not wonder, sir, that you are surprised at my affability. I own, signior, that I was vastly prepossessed against you, and being teased by my papa, I did give some encouragement to Antonio ; but then, sir, you were described to me as quite a different person.

Isaac. Ay, and so were you to me, upon my soul, madam.

Duenna. But when I saw you, I was never more struck in my life.

Isaac. That was just my case too, madam : I was struck all on a heap, for my part.

Duenna. Well, sir, I see our misapprehension has been mutual. You expected to find me haughty and averse, and I was taught to believe you a little, black, snub-nosed fellow, without person, manners, or address.

Isaac. Egad, I wish she had answered her picture as well.

Duenna. But, sir, your air is noble—something so liberal in your carriage, with so penetrating an eye, and so bewitching a smile !

Isaac. Egad, now I look at her again, I don't think she is so ugly.

Duenna. So little like a Jew, and so much like a gentleman !

Isaac. Well, certainly, there is something pleasing in the tone of her voice.

Duenna. You will pardon this breach of decorum in praising you thus ; but my joy in being so agreeably deceived has given me such a flow of spirits !

Isaac. O, dear lady, may I thank those dear lips for this goodness? [Kisses her.] Why, she has a pretty sort of velvet down, that's the truth on't!

[Aside.]

Duenna. O, sir, you have the most insinuating manner: but indeed you should get rid of that odious beard—one might as well kiss an hedgehog.

Isaac. Yes, ma'am, the razor wouldn't be amiss—for either of us. [Aside.] Could you favour me with a song?

Duenna. Willingly, sir, though I am rather hoarse.—Ahem! [Begins to sing.]

Isaac. Very like a Virginia nightingale! Ma'am, I perceive you're hoarse—I beg you will not distress—

Duenna. Oh, not in the least distressed. Now sir.

SONG.

When a tender maid
Is first assay'd
By some admiring swain,
How her blushes rise,
If she meets his eyes,
While he unfolds his pain!
If he takes her hand, she trembles quite;
Touch her lips, and she swoons outright,
While a pit-a-pat, &c.
Her heart avows her fright.
But in time appear
Fewer signs of fear,—
The youth she boldly views;
If her hand he grasps,
Or her bosom clasps,
No mantle blush ensues.
Then to church well pleased the lovers move,
While her smiles her contentment prove,
And a pit-a-pat, &c.
Her heart avows her love.

Isaac. Charming, ma'am! Enchanting! and, truly, your notes put me in mind of one that's very dear to me; a lady, indeed, whom you greatly resemble!

Duenna. How! is there, then, another so dear to you?

Isaac. O, no, ma'am,—you mistake; it was my mother I meant.

Duenna. Come, sir, I see you are amazed and confounded at my condescension, and know not what to say!

Isaac. It is very true, indeed, ma'am; but it is a judgment, I look on it as a judgment on me, for delaying to urge the time when you'll permit me to complete my happiness, by acquainting Don Jerome with your condescension.

Duenna. Sir, I must frankly own to you, that I can never be yours with my papa's consent.

Isaac. Good lack! how so?

Duenna. When my father in his passion, swore he would never see me again till I acquiesced in his will, I also made a vow, that I would never take a husband from his hand: nothing shall make me break that oath: but, if you have spirit and contrivance enough to carry me off without his knowledge, I'm yours.

Isaac. Hum!

Duenna. Nay, sir, if you hesitate—

Isaac. I'faith, no bad whim this. If I take her at her word, I shall secure her fortune, and avoid making any settlement in return: thus, I shall not only cheat the lover, but the father too. Oh, cunning rogue, Isaac! Ay, ay, let this little brain alone. Egad, I'll take her in the mind.

Duenna. Well, sir, what's your determination

Isaac. Madam, I was dumb only from rapture. I applaud your spirit, and joyfully close with your proposal; for which, thus let me on this lily hand express my gratitude.

Duenna. Well, sir, you must get my father's consent to walk with me in the garden. But by no means inform him of my kindness to you.

Isaac. No, to be sure; that would spoil all: but, trust me, when tricking is the word—let me alone for a piece of cunning: this very day you shall be out of his power.

Duenna. Well, I leave the management of it all to you. I perceive plainly, sir, that you are not one that can be easily outwitted.

Isaac. Egad, you're right, madam—you're right, i'faith.

Enter Maid.

Maid. Here's a gentleman at the door, who begs permission to speak with Signior Isaac.

Isaac. A friend of mine, ma'am, and a trusty friend—let him come in. [Exit Maid.] He is one to be depended on, ma'am.

Enter CARLOS.

So, coz. [Aside.]

Carlos. I have left Donna Clara at your lodging—
—but can no where find Antonio.

Isaac. Well, I will search him out myself. Carlos, you rogue, I thrive, I prosper.

Carlos. Where is your mistress?

Isaac. There, you booby, there she stands.

Carlos. Why, she's damned ugly!

Isaac. Hush! [Stops his mouth.]

Duenna. What is your friend saying, signior?

Isaac. Oh, ma'am, he is expressing his raptures at such charms as he never saw before,—eh, Carlos?

Carlos. Ay, such as I never saw before, indeed!

Duenna. You are a very obliging gentleman. Well, Signior Isaac, I believe we had better part for the present. Remember our plan.

Isaac. Oh, ma'am, it is written in my heart, fixed as the image of those divine beauties, Adieu, idol of my soul!—yet once more permit me—

[Kisses her.]

Duenna. Sweet, courteous sir, adieu!

Isaac. Your slave eternally. Come, Carlos, say something civil at taking leave.

Carlos. I'faith, Isaac, she is the hardest woman to compliment I ever saw: however, I'll try something I had studied for the occasion.

SONG.

Ah! sure a pair was never seen,

So justly form'd to meet by nature:

The youth excelling so in mien,

The maid in ev'ry grace of feature.

Oh, how happy are such lovers,

When kindred beauties each discovers!

For surely she

Was made for thee,

And thou to bless this lovely creature.

So mild your looks, your children thence

Will early learn the task of duty;

The boys with all their father's sense,

The girls with all their mother's beauty.

Oh! how happy to inherit
At once such graces and such spirit!
Thus while you live
May fortune give
Each blessing equal to your merit!

[Exeunt.]SCENE III.—*A Library.*JEROME and FERDINAND discovered.

Jerome. Object to Antonio? I have said it: his poverty, can you acquit him of that?

Ferd. Sir, I own he is not over rich; but he is of as ancient and honourable a family as any in the kingdom.

Jerome. Yes, I know the beggars are a very ancient family in most kingdoms; but never in great repute, boy.

Ferd. Antonio, sir, has many amiable qualities.

Jerome. But he is poor. Can you clear him of that, I say? Is he not a gay, dissipated rake, who has squandered his patrimony?

Ferd. Sir, he inherited but little; and that, his generosity, more than his profuseness, has stripped him of; but he has never sullied his honour, which, with his title, has outlived his means.

Jerome. Pshaw! you talk like a blockhead! Nobility, without an estate, is as ridiculous as gold-lace on a frize coat.

Ferd. This language, sir, would better become a Dutch or English trader, than a Spaniard.

Jerome. Yes; and those Dutch and English traders, as you call them, are the wiser people. Why, booby, in England, they were formerly as nice, as to birth and family, as we are; but they have long discovered what a wonderful purifier gold is; and now, no one there regards pedigree in anything but a horse. Oh, here comes Isaac!

I hope he has prospered in his suit.

Ferd. Doubtless, that agreeable figure of his must have helped his suit surprisingly.

Jerome. How now? [FERDINAND walks aside.]

Enter ISAAC.

Well, my friend, have you softened her?

Isaac. Oh, yes; I have softened her.

Jerome. What, does she come to?

Isaac. Why, truly, she was kinder than I expected to find her.

Jerome. And the dear little angel was civil, eh?

Isaac. Yes, the pretty little angel was very civil.

Jerome. I'm transported to hear it.

Isaac. Ay, and if all the family were transported, it would not signify. [Aside.]

Jerome. Well, and you were astonished at her beauty, eh?

Isaac. I was astonished, indeed! Pray, how old is miss?

Jerome. How old? Let me see—eight and twelve: she is twenty.

Isaac. Twenty?

Jerome. Ay, to a month.

Isaac. Then, upon my soul, she is the oldest-looking girl of her age in Christendom!

Jerome. Do you think so? but, I believe, you will not see a prettier girl.

Isaac. Here and there one.

Jerome. Louisa has the family face.

Isaac. Yes, egad, I should have taken it for a family face, and one that has been in the family some time, too. [Aside.]

Jerome. She has her father's eyes.

Isaac. Truly, I should have guessed them to have been so. If she had her mother's spectacles, I believe she would not see the worse. [Aside.]

Jerome. Her aunt Ursula's nose, and her grandmother's forehead, to a hair.

Isaac. Ay, 'faith, and her grandfather's chin, to a hair. [Aside.]

Jerome. Well, if she was but as dutiful as she's handsome—and hark ye, friend Isaac, she is none of your made-up beauties—her charms are of the lasting kind.

Isaac. I'faith, so they should; for if she be but twenty now, she may double her age before her years will overtake her face.

Jerome. Why, zounds, Master Isaac! you are not sneering, are you?

Isaac. Why now, seriously, Don Jerome, do you think your daughter handsome?

Jerome. By this light, she's as handsome a girl as any in Seville.

Isaac. Then, by these eyes, I think her as plain a woman as ever I beheld.

Jerome. By St. Iago, you must be blind.

Isaac. No, no; 'tis you are partial.

Jerome. How! have I neither sense nor taste? If a fair skin, fine eyes, teeth of ivory, with a lovely bloom, and a delicate shape,—if these, with a heavenly voice, and a world of grace, are not charms, I know not what you call beautiful.

Isaac. Good lack! with what eyes a father sees! As I have life, she is the very reverse of all this. As for the dimity skin you told me of, I swear, 'tis as thorough nankeen as ever I saw! For her eyes, their utmost merit is not squinting! For her teeth, where there is one of ivory, its neighbour is pure ebony; black and white alternately, just like the keys of an harpsichord. Then, as to her singing, and heavenly voice—by this hand, she has a shrill, cracked pipe, that sounds, for all the world, like a child's trumpet.

Jerome. Why, you little Hebrew scoundrel, do you mean to insult me? Out of my house, I say!

Ferd. Dear sir, what's the matter?

Jerome. Why, this Israelite here has the impudence to say your sister's ugly.

Ferd. He must be either blind or insolent.

Isaac. So, I find they are all in a story. Egad, I believe I have gone too far!

Ferd. Sure, sir, there must be some mistake: it can't be my sister whom he has seen.

Jerome. 'Sdeath! you are as great a fool as he! What mistake can there be? Did not I lock up Louisa, and hav'n't I the key in my own pocket? And didn't her maid show him into the dressing-room? And yet you talk of a mistake! No, the Portuguese meant to insult me! and, but that this roof protects him, old as I am, this sword should do me justice.

Isaac. I must get off as well as I can: her fortune is not the less handsome.

DUET.

Isaac. Believe me, good sir, I ne'er meant to offend;
My mistress I love, and I value my friend:
To win her, and wed her, is still my request,
For better, for worse, and I swear I don't jest.

Jerome. Zounds! you'd best not provoke me, my rage is so high.

Isaac. Hold him fast, I beseech you, his rage is so high.

Good sir, you're too hot, and this place I must fly.

Jerome. You're a knave and a sot, and this place you'd best fly.

Isaac. Don Jerome, come now, let us lay aside all joking, and be serious.

Jerome. How?

Isaac. Ha! ha! ha! I'll be hanged if you hav'n't taken my abuse of your daughter seriously.

Jerome. You meant it so, did not you?

Isaac. O mercy, no! a joke—just to try how angry it would make you.

Jerome. Was that all, if faith? I didn't know you had been such a wag. Ha! ha! ha! By St. Iago! you made me very angry, though. Well, and you do think Louisa handsome?

Isaac. Handsome! Venus de Medicis was a sibyl to her.

Jerome. Give me your hand, you little jocose rogue. Egad, I thought we had been all off.

Ferd. So! I was in hopes this would have been a quarrel; but I find the Jew is too cunning.

Jerome. Ay, this gust of passion has made me dry—I am seldom ruffled. Order some wine in the next room. Let us drink the poor girl's health. Poor Louisa! ugly, eh! Ha! ha! ha! 'Twas a very good joke, indeed!

Isaac. And a very true one, for all that.

Jerome. And, Ferdinand, I insist upon your drinking success to my friend.

Ferd. Sir, I will drink success to my friend, with all my heart,

Jerome. Come, little Solomon, if any sparks of anger had remained, this would be the only way to quench them.

TRIO.

A bumper of good liquor
Will end a contest quicker
Than justice, judge, or vicar.
So fill a cheerful glass,
And let good humour pass;
But if more deep the quarrel,
Why, sooner drain the barrel,
Than be the hateful fellow,
That's crabbed when he's mellow.
A bumper, &c. [Ereunt.]

SCENE IV.—ISAAC'S Lodgings.

Enter LOUISA.

Louisa. Was ever truant daughter so whimsically circumstanced as I am! I have sent my intended husband to look after my lover—the man of my father's choice is gone to bring me the man of my own: but how dispiriting is this interval of expectation!

Enter CARLOS.

So, friend, is Antonio found?

Carlos. I could not meet with him, lady; but I doubt not, my friend Isaac will be here with him presently.

Louisa. Oh, shame! you have used no diligence. Is this your courtesy to a lady, who has trusted herself to your protection?

Carlos. Indeed, madam, I have not been remiss.

Louisa. Well, well; but if either of you had known how each moment of delay weighs upon the heart of her who loves, and waits the object of her love, oh, ye would not then have trifled thus!

Carlos. Alas, I know it well!

Louisa. Were you ever in love, then?

Carlos. I was, lady; but, while I have life, will never be again.

Louisa. Was your mistress so cruel?

Carlos. If she had always been so, I should have been happier.

SONG.

O, had my love ne'er smiled on me,
I ne'er had known such anguish;
But think how false, how cruel she,
To bid me cease to languish—
To bid me hope her hand to gain,
Breathe on a flame half perish'd;
And then, with cold and fix'd disdain,
To kill the hope she cherish'd.

Not worse his fate, who on a wreck,
That drove as winds did blow it,
Silent had left the shatter'd deck,
To find a grave below it.
Then land was cried—no more resign'd,
He glow'd with joy to hear it;
Not worse his fate, his woe, to find
The wreck must sink ere near it.

Louisa. As I live, here is your friend coming with Antonio. I'll retire for a moment, to surprise him. [Exit.]

Enter ISAAC and ANTONIO.

Ant. Indeed, my good friend, you must be mistaken. Clara d'Almanza in love with me, and employ you to bring me to meet her! It is impossible!

Isaac. That you shall see in an instant. Carlos, where is the lady? In the next room, is she?

Ant. Nay, if that lady is really here, she certainly wants me to conduct her to a dear friend of mine, who has long been her lover.

Isaac. Pshaw! I tell you 'tis no such thing. You are the man she wants, and nobody but you. Here's ado to persuade you to take a pretty girl that's dying for you!

Ant. But I have no affection for this lady.

Isaac. And you have for Louisa, eh? but, take my word for it, Antonio, you have no chance there—so you may as well secure the good that offers itself to you.

Ant. And could you reconcile it to your conscience, to supplant your friend?

Isaac. Pish! Conscience has no more to do with gallantry, than it has with politics. Why, you are no honest fellow, if love can't make a rogue of you—so come, do go in, and speak to her, at least.

Ant. Well, I have no objection to that.

Isaac. [Opens the door.] There—there she is, yonder by the window. Get in, do. [Pushes him in, and half shuts the door.] Now, Carlos, now I shall hamper him, I warrant. Stay, I'll peep how they go on. Egad, he looks confoundedly posed:—now she's coaxing him:—see, Carlos, he begins to come to. Ay, ay, he'll soon forget his conscience.

Carlos. Look:—now they are both laughing!

Isaac. Ay, so they are. Yes, yes, they are laughing at that dear friend he talked of. Ay, poor devil, they have outwitted him.

Carlos. Now he's kissing her hand.

Isaac. Yes, yes, 'faith, they're agreed:—he's caught, he's entangled. My dear Carlos, we have brought it about. O this little cunning head! I'm a Machiavel—a very Machiavel.

Carlos. I hear somebody inquiring for you. I'll see who it is. [Exit CARLOS.]

Enter ANTONIO and LOUISA.

Ant. Well, my good friend, this lady has so entirely convinced me of the certainty of your success at Don Jerome's, that I now resign my pretensions there.

Isaac. You never did a wiser thing, believe me—and, as for deceiving your friend, that's nothing at all. Tricking is all fair in love, isn't it, madam?

Louisa. Certainly, sir, and I am particularly glad to find you are of that opinion.

Isaac. O lud! yes, ma'am. Let any one outwit me that can, I say—but here, let me join your hands.—There, you lucky rogue! I wish you happily married, from the bottom of my soul!

Louisa. And I am sure if you wish it, no one else should prevent it.

Isaac. Now, Antonio, we are rivals no more; so let us be friends, will you?

Ant. With all my heart, Isaac.

Isaac. It is not every man, let me tell you, that would have taken such pains, or been so generous to a rival.

Ant. No, faith; I don't believe there's another beside yourself in all Spain.

Isaac. Well, but you resign all pretensions to the other lady!

Ant. That I do, most sincerely.

Isaac. I doubt you have a little hankering there still.

Ant. None in the least, upon my soul.

Isaac. I mean after her fortune.

Ant. No, believe me. You are heartily welcome to everything she has.

Isaac. Well, 'faith, you have the best of the bargain, as to beauty, twenty to one. Now I'll tell you a secret:—I am to carry off Louisa this very evening.

Louisa. Indeed!

Isaac. Yes: she has sworn not to take a husband from her father's hand—so, I've persuaded him to trust her to walk with me in the garden, and then we shall give him the slip.

Louisa. And is Don Jerome to know nothing of this?

Isaac. O lud, no! There lies the jest. Don't you see that, by this step, I overreach him? I shall be entitled to the girl's fortune, without settling a ducat on her. Ha! ha! ha! This is trap!—I'm a cunning dog, an't I? A sly little villain, eh?

Ant. Ha! ha! you are, indeed

Isaac. Roguish, you'll say; but keen, eh?—devilish keen.

Ant. So you are, indeed—keen—very keen.

Isaac. And what a laugh we shall have at Don Jerome, when the truth comes out! eh?

Louisa. Yes, I'll answer for it, we shall have a good laugh when the truth comes out. Ha! ha! ha!

Enter CARLOS.

Carlos. Here are the dancers come to practise the fandango you intended to have honoured Donna Louisa with Isaac. O, I sha'n't want them; but as I must pay them, I'll see a caper for my money. Will you excuse me?

Louisa. Willingly.

Isaac. Here's my friend, whom you may command for any services. Madam, your most obedient—Antonio, I wish you all happiness. Oh, the easy blockhead! what a tool I have made of him!—This was a master-piece! [Aside.] [Exit.]

Louisa. Carlos, will you be my guard again, and convey me to the convent of St. Catharine?

Ant. Why, Louisa—why should you go there?

Louisa. I have my reasons, and you must not be seen to go with me. I shall write from thence to my father: perhaps, when he finds what he has driven me to, he may relent.

Ant. I have no hope from him. O Louisa! in these arms should be your sanctuary.

Louisa. Be patient but for a little while:—my father cannot force me from thence. But let me see you there before evening, and I will explain myself.

Ant. I shall obey.

Louisa. Come, friend. Antonio, Carlos has been a lover himself.

Ant. Then he knows the value of his trust.

Carlos. You shall not find me unfaithful.

TRIO.

Soft pity never leaves the gentle breast
Where love has been received a welcome guest:
As wandering saints poor huts have sacred made,
He hallows every heart he once has sway'd;
And when his presence we no longer share,
Still leaves compassion as a relic there. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter JEROME and Servant.

Jerome. Why, I never was so amazed in my life! Louisa gone off with Isaac Mendoza! What! steal away with the very man whom I wanted her to marry!—elope with her own husband, as it were!—it is impossible!

Serv. Her maid says, sir, they had your leave to walk in the garden, while you were abroad. The door by the shrubbery was found open, and they have not been heard of since. [Exit.]

Jerome. Well, it is the most unaccountable affair! 'Sdeath! there is certainly some infernal mystery in it, I can't comprehend!

Enter Servant, with a letter.

Serv. Here is a letter, sir, from Signior Isaac.

[Exit.]

Jerome. So, so, this will explain—ay, Isaac Mendoza—let me see—

[Reads.]

"Dear st sir,

"You must, doubtless, be much surprised at my flight with your daughter.—[Yes, 'faith, and well I may!—I had the happiness to gain her heart at our first interview.—[The devil you had!—But she having unfortunately made a vow not to receive a husband from your hands, I was obliged to comply with her whim.—[So, so!—We shall shortly throw ourselves at your feet, and I hope you will have a blessing ready for one, who will then be

"Your son-in-law,
"ISAAC MENDOZA."

A whim, eh? Why, the devil's in the girl, I think! This morning, she would sooner die than have him, and before evening, she runs away with him! Well, well, my will's accomplished—let the motive be what it will—and the Portuguese, sure, will never refuse to fulfil the rest of the article.

Enter Second Servant, with a Letter.

Serv. Sir, here's a man below, who says he brought this from my young lady, Donna Louisa.

[Exit.

Jerome. How? yes, it is my daughter's hand, indeed! Lord, there was no occasion for them both to write: well, let's see what she says—

[Reads.

"My dearest Father,

"How shall I entreat your pardon for the rash step I have taken?—how confess the motive?—[Pish! hasn't Isaac just told me the motive? One would think they weren't together when they wrote.]—If I have a spirit too resentful of ill-usage, I have also a heart as easily affected by kindness—[So, so, here the whole matter comes out! Her resentment for Antonio's ill-usage has made her sensible of Isaac's kindness. Yes, yes, it is all plain enough—well]—I am not married yet, though with a man, I am convinced, adores me—[Yes, yes, I dare say Isaac is very fond of her]—But I shall anxiously expect your answer, in which, should I be so fortunate as to receive your consent, you will make completely happy,

"Your ever affectionate daughter,

"LOUISA."

My consent? to be sure she shall have it! Egad, I was never better pleased. I have fulfilled my resolution—I knew I should. Oh, there's nothing like obstinacy—Lewis!

Enter Servant.

Let the man, who brought the last letter, wait; and get me a pen and ink below. I am impatient to set poor Louisa's heart at rest. Holloa! Lewis! Sancho!

Enter Servants.

See, that there be a noble supper provided in the saloon to-night—serve up my best wines, and let me have music, d'ye hear?

Serv. Yes, sir.

[Exeunt.

Jerome. And order all my doors to be thrown open—admit all guests, with masks or without masks—I'faith, we'll have a night of it. And I'll let them see how merry an old man can be.

SONG.

Oh, the days when I was young,
When I laugh'd in fortune's spite,
Talk'd of love the whole day long,
And with nectar crown'd the night!
Then it was, old father Care,
Little reck'd I of thy frown;
Half thy malice youth could bear,
And the rest a bumper drown.

Truth, they say, lies in a well,
Why, I vow, I ne'er could see;
Let the water-drinkers tell,
There it always lay for me:

For when sparkling wine went round,
Never saw I falsehood's mask,
But still honest truth I found,
In the bottom of each flask.

True, at length my vigour's flown,
I have years to bring decay;
Few the locks that now I own,
And the few I have are gray.
Yet, old Jerome, thou may'st boast,
While thy spirits do not tire,
Still beneath thy age's frost
Glow a spark of youthful fire. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The New Piazza.

Enter FERDINAND and LOPEZ.

Ferd. What, could you gather no tidings of her? Nor guess where she was gone? O Clara! Clara!

Lopez. In truth, sir, I could not. That she was run away from her father, was in everybody's mouth, and that Don Guzman was in pursuit of her was also a very common report. Where she was gone, or what was become of her, no one could take upon them to say.

Ferd. 'Sdeath and fury, you blockhead! She can't be out of Seville.

Lopez. So I said to myself, sir:—'Sdeath and fury, you blockhead, says I, she can't be out of Seville. Then some said, she had hanged herself for love; and others have it, Don Antonio had carried her off.

Ferd. 'Tis false, scoundrel! No one said that.

Lopez. Then I misunderstood them, sir.

Ferd. Go, fool, get home, and never let me see you again, till you bring me news of her. [Exit LOPEZ.] Oh, how my fondness for this ungrateful girl has hurt my disposition!

Enter ISAAC.

Isaac. So, I have her safe, and have only to find a priest to marry us. Antonio now may marry Clara, or not, if he pleases!

Ferd. What! what was that you said of Clara?

Isaac. Oh Ferdinand, my brother-in-law, that shall be, who thought of meeting you?

Ferd. But what of Clara?

Isaac. I'faith, you shall hear. This morning, as I was coming down, I met a pretty damsel, who told me her name was Clara d'Almanza, and begged my protection.

Ferd. How?

Isaac. She said she had eloped from her father, Don Guzman, but that love for a young gentleman in Seville was the cause.

Ferd. O Heavens! did she confess it?

Isaac. O yes, she confessed at once. But then, says she, my lover is not informed of my flight, nor suspects my intention.

Ferd. Dear creature! No more I did, indeed! Oh, I am the happiest fellow! [Aside.] Well, Isaac!

Isaac. Why, then she entreated me to find him out for her, and bring him to her.

Ferd. Good Heavens, how lucky! Well, come along, let's lose no time. [Pulling him.

Isaac. Zooks! where are we to go?

Ferd. Why, did any thing more pass?

Isaac. Any thing more! Yes—the end on't was, that I was moved with her speeches, and complied with her desires.

Ferd. Well, and where is she?

Isaac. Where is she? why, don't I tell you, I complied with her request, and left her safe in the arms of her lover?

Ferd. 'Sdeath, you raffle with me! I have never seen her.

Isaac. You! O lud, no! How the devil should you? 'Twas Antonio she wanted: and with Antonio I left her.

Ferd. Hell and madness! [Aside.] What, Antonio d'Ercilla?

Isaac. Ay, ay, the very man; and the best part of it was, he was shy of taking her at first. He talked a good deal about honour, and conscience, and deceiving some dear friend; but, Lord, we soon overruled that.

Ferd. You did?

Isaac. Oh yes, presently. "Such deceit!" says he. "Pish!" says the lady, "tricking is all fair in love." "But then, my friend!" says he. "Pshaw! damn your friend!" says I. So, poor wretch, he has no chance:—no, no; he may hang himself as soon as he pleases.

Ferd. I must go, 'or I shall betray myself.

Isaac. But stay, Ferdinand: you ha'n't heard the best of the joke.

Ferd. Curse on your joke!

Isaac. Good luck! what's the matter now? I thought to have diverted you.

Ferd. Be racked! tortured! damned——

Isaac. Why, sure, you are not the poor devil of a lover, are you? 'I'faith, as sure as can be, he is. This is a better joke than t'other! Ha! ha!

Ferd. What, do you laugh! you vile, mischievous varlet! [Collars him.] But that you're beneath my anger, I'd tear your heart out. [Throws him from him.]

Isaac. O mercy! here's usage for a brother-in-law!

Ferd. But, hark ye, rascal? tell me directly where these false friends are gone, or by my soul——
[Draws.]

Isaac. For Heaven's sake, now, my dear brother-in-law, don't be in a rage!—I'll recollect as well as I can.

Ferd. Be quick, then!

Isaac. I will, I will—but people's memories differ—some have a treacherous memory—now mine is a cowardly memory—it takes to its heels, at sight of a drawn sword; it does, 'i'faith; and I could as soon fight as recollect.

Ferd. Zounds! tell me the truth, and I won't hurt you.

Isaac. No, no, I know you won't, my dear brother-in-law—but that ill-looking thing there——

Ferd. What, then, you won't tell me?

Isaac. Yes, yes, I will; I'll tell you all, upon my soul—but why need you listen sword in hand?

Ferd. Why, there. [Puts up.] Now.

Isaac. Why, then, I believe they are gone to—that is, my friend Carlos told me, he had left Donna Clara—dear Ferdinand, keep your hands off—at the convent of St. Catharine.

Ferd. St. Catharine!

Isaac. Yes; and that Antonio was to come to her there.

Ferd. Is this the truth?

Isaac. It is, indeed—and all I know, as I hope for life.

Ferd. Well, coward, take your life. 'Tis that false, dishonourable Antonio who shall feel my vengeance.

Isaac. Ay, ay, kill him—cut his throat, and welcome.

Ferd. But, for Clara—infamy on her! she is not worth my resentment.

Isaac. No more she is, my dear brother-in-law.—'I'faith, I would not be angry about her—she is not worth it, indeed.

Ferd. 'Tis false! she is worth the enmity of princes.

Isaac. True, true, so she is; and I pity you exceedingly for having lost her.

Ferd. 'Sdeath, you rascal! how durst you talk of pitying me?

Isaac. Oh, dear brother-in-law, I beg pardon; I don't pity you in the least, upon my soul.

Ferd. Get hence, fool, and provoke me no further; nothing but your insignificance saves you.

Isaac. 'I'faith, then, my insignificance is the best friend I have. I'm going, dear Ferdinand. What a cursed hot-headed bully it is! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Garden of the Convent.

Enter LOUISA and CLARA.

Louisa. And you really wish my brother may not find you out?

Clara. Why else have I concealed myself under this disguise?

Louisa. Why, perhaps, because the dress becomes you; for you certainly don't intend to be a nun for life.

Clara. If, indeed, Ferdinand had not offended me so last night.

Louisa. Come, come; it was his fear of losing you made him so rash.

Clara. Well, you may think me cruel—but I swear, if he were here this instant, I believe I should forgive him.

SONG.—CLARA.

By him we love offended,
How soon our anger flies!
One day apart, 'tis ended;
Behold him, and it dies.

Last night, your roving brother,
Enraged, I bade depart,
And sure his rude presumption
Deserved to lose my heart.

Yet, were he now before me,
In spite of injured pride,
I fear my eyes would pardon
Before my tongue could chide.

Louisa. I protest, Clara, I shall begin to think you are seriously resolved to enter on your probation.

Clara. And, seriously, I very much doubt whether the character of a nun would not become me best.

Louisa. Why, to be sure, the character of a nun is a very becoming one at a masquerade; but no pretty woman, in her senses, ever thought of taking the veil for above a night.

Clara. Yonder I see your Antonio is returned, I shall only interrupt you. Ah, Louisa, with what happy eagerness you turn to look for him! [Exit.]

Enter ANTONIO.

Ant. Well, my Louisa, any news since I left you?

Louisa. None—the messenger is not returned from my father.

Ant. Well, I confess, I do not perceive what we are to expect from him

Louisa. I shall be easier, however, in having made the trial. I do not doubt thy sincerity, Antonio; but there is a chilling air around poverty, that often kills affection that was not nursed in it. If we would make love our household god, we had best secure him a comfortable roof.

SONG.—ANTONIO.

How oft, Louisa, hast thou told,
Nor wilt thou the fond boast disown,
Thou wouldst not lose Antonio's love,
To reign the partner of a throne.
And by those lips, that spoke so kind,
And by that hand, I've pressed to mine,
To be the lord of wealth and power,
By Heav'n's, I would not part with thine!

Then bow, my soul, can we be poor,
Who own what kingdoms could not buy?
Of this true heart thou shalt be queen,—
In serving thee, a monarch I.
Thus uncontroll'd, in mutual bliss,
And rich in love's exhaustless mine,
Do thou snatch treasures from my lips,
And I'll take kingdoms back from thine.

Enter Maid with a letter.

Louisa. My father's answer, I suppose.

Ant. My dearest Louisa, you may be assured, that it contains nothing but threats and reproaches.

Louisa. Let us see, however.—[Reads.] "Dearest daughter,—Make your lover happy: you have my full consent to marry as your whim has chosen; but be sure come home, and sup with your affectionate father."

Ant. You jest, Louisa!

Louisa. [Gives him the letter.] Read—read.

Ant. 'Tis so, by heavens! Sure there must be some mistake; but that's none of our business.—Now, Louisa, you have no excuse for delay.

Louisa. Shall we not then return, and thank my father?

Ant. But first let the priest put it out of his power to recall his word.—I'll fly to procure one.

Louisa. Nay, if you part with me again, perhaps you may lose me.

Ant. Come, then—there is a friar of a neighbouring convent is my friend. You have already been diverted by the manners of a nunnery: let us see whether there is less hypocrisy among the holy fathers.

Louisa. I'm afraid not, Antonio—for in religion, as in friendship, they who profess most are ever the least sincere. [Exeunt.]

Enter CLARA.

Clara. So, yonder they go, as happy as a mutual and confessed affection can make them, while I am left in solitude. Heigho! love may perhaps excuse the rashness of an elopement from one's friend, but I am sure, nothing but the presence of the man we love can support it. Ha! what do I see! Ferdinand, as I live! How could he gain admission? By potent gold, I suppose, as Antonio did. How eager and disturbed he seems! He shall not know me as yet. [Draws her veil.]

Enter FERDINAND.

Ferd. Yes, those were certainly they:—my information was right. [Going.]

Clara. [Stops him.] Pray, signior, what is your business here?

Ferd. No matter—no matter! Oh, they stop.

[Looks out.] Yes, that is the perfidious Clara, indeed!

Clara. So, a jealous error. I'm glad to see him so moved. [Aside.]

Ferd. Her disguise can't conceal her. No, no; I know her too well.

Clara. Wonderful discernment! But, signior—

Ferd. Be quiet, good nun! don't tease me. By heavens, she leans upon his arm,—hangs fondly on it! O woman! woman!

Clara. But, signior, who is it you want?

Ferd. Not you, not you; so prythee don't tease me. Yet, pray stay. Gentle nun, was it not Donna Clara d'Almanza just parted from you.

Clara. Clara d'Almanza, signior, is not yet out of the garden.

Ferd. Ay, ay; I knew I was right. And pray, is not that gentleman, now at the porch with her, Antonio d'Ercilla?

Clara. It is indeed, signior.

Ferd. So, so; now but one question more. Can you inform me for what purpose they have gone away?

Clara. They are gone to be married, I believe.

Ferd. Very well:—enough. Now if I don't mar their wedding! [Erit.]

Clara. [Unreels.] I thought jealousy had made lovers quick-sighted; but it has made mine blind. Louisa's story accounts to me for this error, and I am glad to find I have power enough over him to make him so unhappy. But why should not I be present at his surprise when undeceived? When he's through the porch, I'll follow him; and, perhaps, Louisa shall not singly be a bride.

SONG.

Adieu, thou dreary pile, where never dies

The sullen echo of repentant sighs:

Ye sister mourners of each lonely cell,

Inured to hymns and sorrow, fare ye well;

For happier scenes I fly this darksome grove,—
To saints a prison, but a tomb to love. [Erit.]

SCENE IV.—A Court before the Priory.

Enter ISAAC, crossing the stage.—Enter ANTONIO.

Ant. What, my friend Isaac!

Isaac. What, Antonio! wish me joy! I have Louisa safe.

Ant. Have you?—I wish you joy, with all my soul.

Isaac. Yes, I am come here to procure a priest to marry us.

Ant. So, then we are both on the same errand. I am come to look for Father Paul.

Isaac. Hah! I am glad on't: but, i'faith, he must tack me first, my love is waiting.

Ant. So is mine: I left her in the porch.

Isaac. Ay, but I am in haste to get back to Don Jerome.

Ant. And so am I, too.

Isaac. Well, perhaps he'll save time, and marry us both together—or I'll be your father, and you shall be mine. Come along: but you're obliged to me for all this.

Ant. Yes, yes. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Room in the Priory.—Friars at the table drinking.

GLEE AND CHORUS.

This bottle's the sun of our table,
His beams are rosy wine;

We, planets, that are not able,
Without his help to shine.
Let mirth and glee abound.
You'll soon grow bright
With borrow'd light,
And shine as he goes round.

Paul. Brother Francis, toss the bottle about, and give me your toast.

Francis. Have we drusk the abbess of St. Ursuline?

Paul. Yes, yes; she was the last.

Francis. Then I'll give you the blue-eyed nun of St. Catharine's.

Paul. With all my heart. [Drinks.] Pray, brother Augustine, were there any benefactions left in my absorce?

Francis. Don Juan Corduba has left a hundred ducats, to remember him in our masses.

Paul. Has he? Let them be paid to our wine-merchant, and we'll remember him in our cups, which will do just as well. Anything more?

Aug. Yes; Baptista, the rich miser, who died last week, has bequeathed us a thousand pistoles, and the silver lamp he used in his own chamber, to burn before the image of St. Anthony.

Paul. 'Twas well meant; but we'll employ his money better. Baptista's bounty shall light the living, not the dead. St. Anthony is not afraid to be left in the dark, though he was—See, who's there. [A knocking.—Francis goes to the door, and opens it.]

Enter Porter.

Porter. Here's one without, in pressing haste to speak with Father Paul.

Francis. Brother Paul!

[PAUL comes from behind a curtain, with a glass of wine, and in his hand a piece of cake.]

Paul. Here! how durst you, fellow, thus abruptly break in upon our devotions?

Porter. I thought they were finished.

Paul. No, they were not—were they, Brother Francis?

Francis. Not by a bottle each.

Paul. But neither you nor your fellows mark how the hours go: no, you mind nothing but the gratifying of your appetites: ye eat, and swill, and sleep, and gormandize, and thrive, while we are wasting in mortification.

Porter. We ask no more than nature craves.

Paul. 'Tis false! ye have more appetites than hairs! and your flushed, sleek, and pampered appearance, is the disgrace of our order. Out on't! If you are hungry, can't you be content with the wholesome roots of the earth! and if you are dry, isn't there the crystal spring? [Drinks.] Put this away [Gives the glass], and show me where I'm wanted. [Porter drains the glass—PAUL, going, turns.] So, you would have drunk it, if there had been any left? Ah, glutton! glutton!

SCENE VI.—The Court before the Priory.

Enter ISAAC and ANTONIO.

Isaac. A plaguy while coming, this same Father Paul! He's detained at vespers, I suppose, poor fellow!

Ant. No, here he comes.

Enter PAUL.

Good Father Paul, I crave your blessing.

Isaac. Yes, good Father Paul, we are come to beg a favour.

Paul. What is it, pray?

Isaac. To marry us, good Father Paul; and in truth thou dost look the very priest of Hymen.

Paul. In short, I may be called so; for I deal in repentance and mortification.

Isaac. No, no; thou seemest an officer of Hymen, because thy presence speaks content and good humour.

Paul. Alas! my appearance is deceitful. Bloating I am, indeed! for fasting is a windy recreation, and it hath swoln me like a bladder.

Ant. But thou hast a good fresh colour in thy face, father,—rosy, i'faith.

Paul. Yes, I have blushed for mankind, till the hue of my shame is as fixed as their vices.

Isaac. Good man!

Paul. And I have laboured, too, but to what purpose? They continue to sin under my very nose.

Isaac. Efects, father, I should have guessed as much, for your nose seems to be put to the blush more than any other part of your face.

Paul. Go, you're a wag.

Ant. But, to the purpose, father: will you officiate for us?

Paul. To join young people thus clandestinely is not safe; and, indeed, I have in my heart many weighty reasons against it.

Ant. And I have in my hand many weighty reasons for it. Isaac, hav'n't you an argument or two in our favour about you?

Isaac. Yes, yes: here is a most unanswerable purse.

Paul. For shame! You make me angry; you forget who I am; and when importunate people have forced their trash—ay, into this pocket, here—or into this—why, then the ain was theirs. [They put money into his pockets.] Fie! now how you distress me! I would return it, but that I must touch it that way, and so wrong my oath.

Ant. Now then, come with us.

Isaac. Ay, now give us your title to joy and rapture.

Paul. Well, when your hour of repentance comes, don't blame me.

Ant. No bad caution to my friend Isaac. [Aside.] Well, well, father, do you do your part, and I'll abide the consequence.

Isaac. Ay, and so will I.

[They are going.]

Enter LOUISA, running.

Louisa. O Antonio! Ferdinand is at the porch, and inquiring for us.

Isaac. Who? Don Ferdinand! He's not inquiring for me, I hope.

Ant. Fear not, my love; I'll soon pacify him.

Isaac. Egad, you won't. Antonio, take my advice, and run away: this Ferdinand is the most unmerciful dog! and has the cursedest long sword!—and, upon my soul, he comes on purpose to cut your throat.

Ant. Never fear, never fear.

Isaac. Well, you may stay if you will; but I'll get some one to marry me; for, by St. Iago, he shall never meet me again, while I am master of a pair of heels. [Runs out.]

Enter FERDINAND.—(LOUISA veils.)

Ferd. So, sir, I have met with you at last.

Ant. Well, sir.

Ferd. Base, treacherous man! whence can a false, deceitful soul, like yours, borrow confidence to look so steadily on the man you've injured?

Ant. Ferdinand, you are too warm:—'tis true you find me on the point of wedding one I love beyond my life; but no argument of mine prevailed on her to elope. I scorn deceit as much as you. By heaven, I knew not she had left her father's, till I saw her.

Ferd. What a mean excuse! You have wronged your friend, then, for one, whose wanton forwardness anticipated your treachery; of this, indeed, your Jew pander informed me; but let your conduct be consistent, and since you have dared to do a wrong, follow me, and show you have a spirit to avow it.

Louisa. Antonio, I perceive his mistake. Leave him to me.

Paul. Friend, you are rude, to interrupt the union of two willing hearts.

Ferd. No, meddling priest, the hand he seeks is mine.

Paul. If so, I'll proceed no further. Lady, did you ever promise this youth your hand?

[To LOUISA, who shakes her head.]

Ferd. Clara, I thank you for your silence. I would not have heard your tongue avow such falsity; be't your punishment to remember, I have not reproached you.

Enter CLARA.

Clara. What mockery is this?

Ferd. Antonio, you are protected now, but we shall meet. [Going, CLARA holds one arm, and LOUISA the other.]

DUET.

Louisa. Turn thee round, I pray thee,
Calm awhile thy rage.

Clara. I must help to stay thee,
And thy wrath assuage.

Louisa. Couldst thou not discover
One so dear to thee?

Clara. Canst thou be a lover,
And thus fly from me? [Both unveil.]

Ferd. How's this? my sister! Clara, too! I'm confounded.

Louisa. 'Tis even so, good brother.

Paul. How! what impiety! Did the man want to marry his own sister?

Louisa. And arn't you ashamed of yourself, not to know your own sister?

Clara. To drive away your own mistress—

Louisa. Don't you see how jealousy blinds people?

Clara. Ay, and will you ever be jealous again?

Ferd. Never—never! You, sister, I know will forgive me—but how, Clara, shall I presume—

Clara. No, no; just now you told me not to tease you.—“Who do you want, good signior?” “Not you, not you.” Oh you blind wretch! But swear never to be jealous again, and I'll forgive you.

Ferd. By all—

Clara. There, that will do—you'll keep the oath just as well. [Gives her hand.]

Louisa. But, brother, here is one, to whom some apology is due.

Ferd. Antonio, I am ashamed to think—

Ant. Not a word of excuse, Ferdinand. I have not been in love myself without learning that a lover's anger should never be resented. But come—let us retire with this good father, and we'll explain to you the cause of this error.

GLEE AND CHORUS.

Oft does Hymen smile to hear

Wordy vows of feign'd regard;

Well he knows when they're sincere,

Never slow to give reward;

For his glory is to prove

Kind to those who wed for love. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—A Grand Saloon.

Enter DON JEROME, Servants, and LOPEZ.

Jerome. Be sure, now, let every thing be in the best order. Let all my servants have on their merriest faces: but tell them to get as little drunk as possible, till after supper. So, Lopez, where's your master? Sha'n't we have him at supper?

Lopez. Indeed, I believe not, sir. He's mad, I doubt: I'm sure he has frightened me from him.

Jerome. Ay, ay, he's after some wench, I suppose: a young rake! Well, well, we'll be merry without him.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here is Signior Isaac.

Enter ISAAC.

Jerome. So, my dear son-in-law: there, take my blessing and forgiveness. But where's my daughter? where's Louisa?

Isaac. She's without, impatient for a blessing, but almost afraid to enter.

Jerome. Oh, fly, and bring her in. [Exit ISAAC.]

Poor girl! I long to see her pretty face.

Isaac [Without.] Come, my charmer, my trembling angel!

Enter ISAAC and Duenna; DON JEROME runs to meet them; she kneels.

Jerome. Come to my arms, my—[Starts back.] Why, who the devil have we here!

Isaac. Nay, Don Jerome, you promised her forgiveness; see how the dear creature droops!

Jerome. Droops, indeed! Why, Gad take me, this is old Margaret! But where's my daughter? where's Louisa?

Isaac. Why, here, before your eyes: nay, don't be abashed, my sweet wife!

Jerome. Wife with a vengeance! Why, zounds, you have not married the Duenna!

Duenna. [Kneeling.] O dear papa! you'll not disown me, sure!

Jerome. Papa! papa! Why, zounds, your impudence is as great as your ugliness!

Isaac. Rise, my charmer: go throw your snowy arms about his neck, and convince him you are—

Duenna. Oh, sir, forgive me! [Embraces him]

Jerome. Help! murder!

Servants. What's the matter, sir?

Jerome. Why, here, this damned Jew has brought an old harriidan to strangle me.

Isaac. Lord, it is his own daughter, and he is so hard-hearted, he won't forgive her!

Enter ANTONIO and LOUISA; they kneel.

Jerome. Zounds and fury! what's here now? Who sent for you, sir? and who the devil are you?

Ant. This lady's husband, sir.

Isaac. Ay, that he is, I'll be sworn; for I left them with the priest, and was to have given her away.

Jerome. You were?

Isaac. Ay: that's my honest friend, Antonio; and that's the little girl I told you I had hampered him with.

Jerome. Why, you are either drunk or mad. This is my daughter.

Isaac. No, no; 'tis you are both drunk and mad, I think: here's your daughter.

Jerome. Hark ye, old iniquity, will you explain all this, or not?

Duenna. Come, then, Don Jerome, I will—though our habits might inform you all. Look on your daughter, there, and on me.

Isaac. What's this I hear?

Duenna. The truth is, that in your passion this morning, you made a small mistake; for you turned your daughter out of doors, and locked up your humble servant.

Isaac. O lud! O lud! Here's a pretty fellow! to turn his daughter out of doors instead of an old Duenna.

Jerome. And, O lud! O lud! Here's a pretty fellow, to marry an old Duenna instead of my daughter! But how came the rest about?

Duenna. I have only to add, that I remained in your daughter's place, and had the good fortune to engage the affections of my sweet husband here.

Isaac. Her husband! Why, you old witch, do you think I'll be your husband now! This is a trick, a cheat, and you ought all to be ashamed of yourselves.

Ant. Hark ye, Isaac, do you dare to complain of tricking? Don Jerome, I give you my word, this cunning Portuguese has brought all this upon himself, by endeavouring to overreach you, by getting your daughter's fortune, without making any settlement in return.

Jerome. Overreach me!

Louisa. 'Tis so, indeed, sir, and we can prove it to you.

Jerome. Why, Gad take me, it must be so, or he could never have put up with such a face as Margaret's—so, little Solomon, I wish you joy of your wife, with all my soul.

Louisa. Isaac, tricking is all fair in love:—let you alone for the plot.

Ant. A cunning dog, ar'n't you? A sly little villain, eh?

Louisa. Roguish, perhaps; but keen, devilish keen.

Jerome. Yes, yes; his aunt always called him little Solomon.

Isaac. Why, the plagues of Egypt upon you all!—but do you think I'll submit to such an imposition?

Ant. Isaac, one serious word:—you'd better be content as you are; for, believe me, you will find, that, in the opinion of the world, there is not a fairer subject for contempt and ridicule, than a knave become the dupe of his own art.

Isaac. I don't care—I'll not endure this. Don Jerome, 'tis you have done this—you would be so cursed positive about the beauty of her you locked up, and all the time I told you she was as old as my mother, and as ugly as the devil.

Duenna. Why, you little insignificant reptile!

Jerome. That's right—attack him, Margaret.

Duenna. Dares such a thing as you pretend to talk of beauty! A walking rouleau!—a body that seems to owe all its consequence to the dropsy!—a pair of eyes like two dead beetles in a wad of brown dough!—a beard like an artichoke, with dry shriveled jaws that would disgrace the mummy of a monkey!

Jerome. Well done, Margaret!

Duenna. But you shall know that I have a brother, who wears a sword, and if you don't do me justice—

Isaac. Fire seize your brother, and you too! I'll fly to Jerusalem, to avoid you.

Duenna. Fly where you will, I'll follow you.

Jerome. Throw your snowy arms about him, Margaret. [Exeunt ISAAC and Duenna.] But, Louisa, are you really married to this modest gentleman?

Louisa. Sir, in obedience to your commands, I gave him my hand within this hour.

Jerome. My commands!

Ant. Yes, sir; here is your consent, under your own hand.

Jerome. How! would you rob me of my child by a trick, a false pretence? and do you think to get her fortune by the same means? Why, 'slife, you are as great a rogue as Isaac!

Ant. No, Don Jerome; though I have profited by this paper in gaining your daughter's hand, I scorn to obtain her fortune by deceit. There, sir. [Gives a letter.] Now give her your blessing for a dower, and all the little I possess shall be settled on her in return. Had you wedded her to a prince, he could do no more.

Jerome. Why, Gad take me, but you are a very extraordinary fellow! But have you the impudence to suppose no one can do a generous action but yourself? Here, Louisa, tell this proud fool of yours, that he's the only man I know that would renounce your fortune; and, by my soul, he's the only man in Spain that's worthy of it. There, bless you both; I'm an obstinate old fellow when I'm in the wrong; but you shall now find me as steady in the right.

Enter FERDINAND and CLARA.

Another wonder still! Why, sirrah! Ferdinand you have not stole a nun, have you?

Ferd. She is a nun in nothing but her habit, sir.—look nearer, and you will perceive, 'tis Clara d'Almanza, Don Guzman's daughter; and, with pardon for stealing a wedding, she is also my wife.

Jerome. Gadsbud, and a great fortune. Ferdinand, you are a prudent young rogue, and I forgive you; and, i'fecs, you're a pretty little damsel. Give your father-in-law a kiss, you smiling rogue!

Clara. There, old gentleman: and now mind you behave well to us.

Jerome. I'fecs, those lips ha'n't been chilled by kissing beads. Egad, I believe I shall grow the best-humoured fellow in Spain. Lewis! Sancho! Carlos! d'ye hear? Are all my doors thrown open? Our children's weddings are the only holidays our age can boast; and then we drain, with pleasure, the little stock of spirits time has left us. [Music within.] But see, here come our friends and neighbours!

Enter Masqueraders, from the back of the stage.

And, 'faith, we'll make a night on't, with wine, and dance, and catches—then old and young shall join us.

FINALE.

Jerome. Come now for jest and smiling,
Both old and young beguiling;
Let us laugh and play, so blithe and gay,
Till we banish care away.

Louisa. Thus crown'd with dance and song,
The hours shall glide along,
With a heart at ease, merry, merry
glees,
Can never fail to please.

Ferd. Each bride with blushes glowing,
Our wine as rosy flowing;

Let us laugh and play, so blithe and gay,
Till we banish care away.

Ant. Then healths to every friend
The night's repast shall end,
With a heart at ease, merry, merry
glees,
Can never fail to please.

Clara. Nor, while we are so joyous,
Shall anxious fear annoy us;
Let us laugh and play, so blithe and gay,
Till we banish care away.

Jerome. For generous guests like these,
Accept the wish to please;
So we'll laugh and play, so blithe and gay;
Your smiles drive care away.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Tented Field in the back-ground—the fore-ground, a Pavilion near Pizarro's Tent.

ELVIRA discovered reclining on a couch.—VALVERDE enters, and attempts to kiss her hand.—ELVIRA rises.

Elv. Audacious! Whence is thy privilege to interrupt the few moments of repose my harassed mind can snatch amid the tumults of this noisy camp? Shall I inform thy master, Pizarro, of this presumptuous treachery?

Val. I am his servant, it is true—trusted by him—and I know him well; and therefore 'tis I ask, by what magic could Pizarro gain thy heart, by what fatality still holds he thy affection?

Elv. Hold! thou trusty secretary!

Val. Ignobly born! in mind and manners rude, ferocious, and unpolished, though cool and crafty if occasion need—in youth audacious—ill his first manhood—a licensed pirate—treating men as brutes—the world as booty; yet now the Spanish hero he is styled—the first of Spanish conquerors! and for a warrior so accomplished, 'tis fit Elvira should leave her noble family, her fame, her home, to share the dangers, humours, and the crimes of such a lover as Pizarro!

Elv. What! Valverde moralizing! But grant I am in error, what is thy incentive? Passion, infatuation, call it what thou wilt; but what attaches thee to this despised, unworthy leader? Base lucre is thy object, mean fraud thy means. Could you gain me, thou only hop'st to win a higher interest in Pizarro—I know you.

Val. On my soul, thou wrong'st me; what else my faults, I have none towards thee: but indulge the scorn and levity of thy nature; do it while yet the time permits; the gloomy hour, I fear, too soon approaches.

Elv. Valverde a prophet, too!

Val. Hear me, Elvira—Shame from his late defeat, and burning wishes for revenge, again have brought Pizarro to Peru; but trust me, he over-rates his strength, nor measures well the foe. Encamped in a strange country, where terror cannot force, nor corruption buy, a single friend, what have we to hope? The army murmuring at increasing hardships; while Pizarro decorates with gaudy spoil the gay pavilion of his luxury, each day diminishes our force.

Elv. But are you not the heirs of those that fall?

Val. Are gain and plunder, then, our only purpose? Is this Elvira's heroism?

Elv. No, so save me Heaven! I abhor the motive, means, and end of your pursuits; but I will trust none of you:—in your whole army there is not one of you that has a heart, or speaks ingenuously—aged Las Casas, and he alone, excepted.

Val. He! an enthusiast in the opposite and worst extreme!

Elv. Oh! had I earlier known that virtuous man, how different might my lot have been?

Val. I will grant Pizarro could not then so easily have duped you! forgive me, but at that event I still must wonder.

Elv. Hear me, Valverde. When first my virgin fancy waked to love, Pizarro was my country's idol. 'Tis known that when he left Panama in a slight vessel, his force was not a hundred men. Arrived at the island of Gallo, with his sword he drew a line upon the sand, and said, "Pass those who fear to die or conquer with their leader." Thirteen alone remained, and at the head of these the warrior stood his ground. Even at the moment when my ears first caught this tale, my heart exclaimed, "Pizarro is its lord!" What since I have perceived, or thought, or felt! you must have more worth to win the knowledge of.

Val. I press no further; still assured, that while Alonzo de Molina, our general's former friend and pupil, leads the enemy, Pizarro never more will be a conqueror. [Trumpets without.]

Elv. Silence! I hear him coming; look not perplexed.—How mystery and fraud confound the countenance? Quick, put on an honest face, if thou canst.

Piz. [Speaking without.] Chain and secure him: I will examine him myself.

Enter PIZARRO.

Piz. [Advancing.] Why dost thou smile, Elvira?

Elv. To laugh or weep without a reason, is one of the few privileges poor women have.

Piz. Elvira, I will know the cause, I am resolved.

Elv. I am glad of that, because I love resolution, and am resolved not to tell thee. Now my resolution, I take it, is better of the two, because it depends upon myself, and thine does not.

Piz. Psha! trifle!

Val. Elvira was laughing at my apprehensions that—

Piz. Apprehensions!

Val. Yes—that Alonzo's skill and genius should so have disciplined and informed the enemy, as to—

Piz. Alonzo! the traitor! How I once loved that man! His noble mother trusted him, a boy, to my protection. [ELVIRA walks about pensively in the background.] At my table did he feast—in my tent did he repose. I had marked his early genius, and the valorous spirit that grew with it. Often had I talked to him of our first adventures—what storms we struggled with—what perils we surmounted! when landed with a slender host upon an unknown land—then, when I told how famine and fatigue, discord and toil, day by day, did thin our ranks; and close-pressing enemies, how, still undaunted, I endured and dared—maintained my purpose and my power, in despite of growing mutiny or bold revolt, till, with my faithful few remaining, I became at last victorious!—When, I say, of these things I spoke, the youth, Alonzo, with tears of wonder and delight, would throw him on my neck, and swear his soul's ambition owned no other leader.

Val. What could subdue attachment so begun.

Piz. Las Casas.—He it was, with fascinating craft and canting precepts of humanity, raised in Alonzo's mind a new enthusiasm, which forced him, as the stripling termed it, to forego his country's claims for those of human nature.

Val. Yes, the traitor left thee, joined the Peruvians, and became thy enemy, and Spain's.

Piz. But first with weariless remonstrance he sued to win me from my purpose, and untwine the sword from my determined grasp. Much he spoke of right, of justice, and humanity, calling the Peruvians our innocent and unoffending brethren.

Val. They!—Obdurate heathens!—They our brethren!

Piz. But when he found that the soft folly of the pleading tears he dropped upon my bosom, fell on marble, he flew and joined the foe; then, profiting by the lessons he had gained in wronged Pizarro's school, the youth so disciplined and led his new allies, that soon he forced me—Ha! I burn with shame and fury while I own it!—in base retreat and foul discomfiture to quit the shore.

Val. But the hour of revenge is come.

Piz. It is; I have returned—my force is strengthened, and the audacious boy shall soon know that Pizarro lives, and has—a grateful recollection of the thanks he owes him.

Val. 'Tis doubted whether still Alonzo lives.

Piz. 'Tis certain that he does; one of his armour-bearers is just made prisoner; twelve thousand is their force, as he reports, led by Alonzo and Peruvian Rolla. This day they make a solemn sacrifice on their ungodly altars. We must profit by their security; and attack them unprepared—the sacrificers shall become the victims.

Elv. [Advancing.] Wretched innocents! and their own blood shall bedew their altars!

Piz. [Trumpets without.] Elvira, retire!

Elv. Why should I retire?

Piz. Because men are to meet here, and on manly business.

Elv. O men! men! ungrateful and perverse! O woman! still affectionate though wronged! The beings to whose eyes you turn for animation, hope, and rapture, through the days of mirth and revelry, and on whose bosoms, in the hour of sore calamity, you seek for rest and consolation, them, when the pompous follies of your mean ambition are the question, you treat as playthings or as slaves!—I shall not retire.

Piz. Remain, then—and, if thou canst, be silent.

Elv. They only babble who practise not reflection. I shall think—and thought is silence.

[Goes to the couch, and sits, VALVERDE stands at her back.]

Piz. Ha!—there's somewhat in her manner lately—

Enter LAS CASAS, ALMAGRO, GONZALO, DAVILLA, Officers, and Soldiers.

Las C. Pizarro, we attend thy summons.

Piz. Welcome, venerable father—my friends, most welcome. Friends and fellow-soldiers, at length the hour has arrived, which to Pizarro's hopes presents the full reward of our undaunted enterprise, and long-enduring toils. Confident in security, this day the foe devotes to solemn sacrifice: if with bold surprise we strike on their solemnity—trust to your leader's word—we shall not fail.

Alm. Too long inactive have we been mouldering on the coast—our stores exhausted, and our soldiers murmuring. Battle! battle!—then death to the arm'd, and chains for the defenceless.

Dav. Death to the whole Peruvian race!

Las C. Merciful Heaven!

Alm. Yes, General, the attack, and instantly! Then shall Alonzo, basking at his ease, soon cease to scoff our sufferings, and scorn our force.

Las C. Alonzo!—Scorn and presumption are not in his nature.

Alm. 'Tis fit Las Casas should defend his pupil.

Piz. Speak not of the traitor—or hear his name but as the bloody summons to assault and vengeance. It appears we are agreed?

Alm. Dav. We are.

Gon. All!—Battle! Battle!

Las C. Is, then, the dreadful measure of your cruelty not yet complete!—Battle!—gracious Heaven! Against whom?—Against a king, in whose mild bosom your atrocious injuries even yet have not excited hate! but who, insulted or victorious, still sues for peace. Against a people, who never wronged the living being their Creator formed: a people who, children of innocence! received you as cherished guests—with eager hospitality and confiding kindness. Generously and freely did they share with you their comforts, their treasures, and their homes: you repaid them by fraud, oppression, and dishonour. These eyes have witnessed all I speak—as gods you were received; as fiends you have acted.

Piz. Las Casas!

Las C. Pizarro, hear me!—Hear me, chieftains!—And thou, All-powerful, whose thunders can shiver into sand the adamant rock—whose lightnings can pierce to the core of the rived and quaking—Oh! let thy power give effect to thy servant's words, at thy spirit gives courage to his will! Do not, I implore ye, chieftains—countrymen—do not, I implore you, renew the foul barbarities which your insatiate avarice has inflicted on this wretched, unoffending race!—But hush, my sighs—fall not, drops of useless sorrow!—heart-breaking anguish, choke not my utterance. All I entreat is, send me once more to those you call your enemies—Oh! let me be the messenger of penitence from you, I shall return with blessings and with peace from them. [Turning to ELV.] Elvira, you weep!—Alas! and does this dreadful crisis move no heart but thine!

Alm. Because there are no women here but she and thou.

Piz. Close this idle war of words: time flies, and our opportunity will be lost. Chieftains, are ye for in-tant battle?

Alm. We are.

Las C. Oh, men of blood! [Kneels.] God! thou hast anointed me thy servant—not to curse, but to bless my countrymen: yet now my blessing on their force were blasphemy against thy goodness. [Rises.] No! I curse your purpose, homicides! I curse the bond of blood by which you are united. May fell disunion, infamy, and rout, defeat your projects, and betray your hopes! On you and your children be the peril of the innocent blood which shall be shed this day! I leave you, and for ever! No longer shall these aged eyes be seared by the horrors they have witnessed. In caves, in forests, will I hide myself; with tigers and with savage beasts commune; and when at length we meet before the blessed tribunal of that Deity, whose mild doctrines and whose mercies we have this day renounced, O then shall you feel the agony and grief of soul which tear the bosom of your accuser now! [Going.]

DRAMA NO XLII.

Elv. [Rises, and takes the hand of Las C.] Oh! take me with thee.

Las C. Stay! lost, abused lady! I alone am useless here. Perhaps thy loveliness may persuade to pity, where reason and religion plead in vain. Oh! save thy innocent fellow-creatures, if thou canst: then shall thy frailty be redeemed, and thou wilt share the mercy thou bestowest.

[Exit.]

Piz. How, Elvira! wouldst thou leave me?

Elv. I am bewildered—grown terrified! Your inhumanity—and that good old man—oh! he appeared to me just now something more than heavenly!—and you!—ye all looked worse than earthly.

Piz. Compassion sometimes becomes a beauty.

Elv. Humanity always becomes a conqueror.

Piz. [Turning to Alm.] Now to prepare our muster and our march. At mid-day is the hour of the sacrifice. [Elv. sits.] Consulting with our guides, the route of your divisions shall be given to each commander. If we surprise, we conquer; and if we conquer, the gates of Quito will be open to us.

Alm. And Pizarro then be monarch of Peru.

Piz. Not so fast—ambition for a time must take counsel from discretion. Ataliba still must hold the shadow of a sceptre in his hand—Pizarro still appear dependent upon Spain; while the pledge of future peace, his daughter's hand [Elv. rises, much agitated] secures the proud succession to the crown I seek.

Alm. This is best. In Pizarro's plans observe the statesman's wisdom guides the warrior's valour.

Val. [To Elv.] You mark, Elvira?

Elv. O yes—this is best—this is excellent.

Piz. You seem offended. Elvira still retains my heart. Think—a sceptre waves me on.

Elv. Offended! No! Thou knowest thy glory is my idol; and this will be most glorious, most just and honourable.

Piz. What mean you?

Elv. Oh! nothing—mere woman's prattle—a jealous whim, perhaps: but let it not impede the royal hero's course. [Trumpets without.] The call of arms invites you. Away! away! you, his brave, his worthy fellow-warriors.

Piz. And go you not with me?

Elv. Undoubtedly: I needs must be the first to hail the future monarch of Peru.

Enter GOMEZ.

Alm. How, Gomez! what bring'st thou?

Gom. On yonder hill, among the palm-trees, we have surprised an old cacique; escape by flight he ould not, and we seized him and his attendant unresisting: yet his lips breathed nothing but bitterness and scorn.

Piz. Drag him before us. [ELV. sits pensively.—GOMEZ leaves the tent, and returns conducting OROZEMBO and attendant in chains.]

What art thou, stranger?

Oro. First tell me which among you is the captain of this band of robbers?

Piz. Ha!

Alm. Madman! Tear out his tongue, or else—

Oro. Thou'lt hear some truth.

Dav. [Showing his poignard.] Shall I not plunge this into his heart?

Oro. [After surveying DAV. contemptuously—then turning to Piz.] Does your army boast many such heroes as this?

Piz. Audacious!—This insolence has sealed thy doom. Die thou shalt, grey-headed ruffian. But first confess what thou knowest.

Oro. I know that which thou hast just assured me of—that I shall die.

Piz. Less audacity, perhaps, might have preserved thy life.

Oro. My life is as a withered tree—it is not worth preserving.

Piz. Hear me, old man. Even now we march against the Peruvian army. We know there is a secret path that leads to your strong-hold among the rocks: guide us to that, and name your reward. If wealth be thy wish—

Oro. Ha! ha! ha! ha!

Piz. Dost thou despise my offer?

Oro. Thee and thy offer!—Wealth! I have the wealth of two dear gallant sons—I have stored in heaven the riches which repay good actions here—and still my chief treasure I do bear about me.

Piz. What is that? Inform me.

Oro. I will; for it never can be thine—the treasure of a pure unsullied conscience. [ELV. still sits, paying marked attention to OROZEMBO.]

Iiz. I believe there is no other Peruvian who dares speak as thou dost.

Oro. Would I could believe there is no other Spaniard who dares act as thou dost.

Gon. Obdurate Pagan! How numerous is your army?

Oro. Count the leaves of yonder forest.

Alm. Which is the weakest part of your camp?

Oro. It has no weak part—on every side 'tis fortified by justice.

Piz. Where have you concealed your wives and your children?

Oro. In the hearts of their husbands and their fathers.

Piz. Know'st thou Alonzo?

Oro. Know him. Alonzo! Know him! Our nation's benefactor! The guardian angel of Peru!

Piz. By what has he merited that title?

Oro. By not resembling thee.

Alm. Who is this Rollo joined with Alonzo in command?

Oro. I will answer that; for I love to hear and to repeat the hero's name. Rollo, the kinsman of the king, is the idol of our army; in war a tiger, chased by the hunter's spear; in peace more gentle than the unweaned lamb. Cora was once betrothed to him; but finding she preferred Alonzo, he resigned his claim, and, I fear, his peace, to friendship and to Cora's happiness; yet still he loves her with a pure and holy fire.

Piz. Romantic savage! I shall meet this Rollo soon.

[Retires to confer with VAL.]

Oro. Thou hadst better not! The terrors of his noble eye would strike thee dead.

Dav. Silence, or tremble!

Oro. Beardless robber! I never yet have trembled before God—why should I tremble before man? Why before thee, thou less than man!

Dav. Another word, audacious heathen, and I strike!

Oro. Strike, Christian! Then boast among thy fellows—I too have murdered a Peruvian!

Dav. Hell and vengeance seize thee! [Stabs him.]

Piz. [Rushing forward.] Hold!

Dav. Couldst thou longer have endured his insults?

Piz. And therefore should he die untortur'd?

Oro. True! Observe, young man, [To DAV.] thy unthinking rashness has saved me from the rack; and thou thyself hast lost the opportunity of a useful lesson: thou mightst thyself have seen with what cruelty vengeance would have inflicted torments—and with what patience virtue would have borne them.

Elv. [Rising, runs to OROZ. and supports his head on her bosom.] Oh! ye are monsters all. Look up, thou martyr'd innocent! look up once more, and bless me ere thou diest. God! how I pity thee!

Oro. Pity me! Me! So near my happiness! Bless thee, lady! Spaniards—Heaven turn your hearts, and pardon you as I do.

[OROZ. is borne off, dying.]

Piz. Away!—Davilla! if thus rash a second time—

Dav. Forgive the hasty indignation which—

Piz. No more—unbind that trembling wretch—let him depart; 'tis well he should report the mercy which we show to insolent defiance. Hark! our troops are moving.

Att. [On passing ELVIRA.] If through thy gentle means my master's poor remains might be preserved from insult—

Elv. I understand thee.

Att. His sons may yet thank thy charity, if not avenge their father's fate. [Exit.]

Piz. What says the slave?

Elv. A parting word to thank you for your mercy.

Piz. Our guard and guides approach. [Soldiers cross.] Follow me, friends—each shall have his post assigned, and ere Peruvia's God shall sink beneath the main, the Spanish banner, bathed in blood, shall float above the walls of vanquish'd Quito. [Exeunt all but ELVIRA and VALVERDE.]

Val. Is it now presumption that my hopes gain strength with the increasing horrors which I see appal Elvira's soul!

Elv. I am mad with terror and remorse! Would I could fly these dreadful scenes!

Val. Might not Valverde's true attachment be thy refuge?

Elv. What wouldst thou do to save or to avenge me!

Val. I dare do all thy injuries may demand—a word—and he lies bleeding at your feet.

Elv. Perhaps we will speak again of this. Now leave me. [Exit VALVERDE.]

Elv. [Alone.] No! not this revenge—no! not this instrument. Fie, Elvira! even for a moment to counsel with this unworthy traitor! Can a wretch, false to a confiding master, be true to any pledge of love or honour? Pizarro will abandon me—yes; me—who, for his sake, have sacrificed—Oh, God!—what have I not sacrificed for him? yet, curbing the avenging pride that swells this bosom, I still will further try him. Oh, men! ye who, wearied by the fond fidelity of virtuous love, seek in the wanton's flattery a new delight, oh, ye may insult and leave the hearts to which your faith was pledged, and, stifling self-reproach, may fear no other peril; because such hearts, howe'er you injure and desert them, have yet the proud retreat of an unspotted fame—of unreproaching conscience. But beware the desperate libertine, who forsakes the creature whom his arts have first deprived of all natural protection—of all self-consolation!—What has he left her?—Despair and vengeance.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Rock, with a Forest in the background.

A Bank.—Cora playing with her Child, and ALONZO hanging over them with delight.

Cora. Now confess, does he resemble thee, or not?

Al. Indeed, he is liker thee—thy rosy softness, thy smiling gentleness.

Cora. But his auburn hair, the colour of his eyes, Alonzo. O! my lord's image, and my heart's adored!

[Pressing the Child to her bosom.

Al. The little daring urchin robs me, I doubt, of some portion of thy love, my Cora. At least he shares caresses, which till his birth were only mine.

Cora. O, no, Alonzo! A mother's love for her sweet babe is not a stealth from the dear father's store; it is a new delight that turns with quickened gratitude to him, the author of her augmented bliss.

Al. Could Cora think me serious?

Cora. I am sure he will speak soon: then will be the last of the three holidays allowed by Nature's sanction to the fond anxious mother's heart.

Al. What are those three?

Cora. The ecstasy of his birth I pass; that in part is selfish: but when first the white blossoms of his teeth appear, breaking the crimson buds that did incase them, that is a day of joy: next, when from his father's arms he runs without support, and clings, laughing and delighted, to his mother's knees, that is the mother's heart's next holiday: and sweeter still the third, whene'er his little stammering tongue shall utter the grateful sound of father, mother!—Oh! that is the dearest joy of all!

Al. Beloved Cora!

Cora. Oh! my Alonzo! daily, hourly, do I pour thanks to Heaven for the dear blessing I possess in him and thee.

Al. To Heaven and Rolla.

Cora. Yes, to Heaven and Rolla: and art thou not grateful to them too, Alonzo? Art thou not happy?

Al. Can Cora ask that question?

Cora. Why, then, of late, so restless on thy couch? Why to my waking, watching ear, so often does the stillness of the night betray thy struggling sighs?

Al. Must not I fight against my country, against my brethren?

Cora. Do they not seek our destruction? and are not all men brethren?

Al. Should they prove victorious!

Cora. I will fly, and meet thee in the mountains.

Al. Fly with thy infant, Cora?

Cora. What! think you a mother, when she runs from danger, can feel the weight of her child?

Al. Cora, my beloved, do you wish to set my heart at rest?

Cora. Oh, yes! yes! y-s!

Al. Hasten, then, to the concealment in the mountains; where all our matrons and virgins, and our warriors' offspring, are allotted to await the issue of the war.—Cora will not alone resist her husband's, her sister's, and her monarch's wish.

Cora. Alonzo, I cannot leave thee: Oh! how in every moment's absence would my fancy paint you, wounded, alone, abandoned! No, no, I cannot leave thee!

Al. Rolla will be with me.

Cora. Yes, while the battle rages, and where it rages most, brave Rolla will be found. He may revenge, but cannot save thee. To follow danger, he will leave even thee. But I have sworn never to forsake thee but with life. Dear, dear Alonzo! canst thou wish that I should break my vow?

Al. Then be it so. Oh! excellence in all that's great and lovely, in courage, gentleness, and truth! my pride, my content, my all! Can there on this earth be fools who seek for happiness, and pass by love in the pursuit?

Cora. Alonzo, I cannot thank thee—silence is the gratitude of true affection: who seeks to follow it by sound, will miss the track. [Shouts without.] Does the quick approach?

Al. No, 'tis the general, placing the guard that will surround the temple, during the sacrifice. 'Tis Rolla comes, the first and best of heroes.

ROLLA within.

Rol. Then place them on the hill fronting the Spanish camp.

[Enters

Cora. Rolla! my friend, my brother!

Al. Rolla! my friend, my benefactor! how can our lives repay the obligations which we owe thee?

Rol. Pass them in peace and bliss. Let Rolla witness it, he is overpaid.

Cora. Look on this child—he is the life-blood of my heart; but if ever he love or revere thee less than his own father, his mother's hate fall on him!

Rol. Oh, no more! What sacrifice have I made to merit gratitude? The object of my love was Cora's happiness. I see her happy. Is not my object gained; and am I not rewarded? Now, Cora, listen to a friend's advice. Thou must away; thou must seek the sacred caverns, the unprofaned recess, whither, after this day's sacrifice, our matrons, and e'en the virgins of the sun, retire.

Cora. Not secure with Alonzo and with thee?

Rol. We have heard Pizarro's plan is to surprise us. Thy presence, Cora, cannot aid, but may impede our efforts.

Cora. Impede!

Rol. Yes, yes. Thou know'st how tenderly we love thee; we, thy husband and thy friend. Art thou near us?—our thoughts, our valour—vengeance will not be our own. No advantage will be pursued, that leads us from the spot where thou art placed; no succour will be given but for the protection. The faithful lover dares not be all himself amid the war, until he knows that the beloved of his soul is absent from the peril of the fight.

Al. Thanks to my friend; 'tis this I would have urged.

Cora. This timid excess of love, producing fear instead of valour, flatters, but does not convince me: the wife is incredulous.

Rol. And is the mother unbelieving, too?

Cora. [Kisses Child.] No more. Do with me as thou pleasest. My friend, my husband! place me where thou wilt.

Al. My adored! we thank you both. [March without.] Hark! the king approaches to the sacrifice. Thou, Rolla, spokest of rumours of surprise. A servant of mine, I hear, is missing; whether surprised or treacherous, I know not.

Rol. It matters not; we are everywhere prepared.—Come, Cora, upon the altar 'mid the rocks thou'lt implore a blessing on our cause. The pious supplication of the trembling wife, and mother's heart, rises to the throne of mercy, the most resistless prayer of human homage.

[Exit.—ROLLA leads off CORA.—ALONZO takes the child by the hand, and follows.

SCENE II.—The Temple of the Sun.—A solemn March.—The Warriors and King enter.—ROLLA, ALONZO, and CORA.

Ata. Welcome, Alonzo! [To ROLLA.] Kinsman, thy hand. [To CORA.] Bless'd be the object of the happy mother's love.

Cora. May the son bless the father of his people?

Ata. In the welfare of his children lives the happiness of their king. Friends, what is the temper of our soldiers?

Rol. Such as becomes the cause which they support; their cry is, Victory or death! our king, our country, and our God!

Ata. Thou, Rolla, in the hour of peril, hast been wont to animate the spirit of their leaders, ere we proceed to consecrate the banners which thy valour knows so well to guard.

Rol. Yet never was the hour of peril near, when to inspire them words were so little needed. My brave associates! partners of my toil, my feelings, and my fame! Can Rolla's words add vigour to the virtuous energies which inspire your hearts? No! you have judged as I have, the foulness of the crafty plea by which these bold invaders would delude you. Your generous spirit has compared, as mine has, the motives which, in a war like this, can animate their minds and ours. They, by a strange frenzy driven, fight for power, for plunder, and extended rule. We, for our country, our altars, and our homes. They follow an adventurer whom they fear, and obey a power which they hate. We serve a monarch whom we love—a God whom we adore. Whene'er they move in anger, desolation tracks their progress!—Whene'er they pause in amity, affliction mourns their friendship. They boast they come but to improve our state, enlarge our thoughts, and free us from the yoke of error! Yes—they will give enlightened freedom to our minds, who are themselves the slaves of passion, avarice, and pride. They offer us their protection—yes, such protection as vultures give to lambs—covering and devouring them! They call on us to barter all of good we have inherited and proved, for the desperate chance of something better which they promise. Be our own plain answer this:—The throne we honour is the people's choice—the laws we reverence are our brave fathers' legacy—the faith we follow teaches us to live in bonds of charity with all mankind, and die with hope of bliss beyond the grave. Tell your invaders this, and tell them, too, we seek no change; and, least of all, such change as they would bring us.

[Goes to the King.—Loud shouts of the Soldiery.

Ata. [Embracing him.] Now, holy friends, ever mindful of these sacred truths, begin the sacrifice

CHORUS.—Enter Priests and Virgins.

Oh Pow'r supreme! in mercy smile
With favour on thy servant's toil!
Our hearts from guileful passions free,
Which here we render unto thee!
Thou Parent Light, but deign to hear
The voices of our feeble choir;
And this, our sacrifice of fear,
Consume with thine own hallow'd fire!

[Fire from above alights upon the altar.—ROLLA and King advance to the altar.]

Give praise, give praise, the God has heard,
Our God most awfully revered!
The altar his own flames enwreath'd!
Then be the conquering sword unsheath'd,
And victory set on Rolla's brow,
His foes to crush—to overthrow!

Ata. Our offering is accepted. [Rise, and all close round, and prostrate at the altar.—Exit chorus, &c.] Now to arms, my friends, prepare for battle!
[Goes with ROLLA.

Enter ORANO.

Ora. The enemy!

Ata. How near?

Ora. From the hill's brow, e'en now as I o'erlooked their force, suddenly I perceived the whole in motion: with eager haste they march towards our deserted camp, as if apprised of this most solemn sacrifice.

Rol. They must be met before they reach it.

Ata. [To CORA, &c.] And you, my daughters, with your dear children, away to the appointed place of safety.

Cora. Oh, Alonzo! [Embracing him.

Al. We shall meet again.

Cora. Bless us once more, ere thou leave us.

Al. Heaven protect and bless thee, my beloved; and thee, my innocent!

Ata. Haste! haste!—each moment is precious!

Cora. Farewell, Alonzo! Remember thy life is mine.

Rol. [As she is passing him.] Not one farewell to Rolla?

Cora. [Giving him her hand.] Farewell! the God of war be with thee: but bring me back Alonzo.

[Exit with the Child.

Ata. [Drawing his sword.] Now, my brethren, my sons, my friends, I know your valour. Should all success assail us, be despair the last feeling of your hearts. If successful, let mercy be the first. Alonzo, to thee I give to defend the narrow passage of the mountains. On the right of the wood be Rolla's station. For me, straight forwards will I march to meet them, and fight until I see my people saved, or they behold their monarch fall. Be the word of battle—God! and our native land

[A march.—Exit.

SCENE III.—A Wood.

Enter ROLLA and ALONZO.

Rol. Here, my friend, we separate—soon, I trust, to meet again in triumph.

Al. Or perhaps we part to meet no more. Rolla, a moment's pause; we are yet before our army's strength; one earnest word at parting.

Rol. There is in language now no word but battle.

Al. Yes, one word more—Cora!

Rol. Cora! speak!

Al. The next hour brings us—

Rol. Death or victory!

Al. It may be victory to one—death to the other.

Rol. Or both may fall.

Al. If so, my wife and child I bequeath to the protection of heaven and my king. But should I only fall, Rolla, be thou my heir.

Rol. How?

Al. Be Cora thy wife—be thou a father to my child.

Rol. Rouse thee, Alonzo! Banish these timid fancies.

Al. Rolla! I have tried in vain, and cannot fly from the foreboding which oppresses me: thou know'st it will not shake me in the fight; but give me the promise I exact.

Rol. If it be Cora's will—Yes—I promise.

[Gives his hand.]

Al. Tell her it was my last wish! and bear to her and to my son, my last blessing.

Rol. I will.—Now then to our posts, and let our swords speak for us. [They draw their swords.]

Al. For the king and Cora!

Rol. For Cora and the king!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A view of the Peruvian Camp.

Enter an Old Blind Man and a Boy.

O. Man. Have none returned to the camp?

Boy. One messenger alone. From the temple they all march'd to meet the foe.

O. Man. Hark! I hear the din of battle. O! had I still retain'd my sight, I might now have grasp'd a sword, and died a soldier's death! Are we quite alone?

Boy. Yes.—I hope my father will be safe!

O. Man. He will do his duty. I am more anxious for thee, my child.

Boy. I can stay with thee, dear grandfather.

O. Man. But should the enemy come, they will drag thee from me, my boy.

Boy. Impossible, grandfather! for they will see at once that thou art old and blind, and cannot do without me.

O. Man. Poor child! thou little know'st the hearts of these inhuman men. [Trumpets, alarms, and discharges of cannon.] Hark! the noise is near—I hear the dreadful roaring of the fiery engines of these cruel strangers. [Shouts at a distance.] At every shout, with involuntary haste, I clench my hand, and fancy still it grasps a sword! Alas! I can only serve my country by my prayers. Heaven preserve the Inca and his gallant soldiers!

Boy. O father! there are soldiers running.

O. Man. Spaniards, boy?

Boy. No, Peruvians!

O. Man. How! and flying from the field!—It cannot be.

Enter two Peruvian Soldiers.

O speak to them, boy!—Whence come you? How goes the battle?

Sol. We may not stop; we are sent for the reserve behind the hill. The day's against us.

[Exeunt Soldiers.]

O. Man. Quick, then, quick!

Boy. I see the points of lances glittering in the light.

O. Man. Those are Peruvians. Do they bend this way?

Enter a Peruvian Soldier.

Boy. Soldier, speak to my blind father.

Sol. I'm sent to tell the helpless further to retreat among the rocks: all will be lost, I fear.—The king is wounded.

O. Man. Quick, boy! Lead me to the hill where thou mayst view the plain.

[Alarms.—Old Man and Boy retire.]

Enter ATALIBA, wounded, with ORANO, Officers, and Soldiers.

Ata. My wound is bound; believe me, the hurt is nothing; I may return to the fight.

Ora. Pardon your servant, but the allotted priest who attends the sacred banner has pronounced, that the Inca's blood once shed, no blessing can await the day, until he leave the field.

Ata. Hard restraint! O! my poor brave soldiers!—Hard that I may no longer be a witness of their valour. But haste you; return to your comrades: I will not keep one soldier from his post. Go, and avenge your fallen brethren. [Exeunt ORANO, &c.] I will not repine: my own fate is the last anxiety of my heart. It is for you, my people, that I feel and fear.

[Old Man and Boy advance.]

O. Man. Did I not hear the voice of an unfortunate? Who is it complains thus?

Ata. One almost by hope forsaken.

O. Man. Is the king alive?

Ata. The king still lives.

O. Man. Then thou art not forsaken. Ataliba protects the meanest of his subjects.

Ata. And who shall protect Ataliba?

O. Man. The Immortal Powers, that protect the just. The virtues of our monarch alike secure to him the affection of his people, and the benign regard of heaven.

Ata. How impious had I murmur'd! How wondrous, thou Supreme Disposer, are thy acts! Even in this moment, which I had thought the bitterest trial of mortal suffering, thou hast infused the sweetest sensation of my life—it is the assurance of my people's love.

Boy. [Turning forward.] O father!—Stranger! see those hideous men that rush upon us yonder!

Ata. Ha! Spaniards!—And I, Ataliba—ill-fated fugitive! without a sword even to try the ransom of a monarch's life,

Enter DAVILLA, ALMAGRO, and Spanish Soldiers.

Dav. 'Tis he—our hopes are answered—I know him well—it is the king.

Alm. Away; follow with your prize. Avoid those Peruvians, though in flight. This way we may regain our line.

[Exeunt DAVILLA, ALMAGRO, &c. with ATALIBA prisoner.]

O. Man. The king! Wretched old man, that could not see his gracious form!—Boy, would thou hadst led me to the reach of those ruffians' swords!

Boy. Father! all our countrymen are flying here for refuge.

O. Man. No—to the rescue of their king—they never will desert him. [Alarms without.]

Enter Peruvian Officers and Soldiers, ORANO following.

Ora. Hold, I charge you! Rolla calls you.

Offi. We cannot combat with their dreadful engines.

Enter ROLLA.

Rol. Hold, recreants! cowards!—What, fear ye death, and fear not shame? By my soul's fury, I cleave to the earth the first of you that stirs, or plunge your dastard swords into your leader's heart, that he no more may witness your disgrace. Where is the king?

Ora. From this old man and boy I learn, that the detachment of the enemy, which you observed so suddenly to quit the field, have succeeded in surprising him; they are yet in sight.

Rol. And bear the Inca off a prisoner!—Hear this, ye base, disloyal rout! Look there!—the dust you see hangs on the bloody Spaniard's track, dragging, with ruffian taunts, your king, your father—Ataliba in bondage! Now fly and seek your own vile safety, if you can!

O. Man. Bless the voice of Rolla!—and bless the stroke I once lamented, but which now spares these extinguished eyes the shame of seeing the pale, trembling wretches who dare not follow Rolla, though to save their king!

Rol. Shrink ye from the thunder of the foe, and fall ye not at this rebuke!—Oh! had ye each but one drop of the loyal blood which gushes to waste through the brave heart of this sightless veteran! Eternal shame pursue you if you desert me now!—But do—alone I go—alone—to die with glory by my monarch's side!

Soldiers. Rolla! we'll follow thee!

[ROLLA rushes out, followed by ORANO, &c.]

O. Man. O, godlike Rolla! And thou, sun, send from thy clouds avenging lightning to his aid!—Haste, my boy, ascend some height, and tell to my impatient terror what thou seest!

Boy. I can climb this rock, and the tree above. [Ascends a rock.] O, now I see them—now—yes—and the Spaniards turning by the steep.

O. Man. Rolla follows them?

Boy. He does—he does—he moves like an arrow!—now he waves his arm to our soldiers. [Report of cannon.] Now there is fire and smoke.

O. Man. Yes, fire is the weapon of those fiends.

Boy. The wind blows off the smoke; they are all mixed together.

O. Man. Seest thou the king?

Boy. Yes! Rolla is near him!—His sword sheds fire as he strikes!

O. Man. Bless thee, Rolla! Spare not the monsters.

Boy. Father! father! the Spaniards fly!—O, now I see the king embracing Rolla.

[Shouts of victory, flourish of trumpets, &c.]

O. Man. [Falls on his knees.] Fountain of life! how can my exhausted breath bear to thee thanks for this one moment of my life! My boy, come down and let me kiss thee!—My strength is gone—

[Boy descends.]

Boy. Let me help thee, father. Thou tremblest so—

O. Man. 'Tis with transport, boy!

[Boy leads him off.—Shouts, flourish, &c.]

Enter ATALIBA, ROLLA, and Peruvians.

Ata. In the name of my people, the saviour of whose sovereign thou hast this day been, accept this emblem of his gratitude. [Giving ROLLA his sun of diamonds.] The tear that falls upon it may for a moment dim its lustre, yet does it not impair the value of the gift.

Rol. It was the hand of heaven, not mine, that saved my king.

Enter Peruvian Officer.

Rol. Now, soldier, from Alonzo?

Offi. Alonzo's genius soon repaired the panic which early broke into our ranks; but I fear we have to mourn Alonzo's loss: his eager spirit urged him too far in the pursuit.

Ata. How! Alonzo slain! O! victory, dearly purchased!

Rol. O Cora! who shall tell thee this?

Ata. Rolla, our friend is lost—our native country saved! Our private sorrows must yield to the public claim for triumph. Now go we to fulfil the first, the most sacred duty which belongs to victory—to dry the widowed and the orphaned tears of those whose brave protectors have perished in their country's cause.

[Triumphant march.—King takes the hand of ROLLA, and exeunt, Soldiers following.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Wild Retreat.—CORA sitting with her Child in the background, and Wives and Children discovered scattered about.

GLEE.—Women.

Fly away, Time, nor be the anxious hour delay'd—
Fly away, Time, that soothes the heart by grief
dismay'd;

Should ghastly death appear in view,

We can dare it;

With friends we love, so brave, so true,

We will share it.

Fly away, Time, &c.

A triumphant march of the army is heard at a distance.—CORA rises and looks anxiously about.

Wom. Hush! hush! don't you hear?

A distant march assails the ear;—

Hark! louder still from yonder hill

Increasing sounds with terror fill—

Enter Warriors, singing.—CORA attentively examines them all as they pass.

Victory now has made us free;

We haste, we haste, our friends to see!

Ata. Thanks, thanks, my children! I am well, believe it; the blood once stopped, my wound was nothing.

CORA at length approaches ROLLA, who appears to have been mournfully avoiding her.—Where is Alonzo?

[ROLLA turns away in silence.]

Cora. [Falling at the King's feet.] Give me my husband, give this child his father!

Ata. I grieve that Alonzo is not here.

Cora. Hoped you to find him?

Ata. Most anxiously.

Cora. Ataliba! is he not dead?

Ata. No! the gods will have heard our prayers.

Cora. [Starts up.] Is he not dead, Ataliba?

Ata. He lives—in my heart.

Cora. Oh, king! torture me not thus!—Speak out, is this child fatherless?

Ata. Dearest Cora! do not thus dash aside the little hope that still remains.

Cora. The little hope! yet still there is hope! [Turns to ROLLA.] Speak to me, Rolla; thou art the friend of truth.

Rolla. Alonzo has not been found.

Cora. Not found! What mean'st thou? Will not thou, Rolla, tell me true? Oh! let me not hear the thunder rolling at a distance; let the bolt fall and crush my brain at once.—Say not that he is not found; say at once that he is dead.

Rolla. Then should I say false.

Cora. False! blessings on thee for that word! But snatch me from this terrible suspense. [CORA and Child kneel to ROLLA.] Lift up thy little hands, my child; perhaps thy ignorance may plead better than thy mother's agony.

Rolla. Alonzo is taken prisoner.

Cora. Prisoner! and by the Spaniards? Pizarro's prisoner? Then is he dead.

Ata. Hope better—the richest ransom which our realm can yield, a herald shall this instant bear.

Cora. Now one boon more, beloved monarch. Let me go with the herald.

Ata. Remember, Cora, thou art not a wife only, but a mother too: hazard not thy own honour, and the safety of thy infant. Among these barbarians the sight of thy youth, thy loveliness, and innocence, would but rivet faster thy Alonzo's chains, and rack his heart with added fears for thee. Wait, Cora, the return of the herald.

Cora. Teach me how to live till then.

Ata. Now we go to offer to the gods thanks for our victory, and prayers for Alonzo's safety.

[March and procession.—Exit King and Army.]

—CORA and Child, followed by ROLLA.

SCENE II.—The Wood.

Enter CORA and Child.

Cora. Mild innocence! what will become of thee?

Enter ROLLA.

Rolla. Cora, I attend thy summons at the appointed spot.

Cora. Oh my child, my boy!—hast thou still a father?

Rolla. Cora, can thy child be fatherless, while Rolla lives?

Cora. Will he not soon want a mother too? For canst thou think I will survive Alonzo's loss?

Rolla. Yes! for his child's sake.—Yes, as thou didst love Alonzo, Cora, listen to Alonzo's friend.

Cora. Thou bid'st me listen to the world.—Who was not Alonzo's friend?

Rolla. His parting words—

Cora. His parting words! [Wildly.] Oh, speak!

Rolla. Consign'd to me two precious trusts—his blessing to his son, and a last request to thee.

Cora. His last request! his last!—Oh, name it!
Rolla. If I fall, said he—and sad forebodings shook him while he spoke—promise to take Cora for thy wife; be thou a father to my child. I pledged my word to him, and we parted. Observe me, Cora, I repeat this only as my faith to do so was given to Alonzo—for myself, I neither cherish claim nor hope.

Cora. Ha! does my reason fail me, or what is this horrid light that presses on my brain? Oh, Alonzo, it may be thou hast fallen a victim to thy own guileless heart—hadst thou been silent, hadst thou not made a fatal legacy of these wretched charms—

Rolla. Cora! what hateful suspicion has possessed thy mind?

Cora. Yes, yes, 'tis clear—his spirit was ensnared; he was led to the fatal spot, where mortal valour could not front a host of murderers.—He fell—in vain did he exclaim for help to Rolla. At a distance thou look'st on and smil'st—Thou couldst have saved him—couldst, but didst not.

Rolla. Oh, glorious sun! can I have deserved this? Cora, rather bid me strike this sword into my heart—

Cora. No! live! live for love! for that love thou seekest: whose blossoms are to shoot from the bleeding grave of thy betrayed and slaughtered friend!—But thou hast borne to me the last words of my Alonzo! now hear mine—Sooner shall this boy draw poison from this tortured breast—sooner would I link me to the pallid corpse of the meanest wretch that perish'd with Alonzo, than he call Rolla father—than I call Rolla husband!

Rolla. Yet call me what I am—thy friend, thy protector!

Cora. [Distraughtly.] Away! I have no protector but my God! [Falls on her knees.—ROLLA steps back.] With this child in my arms will I hasten to the field of slaughter.—There with these hands will I turn up to the light every mangled body—seeking, however disfigured, the sweet smile of my Alonzo—with fearful cries I will shriek out his name till my veins snap! If the smallest spark of life remain, he will know the voice of his Cora, open for a moment his unshrouded eyes, and bless me with a last look. [Rises.] But if we find him not—Oh! then, my boy, we will to the Spanish camp—that look of thine will win my passage through a thousand swords—they too are men. Is there a heart that could drive back the wife that seeks her bleeding husband; or the innocent babe that cries for his imprisoned father? No, no, my child, everywhere we shall be safe. A wretched mother, bearing a poor orphan in her arms, has Nature's passport through the world. Yes, yes, my son, we'll go and seek thy father.

[Passes ROLLA, and exit with the Child.]

Rolla. [After a pause of agitation.] Could I have merited one breath of thy reproaches, Cora, I should be the wretch—I think I was not formed to be. Her safety must be my present purpose—then to convince her she has wronged me! [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Pizarro's Tent.—PIZARRO traversing the stage in agitation.

Piz. Well, capricious idol, Fortune, be my ruin thy work and boast. To myself I will still be true.—Yet, ere I fall, grant me thy smile to prosper in one act of vengeance, and be that smile Alonzo's death.

Enter ELVIRA.

Who's there? Who dares intrude? Why does my guard neglect their duty?

Elv. Thy guard did what they could—but they knew their duty better than to enforce authority, when I refused obedience.

Piz. And what is it thou desirest?

Elv. To see how a hero bears misfortune. Thou, Pizarro, art not now collected—nor thyself.

Piz. Wouldst thou, I should rejoice that the spears of the enemy, led by accurs'd Alonzo, have pierced the bravest hearts of my followers?

Elv. No!—I would have thee cold and dark as the night that follows the departed storm; still and sullen as the awful pause that precedes nature's convulsion: yet I would have thee feel assured, that a new morning shall arise, when the warrior's spirit shall stalk forth—nor fear the future, nor lament the past.

Piz. Woman! Elvira!—why had not all my men hearts like thine?

Elv. Then would thy brows have this day worn the crown of Quito.

Piz. Oh! hope fails me while that scourge of my life and fame, Alonzo, leads the enemy.

Elv. Pizarro, I am come to probe the hero farther: not now his courage, but his magnanimity—Alonzo is thy prisoner.

Piz. How!

Elv. 'Tis certain: Valverde saw him even now dragged in chains within thy camp. I chose to bring thee this intelligence myself.

Piz. Bless thee, Elvira, for the news!—Alonzo in my power!—Then I am the conqueror—the victory is mine!

Elv. Pizarro, this is savage and unmanly triumph. Believe me, thou raisest impatience in my mind to see the man whose valour and whose genius awe Pizarro; whose misfortunes are Pizarro's triumph; whose bondage is Pizarro's safety.

Piz. Guard!—Drag here the Spanish prisoner, Alonzo!—Quick, bring the traitor here!

Elv. What shall be his fate?

Piz. Death! death! in lingering torments! protracted to the last stretch that burning vengeance can devise, and fainting life sustain.

Elv. Shame on thee! Wilt thou have it said, that the Peruvians found Pizarro could not conquer till Alonzo felt that he could murder?

Piz. Be it said—I care not! His fate is sealed. Why this interest for a stranger? What is Alonzo's fate to thee?

Elv. His fate!—nothing!—thy glory, every thing!—Think'st thou I could love thee, stripp'd of fame, of honour, and a just renown!—Know me better.

Piz. Thou shouldst have known me better. Thou shouldst have known that, once provoked to hate, I am for ever fixed in vengeance—[Alonzo is brought in, in chains, guarded, Pizarro turns and surveys him.] Welcome, welcome, Don Alonzo de Molina; 'tis long since we have met; thy mended looks should speak a life of rural idolence. How is it, that amid the toils and cares of war, thou dost preserve the healthful bloom of careless ease? Tell me thy secret?

Al. Thou wilt not profit by it. Whate'er the toils or cares of war, peace still is here.

[Putting his hand to his heart.]

Piz. Sarcastic boy!

Elv. Thou art answered rightly. Why sport with the unfortunate?

Piz. And thou art wedded too, I hear; ay, and the father of a lovely boy—the heir, no doubt, of all his father's loyalty; of all his mother's faith.

Al. The heir, I trust, of all his father's scorn of fraud, oppression, and hypocrisy—the heir, I hope, of all his mother's virtue, gentleness, and truth—the heir, I trust, to all Pizarro's hate.

Piz. Really! Now do I feel for this poor orphan; for fatherless to-morrow's sun shall see that child.

Alonzo, thy hours are numbered.

Elv. Pizarro—no!

Piz. Hence—or dread my anger.

Elv. I will not hence; nor do I dread thy anger.

Al. [To ELVIRA.] Generous loveliness! spare thy unavailing pity.—Seek not to thwart the tiger with his prey beneath his fangs.

Piz. Audacious rebel! Thou art a renegade from thy monarch and thy God!

Al. 'Tis false.

Piz. Art thou not, tell me, a deserter from thy country's legions, and, with vile heathens leagued, hast thou not warred against thy native land?

Al. No! Deserter I am none! I was not born among robbers! pirates! murderers!—When those legions, lured by the abhorred lust of gold, and by thy foul ambition urged, forgot the honour of Castilians, and forsook the duties of humanity, they deserted me. I have not warred against my native land, but against those who have usurp'd its power. The banners of my country, when first I followed arms beneath them, were Justice, Faith, and Mercy. If these are beaten down, and trampled under foot—I have no country, nor exists the power entitled to reproach me with revolt.

Piz. The power to judge and punish thou at least exists.

Al. Where are my judges?

Piz. Thou wouldst appeal to the war-council?

Al. If the good Las Casas have yet a seat there, yes; if not, I appeal to heaven!

Piz. And to impose upon the folly of Las Casas, what would be the excuses of thy treason?

Elv. The folly of Las Casas!—Such, doubtless, his mild precepts seem to thy hard-hearted wisdom!—O! would I might have lived as I will die, a sharer in the follies of Las Casas!

Al. To him I should not need to urge the foul barbarities which drove me from your side; but I would gently lead him by the hand through all the lovely fields of Quito; there, in many a spot, where late was barrenness and waste, I would show him how now the opening blossom, blade, or perfumed bud, sweet bashful pledges of delicious harvest, waiting their incense to the ripening sun, give cheerful promise to the hope of industry. This, I would say, is my work! I would show him many an eye, and many a hand, by gentleness from error won, raised in pure devotion to the true and only God!—this, too, I could tell him is Alonzo's work! Then would Las Casas clasp me in his aged arms; from his uplifted eyes a tear of gracious thankfulness would fall upon my head, and that one blessed drop would be to me at once this world's best proof, that I had acted rightly here, and surest hope of my Creator's mercy and reward hereafter.

Elv. Happy, virtuous Alonzo! And thou, Pizarro, wouldst appal, with fear of death, a man who thinks and acts as he does?

Piz. Daring, obstinate enthusiast! But know, the pious blessing of thy preceptor's tears does not avail thee here; he has fled like thee—like thee, no doubt, to join the foes of Spain. The perilous trial of the next reward thouapest, is nearer than perhaps thou'st thought; for, by my country's wrongs, and by mine own, to-morrow's sun shall see thy death.

Elv. Hold!—Pizarro, hear me!—If not always justly, at least act always greatly. Name not thy country's wrongs—'tis plain they have no share in thy resentment. Thy fury 'gainst this youth is private hate, and deadly personal revenge; if this be so—and even now thy detected conscience in that look avows it—profane not the name of justice or thy country's cause, but let him arm, and bid him to the field on equal terms.

Piz. Officious advocate for treason—peace! Bear him hence—he knows his sentence.

[Retires back.]

Al. [To Piz.] Thy revenge is eager, and I'm thankful for it;—to me thy haste is mercy. [To Elv.] For thee, sweet pleader in misfortune's cause, accept my parting thanks. This camp is not thy proper sphere. Wert thou among yon savages, as they are called, thou'dst find companions more congenial to thy heart.

Piz. [Returns.]. Yes; she shall bear the tidings of thy death to Cora.

Al. Inhuman man! that pang at least might have been spared me: but thy malice shall not shake my constancy. I go to death—many shall bless, and none shall curse my memory. Thou still wilt live, and still wilt be—Pizarro. [Exit, guarded.]

Elv. Now, by the indignant scorn that burns upon my cheek, my soul is shamed and sickened at the meanness of thy vengeance.

Piz. What has thy romantic folly aimed at? He is mine enemy, and in my power.

Elv. He is in your power, and therefore is no more an enemy. Pizarro, I demand not of thee justice—I ask not from thee nobleness of mind—I require only just dealing to the fame thou hast acquired: be not the assassin of thine own renown. Do not act that which, howe'er thy present power may gloss it to the world, will make thee hateful to all future ages—accursed and scorned by posterity.

Piz. And should posterity applaud my deeds, think'st thou my mouldering bones would rattle then with transport in my tomb? This is renown for visionary boys to dream of—I understand it not. The fame I value shall uplift my living estimation—o'er-bear with popular support the envy of my foes—advance my purposes, and aid my power.

Elv. Pizarro, thou no longer lov'st me.

Piz. It is not so, Elvira. But what might I not suspect—this wondrous interest for a stranger! Take back thy reproach.

Elv. No, Pizarro; as yet I am not lost to thee—one string still remains, and binds me to thy fate. Do not, I conjure thee—do not, for mine own sake, tear it asunder—shed not Alonzo's blood!

Piz. My resolution is fixed.

Elv. Even though that moment lost thee Elvira for ever?

Piz. Even so.

Elv. Pizarro, if not to honour, if not to humanity, yet listen to affection; bear some memory of the sacrifices I have made for thy sake. Have I not for thee quitted my parents, my friends, my fame, my native land? When escaping, did I not risk, in rushing to thy arms, to bury myself in the bo-

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XIV.

some of the deep? Have I not shared all thy perils—heavy storms at sea, and frightful 'scapes on shore? Even on this dreadful day, amid the rout of battle, who remained firm and constant at Pizarro's side? Who presented her bosom as his shield to the assailing foe?

Piz. 'Tis truly spoken all. In love thou art thy sex's miracle—in war the soldier's pattern—and therefore my whole heart and half my acquisitions are thy right.

Elv. Convince me I possess the first—I exchange all title to the latter, for—mercy to Alonzo.

Piz. No more! Had I intended to prolong his doom, each word thou utterest now would hasten on his fate.

Elv. Alonzo then at morn will die?

Piz. Think'st thou yon sun will set! as surely at his rising shall Alonzo die.

Elv. Then be it done—the string is cracked—sundered for ever. But mark me—thou hast heretofore had cause, 'tis true, to doubt my resolution, howe'er offended—but mark me now—the lips which, cold and jeering, barbing revenge with rancorous mockery, can insult a fallen enemy, shall never more receive the pledge of love: the arm which, unshaken by its bloody purpose, shall assign to needless torture the victim who avows his heart, never more shall press the hand of faith! Pizarro, scorn not my words—beware thou slightest them not! I feel how noble are the motives which now animate my thoughts—who could not feel as I do, I condemn: you, feeling so, yet would not act as I shall, I despise.

Piz. [With a smile of contempt.] I have heard thee, Elvira, and know well the noble motives which inspire thee, fit advocate in virtue's cause! Believe me, I pity thy tender feelings for the youth Alonzo! He dies at sunrise! [Exit.]

Elv. 'Tis well! 'tis just I should be humble—I had forgot myself, and in the cause of innocence assumed the tone of virtue. 'Twas fit I should be rebuked—and by Pizarro. Fall, fall, ye few reluctant drops of weakness—the last these eyes shall ever shed. How a woman can love, Pizarro, thou hast known too well—how she can hate, thou hast yet to learn. Yes, thou undaunted! Thou, whom yet no mortal hazard has appalled! Thou, who on Panama's brow didst make alliance with the raging elements, that tore the silence of that horrid night—when thou didst follow, as thy pioneer, the crashing thunder's drift, and, stalking o'er the trembling earth, didst plant thy banner by the red volcano's mouth! Thou, who when battling on the sea, and thy brave ship was blown to splinters, wast seen—as thou didst bestride a fragment of the smoking wreck—to wave thy glittering sword above thy head—as thou wouldst defy the world in that extremity! Come, fearless man—now meet the last and felldest peril of thy life:—meet, and survive—an injured woman's fury, if thou canst! [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Dungeon.—ALONZO in chains.—A Sentinel walking near.

Al. For the last time, I have beheld the shadow'd ocean close upon the light. For the last time, through my cleft dungeon's roof, I now behold the quivering lustre of the stars. For the last time, oh, Sun! (and soon the hour) I shall behold thy rising, and thy level beams melting the pale mists of morn to glittering dew-drops. Then comes my death, and in the morning of my day, I fall, which—No, Alonzo, date not the life which thou hast run, by the mean reck'ning of the hours and days which thou hast breathed: a life spent worthily should be measured by a nobler line; by deeds, not years. Then wouldst thou murmur not, but bless Providence, which in so short a span made thee the instrument of wide and spreading blessings, to the helpless and oppressed! Though sinking in decrepid age, he prematurely falls, whose memory records no benefit conferred by him on man. They only have lived long, who have lived virtuously.

Enter a Soldier—shows the Sentinel a passport, who withdraws.

Al. What bear you there?

Sol. These refreshments I was ordered to leave in your dungeon.

Al. By whom ordered?

Sol. By the Lady Elvira; she will be here herself before the dawn.

Al. Bear back to her my humblest thanks; and take thou the refreshments, friend. I need them not.

Sol. I have served under you, Don Alonzo. Pardon my saying, that my heart pities you. [Exit.]

Al. In Pizarro's camp, to pity the unfortunate, no doubt, requires forgiveness. [Looking out.] Surely, even now, thin streaks of glimmering light steal on the darkness of the east. If so, my life is but one hour more. I will not watch the coming dawn; but in the darkness of my cell, my last prayer to thee, Power Supreme! shall be for my wife and child! Grant them to dwell in innocence and peace; grant health and purity of mind—all else is worthless. [Enters the cavern.]

Sen. Who's there? answer quickly! who's there?

Rol. [Within.] A friar come to visit your prisoner.

Enters, disguised as a Monk.

Rol. Inform me, friend, is not Alonzo, the Spanish prisoner, confined in this dungeon?

Sen. He is.

Rol. I must speak with him.

Sen. You must not. [Stopping him with his spear.]

Rol. He is my friend.

Sen. Not if he were thy brother.

Rol. What is to be his fate?

Sen. He dies at sunrise.

Rol. Ha! Then I am come in time.

Sen. Just—to witness his death.

Rol. Soldier, I must speak to him.

Sen. Back, back.—It is impossible.

Rol. I do entreat thee, but for one moment.

Sen. Thou entreat'st in vain—my orders are most strict.

Rol. Even now, I saw a messenger go hence.

Sen. He brought a pass which we are all accustomed to obey.

Rol. Look on this wedge of massive gold—look on these precious gems. In thy own land they will be wealth for thee and thine—beyond thy hope or wish. Take them—they are thine. Let me but pass one minute with Alonzo.

Sen. Away!—wouldst thou corrupt me? Me! an old Castilian! I know my duty better.

Rol. Soldier!—hast thou a wife?

Sen. I have.

Rol. Hast thou children?

Sen. Four—honest, lovely boys.

Rol. Where didst thou leave them?

Sen. In my native village; even in the cot where myself was born.

Rol. Dost thou love thy children and thy wife?

Sen. Do I love them!—God knows my heart—I do.

Rol. Soldier! imagine thou wert doomed to die a cruel death in this strange land. What would be thy last request?

Sen. That some of my comrades should carry my dying blessing to my wife and children.

Rol. Oh! but if that comrade was at thy prison-gate, and should there be told—thy fellow-soldier dies at sunrise, yet thou shalt not for a moment see him, nor shalt thou bear his dying blessing to his poor children or his wretched wife, what wouldst thou think of him who thus could drive thy comrade from the door?

Sen. How!

Rol. Alonzo has a wife and child. I am come but to receive for her, and for her babe, the last blessing of my friend.

Sen. Go in. [Shoulders his spear, and walks away.]

Rol. Oh, holy Nature! thou dost never plead in vain. There is not, of our earth, a creature bearing form, and life, human or savage—native of the forest wild, of giddy air—around whose parent bosom, thou hast not a cord entwined of power to tie them to their offspring's claims, and at thy will to draw them back to thee. On iron pinions borne, the blood-stained vulture cleaves the storm, yet is the plumage closest to her breast, soft as the cygnet's down, and o'er her unshell'd brood the murm'ring ring-dove sits not more gently!—Yes, now he is beyond the porch, barring the outer gate! Alonzo! Alonzo! my friend! Ha! In gentle sleep! Alonzo—rise!

Al. How! is my hour elapsed? Well, I am ready.

Rol. Alonzo—know me.

Al. What voice is that?

Rol. 'Tis Rolla's.

Al. Rolla! my friend! [Takes off his disguise. Embraces him.] Heavens!—how couldst thou pass the guard? Did this habit—

Rol. There is not a moment to be lost in words: this disguise I tore from the dead body of a friar, as I pass'd our field of battle: it has gained me entrance to thy dungeon; now take it, thou, and fly.

Al. And Rolla—

Rol. Will remain here in thy place.

Al. And die for me? No! Rather eternal tortures rack me.

Rol. I shall not die, Alonzo. It is thy life Pizarro seeks, not Rolla's; and from my prison soon will thy arm deliver me; or, should it be otherwise, I am as a blighted plantain, standing alone amid the sandy desert. Nothing seeks or lives beneath my shelter. Thou art—a husband and a father—the being of a lovely wife and helpless infant hangs upon thy life. Go! go, Alonzo! Go, to save, not thyself, but Cora and thy child!

Al. Urge me not thus, my friend; I had prepared to die in peace.

Rol. To die in peace! devoting her thou'st sworn to live for, to madness, misery, and death! For be assured the state I left her in forbids all hope, but from thy quick return.

Al. Oh God!

Roll. If thou art yet irresolute, Alonzo, now heed me well. I think thou hast not known that Rolla ever pledg'd his word, and shrunk from its fulfilment. And by the heart of truth I swear, if thou art proudly obstinate to deny thy friend the transport of preserving Cora's life, in thee, no power that sways the will of man shall stir me hence; and thou't have the desperate triumph of seeing Rolla perish by thy side, with the assured conviction that Cora and thy child—are lost for ever!

Al. Oh, Rolla! thou distractest me!

Roll. Begone! A moment's further pause, and all is lost. The dawn approaches. Fear not for me; I will treat with Pizarro, as for surrender and submission; I shall gain time, doubt not, while thou, with a chosen band, passing the secret way, mayst at night return, release thy friend, and bear him back in triumph. Yes, hasten, dear Alonzo. Even now I hear the frantic Cora call thee! Haste, Alonzo!—Haste!—Haste!

Al. Rolla, I fear thy friendship drives me from honour, and from right.

Roll. Did Rolla ever counsel dishonour to his friend?

Al. Oh! my preserver!

[Embracing him.

Roll. I feel thy warm tears dropping on my cheek.—Go! I am rewarded. [Throws the Friar's garment over Alonzo.] There, conceal thy face; and, that they may not clank, hold fast thy chains. Now, God be with thee!

Al. At night we meet again. Then, so aid me Heaven! I return to save, or perish with thee!

[Exit.

Roll. [Looking after him.] He has passed the outer porch—he is safe! he will soon embrace his wife and child! Now, Cora, didst thou not wrong me? This is the first time throughout my life, I ever deceived man. Forgive me, God of Truth! if I am wrong. Alonzo flatters himself that we shall meet again! Yes—there!—[Lifting his hands to heaven.]—Assuredly we shall meet again; there possess, in peace, the joys of everlasting love and friendship—on earth, imperfect and embitter'd. I will retire, lest the guard return before Alonzo may have passed their lines.

[Retires into the cavern.

Enter ELVIRA.

Elv. No, not Pizarro's brutal taunts, not the glowing admiration which I feel for this noble youth, shall raise an interest in my harassed bosom, which honour would not sanction. If he reject the vengeance my heart has sworn against the tyrant, whose death alone can save this land, yet shall the delight be mine, to restore him to his Cora's arms, to his dear child, and to the unoffending people, whom his virtues guide, and valour guards. Alonzo, come forth!

Enter ROLLA.

Ha! who art thou? Where is Alonzo?

Roll. Alonzo's fled.

Elv. Fled!

Roll. Yes; and he must not be pursued. Pardon this roughness [seizing her hand], but a moment's precious to Alonzo's flight.

Elv. What if I call the guard?

Roll. Do so; Alonzo still gains time.

Elv. What if thus I free myself?

[Shows a dagger.

Roll. Strike it to my heart! Still, with the convulsive grasp of death I'll hold thee fast.

Elv. Release me! I give my faith, I never will alarm the guard, nor cause pursuit.

Roll. At once, I trust thy word. A feeling boldness in those eyes assures me that thy soul is noble.

Elv. What is thy name? speak freely; by my order the guard is remov'd beyond the outer porch.

Roll. My name is Rolla.

Elv. The Peruvian leader?

Roll. I was so yesterday. To-day, the Spaniard's captive.

Elv. And friendship for Alonzo moved thee to this act?

Roll. Alonzo is my friend. I am prepared to die for him. Yet is the cause a motive stronger far than friendship.

Elv. One only passion else could urge such generous rashness.

Roll. And that is—

Elv. Love?

Roll. True!

Elv. Gallant, ingenuous Rolla! Know that my purpose here was thine; and were I to save thy friend—

Roll. How! a woman blessed with gentleness and courage, and yet not Cora?

Elv. Does Rolla think so meanly of all female hearts?

Roll. Not so—you are worse and better than we are!

Elv. Were I to save thee, Rolla, from the tyrant's vengeance—restore thee to thy native land—and thy native land to peace—wouldst thou not rank Elvira with the good?

Roll. To judge the action I must know the means.

Elv. Take this dagger.

Roll. How to be used?

Elv. I will conduct thee to the tent where fell Pizarro sleeps; the scourge of innocence—the terror of thy race—the fiend that desolates thy afflicted country.

Roll. Hast thou not been injured by Pizarro?

Elv. Deeply as scorn and insult can inflame thy deadly venom.

Roll. And thou ask'st that I shall murder him in his sleep!

Elv. Would he not have murdered Alonzo in his chains? He that sleeps and he that's bound are equally defenceless. Hear me, Rolla: so may I prosper in this perilous act, as searching my full heart I have put by all rancorous motive of private vengeance there, and feel that I advance to my dread purpose in the cause of human nature, and at the call of sacred justice.

Roll. The God of justice sanctifies no evil as a step towards good. Great actions cannot be achieved by wicked means.

Elv. Then, Peruvian, since thou dost feel so coldly for thy country's wrongs, this hand, though it revolt my soul, shall strike the blow.

Roll. Then is thy destruction certain, and for Peru thou perishest! Give me the dagger!

Elv. Now follow me; but first—and dreadful is the hard necessity—thou must strike down the guard.

Roll. The soldier who was on duty here?

Elv. Yes, him; else, seeing thee, the alarm will be instant.

Roll. And I must stab that soldier as I pass?—Take back thy dagger.

Elv. Rolla!

Roll. That soldier, mark me, is a man! All are not men that bear the human form. He refused my prayers—refused my gold—denying to admit me—till his own feelings bribed him. For my nation's safety, I would not harm that man.

Elv. Then he must with us. I will answer for his safety.

Rol. Be that plainly understood between us: for, whatever betide our enterprise, I will not risk a hair of that man's head, to save my heartstrings from consuming fire. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Inside of PIZARRO's Tent.—

PIZARRO on a couch, at the back of stage.

Piz. [In his sleep.] No mercy, traitor. Now at his heart! Stand off there, you—let me see him bleed! Ha! ha! ha! Let me hear that groan again.

Enter ROLLA and ELVIRA.

Elv. There!—Now lose not a moment.

Rol. Thou must leave me now. This scene of blood fits not a woman's presence.

Elv. But a moment's pause may—

Rol. Go!—return to thy own tent, and return not here. I will come to thee. Be thou not known in this business, I implore thee!

Elv. I will withdraw the guard that waits.

[Exit ELVIRA.]

Rol. Now have I in my power the accursed destroyer of my country's peace: yet tranquilly he rests. God! can this man sleep?

Piz. [In his sleep.] Away! away! hideous fiends! Tear not my bosom thus!

Rol. No: I was in error—the balm of sweet repose he never more can know. Look here, ambition's fools! Ye, by whose inhuman pride the bleeding sacrifice of nations is held as nothing, behold the rest of the guilty! He is in my power; and one blow!—No! my heart and hand refuse the act: Rolla cannot be an assassin!—Yet Elvira must be saved.—[Approaches the couch.]
Pizarro! awake!

Piz. [Starts up.] Who?—Guard!—

Rol. Speak not—another word is thy death—call not for aid! this arm will be swifter than thy guard.

Piz. Who art thou? and what is thy will?

Rol. I am thine enemy! Peruvian Rolla! Thy death is not my will, or I could have slain thee sleeping.

Piz. Speak, what else?

Rol. Now thou art at my mercy, answer me! Did a Peruvian ever yet wrong or injure thee, or any of thy nation? Didst thou, or any of thy nation, ever yet show mercy to a Peruvian in thy power? Now shalt thou feel, and if thou hast a heart, thou'lt feel it keenly—a Peruvian's vengeance!—[Drops the dagger at his feet.]
—There!

Piz. Is it possible!

Rol. Can Pizarro be surprised at this? I thought, forgiveness of injuries had been the Christian's precept. Thou see'st, at least, it is the Peruvian's practice.

Piz. Rolla, thou hast indeed surpris'd—subdued me.

[Retires.]

Re-enter ELVIRA.

Elv. [Not seeing PIZARRO.] Is it done? Is he dead?—[Sees PIZARRO.] How! still living! Then I am lost! And for you, wretched Peruvians! mercy is no more! Oh, Rolla! treacherous or cowardly!

Piz. How can it be, that—

Rol. Away! Elvira speaks she knows not what!—Leave me [to ELVIRA], I conjure thee, with Pizarro.

Elv. How! Rolla, dost thou think I shall retract—or that I meanly will deny, that in thy hand I placed a poniard to be plunged into that tyrant's heart? No! my sole regret is, that I trusted to thy weakness, and did not strike the blow myself. Too soon thou'lt learn that mercy to that man is direct cruelty to all thy race!

Piz. Guard! quick! a guard, to seize this frantic woman.

Elv. Yes, a guard! I call them too! And soon I know they'll lead me to my death. But think not, Pizarro, the fury of thy flashing eyes shall awe me for a moment! Nor think that woman's anger, or the feelings of an injured heart, prompted me to this design. No! had I been only influenced so, thus failing, shame and remorse would weigh me down. But, though defeated and destroyed, as now I am, such is the greatness of the cause that urged me, I shall perish, glorying in the attempt, and my last breath of life shall speak the proud avowal of my purpose—to have rescued millions of innocents from the blood-thirsty tyranny of one—by ridding the insulted world of thee!

Rol. Had the act been noble as the motive, Rolla would not have shrunk from its performance.

Enter Guards.

Piz. Seize this discovered fiend, who sought to kill your leader.

Elv. Touch me not, at the peril of your souls; I am your prisoner, and will follow you. But thou, thy triumphant leader, first shalt hear me. Yet, first, for thee, Rolla, accept my forgiveness; even had I been the victim of thy nobleness of heart, I should have admired thee for it. But 'twas myself provoked my doom. Thou wouldst have shielded me. Let not thy contempt follow me to the grave. Didst thou but know the fiend-like arts by which this hypocrite first undermined the virtue of a guileless heart! how, even in the pious sanctuary wherein I dwelt, by corruption and by fraud he practised upon those in whom I most confided—till my distempered fancy led me, step by step, into the abyss of guilt—

Piz. Why am I not obeyed? Tear her hence!

Elv. 'Tis past—but didst thou know my story, Rolla, thou wouldst pity me.

Rol. From my soul I do pity thee.

Piz. Villains! drag her to the dungeon!—prepare the torture instantly.

Elv. Soldiers—but a moment more. 'Tis to applaud your general; it is to tell the astonished world, that, for once, Pizarro's sentence is an act of justice; yes, rack me with the sharpest tortures that ever agoniz'd the human frame; it will be justice. Yes, bid the minions of thy fury wrench forth the sinews of these arms that have caressed, and—even defended thee! Bid them pour burning metal into the bleeding cases of these eyes, that so oft, oh God! have hung with love and homage on thy look; then approach me, bound on the abhorred wheel, there glut thy savage eyes with the convulsive spasms of that dishonoured bosom, which was once thy pillow!—Yet will I bear it all; for it will be justice, all! And, when thou shalt bid them tear me to my death, hoping that thy unshrinking ears may at last be feasted with the music of my cries, I will not utter one shriek or groan;—but to the last gasp, my body's patience shall deride thy vengeance, as my soul defies thy power.

Piz. Hear'st thou the wretch whose hands were even now prepared for murder?

Rol. Yes! And if her accusation's false, thou wilt not shrink from hearing her: if true, thy barbarity cannot make her suffer the pangs thy conscience will inflict on thee.

Elv. And now, farewell, world! Rolla, farewell! Farewell, thou condemned of Heaven! [To Pizarro] for repentance and remorse, I know, will never touch thy heart. We shall meet again. Ha! be it thy horror here, to know that we shall meet hereafter! And when thy parting hour approaches, hark to the knell, whose dreadful beat will strike to thy despairing soul. Then will vibrate on thy ear the curses of the cloister'd saint from whom thou stolest me. Then, the last shrieks which burst from my mother's breaking heart, as she died, appealing to her God against the seducer of her child! Then the blood-stifled groan of my murder'd brother, murdered by thee, fell monster, seeking atonement for his sister's ruined honour! I hear them now: To me the recollection's madness! At such an hour—what will it be to thee?

Piz. A moment's more delay, and at the peril of your lives—

Elv. I have spoken, and the last mortal frailty of my heart is past. And now, with an undaunted spirit and unshaken firmness, I go to meet my destiny. That I could not live nobly, has been Pizarro's act: that I will die nobly, shall be my own. [Exit, guarded.]

Piz. Rolla, I would not thou, a warrior, valiant and renowned, shouldst credit the vile tales of this frantic woman. The cause of all this fury—O! a wanton passion for the rebel youth Alonzo, now my prisoner.

Rol. Alonzo is not now thy prisoner.

Piz. How!

Rol. I came to rescue him, to deceive his guard. I have succeeded; I remain thy prisoner.

Piz. Alonzo fled! Is then the vengeance dearest to my heart never to be gratified?

Rol. Dismiss such passions from thy heart; then thou'lt consult its peace.

Piz. I can face all enemies that dare confront me—I cannot war against my nature.

Rol. Then, Pizarro, ask not to be deemed a hero. To triumph o'er ourselves is the only conquest, where fortune makes no claim. In battle chance may snatch the laurel from thee, or chance may place it on thy brow; but, in a contest with thyself, be resolute, and the virtuous impulse must be the victor.

Piz. Peruvian! thou shalt not find me to thee ungrateful or ungenerous. Return to thy countrymen—thou art at liberty.

Rol. Thou dost act in this, as honour, and as duty, bid thee.

Piz. I cannot but admire thee, Rolla; I would we might be friends.

Rol. Farewell! Pity Elvira!—Become the friend of virtue, and thou wilt be mine. [Exit.]

Piz. Ambition! tell me what is the phantom I have followed? where is the one delight which it has made my own? My fame is the mark of envy—my love, the dupe of treachery—my glory, eclipsed by the boy I taught—my revenge, defeated and rebuked by the rude honour of a savage foe—before whose native dignity of soul I have sunk confounded and subdued! I would I could retrace my steps—I cannot. Would I could evade my own reflections! No! thought and memory are my hell. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A thick Forest.—A dreadful storm.—Corra has covered her Child on a bed of leaves and moss.

Corra. [Sitting on bank by Child.] O, Nature, thou hast not the strength of love. My anxious spirit is untired in its march; my wearied shivering frame sinks under it. And for thee, my boy, when faint beneath thy lovely burden, could I refuse to give thy slumbers that poor bed of rest! O, my child! were I assured thy father breathes no more, how quickly would I lay me down by thy dear side—but down—down for ever. [Thunder and lightning.] I ask thee not, un pitying storm! to abate thy rage, in mercy to poor Corra's misery; nor while thy thunders spare his slumbers, will I disturb my sleeping cherub; though Heaven knows I wish to hear the voice of life, and feel that life is near me. But I will endure all, while what I have of reason holds. [Thunder and lightning.] Still, still implacable!—unfeeling elements! yet still dost thou sleep, my smiling innocent! O, Death! when wilt thou grant to this babe's mother such repose?—Sure I may shield thee better from the storm; my veil may—

Al. [Without.] Corra!

Corra. [Runs.] Hah!

Al. Corra!

Corra. O, my heart! Sweet Heaven, deceive me not! Is it not Alonzo's voice?

Al. [Louder.] Corra!

Corra. It is—it is Alonzo!

Al. [Very loud.] Corra! my beloved!

Corra. Alonzo? Here!—here!—Alonzo!

[Runs out.]

Enter two Spanish Soldiers.

1st Sol. I tell you we are near our outposts, and the word we heard just now was the countersign.

2d Sol. Well, in our escape from the enemy, to have discovered their secret passage through the rocks, will prove a lucky chance to us—Pizarro will reward us.

1st Sol. This way. The sun, though clouded, is on our left. [Perceives the Child.] What have we here? A child! as I'm a soldier.

2d Sol. 'Tis a sweet little babe. Now would it be a great charity to take this infant from its pagan mother's power.

1st Sol. It would so. I have one at home shall play with it. Come along. [Takes the Child.]

[Exeunt.]

Re-enter Corra and Alonzo.

Corra. [Speaking without.] This way, dear Alonzo. Now am I right—there—there—under that tree. Was it possible the instinct of a mother's heart could mistake the spot! Now, wilt thou look at him as he sleeps, or shall I bring him waking with his full blue laughing eyes to welcome thee at once! Yes—yes. Stand thou there; I'll snatch him from his rosy slumber, blushing like the perfum'd morn.

[Finding only the mantle and veil, which she tears from the ground, and the Child gone, she screams.

Al. [Running to her.] Cora! my heart's beloved! Cora. He is gone!

Al. Eternal God!

Cora. He is gone!—my child! my child!

Al. Where didst thou leave him?

Cora. [Dashing herself on the spot.] Here!

Al. Be calm, beloved Cora! he has awak'd and crept to a little distance—we shall find him. Are you assured this was the spot you left him in?

Cora. Did not these hands make that bed, and shelter for him? And is not this the veil that covered him? O, unnatural mother that I was. I left my child—I forsook my innocent—but I will fly to the earth's brink, but I will find him.

[Runs out, takes up mantle, followed by ALONZO.]

SCENE II.—The Outpost of the Spanish Camp, and a Bridge.—[Trumpets sound without.]

ALMAGRO—[Without].

Bear him along—his story must be false.

[Entering.]

ROLLA in chains, brought in by Soldiers.

Rol. False! Rolla utter falsehood! I would I had thee in a desert with a troop around thee; and I but with my sword in this unshackled hand!

[Trumpets without.]

Alm. Is it to be credited that Rolla, the renown'd Peruvian hero, should be detected like a spy, skulking through our camp?

Rol. Skulking!

Alm. But answer to the general—he is here.

Enter PIZARRO.

Piz. What do I see! Rolla!

Rol. Oh! to thy surprise, no doubt.

Piz. And bound too!

Rol. So fast, thou need'st not fear approaching me.

Alm. The guards surpris'd him passing our outpost.

Piz. Release him instantly. Believe me, I regret this insult.

Rol. Thou feel'st then as thou ought'st.

Piz. Nor can I brook to see a warrior of Rolla's fame disarm'd. Accept this, though it has been thy enemy's. [Gives a sword.] The Spaniards know the courtesy that's due to valour.

Rol. And the Peruvians how to forget offences.

Piz. May not Rolla and Pizarro cease to be foes?

Rol. When the sea divides us; yes! May I now depart?

Piz. Freely.

Rol. And shall I not again be intercepted?

Piz. No!—let the word be given that Rolla passes freely.

Enter DAVILLA and Soldiers, with the Child.

Dav. Here are two soldiers, captiv'd yesterday, who have escap'd from the Peruvian hold, and by the secret way we have so long endeavoured to discover.

Piz. Silence!—imprudent! Seest thou not—?

[Pointing to ROLLA.]

Dav. In their way, they found a Peruvian child, who seems—

Piz. What is the imp to me? Bid them toss it into the sea.

Rol. Gracious Heaven! it is Alonzo's child!—give it to me.

Piz. Ha! Alonzo's child! [Takes the Child.] Welcome, thou pretty hostage. Now Alonzo is again my prisoner!

Rol. Thou wilt not keep the infant from its mother?

Piz. Will I not? What, when I shall meet Alonzo in the heat of the victorious fight, think'st thou I shall not have a check upon the valour of his heart, when he is reminded, that a word of mine is this child's death?

Rol. I do not understand thee.

Piz. My vengeance has a long arrear of hate to settle with Alonzo! and this pledge may help to settle the account. [Gives the Child to a Soldier.]

Rol. Man! Man! Art thou a man! Couldst thou hurt that innocent! By Heaven! it's smiling in thy face.

Piz. Tell me, does it resemble Cora?

Rol. Pizarro! thou hast set my heart on fire. If thou dost harm that child, think not his blood will sink into the barren sand. No! faithful to the eager hope that now trembles in this indignant heart, 'twill rise to the common God of nature and humanity, and cry aloud for vengeance on his accurs'd destroyer's head.

Piz. Be that peril mine.

Rol. [Throwing himself at his feet.] Behold me at thy feet. Me, Rolla!—Me, the preserver of thy life!—Me, that have never yet bent or bow'd before created man!—In humble agony I sue to thee—prostrate I implore thee—but spare that child, and I will be thy slave.

Piz. Rolla! still art thou free to go—this boy remains with me.

Rol. [Rises.] Then was this sword Heaven's gift, not thine! [Seizes the Child.] Who moves one step to follow me, dies upon the spot.

[Exit, with the Child.]

Piz. Pursue him instantly—but spare his life. [Exit ALMAGRO and Soldiers.] With what fury he defends himself! Ha! he tells them to the ground—and now—

Enter ALMAGRO.

Alm. Three of thy brave soldiers are already victims to thy command to spare this madman's life; and if he once gain the thicket—

Piz. Spare him no longer. [Exit ALMAGRO.] Their guns must reach him—he'll yet escape—holloa to those horse—the Peruvian sees them—and now he turns among the rocks—then is his retreat cut off.

[ROLLA crosses the wooden-bridge, pursued by the Soldiers—they fire at him—a shot strikes him.]

Piz. Now!—quick! quick! seize the child!

[ROLLA retreats by the background, bearing off the Child.]

Re-enter ALMAGRO.

Alm. By hell! he has escaped! and with the child unhurt.

Dav. No—he bears his death with him.—Believe me, I saw him struck upon the side.

Piz. But the child is sav'd—Alonzo's child! Oh! the furies of disappointed vengeance.

Alm. Away with the revenge of words—let us to deeds. Forget not we have acquired the knowledge of the secret pass, which through the rocky cavern's gloom brings thee at once to the strong hold, where are lodged their women and their treasures.

Piz. Right, Almagro! Swift as thy thought, draw forth a daring and a chosen band—I will not wait for numbers. Stay, Almagro!—Valverde is informed Elvira dies to day?

Alm. He is—and one request alone she—

Piz. I'll hear of none!

Alm. The boon is small—'tis but for the novice habit which you first beheld her in. She wishes not to suffer in the gaudy trappings which remind her of her shame.

Piz. Well, do as thou wilt—but tell Valverde, that, at our return, as his life shall answer it, to let me hear that she is dead. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Ataliba's Tent.

Enter ATALIBA, followed by CORA and ALONZO.

Cora. Oh! avoid me not, Ataliba! To whom but to her king is the wretched mother to address her griefs? The gods refuse to hear my prayers. Did not my Alonzo fight for thee?—And will not my sweet boy, if thou'lt but restore him to me, one day fight thy battles too?

At. Oh! my suffering love—my poor heart-broken Cora!—thou but wound'st our sovereign's feeling soul and not relief'st thy own.

Cora. Is he our sovereign, and has he not the power to give me back my child?

Ata. When I reward desert or can relieve my people, I feel what is the real glory of a king; when I hear them suffer, and cannot aid them, I mourn the impotence of all mortal power.

[Voices behind.] Rolla! Rolla! Kolla!

Enter ROLLA, his countenance ghastly and bleeding, with the Child, followed by Peruvians.

Rol. Thy child!

[Gives the Child into CORA's arms, and falls.

Cora. O God! there is blood upon him!

Rol. 'Tis my blood, Cora!

At. Rolla, thou diest.

Rol. For thee and Cora. [Dies.

Enter ORANO.

Ora. Treachery has revealed our asylum in the rocks. Even now the foe assails the peaceful band retired for protection there.

Al. Lose not a moment! Swords, be quick! Your wives and children cry to you. Bear our lov'd hero's body in the van; 'twill raise the fury of our men to madness.—Now, fell Pizarro! the death of one of us is near!—Away! be the word of assault, Revenge and Rolla.

[Exeunt ALONZO and ATALIBA.—Soldiers take up the body, and bear it off, followed by CORA and Child, and army.—Charge.

SCENE IV.—A Recess among the Rocks.

Enter PIZARRO, ALMAGRO, VALVERDE, and Spanish Soldiers.

Piz. Well!—if surrounded, we must perish in the centre of them. Where do Rolla and Alonzo hide their heads?

Enter ALONZO, ORANO, and Peruvians.

Al. Alonzo answers thee, and Alonzo's sword shall speak for Rolla.

Piz. Thou know'st the advantage of thy numbers. Thou dar'st not singly face Pizarro.

Al. Peruvians, stir not a man! Be this contest only ours.

Piz. Spaniards!—observe ye the same.

[They fight.—ALONZO is disarmed, and is beat down.

Piz. Now, traitor, to thy heart.

[ELVIRA enters in black.—PIZARRO, appalled, staggers back—ALONZO recovers his sword, renews the fight, and slays him.

ATALIBA enters, and embraces ALONZO.

Ata. My brave Alonzo!

Alm. Alonzo, we submit. Spare us! we will embark, and leave the coast.

Val. Elvira will confess I sav'd her life; she has sav'd thine.

Al. Fear not. You are safe.

[Spaniards ground their arms.

Elv. Valverde speaks the truth; nor could he think to meet me here. An awful impulse, which my soul could not resist, impelled me hither.

Al. Noble Elvira! my preserver! How can I speak what I, Ataliba, and his rescued country, owe to thee! If amid this grateful nation thou wouldst remain—

Elv. Alonzo, no! the destination of my future life is fix'd. Humbled in penitence I will endeavour to atone the guilty errors, which, however mask'd by shallow cheerfulness, have long consumed my secret heart. When, by my sufferings purified and penitence sincere, my soul shall dare address the Throne of Mercy in behalf of others, for thee, Alonzo, for thy Cora, and thy child—for thee, thou virtuous monarch, and the innocent race thou reign'st over, shall Elvira's prayers address the God of Nature.—Valverde, thou hast preserved my life. Cherish humanity, avoid the foul examples thou hast view'd. Spaniards, returning to your native home, assure your rulers they mistake the road to glory or to power. Tell them that the pursuits of avarice, conquest, and ambition, never yet made a people happy, or a nation great. [Exit.

At. Ataliba, think not I wish to check the voice of triumph, when I entreat we first may pay the tribute due to our loved Rolla's memory. [Exeunt.

DIRGE.—Priests and Priestesses.

Let tears of gratitude and woe
For the brave Rolla ever flow!

[Curtain slowly descends.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—St. Mark's.

Enter PRIULI and JAFFIER.

Pri. No more! I'll hear no more! begone, and leave me!

Jaff. Not hear me! by my sufferings, but you shall!

My lord—my lord! I'm not that abject wretch
You think me. Patience! where's the distance throws

Me back so far, but I may boldly speak
In right, though proud oppression will not hear me?

Pri. Have you not wrong'd me?

Jaff. Could my nature e'er
Have brook'd injustice, or the doing wrongs,
I need not now thus low have bent myself
To gain a hearing from a cruel father.—
Wrong'd you?

Pri. Yes, wrong'd me! in the nicest point,
The honour of my house, you've done me wrong.

You may remember (for I now will speak,
And urge its baseness), when you first came home
From travel, with such hopes as made you look'd on

By all men's eyes, a youth of expectation;
Pleas'd with your growing virtue, I receiv'd you;
Court'd, and sought to raise you to your merits;
My house, my table—nay, my fortune, too,
My very self was yours; you might have us'd me
To your best service; like an open friend
I treated, trusted you, and thought you mine;
When, in requital of my best endeavours,
You treacherously practis'd to undo me;
Seduc'd the weakness of my age's darling,
My only child, and stole her from my bosom.
Oh! Belvidera!

Jaff. 'Tis to me you owe her:
Childless had you been else, and in the grave
Your name extinct; no more Priuli heard of.
You may remember, scarce five years are past,
Since in your brigantine you sail'd to see
The Adriatic wedded by our duke;
And I was with you; your unskilful pilot
Dash'd us upon a rock; when to your boat
You made for safety: entered first yourself;
Th' affrighted Belvidera, following next,
As she stood trembling on the vessel's side,
Was by a wave wash'd off into the deep;
When instantly I plung'd into the sea,
And, buffeting the billows to her rescue,
Redeem'd her life with half the loss of mine:
Like a rich conquest, in one hand I bore her,
And with the other dash'd the saucy waves,
That throng'd and press'd to rob me of my prize.
I brought her, gave her to your despairing arms;
Indeed, you thank'd me; but a nobler gratitude
Rose in her soul; for from that hour she lov'd me,
Till for her life she paid me with herself.

Pri. You stole her from me; like a thief you stole her,

At dead of night; that cursed hour you chose
To rifle me of all my heart held dear.
May all your joys in her prove false, like mine!
A sterile fortune, and a barren bed,
Attend you both; continual discord make
Your days and nights bitter, and grievous still:
May the hard hand of a vexatious need

Oppress and grind you ; till at last you find
The curse of disobedience all your portion.

Jaff. Half of your curse you have bestow'd in vain.

Heav'n has already crown'd our faithful loves
With a young boy, sweet as his mother's beauty :
May he live to prove more gentle than his grand-
sire,

And happier than his father.

Pri. Rather live
To bait thee for his bread, and din your ears
With hungry cries ; whilst his unhappy mother
Sits down and weeps in bitterness of want.

Jaff. You talk as if 'twould please you.

Pri. 'Twould, by Heaven !

Jaff. Would I were in my grave !

Pri. And she, too, with thee ;

For, living here, you're but my curs'd remembrances—

I once was happy !

Jaff. You use me thus, because you know my soul

Is fond of Belvidera. You perceive
My life feeds on her, therefore thus you treat me.
Were I that thief, the doer of such wrongs
As you upbraid me with, what hinders me
But I might send her back to you with contumely,
And court my fortune where she would be kinder ?

Pri. You dare not do't.

Jaff. Indeed, my lord, I dare not.

My heart, that awes me, is too much my master :
Three years are past since first our vows were plighted,

During which time, the world must bear me witness,

I've treated Belvidera like your daughter,
The daughter of a senator of Venice :
Distinction, place, attendance, and observance,
Due to her birth, she always has commanded :
Out of my little fortune I've done this ;
Because (though hopeless e'er to win your nature)
The world might see I lov'd her for herself ;
Not as the heiress of the great Priuli.

Pri. No more.

Jaff. Yes, all, and then adieu for ever !

[Pausing, with clasped hands.]

There's not a wretch, that lives on common charity,
But's happier than I : for I have known
The luscious sweets of plenty ; every night
Have slept with soft content about my head,
And never wak'd but to a joyful morning :
Yet now must fall, like a full ear of corn,
Whose blossom 'scap'd, yet's wither'd in the rip'ning.

Pri. Home, and be humble ; study to retrench ;
Discharge the lazy vermin of thy hall,
Those pageants of thy folly :
Reduce the glittering trappings of thy wife
To humble weeds, fit for thy little state : [Going.]
Then to some suburb cottage both retire ;
Drudge to feed loathsome life ; get brats and starve—

Home, home, I say !

Jaff. Yes, if my heart would let me— [Exit.]

This proud, this swelling heart : home I would go,
But that my doors are hateful to my eyes,
Fill'd and damm'd up with gaping creditors :
I've now not fifty ducats in the world,
Yet still I am in love, and pleas'd with ruin.
Oh, Belvidera ! oh ! she is my wife—
And we will bear our wayward fate together,
But ne'er know comfort more.

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XV.

Enter PIERRE.

Pie. My friend, good morrow ;
How fares the honest partner of my heart ?
What, melancholy ! not a word to spare !

Jaff. I'm thinking, Pierre, how that damn'd starving quality,

Call'd honesty, got footing in the world.

Pie. Why, powerful villany first set it up,
For its own ease and safety. Honest men
Are the soft easy cushions on which knaves
Repose and fatten. Were all mankind villains, They'd starve each other ; lawyers would want practice,

Cut-throats reward ; each man would kill his brother
Himself ; none would be paid or hang'd for murder.

Honesty ! 'twas a cheat, invented first

To bind the hands of bold deserving rogues,
That fools and cowards might sit safe in power,
And lord it uncontroll'd above their betters.

Jaff. Then honesty is but a notion ?

Pie. Nothing else ;

Like wit, much talk'd of, not to be defin'd :
He that pretends to most, too, has least share in't.
'Tis a ragged virtue. Honesty ! no more on't.

Jaff. Sure, thou art honest ?

Pie. So, indeed, men think me ;

But they are mistaken, Jaffier : I am a rogue
As well as they :

A fine, gay, bold-faced villain, as thou seest me.
'Tis true, I pay my debts, when they're contracted ;

I steal from no man ; would not cut a throat

To gain admission to a great man's purse,

Or a whore's bed ; I'd not betray my friend,

To get his place or fortune ; I scorn to flatter

A blown-up fool above me, or crush the wretch beneath me ;

Yet, Jaffier, for all this I am a villain.

Jaff. A villain !

Pie. Yes, a most notorious villain ;

To see the sufferings of my fellow-creatures,

And own myself a man ; to see our senators

Cheat the deluded people with a show

Of liberty, which yet they ne'er must taste of.

They say by them our hands are free from fetters ;

Yet whom they please they lay in basest bonds ;

Bring whom they please to infamy and sorrow ;

Drive us, like wrecks, down the rough tide of power,

Whilst no hold's left to save us from destruction.

All that bear this are villains, and I one,

Not to rouse up at the great call of nature,

And check the growth of these domestic spoilers,

That make us slaves, and tell us 'tis our charter.

Jaff. I think no safety can be here for virtue,

And grieve, my friend, as much as thou, to live

In such a wretched state as this of Venice,

Where all agree to spoil the public good,

And villains fatten with the brave man's labours.

Pie. We've neither safety,

Unity, nor peace, my friend,

For the foundation's lost of common good ;

Justice is lame, as well as blind, amongst us ;

The laws (corrupted to their ends that make them)

Serve but for instruments of some new tyranny,

That every day starts up, t'enslave us deeper.

Now [Lays his hand on JAFFIER'S arm.] could this glorious cause but find out friends

To do it right, oh, Jaffier ! then might'st thou

Not wear those seals of woe upon thy face ;

The proud Priuli should be taught humanity,

Q

And learn to value such a son as thou art.

I dare not speak, but my heart bleeds this moment.

Jaff. Curs'd be the cause, though I, my friend, be part on't :

Let me partake the troubles of thy bosom,

For I am us'd to misery, and perhaps

May find a way to sweeten't to thy spirit.

Pie. Too soon 'twill reach thy knowledge——

Jaff. Then from thee

Let it proceed. There's virtue, in thy friendship,

Would make the saddest tale of sorrow pleasing,

Strengthen my constancy, and welcome ruin.

Pie. Then thou art ruined !

Jaff. That I long since knew ;

I and ill-fortune have been long acquainted.

Pie. I pass'd this very moment by thy doors,

And found them guarded by a troop of villains ;

The sons of public rapine were destroying.

They told me, by the sentence of the law,

They had commission to seize all thy fortune :

Nay, more, Priuli's cruel hand had sign'd it.

Here stood a ruffian, with an horrid face,

Lording it o'er a pile of massy plate,

Tumbled into a heap for public sale :

There was another making villanous jests

At thy undoing : he had ta'en possession

Of all thy ancient, most domestic ornaments ;—

The very bed, which, on thy wedding night,

Received thee to the arms of Belvidera,

The scene of all thy joys, was violated

By the coarse hands of filthy dungeon-villains,

And thrown amongst the common lumber.

Jaff. Now, thank Heaven !

Pie. Thank Heaven ! for what ?

Jaff. That I'm not worth a ducat.

Pie. Curse thy dull stars, and the worse fate of Venice,

Where brothers, friends, and fathers, all are false ;

Where there's no truth, no trust ; where innocence

Stoops under vile oppression, and vice lords it.

Hadst thou but seen, as I did, how, at last,

Thy beauteous Belvidera, like a wretch

That's doom'd to banishment, came weeping forth,

Whilst two young virgins, on whose arm she lean'd,

Kindly look'd up, and at her grief grew sad,

As if they catch'd the sorrows that fell from her :

E'en the lewd rabble, that were gather'd round

To see the sight, stood mute when they beheld her ;

Govern'd their roaring throats, and grumbled pity :

I could have hugg'd the greasy rogues—they pleas'd me.

Jaff. I thank thee for this story, from my soul ;

Since now I know the worst that can befall me.

Ah, Pierre ! I have a heart that could have borne

The roughest wrong my fortune could have done
me ;

But, when I think what Belvidera feels,

The bitterness her tender spirits taste of,

I own myself a coward : bear my weakness ;

If, throwing thus my arms about thy neck, [Embrace.]

I play the boy, and blubber in thy bosom.

Oh, I shall drown thee with my sorrows.

Pie. Burn,

First burn and level Venice to thy ruin.

What ! starve, like beggars' brats in frosty weather,

Under a hedge, and whine ourselves to death !

Thou, or thy cause, shall never want assistance,

Whilst I have blood or fortune fit to serve thee :

Command my heart, thou't every way its master.

Jaff. No ; there's a secret pride in bravely dying.

Pie. Rats die in holes and corners, dogs run mad ;

Man knows a braver remedy for sorrow—

Revenge, the attribute of gods ; they stamp'd it,

With their great image, on our natures. Die !

Consider well the cause that calls upon thee ;

And, if thou'rt base enough, die then. Remember

Thy Belvidera suffers ; Belvidera !

Die !—damn first !—What ! be decently interr'd

In a church-yard, and mingle thy brave dust

With stinking rogues, that rot in winding-sheets,

Surfeit-slain fools, the common dung o' th' soil !

Jaff. Oh !

Pie. Well said, out with't—swear a little——

Jaff. Swear ! By sea and air ; by earth, by heav'n and hell,

I will revenge my Belvidera's tears !

Hark thee, my friend—Priuli—is—a senator !

Pie. A dog !

Jaff. Agreed.

Pie. Shoot him !

Jaff. With all my heart !

No more—where shall we meet at night ?

Pie. I'll tell thee :

On the Rialto, every night at twelve,

I take my evening's walk of meditation :

There we two will meet, and talk of precious

Mischief—— [Shake hands.]

Jaff. Farewell !

Pie. At twelve.

Jaff. At any hour ; my plagues

Will keep me waking. [Exit PIERRE.]

Tell me why, good Heaven,

Thou mad'st me what I am, with all the spirit,

Aspiring thoughts, and elegant desires,

That fill the happiest man ? Ah, rather why,

Base-minded, dull, and fit to carry burdens !

Didst thou not form me sordid as my fate ?

Why have I sense to know the curse that's on me ?

Is this just dealing, nature ? Belvidera !

Poor Belvidera !

Bel. [Without.] Lead me, lead me, my virgins,

To that kind voice.

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. My lord, my love, my refuge !

[Leans on JAFFIER.]

Happy my eyes, when they behold thy face !

My heavy heart will leave its doleful beating

At sight of thee, and bound with sprightly joys.

Oh, smile ! as when our loves were in their spring,

And cheer my fainting soul !

Jaff. As when our loves

Were in their spring ! Has, then, my fortune chang'd thee ?

Art thou not, Belvidera, still the same—

Kind, good, and tender, as my arms first found

thee ?

If thou art alter'd, where shall I have harbour ?

Where ease my loaded heart ? [Part.] Oh, where complain ?

Bel. Does this appear like change, or love decaying,

When thus I throw myself into thy bosom,

[Leans on JAFFIER.]

With all the resolution of strong truth ?

I joy more in thee

Than did thy mother, when she hugg'd thee first,

And bless'd the gods for all her travail past.

Jaff. Can there in woman be such glorious faith ?

Sure, all ill stories of thy sex are false !

Oh, woman ! lovely woman ! Nature made thee

To temper man : we had been brutes without you !

Angels are painted fair, to look like you :

There's in you all that we believe of Heav'n ;

Amazing brightness, purity, and truth,
Eternal joy, and everlasting love! [Embrace.]

Bel. If love be treasure, we'll be wondrous rich;
Oh! lead me to some desert, wide and wild,
Barren as our misfortunes, where my soul
May have its vent, where I may tell aloud
To the high heavens, and every list'ning planet,
With what a boundless stock my bosom's fraught.

Jaff. [Taking her hand.] Oh, Belvidera! doubly
I'm a beggar;

Undone by fortune, and in debt to thee.
Want, worldly want, that hungry meagre fiend,
Is at my heels, and chases me in view.
Canst thou bear cold and hunger? Can these limbs,
Fram'd for the tender offices of love,
Endure the bitter gripes of smarting poverty?
When banished by our miseries abroad
(As suddenly we shall be), to seek out,
In some far climate, where our names are strangers,
For charitable succour, wilt thou then,
When, in a bed of straw we shrink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads,
Wilt thou then talk thus to me? Wilt thou then
Hush my cares thus, and shelter me with love?

Bel. Oh! I will love, even in madness, love thee!
Though my distracted senses should forsake me,
I'd find some intervals when my poor heart
Should 'suage itself, and be let loose to thine.
Though the bare earth be all our resting-place,
Its roots our food, some cliff our habitation,
I'll make this arm a pillow for thine head;
And, as thou sighing liest, and swelled with sorrow,

Creep to thy bosom, pour the balm of love
Into thy soul, and kiss thee to thy rest;
Then praise our God, and watch thee till the morning.

Jaff. Hear this, you heav'ns, and wonder how you made her!

Reign, reign, ye monarchs, that divide the world;
Busy rebellion ne'er will let you know
Tranquillity and happiness like mine;
Like gaudy ships, the obsequious billows fall,
And rise again, to lift you in your pride;
They wait but for a storm, and then devour you.
I, in my private bark already wreck'd,
Like a poor merchant, driven to unknown land,
That had, by chance, pack'd up his choicest treasure
In one dear casket, and sav'd only that;
Since I must wander farther on the shore,
Thus [Taking her arm] hug my little, but my precious store,

Resolv'd to scorn, and trust my fate no more.
[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Rialto.

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaff. I'm here; and thus, the shades of night around me,

I look as if all hell were in my heart,
And I in hell. Nay, surely, 'tis so with me!
For every step I tread, methinks some fiend
Knocks at my breast, and bids it not be quiet.
I've heard how desperate wretches, like myself,

Have wander'd out at this dead time of night,
To meet the foe of mankind in his walk.
Sure I'm so curs'd, that, though of Heav'n forsaken,
No minister of darkness cares to tempt me.
Hell! hell! why sleep'st thou?

Enter PIERRE.

Pie. Sure, I've stay'd too long: [Coming forward.
The clock has struck, and I may lose my proselyte.
Speak [seeing JAFFIER], who goes there?

Jaff. A dog, that comes to howl
At yonder moon. What's he, that asks the question?

Pie. A friend to dogs, for they are honest creatures,

And ne'er betray their masters; never fawn
On any that they love not. Well met, friend Jaffier!

Jaff. The same.

Pie. Where's Belvidera?

Jaff. For a day or two,
I've lodged her privately, till I see farther
What fortune will do with me. Prithee, friend,
If thou wouldst have me sit to hear good counsel,
Speak not of Belvidera.

Pie. Speak not of her?

Jaff. Oh, no! nor name her!

Pie. May be I wish her well.

Jaff. Whom well?

Pie. Thy wife; thy lovely Belvidera.
I hope a man may wish his friend's wife well,
And no harm done.

Jaff. [Retiring.] You're merry, Pierre.

Pie. [Following.] I am so;
Thou shalt smile, too, and Belvidera smile:
We'll all rejoice. Here's something to buy pins;
Marriage is chargeable. [Gives him a purse.]

Jaff. I but half wish'd
To see the devil, and he's here already! Well!
What must this buy? Rebellion, murder, treason?
Tell me which way I must be damn'd for this.

Pie. When last we parted, we had no qualms like these,

But entertain'd each other's thoughts, like men
Whose souls were well acquainted. Is the world Reform'd since our last meeting? What new miracles

Have happen'd? Has Priuli's heart relented?
Can he be honest?

Jaff. Kind Heav'n, let heavy curses
Gall his old age, till life become his burden;
Let him groan under't long, linger an age
In the worst agonies and pangs of death,
And find its ease but late!

Pie. Nay, couldst thou not
As well, my friend, have stretch'd the curse to all
The senate round, as to one single villain?

Jaff. But curses stick not; could I kill with cursing,

By Heav'n, I know not thirty heads in Venice
Should not be blasted! Senators should rot,
Like dogs, on dunghills. Oh, for a curse
To kill with!

Pie. Daggers! daggers! are much better.

Jaff. Ha!

Pie. Daggers.

Jaff. But where are they?

Pie. Oh! a thousand

May be dispos'd, in honest hands, in Venice.

Jaff. Thou talk'st in clouds.

Pie. But yet a heart, half wrong'd
As thine has been, would find the meaning, Jaffier!

Jaff. A thousand daggers, all in honest hands !
And have not I a friend will stick one here ?

Pie. Yes, if I thought thou wert not to be cherish'd

To a nobler purpose, I would be that friend.

[Lays his hand on JAFFIER's arm.
But thou hast better friends—friends, whom thy wrongs

Have made thy friends ; friends, worthy to be call'd so.

I'll trust thee with a secret. There are spirits
This hour at work. But, as thou'rt a man
Whom I have pick'd and chosen from the world,
Swear that thou wilt be true to what I utter ;
And when I've told thee that, which only gods,
And men like gods, are privy to, then swear,
No chance, or change, shall wrest it from thy bosom.

Jaff. When thou wouldst bind me, is there need of oaths ?

Is coward, fool, or villain, in my face ?

If I seem none of these, I dare believe
Thou wouldst not use me in a little cause ;
For I am fit for honour's toughest task ;
Nor ever yet found fooling was my province :
And, for a villainous, inglorious enterprise,
I know thy heart so well, I dare lay mine
Before thee, set it to what point thou wilt.

Pie. 'Tis a cause thou wilt be fond of, Jaffier ;
For it is founded on the noblest basis :
Our liberties, our natural inheritance !
We'll do the business, and ne'er fast and pray for't ;

Openly act a deed, the world may gaze
With wonder at, and envy when 'tis done.

Jaff. For liberty !

Pie. For liberty, my friend.

Thou shalt be freed from base Piuli's tyranny,
And thy sequester'd fortunes heal'd again :
I shall be free from those opprobrious wrongs
That press me now, and bend my spirit downward ;
All Venice free, and every growing merit
Succeed to its just right ; fools shall be pull'd
From wisdom's seat ; those baleful, unclean birds,
Those lazy owls, who, perch'd near fortune's top,
Sit only watchful with their heavy wings
To cuff down new-fledg'd virtues, that would rise
To nobler heights, and make the grove harmonious.

Jaff. What can I do ?

Pie. Canst thou not kill a senator ?

Jaff. By all my wrongs, thou talk'st as if revenge
Were to be had ! and the brave story warms me.

Pie. Swear, then.

Jaff. I do [Kneels], by all those glittering stars,
And you great planet of the ruling night !
By all good spirits above, and ill below !

By love and friendship, dearer than my life,
Nor power, nor death, shall make me false to thee !

Pie. Here we embrace, and I'll unlock my heart.
A counsel's held hard by, where the destruction
Of this great empire's hatching ; there I'll lead thee.

But be a man ; for thou'rt to mix with men
Fit to disturb the peace of all the world,
And rule it when 'tis wildest.

Jaff. I give thee thanks
For this kind warning. Yes, I'll be a man,
And charge thee, Pierre, whene'er thou see'st my fears

Betray me less, to rip this heart of mine
Out of my breast, and show it for a coward's.

Come, let's begone, for from this hour I chase
All little thoughts, all tender human follies,
Out of my bosom : vengeance shall have room !
Revenge !

Pie. And liberty !

Jaff. Revenge ! revenge !

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the House of AQUILINA.

Enter RENAULT.

Ren. Why was my choice ambition ? The worst ground
A wretch can build on ? 'Tis, indeed, at distance,
A goodly prospect, tempting to the view ;
The height delights us, and the mountain-top
Looks beautiful, because 'tis high to heav'n ;
But we ne'er think how sandy 's the foundation,
What storm will batter, and what tempest shake us.
Who's there ?

Enter SPINOSA.

Spi. Renault, good morrow, for by this time,
I think, the scale of night has turn'd the balance,
And weighs up morning : has the clock struck twelve ?

Ren. Yes ; clocks will go as they are set : but, man,
Irregular man's ne'er constant, never certain.
I've spent at least three precious hours of darkness
In waiting dull attendance ; 'tis the curse
Of diligent virtue to be mix'd, like mine,
With giddy tempers, souls but half resolved.

Spi. Hell seize that soul amongst us it can frighten !

Ren. What's then the cause that I am here alone ?

Why are we not together ?

Enter ELLIOT.

O, sir, welcome !

You are an Englishman : when treason's hatching,
One might have thought you'd not have been behind-hand.

In what whore's lap have you been lolling ?
Give but an Englishman his whore and ease,
Beef and a sea-coal fire, he's yours for ever.

Ell. Frenchman, you are saucy.

Ren. How ! [Puts his hand to his sword.]

Enter BEDAMAR, MEZZANA, DURAND, and THEODORE—MEZZANA, DURAND, and THEODORE, stand back.

Bed. At difference ? Fie !

Is this a time for quarrels ? Thieves and rogues
Fall out and brawl : should men of your high calling—

Men, separated by the choice of Providence
From the gross heap of mankind, and set here
In this assembly, as in one great jewel,
To adorn the bravest purpose it e'er smil'd on ;
Should you, like boys, wrangle for trifles ?

Ren. Boys !

Bed. Renault, thy hand.

Ren. I thought I'd given my heart,
Long since, to every man that mingles here ;
But grieve to find it trusted with such tempers,
That can't forgive my forward age its weakness.

Bed. Elliot, thou once hadst virtue. I have seen
Thy stubborn temper bend with godlike goodness,
Not half thus courted : 'tis thy nation's glory,
To hug the foe that offers brave alliance.

Once more, embrace, my friends—
United thus, we are the mighty engine.
Must twist this rooted empire from its basis.
Totters it not already?

Ell. 'Would 'twere tumbling!

Bed. Nay, it shall down: this night we seal its ruin.

Enter PIERRE.

O, Pierre! thou art welcome.
Come to my breast; for, by its hopes, thou look'st
Lovely dreadfull; and the fate of Venice
Seems on thy sword already. O, my Mars!
The poets that first feign'd a god of war,
Surely prophesied of thee!

Pie. Friends, was not Brutus
(I mean that Brutus, who, in open senate, Stabb'd the first Cæsar that usurp'd the world)
A gallant man?

Ren. Yes: and Cataline, too,
Though story wrong his fame, for he conspir'd
To prop the reeling glory of his country;
His cause was good.

Bed. And ours as much above it,
As, Renault, thou'rt superior to Cethegus,
Or Pierre to Cassius.

Pie. Then to what we aim at.
When do we start? Or must we talk for ever?

Bed. No, Pierre, the deed's near birth: fate seems to have set

The business up, and given it to our care.
I hope there's not a heart or hand amongst us,
But what is firm and ready.

Ell. All.

We'll die with Bedamar.

Bed. O, men,
Matchless, as will your glory be hereafter:
The game is for a matchless prize, if won—
If lost, disgraceful ruin.

Pie. Ten thousand men are armed at your nod,
Commanded all by leaders fit to guide
A battle for the freedom of the world:
This wretched state has starv'd them in its service,
And, by your bounty quicken'd, they've resolved
To serve your glory, and revenge their own:
They've all their different quarters in this city,
Watch for the alarm, and grumble, 'tis so tardy.

Bed. I doubt not, friend, but thy unwearied diligence

Has still kept waking, and it shall have ease;
After this night, it is resolved, we meet
No more, till Venice owns us for her lords.

Pie. How lovely the Adriatic, then,
Dress'd in her flames, will shine! Devouring flames,

Such as shall burn her to the watery bottom,
And hiss in her foundation.

Bed. Now, if any
Amongst us, that owns this glorious cause,
Have friends or int'rest he would wish to save,
Let it be told—the general doom is seal'd;
But I'd forego the hopes of a world's empire,
Rather than wound the bowels of my friend.

Pie. I must confess you there have touch'd my weakness.

I have a friend—hear it; and such a friend!
My heart was ne'er shut to him. Nay, I'll tell you,
He knows the very business of this hour;

[All start.]

But he rejoices in the cause, and loves it:
We've changed a vow to live and die together,
And he's at hand, to ratify it here.

Ren. How! all betray'd!

Pie. No; I've dealt nobly with you.—
I've brought my all into the public stock:
I'd but one friend, and him I'll share amongst you:
Receive and cherish him; or if, when seen
And search'd, you find him worthless—as my tongue

Has lodg'd this secret in his faithful breast,
To ease your fears, I wear a dagger here,
Shall rip it out again, and give you rest.
Come forth, thou only good I e'er could boast of.

Enter JAFFIER, with a dagger in his hand.

Bed. His presence bears the show of manly virtue.

Jaff. I know you'll wonder all, that, thus un-call'd,

I dare approach this place of fatal councils;
But I'm amongst you, and, by Heav'n, it glads me
To see so many virtues thus united
To restore justice, and dethrone oppression.
Command this steel, if you would have it quiet,
Into this breast: but, if you think it worthy
To cut the throats of reverend rogues in robes,
Send me into the curs'd assembled senate:
It shrinks not, though I meet a father there.
Would you behold the city flaming? here's
A hand, shall bear a lighted torch at noon
To th' arsenal, and set its gates on fire!

Ren. You talk this well, sir.

Jaff. Nay, by Heaven, I'll do this!
Come, come, I read distrust in all your faces:
You fear me villain, and, indeed, 'tis odd
To hear a stranger talk thus, at first meeting,
Of matters that have been so well debated;
But I come ripe with wrongs, as you with counsels.
I hate this senate—am a foe to Venice;
A friend to none, but men resolved like me
To push on mischief. Oh, did you but know me,
I need not talk thus!

Bed. Pierre, I must embrace him;
My heart beats to this man, as if it knew him.

Ren. I never lov'd these huggers.

Jaff. Still, I see
The cause delights me not. Your friends survey
me,

As I were dangerous. But I come arm'd
Against all doubts, and to your trusts will give A pledge, worth more than all the world can pay for.

My Belvidera! Ho! my Belvidera! [Calls.]

Bed. What wonder next?

Jaff. Let me entreat you, sirs,
As I have henceforth hope to call you friends,
That all but the ambassador, and this Grave guide of councils, with my friend, that owns me,

Withdraw awhile, to spare a woman's blushes.

[*Exeunt all but BEDAMAR, RENAULT, JAF-
FIER, and PIERRE, who stand back.*]

Bed. Pierre, whither will this ceremony lead us?

Jaff. My Belvidera! Belvidera! [Calling.]

Bel. [Within.] Who,
Who calls so loud, at this late peaceful hour?
That voice was wont to come in gentle whispers,
And fill my ears with the soft breath of love.

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. Thou hourly image of my thoughts, where art thou?

Jaff. Indeed, 'tis late.

Bel. Alas! where am I? whither is't you lead me?

Methinks I read distraction in your face—
You shake and tremble too! your blood runs cold!
Heav'n's guard my love, and bless his heart with patience!

Jaff. That I have patience, let our fate bear witness,

Who has ordained it so, that thou and I (Thou, the divinest good man e'er possess'd,
And I, the wretched'st of the race of man),
This very hour, without one tear, must part.

Bel. Part! must we part? Oh! am I then forsaken?

Why drag you from me? whither are you going?
My dear! my life! my love!

Jaff. Oh, friends! [To RENAULT, &c.]

Bel. Speak to me! [To JAFFIER.]

Jaff. Take her from my heart—

She'll gain such hold else, I shall ne'er get loose.
I charge you, take her, but with tenderest care
Relieve her troubles, and assuage her sorrows.

Ren. [Advancing to her.] Rise, madam, and command among your servants—

Jaff. To you, sirs, and your honours, I bequeath her, [They lay hold of her.]

And with her this: Whene'er I prove unworthy—
[Gives a dagger to RENAULT.]

You know the rest—Then strike it to her heart;
And tell her, he, who three whole happy years
Lay in her arms, and each kind night repeated
The passionate vows of still increasing love,
Sent that reward, for all her truth and sufferings.

Bel. [Held between BEDAMAR and RENAULT.] Oh, thou unkind one!

Have I deserted this from you?

Look on me—tell me—speak, thou dear deceiver,—
If I am false, accuse me; but, if true,

Don't, prithee don't, in poverty forsake me,

[She breaks away, and runs to JAFFIER.]

But pity the sad heart that's torn with parting.

[They retake her.]

Yet, hear me; yet, recall me. Jaffier, Jaffier!

[Exit BEDAMAR, &c. dragging her. JAFFIER and PIERRE.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in the House of AQUELINA.

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. I'm sacrificed! I'm sold! betray'd to shame!
Inevitable ruin has enclos'd me!
He, that should guard my virtue, has betray'd it;—
Left me—undone me! Oh, that I could hate him!—
Where shall I go? Oh, whither, whither wander?

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaff. Can Belvidera want a resting-place,
When these poor arms are open to receive her?
There was a time—

Bel. Yes, yes, there was a time,
When Belvidera's tears, her cries and sorrows,
Were not despis'd; when, if she chanced to sigh,
Or look but sad—there was, indeed, a time,
When Jaffier would have ta'en her in his arms,
Eas'd her declining head upon his breast,
And never left her, till he found the cause.

But well I know why you forsake me thus;

I am no longer fit to bear a share

In your concerns: my weak female virtue
Must not be trusted; 'tis too frail and tender.

Jaff. O, Portia, Portia, what a soul was thine!

Bel. That Portia was a woman; and when Brutus,
Big with the fate of Rome (Heav'n guard thy safety!)

Conceal'd from her the labours of his mind,

She let him see her blood was great as his,
Flow'd from a spring as noble, and a heart
Fit to partake his troubles, as his love.

Fetch, fetch that dagger back, the dreadful dower
Thou gav'st last night, in parting with me; strike it
Here to my heart; and, as the blood flows from it,
Judge if it run not pure as Cato's daughter's.

Jaff. O, Belvidera!

Bel. Why was I last night deliver'd to a villain?

Jaff. Ha! a villain?

Bel. Yes, to a villain! Why, at such an hour,
Meets that assembly, all made up of wretches,
That look as hell had drawn them into league?

Why, I in this hand, and in that a dagger,
Was I deliver'd with such dreadful ceremonies?

"To you, sirs, and your honours, I bequeath her,
And with her this: Whene'er I prove unworthy—

You know the rest—Then strike it to her heart."

Oh! why's that rest conceal'd from me? Must I

Be made the hostage of a hellish trust?

For such I know I am; that's all my value.

But, by the love and loyalty I owe thee,

I'll free thee from the bondage of these slaves!

Straight to the senate—tell them all I know, [Going.]

All that I think, all that my fears inform me.

Jaff. Is this the Roman virtue? this the blood

That boasts its purity with Cato's daughter?

Would she have e'er betray'd her Brutus?

[Going to her.]

Bel. No;

For Brutus trusted her. [Leans on him.] Wert thou
so kind,

What would not Belvidera suffer for thee?

Jaff. I shall undo myself, and tell thee all—

Yet think a little, ere thou tempt me further;

Think I've a tale to tell will shake thy nature,

Melt all this boasted constancy thou talk'st of

Into vile tears and despicable sorrows:

Then, if thou should'st betray me—

Bel. Shall I swear?

Jaff. No, do not swear: I would not violate

Thy tender nature with so rude a bond;

But, as thou hop'st to see me live my days,

And love thee long, lock this within thy breast:

I've bound myself, by all the strictest sacraments,
Divine and human—

Bel. Speak!

Jaff. To kill thy father—

Bel. My father!

Jaff. Nay, the throats of the whole senate

Shall bleed, my Belvidera. He, amongst us,

That spares his father, brother, or his friend,

Is damn'd.

Bel. Oh!

Jaff. Have a care, and shrink not, even in thought:

For, if thou dost—

Bel. I know it; thou wilt kill me.

Do, strike thy sword into this bosom: lay me

Dead on the earth, and then thou wilt be safe.

Murder my father! though his cruel nature

Has persecuted me to my undoing,

Driven me to basest wants, can I behold him,
With smiles of vengeance, butcher'd in his age?
The sacred fountain of my life destroy'd!
And canst thou shed the blood that gave me being?

[Leans on him.

Nay, be a traitor, too, and sell thy country!
Can thy great heart descend so vilely low,
Mix with hir'd slaves, bravoës, and common stab-
bers,
Join with such a crew, and take a ruffian's wages,
To cut the throats of wretches as they sleep?

[They part.

Jaff. Thou wrong'st me, Belvidera! I've en-gag'd

With men of souls, fit to reform the ills
Of all mankind: there's not a heart amongst them
But's stout as death, yet honest as the nature
Of man first made, ere fraud and vice were fashions.

Bel. What's he, to whose curs'd hands last night thou gav'st me?

Was that well done? Oh! I could tell a story,
Would rouse thy lion heart out of its den,
And make it rage with terrifying fury!

Jaff. Speak on, I charge thee!

Bel. O my love! [Leaning on him] if e'er
Thy Belvidera's peace deserved thy care,
Remove me from this place. Last night! last night!

Jaff. Distract me not, but give me all the truth!

Bel. No sooner wert thou gone, and I alone,
Left in the power of that old son of mischief:
No sooner was I laid on my sad bed,
But that vile wretch approach'd me.

Oh, how I wept and sigh'd,
And shrunk, and trembled! wish'd, in vain, for
him

That should protect me! Thou, alas, wast gone!

Jaff. Patience, sweet Heaven, till I make vengeance sure!

Bel. He drew the hideous dagger forth, thou gav'st him,

And, with upbraiding smiles, he said, "Behold it:
This is the pledge of a false husband's love;"
And in my arms then press'd, and would have clasp'd me;

But with my cries I scar'd his coward heart,
Till he withdrew, and mutter'd vows to hell.

[They rush into each other's arms.

These are thy friends! [They part] with these thy life, thy honour,
Thy love, all stak'd, and all will go to ruin.

Jaff. No more; I charge thee, keep this secret close.

Clear up thy sorrows; look as if thy wrongs
Were all forgot, and treat him like a friend,
As no complaint were made. No more; retire,
Retire, my life, and doubt not of my honour;
I'll heal thy failings, and de erve thy love.

Bel. Oh! should I part with thee, I fear thou wilt

In anger leave me, and return no more.

Jaff. Return no more! I would not live without thee

Another night, to purchase the creation.

Bel. When shall we meet again?

Jaff. Anon, at twelve,

I'll steal myself to thy expecting arms:
Come, like the travell'd dove, and bring thee peace.

Bel. Indeed!

Jaff. By all our loves!

Bel. 'Tis hard to part:

But sure no falsehood ever look'd so fairly.

Farewell! remember twelve.

[Exit.

Jaff. Let Heav'n forget me,
When I remember not thy truth, thy love!

Enter PIERRE.

Pie. Jaffier!

Jaff. Who calls?

Pie. A friend, that could have wish'd
T' have found thee otherwise employ'd. What, hunt

A wife, on the dull foil! Sure, a stanch husband,
Of all hounds, is the dullest. Wilt thou never,
Never be wean'd from caudles and confections?
What feminine tales hast thou been list'n'ing to,
Of unair'd shirts? catarrhs, and tooth-ache, got
By thin-soled shoes? Damnation! that a fellow,
Chosen to be a sharer in the destruction
Of a whole people, should sneak thus in corners,
To waste his time, and fool his mind with love!

Jaff. May not a man, then, trifle out an hour
With a kind woman, and not wrong his calling?

Pie. Not in a cause like ours.

Jaff. Then, friend, our cause
Is in a damn'd condition: for I'll tell thee,
That canker-worm, call'd lechery, has touch'd it;
'Tis tainted vilely. Wouldst thou think it?

Renault

(That mortify'd old wither'd winter rogue)
Loves simple fornication like a priest;
I found him out for watering at my wife;
He visited her last night, like a kind guardian:
Faith! she has some temptations, that's the truth
on't.

Pie. He durst not wrong his trust!

Jaff. 'Twas something late, though,
To take the freedom of a lady's chamber.

Pie. Was she in bed?

Jaff. Yes, 'faith! in virgin sheets,
White as her bosom, Pierre; dish'd neatly up,—
Might tempt a weaker appetite to taste.

Pie. Patience guide me!

He us'd no violence?

Jaff. No, no: out on't, violence!

Play'd with her neck; brush'd her with his gray beard;
Struggled and touz'd; tickled her till she squeak'd
a little,

May be, or so—but not a jot of violence—

Pie. Damn him!

Jaff. Ay, so say I: but, hush, no more on't!
Sure it is near the hour

We all should meet for our concluding orders:

Will the ambassador be here in person?

Pie. No, he has sent commission to that villain,
Renault,

To give the executing charge:

I'd have thee be a man, if possible,
And keep thy temper: for a brave revenge
Ne'er comes too late.

Jaff. Fear not, I am as cool as patience.

Pie. He's yonder, coming this way, through the hall;

His thoughts seem full.

Jaff. Prithee retire, and leave me

With him alone: I'll put him to some trial;
See how his rotten part will bear the touching.

Pie. Be careful, then.

Jaff. Nay, never doubt, but trust me.

[Exit PIERRE.

What! be a devil, and take a damning oath

For shedding native blood ! Can there be sin
In merciful repentance ? Oh, this villain !

[Retires.]

Enter RENAULT.

Ren. Perverse and peevish : what a slave is man,
To let his itching flesh thus get the better of him !
Despatch the fool, her husband—that were well—
Who's there ?

Jaff. A man.

[Advancing.]

Ren. My friend, my near ally,
The hostage of your faith, my beauteous charge, is very well.

Jaff. Sir, are you sure of that ?
Stands she in perfect health ? Beats her pulse even ?

Neither too hot nor cold ?

Ren. What means that question ?

Jaff. Oh ! women have fantastic constitutions,
Inconstant in their wishes, always wavering,
And never fix'd. Was it not boldly done,
Ev'n at first sight, to trust the thing I lov'd
(A tempting treasure too) with youth, so fierce
And vigorous as thine ? But thou art honest.

Ren. Who dares accuse me ?

Jaff. Curs'd be he that doubts
Thy virtue ! I have try'd it, and declare,
Were I to choose a guardian of my honour,
I'd put it into thy keeping ; for I know thee.

Ren. Know me !

Jaff. Ay, know thee.—There's no falsehood in
thee ;

Thou look'st just as thou art. Let us embrace.
Now, wouldst thou cut my throat, or I cut thine.

Ren. You dare not do't !

Jaff. You lie, sir !

Ren. How !

Jaff. No more—

'Tis a base world, and must reform, that's all.

Enter SPINOSA, ELLIOT, THEODORE, DURAND, and MEZZANA.

Ren. Spinosa, Theodore, you are welcome.

Spi. You are trembling, sir.

Ren. 'Tis a cold night, indeed ; I am aged ;
Full of decay, and natural infirmities.
We shall be warm, my friends, I hope, to-morrow,
[RENAULT and the Conspirators retire and confer.]

Enter PIERRE.

Pie. [To JAFFIER.] 'Twas not well done ; thou
shouldst have strok'd him,
And not have gall'd him. [Retires to the others.]

Jaff. Damn him, let him chew on't !
Heaven ! where am I ? Beset with cursed fiends,
That wait to damn me ! what a devil's man,
When he forgets his nature !—Hush, my heart.

[RENAULT and the Conspirators advance.]

Ren. My friends, 'tis late : are we assembled all ?

Spi. All—all !

Ren. Oh ! you're men, I find,
Fit to behold your fate, and meet her summons.
To-morrow's rising sun must see you all
Deck'd in your honours. Are the soldiers ready ?

Pie. All—all !

Ren. You, Durand, with your thousand, must possess
St. Mark's ; you, captain, know your charge already ;

'Tis to secure the ducal palace :

Be all this done with the least tumult possible,
Till in each place you post sufficient guards ;

Then sheathe your swords in every breast you meet.

Jaff. [Aside.] Oh, reverend cruelty ! damn'd bloody villain !

Ren. During this execution, Durand, you
Must in the midst keep your battalia fast :
And, Theodore, be sure to plant the cannon
That may command the streets ;
This done, we'll give the general alarm,
Apply petards, and force the arsenal gates ;
Then fire the city round in several places,
Or with our cannon, if it dare resist,
Batter to ruin. But, above all, I charge you,
Shed blood enough ; spare neither sex nor age,
Name nor condition : if there lives a senator
After to-morrow, though the dullest rogue
That e'er said nothing, we have lost our ends.
If possible, let's kill the very name
Of senator, and bury it in blood.

Jaff. [Aside.] Merciless, horrid slave ! Ay, blood enough !

Shed blood enough, old Renault ! how thou charm'st
me !

Ren. But one thing more, and then farewell, till fate

Join us again, or separate us ever :

But let us all remember,

We wear no common cause upon our swords.

Let each man think that on his single virtue

Depends the good and fame of all the rest :—

Eternal honour, or perpetual infamy.

You droop, sir.

[To JAFFIER.]

Jaff. No : with the most profound attention
I've heard it all, and wonder at thy virtue.

Ren. Let's consider,

That we destroy oppression—avarice ;

A people nurs'd up equally with vices

And loathsome lusts, which nature most abhors,

And such as, without shame, she cannot suffer.

Jaff. [Aside.] Oh, Belvidera, take me to thy arms,

And show me where's my peace, for I have lost it.

[Exit.]

Ren. Without the least remorse, then, let's resolve

With fire and sword t'exterminate these tyrants,
Under whose weight this wretched country labours.

Pie. And may those powers above, that are propitious

To gallant minds, record this cause, and bless it.

Ren. Thus happy, thus secure of all we wish for,
Should there, my friends, be found among us one
False to this glorious enterprise, what fate,
What vengeance, were enough for such a villain !

Ell. Death here, without repentance, hell hereafter.

Ren. Let that be my lot, if, as here I stand,

Listed by fate among her darling sons,

Though I had one only brother, dear by all

The strictest ties of nature,

Join'd in this cause, and had but ground for fear
He meant foul play, may this right hand drop from
me,

If I'd not hazard all my future peace,
And stab him to the heart before you ? Who,
Who would do less ? Wouldst thou not, Pierre, the same !

Pie. You've singled me, sir, out for this hard question,

As if 'twere started only for my sake ;

Am I the thing you fear ? Here, here's my bosom :
Search it with all your swords. Am I a traitor ?

Ren. No; but I fear your late commended friend

Is little less. Come, sirs, 'tis now no time
To trifle with our safety. Where's this Jaffier?

Spil. He left the room just now, in strange disorder.

Ren. Nay, there is danger in him: I observ'd him:

During the time I took for explanation,
He was transported from most deep attention
To a confusion which he could not smother.
What's the requisite for safety, must be done
With speedy execution; he remains
Yet in our power; I, for my own part, wear
A dagger—

Pie. Well? [Goes to RENAULT.

Ren. And I could wish it—

Pie. Where?

Ren. Buried in his heart.

Pie. Away! we're yet all friends.—

No more of this; 'twill breed ill blood among us.

Spil. Let us all draw our swords, and search the house;

Pull him from the dark hold, where he sits brooding
O'er his cold fears, and each man kill his share of him.

Pie. Who talks of killing? Who's he'll shed the blood

That's dear to me? Is't you, or you, sir?

What! not one speak? How you stand gaping all
On your grave oracle, your wooden god there!

Yet not a word? Then, sir, I'll tell you a secret:
Suspicion's but at best a coward's virtue.

[To RENAULT.

Ren. A coward!

Pie. Put—put up thy sword, old man;

Thy hand shakes at it. Come, let's heal this breach;

I am too hot: we may yet all live friends.

Spil. Till we are safe, our friendship cannot be so.

Pie. Again? Who's that?

Spil. 'Twas I.

The. And I.

Ren. And I.

Spil. And all.

Let's die like men, and not be sold like slaves.

Pie. One such word more, by Heaven, I'll to the senate,

And hang ye all like dogs, in clusters.

Why peep your coward swords half out their sheaths?

Why do you not all brandish them like mine?

You fear to die, and yet dare talk of killing.

[Going.

Ren. Go to the senate, and betray us—haste!

Secure thy wretched life; we fear to die
Less than thou dar'st be honest.

Pie. That's rank falsehood.

Fear'st thou not death? Fie, there's a knavish itch
In that salt blood, an utter foe to smarting!

Had Jaffier's wife prov'd kind, he'd still been true.

Faugh—how that stinks! [Exit RENAULT.

Away, disperse all to your several charges,

And meet to-morrow, where your honour calls you.

I'll bring that man, whose blood you so much thirst for,

And you shall see him venture for you fairly—

Hence, hence, I say!

Spil. I fear we have been to blame,

And done too much.

The. 'Twas too far urg'd against the man you love.

Ell. Forgive us, gallant friend.

Pie. Nay, now you've found

The way to melt and cast me as you will.

I'll fetch this friend, and give him to your mercy;

Nay, he shall die, if you will take him from me!

For your repose, I'll quit my heart's best jewel,

But would not have him torn away by villains

And spiteful villany.

Spil. No: may ye both

For ever live, and fill the world with fame!

Pie. Now you're too kind. Whence rose all this discord?

Oh! what a dangerous precipice have we 'scap'd!

How near a fall was all we'd long been building!

What an eternal blot had stain'd our glories,

If one, the bravest and the best of men,

Had fall'n a sacrifice to rash suspicion,

Butcher'd by those whose cause he came to cherish!

Oh, could you know him all, as I have known him—

How good he is, how just, how true, how brave,

You would not leave this place till you had seen him,

And gained remission for the worst of follies.

Come but to-morrow, all your doubts shall end,

And to your loves me better recommend,

That I've preserved your fame, and sav'd my friend. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter BELVIDERA and JAFFIER.

Jaff. Where dost thou lead me? Every step I move,

Methinks I tread upon some mangled limb

Of a rack'd friend. Oh, my dear, charming ruin!

Where are we wandering?

Bel. To eternal honour.

To do a deed, shall chronicle thy name

Among the glorious legends of those few

That have sav'd sinking nations. Every street

Shall be adorn'd with statues to thy honour:

And, at thy feet, this great inscription written—

“Remember him that propp'd the fall of Venice!”

Jaff. Rather, remember him, who, after all

The sacred bonds of oaths, and holier friendship,

In fond compassion to a woman's tears,

Forgot his manhood, virtue, truth, and honour,

To sacrifice the bosom that reliev'd him.

Why wilt thou damn me?

Bel. O, inconstant man!

How wilt you promise! how will you deceive!

Do, return back, replace me in my bondage,

Tell all thy friends how dangerously thou lov'st me,

And let thy dagger do its bloody office.

Or, if thou think'st it nobler, let me live

Till I'm a victim to the hateful will

Of that infernal devil!

Last night, my love!

Jaff. Name, name it not again:

Destruction, swift destruction, fall on my coward head,

If I forgive him!

Bel. Delay no longer, then, but to the senate,
And tell the dismal'st story ever utter'd:
Tell them what bloodshed, rapines, desolations,
Have been prepar'd;—how near's the fatal hour.
Save thy poor country, save the rev'rend blood
Of all its nobles, which to-morrow's dawn
Must else see shed!

Jaff. Oh!

Bel. Think what then may prove
My lot: the ravisher may then come safe,
And, 'midst the terror of the public ruin,
Do a damn'd deed.

Jaff. By all Heaven's pow'rs, prophetic truth dwells in thee!

For every word thou speak'st strikes through my heart,

Like a new light, and shows it how't has wan-
der'd—

Just what thou'st made me, take me, Belvidera,
And lead me to the place, where I'm to say
This bitter lesson; where I must betray
My truth, my virtue, constancy, and friends.
Must I betray my friends? Ah! take me quickly,
Secure me well before that thought's renew'd:
If I relapse once more, all's lost for ever.

Bel. Hast thou a friend more dear than Belvidera?

Jaff. No: thou'rt my life itself; wealth, friendship, honour,
All present joys, and earnest of all future,
Are summ'd in thee. [Going.]

Enter Captain and Guards.

Cap. Stand! who goes there?

Bel. Friends.

Cap. But what friends are you?

Bel. Friends to the senate, and the state of Venice.

Cap. My orders are to seize on all I find
At this late hour, and bring them to the council,
Who now are sitting.

Jaff. Sir, you shall be obey'd.

Now the lot's cast, and, fate, do what thou wilt.
[Exeunt JAFFIER and BELVIDERA, guarded.]

SCENE II.—The Senate-House.

The Duke of Venice, PRIULI, and other Senators, discovered sitting.

Duke. Antony, Priuli, senators of Venice,
Speak—Why are we assembled here this night?
What have you to inform us of, concerns
The state of Venice' honour or its safety?

Pri. Could words express the story I've to tell
you,

Fathers, these tears were useless—these sad tears
That fall from my old eyes; but there is a cause
We all should weep,
And wrap ourselves in sackcloth, sitting down
On the sad earth, and cry aloud to Heaven:
Heav'n knows, if yet there be an hour to come,
Ere Venice be no more.

Duke. How!

Pri. Nay, we stand
Upon the very brink of gaping ruin.
Within this city's form'd a dark conspiracy
To massacre us all, our wives and children,
Kindred and friends: our palaces and temples
To lay in ashes: nay, the hour, too, fix'd;
The swords, for aught I know, drawn e'en this moment,
And the wild waste begun. From unknown hands

I had this warning; but, if we are men,
Let's not be tamely butcher'd, but do something
That may inform the world, in after ages,
Our virtue was not ruin'd, though we were.

[A noise within.]

Cap. [Within.] Room, room! make room for some prisoners!

Enter Officer.

Duke. Speak, there! what disturbance?

Off. A prisoner have the guards seized in the street,

Who says he comes to inform this rev'rend council
About the present danger.

Enter Officer, JAFFIER, Captain, and Guards.

All. Give him entrance. [Exit Officer.] Well, who are you?

Jaff. A villain!

Would every man that hears me
Would deal so honestly, and own his title!

Duke. 'Tis rumour'd that a plot has been con-triv'd

Against the state, and you've a share in't, too.

If you're a villain, to redeem your honour,
Unfold the truth, and be restor'd with mercy.

Jaff. Think not, that I to save my life came hither;

I know it's value better: but in pity
To all those wretches, whose unhappy dooms
Are fix'd and seal'd. You see me here before you,
The sworn and covenanted foe of Venice;
But use me as my dealings may deserve,
And I may prove a friend.

Duke. The slave capitulates;
Give him the tortures.

Jaff. That you dare not do—
Your fears won't let you, nor the longing itch
To hear a story, which you dread the truth of:
Truth, which the fear of smart shall ne'er get from
me.

Cowards are scar'd with threat'nings; boys are whipp'd

Into confessions: but a steady mind
Acts of itself, ne'er asks the body counsel.
Give him the tortures!—name but such a thing
Again, by Heav'n, I'll shut these lips for ever!
Nor all your racks, your engines, or your wheels,
Shall force a groan away, that you may guess at!

Duke. Name your conditions.

Jaff. For myself full pardon,
Besides the lives of two-and-twenty friends,
Whose names I have enrolled—Nay, let their crimes

Be ne'er so monstrous, I must have the oaths,
And sacred promise, of this rev'rend council,
That, in a full assembly of the senate,
The thing I ask be ratify'd. Swear this,
And I'll unfold the secrets of your danger.

Duke. Propose the oath.

Jaff. By all the hopes
You have of peace and happiness hereafter,
Swear!

Duke. We swear.

Jaff. And, as ye keep the oath,
May you and your posterity be bless'd
Or curs'd, for ever!

Duke. Else be curs'd for ever!

Jaff. [Delivers two papers to the Officer, who delivers them to the Duke.] Then here's the list, and with it the full disclosure.

Of all that threaten you.

Now, Fate, thou hast caught me !

Duke. Give order, that all diligent search be made

To seize these men, their characters are public.

The paper intimates their rendezvous

To be at the house of the fam'd Grecian courtesan,

Call'd Aquilina ; see the place secur'd.

You, Jaffier, must with patience bear till morning

To be our prisoner.

Jaff. Would the chains of death

Had bound me fast, ere I had known this minute !

Duke. Captain, withdraw your prisoner.

Jaff. Sir, [To Officer] if possible,

Lead me where my own thoughts themselves may lose me ;

Where I may doze out what I've left of life.—

Forget myself, and this day's guilt and falsehood.

Cruel remembrance ! how shall I appease thee ?

[Exit, guarded.]

Offi. [Without.] More traitors ! room, room, make room, there !

Duke. How's this ?

The treason's

Already at the doors !

Enter Officer and Captain.

Offi. My lords, more traitors !

Seiz'd in the very act of consultation ;

* Furnish'd with arms and instruments of mischief.—

Bring in the prisoners !

Enter SPINOSA, ELLIOT, THEODORE, DURAND, MEZZANA, RENAULT, and PIERRE, in chains.

Pie. You, my lords and fathers

(As you are pleas'd to call yourselves) of Venice,

If you sit here to guide the course of justice,

Why those disgraceful chains upon the limbs

That have so often labour'd in your service ?

Are these the wreaths of triumph you bestow

On those that bring you conquest home, and honours ?

Duke. Go on ! you shall be heard, sir.

Pie. Are these the trophies I've deserv'd for fighting

Your battles with confederated powers ?

When winds and seas conspired to overthrow you,

And brought the fleets of Spain to your own harbours ;

When you, great duke, shrunk trembling in your palace,

Stipp'd not I forth, and taught your loose Venetians

The task of honour, and the way to greatness ?

Rais'd you from your capitulating fears

To stipulate the terms of sued-for peace ?

And this my recompense ! If I'm a traitor,

Produce my charge ; or show the wretch that's base

And brave enough to tell me I'm a traitor !

[Goes to the table.]

Duke. Know you one Jaffier ?

Pie. Yes, and know his virtue.

His justice, truth, his general worth and sufferings

From a hard father, taught me first to love him.

Duke. See him brought forth.

Enter Captain, with JAFFIER in chains.

Pie. My friend, too, bound ! nay, then,
Our fate has conquer'd us, and we must fall,

Why droops the man, whose welfare's so much mine,

They're but one thing. These rev'rend tyrants Jaffier,

Call us traitors. Art thou one, my brother ?

Jaff. To thee I am the falsest, veriest slave,

That e'er betray'd a gen'rous, trusting friend,

And gave up honour to be sure of ruin.

All our fair hopes, which morning was t' have crown'd,

Has this curs'd tongue o'erthrown.

Pie. So, then, all's over :

Venice has lost her freedom, I my life.

No more !

Duke. Say, will you make confession

Of your vile deeds, and trust the senate's mercy ?

Pie. Curs'd be your senate, curs'd your constitution !

The curse of growing factions and divisions

Still vex your councils, shake your public safety,

And make the robes of government you wear

Hateful to you, as these base chains to me.

Duke. Pardon, or death !

Pie. Death ! honourable death !

Ren. Death's the best thing we ask, or you can give.

No shameful bonds, but honourable death !

Duke. Break up the council. Captain, guard your prisoners.

Jaffier, you're free, but these must wait for judgment.

[Exeunt Duke, Senators, Conspirators, and Officer.]

Pie. Come, where's my dungeon ? Lead me to my straw :

It will not be the first time I've lodged hard,

To do your senate service.

Jaff. Hold one moment.

Pie. Who's he disputes the judgment of the senate ?

Presumptuous rebel !—on—— [Strikes JAFFIER.]

Jaff. By Heaven, you stir not !

[Exeunt Captain and Guards.]

I must be heard ! I must have leave to speak.

Thou hast disgrac'd me, Pierre, by a vile blow :

Had not a dagger done thee nobler justice ?

But use me as thou wilt, thou canst not wrong me,

For I am fallen beneath the basest injuries ;

Yet, look upon me with an eye of mercy,

And, as there dwells a godlike nature in thee,

Listen with mildness to my supplications.

Pie. What whining monk art thou ? what holy cheat,

That wouldst encroach upon my credulous ears,
And cant'st thus vilely ? Hence ! I know thee not !

Jaff. Not know me, Pierre ?

Pie. No, know thee not. What art thou ?

Jaff. Jaffier, thy friend,—thy once-lov'd, valued friend !

Though now deservedly scorn'd, and us'd most hardly.

Pie. Thou, Jaffier ! thou, my once-lov'd, valu'd friend !

By Heavens, thou lyest ! the man so call'd my friend

Was generous, honest, faithful, just, and valiant ;
Noble in mind, and in his person lovely ;

Dear to my eyes, and tender to my heart ;

But thou, a wretched, base, false, worthless coward,
Poor, even in soul, loathsome in thy aspect :

All eyes must shun thee, and all hearts detest thee !

Prithee, avoid, nor longer cling thus round me;
Like something baneful, that my nature's chill'd at.

Jaff. I have not wrong'd thee; by these tears, I have not.

Pie. Hast thou not wrong'd me? dar'st thou call thyself

That once-lov'd, honest, valu'd friend of mine,
And swear thou hast not wrong'd me? Whence these chains?

Whence the vile death which I may meet this moment?

Whence this dishonour, but from thee, thou false one?

Jaff. All's true; yet grant one thing, and I've done asking.

Pie. What's that?

Jaff. To take thy life on such conditions
The council have propos'd: thou and thy friends
May yet live long, and to be better treated.

Pie. Life! ask my life! confess! record myself
A villain, for the privilege to breathe,
And carry up and down this cursed city
A discontented and repining spirit,
Burdensome to itself, a few years longer!
To lose it, may be, at last, in a lewd quarrel
For some new friend, treacherous and false as thou art!

No: this vile world and I have long been jangling,
And cannot part on better terms than now,
When only men like thee are fit to live in't.

Jaff. By all that's just—

Pie. Swear by some other power,
For thou hast broke that sacred oath too lately.

Jaff. Then by that hell I merit, I'll not leave thee
Till, to thyself, at last, thou'rt reconciled,
However thy resentments deal with me.

Pie. Not leave me!

Jaff. No; thou shalt not force me from thee.
Use me reproachfully, and like a slave;
Tread on me, buffet me, heap wrongs on wrongs
On my poor head; I'll bear it all with patience,
Shall weary out thy most unfriendly cruelty;
Lie at thy feet [Falls on his knees] and kiss them
though they spurn me;
Till, wounded by my sufferings, thou relent,
And raise me to thy arms with dear forgiveness.

Pie. Art thou not—

Jaff. What?

Pie. A traitor!

Jaff. Yes.

Pie. A villain?

Jaff. Granted.

Pie. A coward, a most scandalous coward;
Spiritless, void of honour; one who has sold
Thy everlasting fame, for shameless life!

Jaff. [Rising.] All, all, and more, much more;
my faults are numberless.

Pie. And wouldst thou have me live on terms like thine?

Base, as thou'rt false—

Jaff. No, 'tis to me that's granted;
The safety of thy life was all I aim'd at,
In recompense for faith and trust so broken.

Pie. I scorn it more, because preserved by thee;
And, as when first my foolish heart took pity
On thy misfortunes, sought thee in thy miseries,
Reliev'd thy wants, and rais'd thee from the state
Of wretchedness, in which thy fate had plunged
thee,

To rank thee in my list of noble friends;
All I receiv'd, in surety for thy truth,
Were unregarded oaths, and this, this dagger,

Given with a worthless pledge, thou since hast stol'n:

So I restore it back to thee again.

Swearing by all those powers which thou hast violated,

Never, from this cursed hour, to hold communion,
Friendship, or interest, with thee, though our years
Were to exceed those limited the world.

Take it. [Throws down the dagger.] Farewell, for now I owe thee nothing.

Jaff. Say thou wilt live, then,

Pie. For my life, dispose it

Just as thou wilt, because 'tis what I'm tired with.

Jaff. O, Pierre!

Pie. No more.

Jaff. My eyes won't lose the sight of thee,
But languish after thine, and ake with gazing.

Pie. Leave me. Nay, then, thus, thus I throw thee from me;

And curses, great as is thy falsehood, catch thee!

[Drives him from him and exit.]

Jaff. He's gone—my father, friend, preserver!
And here's the portion he has left me—

[Takes up the dagger.]

This dagger! Well remembered! with this dagger,
I gave a solemn vow of dire importance;

Parted with this and Belyvidera together;—
Have a care, mem'ry,—drive that thought no farther,—

No, I'll esteem it, as a friend's last legacy—
Treasure it up, within this wretched bosom,
Where it may grow acquainted with my heart,
That when they meet they start not from each other.

So, now for thinking—a blow, call'd traitor, villain,
Coward, dishonourable coward: faugh!

Oh, for a long round sleep, and so forget it!
Down, busy devil!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. Whither shall I fly?

Where hide me and my miseries together?
Where's now the Roman constancy I boasted?
Sunk into trembling fears and desperation,
Not daring to look up to that dear face,
Which us'd to smile, even on my faults; but,
down,

Bending those miserable eyes to earth,
Must move in penance, and implore much mercy,

Jaff. Mercy! kind heaven has surely endless stores

Hoarded for thee, of blessings yet untasted:
Let wretches, loaded hard with guilt as I am,
Bow with the weight, and groan beneath the burden,

Before the footstool of that heav'n they've injured.
O, Belvidera! I'm the wretched'st creature
E'er crawl'd on earth!

Bel. Alas! I know thy sorrows are most mighty.

Jaff. My friend, too, Belvidera—that dear friend,
Who, next to thee, was all my heart rejoic'd in,
Has us'd me like a slave, shamefully us'd me:

'Twould break thy pitying heart to hear the story.

Bel. What has he done?

Jaff. O, my dear angel! in that friend, I've lost
All my soul's peace; for every thought of him
Strikes my sense hard, and deadens it in my brains!
Wouldst thou believe it?

Before we parted,
Ere yet his guards had led him to his prison,
Full of severest sorrows for his sufferings,
As at his feet I kneel'd, and sued for mercy,

With a reproachful hand he dash'd a blow :
He struck me, Belvidera ! by Heaven, he struck me !
Buffetted, call'd me traitor, villain, coward.
Am I a coward ? am I a villain ? tell me :
Thou'rt the best judge, and mad'st me, if I am so ?
Damnation ! coward !

Bel. Oh ! forgive him, Jaffier :
And, if his sufferings wound thy heart already,
What will they do to-morrow ?

Jaff. Ah !
Bel. To-morrow,
When thou shalt see him stretch'd in all the agonies
Of a tormenting and a shameful death,
What will thy heart do, then ? Oh ! sure 'twill stream,

Like my eyes now.
Jaff. What means thy dreadful story ?
Death, and to-morrow ?

Bel. The faithless senators, 'tis they've decreed.
They say, according to our friends' request,
They shall have death, and not ignoble bondage ;
Declare their promised mercy all as forfeited :
False to their oaths, and deaf to intercession—
Warrants are pass'd for public death to-morrow.

Jaff. Death ! doom'd to die ! condemn'd unheard ! unpleaded !

Bel. Nay, cruel'st racks and torments are preparing

To force confession from their dying pangs.
Oh ! do not look so terribly upon me !
How your lips shake, and all your face disorder'd !
What means my love ?

Jaff. Leave me, I charge thee, leave me ! Strong temptations

Wake in my heart.

Bel. For what ?
Jaff. No more, but leave me.

Bel. Why ?
Jaff. Oh ! by Heav'n, I love thee with that fondness,

I would not have thee stay a moment longer
Near these cursed hands.

[Pulls the dagger half out of his bosom, and puts it back again.

Art thou not terrified ?

Bel. No.
Jaff. Call to mind
What thou hast done, and whither thou hast brought me.

Bel. Ha !
Jaff. Where's my friend ? my friend, thou smiling mischief !

Nay, shrink not, now 'tis too late, for dire revenge
Is up, and raging for my friend. He groans !
Hark, how he groans ! his screams are in my ears !
Already, see, they've fix'd him on the wheel !
And now they tear him—murder ! perjur'd senate !
Murder ! Oh ! hark thee, traitress, thou hast done this !

Thanks to thy tears, thou false persuading love.
How her eyes speak ! oh, thou bewitching creature !
Madness can't hurt thee. Come, thou little trembler,
Creep even into my heart, and there lie safe ;
'Tis thy own citadel. 'Hah ! yet stand off ! [Going.
Heav'n must have justice, and my broken vows
Will sink me else beneath its reaching mercy.
I'll wink, and then 'tis done.

Bel. What means the lord
Of me, my life, and love ? What's in thy bosom,
Thou grasp'st at so ?

[Jaffier draws the dagger, and offers to stab her.
Ah ! do not kill me, Jaffier. [Falls on her knees.

Jaff. Know, Belvidera, when we parted last,
I gave this dagger with thee, as in trust,
To be thy portion if I e'er proved false.
On such condition was my truth believed :
But now 'tis forfeited, and must be paid for.
[Offers to stab her again.

Bel. Oh ! mercy !
Jaff. Nay, no struggling.
Bel. Now, then, kill me !
[Leaps on his neck, and kisses him.

While thus I cling about thy cruel neck,
Kiss thy revengeful lips, and die in joys
Greater than any I can guess hereafter.

Jaff. I am, I am a coward—witness, Heav'n,
Witness it, earth, and ev'ry being witness :
'Tis but one blow ! yet, by immortal love,
I cannot longer bear a thought to harm thee !

[He throws away the dagger, and embraces her.

The seal of Providence is sure upon thee ;
And thou wast born for yet unheard-of wonders.
Oh ! thou wast either born to save or damn me !
By all the power that's given thee o'er my soul—
By thy resistless tears and conquering smiles—
By thy victorious love, that still waits on thee—
Fly to thy cruel father, save my friend,
Or all our future quiet's lost for ever.

Fall at his feet, cling round his rev'rend knees,
Speak to him with thy eyes, and with thy tears
Melt his hard heart, and wake dead nature in him ;
Nor, till thy prayers are granted, set him free,
But conquer him, as thou hast vanquish'd me.
[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Priuli's House.

Enter PRIULI.

Pri. Why, cruel Heav'n, have my unhappy days
Been lengthen'd to this sad one ? Oh ! dishonour,
And deathless infamy, have fall'n upon me.
Was it my fault ? Am I a traitor ? No.
But then, my only child, my daughter wedded !
There my best blood runs foul, and a disease
Incurable has seiz'd upon my memory.

Enter BELVIDERA, in a mourning veil.

Bel. [Speaking aside, as she enters.] He's there,
my father, my inhuman father,
That, for three years, has left an only child
Expos'd to all the outrages of fate,
And cruel ruin ? Oh !

Pri. What child of sorrow
Art thou, that com'st, wrapt up in weeds of sadness,
And mov'st as if thy steps were towards a grave ?

Bel. A wretch, who, from the very top of happiness,

Am fallen into the lowest depths of misery,
And want your pitying hand to raise me up again.

Pri. What wouldst thou beg for ?

Bel. Pity and forgiveness. [Throws up her veil.
By the kind tender names of child and father,
Hear my complaints, and take me to your love.

[Kneels.

Pri. My daughter !
Bel. Yes, your daughter ; and you've oft told me,

With smiles of love, and chaste paternal kisses,
I'd much resemblance of my mother.

Pri. Don't talk thus.

Bel. Yes, I must: and you must hear, too.

I have a husband.

Pri. Damn him!

Bel. Oh, do not curse him!

He would not speak so hard a word towards you,
On any terms, howe'er he deal with me.

Pri. Ah! what means my child?

Bel. Oh! my husband, my dear husband,
Carries a dagger in his once kind bosom,

To pierce the heart of your poor Belvidera!

Pri. Kill thee!

Bel. Yes, kill me. When he passed his faith

And covenant against your state and senate,
He gave me up a hostage for his truth:

With me a dagger, and a dire commission,
Whene'er he fail'd, to plunge it through this bosom.

I learnt the danger, chose the hour of love
T' attempt his heart, and bring it back to honour.

Great love prevail'd, and bless'd me with success!
He came, confess'd, betray'd his dearest friends,

For promis'd mercy. Now, they're doom'd to suffer!
Gall'd with remembrance of what then was sworn,

If they are lost, he vows t' appease the gods
With this poor life, and make my blood th' atonement.

Pri. Heavens!

Bel. If I was ever, then, your care, now hear me:
Fly to the senate, save the promis'd lives.

Of his dear friends, ere mine be made the sacrifice.

Pri. Oh, my heart's comfort!

Bel. Will you not, my father?

Weep not, but answer me.

Pri. By Heav'n I will!

Not one of them but what shall be immortal!

Canst thou forgive me all my follies past?

I'll henceforth be indeed a father! never,

Never more, thus expose, but cherish thee,

Dear as the vital warmth that feeds my life;

Dear as these eyes, that weep in fondness o'er thee:
Peace to thy heart. Farewell!

Bel. Go, and remember,

'Tis Belvidera's life her father pleads for! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Rialto.

Enter Captain—Muffled Drums—Guards—Executioner, with axe—RENAULT—SPINOSA—ELLIOT—THEODORE—DURAND—MEZZANA—PIERRE—Officer—Guards.—They all pass over the stage, and exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Street.

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaft. Final destruction seize on all the world!
Bend down, ye heav'ns, and, shutting round this earth,
Crush the vile globe into its first confusion!

Enter BELVIDERA:

Bel. My life! —

Jaft. My plague! —

Bel. Nay, then, I see my ruin.

If I must die —

Jaft. No, death's this day too busy;
Thy father's ill-timed mercy came too late.
I thank thee for thy labours, though, and him, too;
But all my poor, betray'd, unhappy friends,
Have summons to prepare for fate's black hour.

Yet, Belvidera, do not fear my cruelty,
Nor let the thoughts of death perplex thy fancy:
But answer me to what I shall demand,
With a firm temper and unshaken spirit.

Bel. I will, when I've done weeping —

Jaft. Fie, no more on't!

How long is't since the miserable day

We wedded first?

Bel. Oh! oh!

[Weeps.]

Jaft. Nay, keep in thy tears,

Least they unman me, too.

Bel. Heaven knows I cannot!

The words you utter sound so very sadly,

The streams will follow —

Jaft. Come, I'll kiss them dry, then.

Bel. [Hanging on him.] But wasn't a miserable day?

Jaft. A curs'd one!

Bel. I thought it otherwise; and you have often sworn,

When sure you spoke the truth, you've sworn, you bless'd it.

Jaft. 'Twas a rash oath.

Bel. Then why am I not curs'd, too?

Jaft. No, Belvidera; by th' eternal truth,

I dote with too much fondness.

Bel. Still so kind?

Still, then, do you love me?

Jaft. Man ne'er was bless'd,

Since the first pair met, as I have been.

Bel. Then sure you will not curse me?

Jaft. No, I'll bless thee.

I came on purpose, Belvidera, to bless thee.

'Tis now, I think, three years, we've liv'd together.

Bel. And may no fatal minute ever part us,

Till reverend grown, for age and love, we go

Down to one grave, as our last bed, together;

There sleep in peace till an eternal morning.

Jaft. Did not I say, I came to bless thee?

Bel. You did.

[Part.]

Jaft. Then hear me, bounteous Heaven. [Kneeling.]

Pour down your blessings on this beauteous head,

Where everlasting sweets are always springing,

With a continual giving hand: let peace,

Honour, and safety, always hover round her:

Feed her with plenty; let her eyes ne'er see

A sight of sorrow, nor her heart know mourning;

Crown all her days with joy, her nights with rest,

Harmless as her own thoughts; and prop her virtue

To bear the loss of one that too much lov'd;

And comfort her with patience in our parting!

Bel. How? parting, parting!

Jaft. Yes, for ever parting!

I have sworn, Belvidera, by yon heav'n,

That best can tell how much I lose to leave thee,

We part this hour for ever!

Bel. Oh! call back

Your cruel blessing; stay with me, and curse me.

Jaft. Now hold, heart, or never!

Bel. By all the tender days we've lived together,

Pity my sad condition; speak, but speak.

Jaft. Murder! unhold me;

Or by th' immortal destiny that doom'd me

[Draws his dagger.]

To this curs'd minute, I'll not live one longer!

Resolve to let me go, or see me fall —

Hark! the dismal bell

[Passing bell tolls.]

Tolls out for death! I must attend its call, too,

For my poor friend, my dying Pierre, expects me;

He sent a message to require I'd see him

Before he died, and take his last forgiveness.

Farewell for ever!

[Going.]

Bel. Leave thy dagger with me;
Bequeath me something—not one kiss at parting!
Oh, my poor heart! when wilt thou break?

Jaff. [Returning—she runs into his arms.] Yet stay:

We have a child, as yet a tender infant;
Be a kind mother to him when I'm gone;
Breed him in virtue, and the paths of honour,
But never let him know his father's story:
I charge thee, guard him from the wrongs my fate
May do his future fortune or his name.

Now—nearer yet—
Oh, that my arms were riveted
Thus round thee ever! But my friends! my oath!
This, and more! [Kisses her.]

Bel. Another, sure another
For that poor little one, you've ta'en such care of.
I'll giv' him truly.

Jaff. So—now, farewell!

Bel. For ever!

Jaff. Heav'n knows, for ever! all good angels guard thee! [Exit.]

Bel. All ill ones, sure, had charge of me this moment!

Oh, give me daggers, fire, or water!
How I could bleed, how burn, how drown, the waves

Huzzing and foaming round my sinking head,
Till I descended to the peaceful bottom!
Oh! there's all quiet—here, all rage and fury!
The air's too thin, and pierces my weak brain;
I long for thick substantial sleep: hell! hell!
Burst from the centre, rage and roar aloud,
If thou art half so hot, so mad as I am. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—St. Mark's Place.—A Scaffold in the background, and a Wheel, prepared for the Execution of PIERRE.

Enter Captain, PIERRE, Guards, Executioner, and Rabble.

Pie. My friend not yet come?

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaff. Oh, Pierre! [Falling on his knees.]

Pie. Dear to my arms, though thou'st undone
my fame,

I can't forget to love thee. Prithee, Jaffier,
Forgive that filthy blow my passion dealt thee;
I am now preparing for the land of peace,
And fain would have the charitable wishes
Of all good men, like thee, to bless my journey.

Cap. The time grows short; your friends are dead already.

Jaff. Dead!

Pie. Yes, dead, Jaffier! they've all died like men, too

Worthy their character.

Jaff. And what must I do?

Pie. Oh, Jaffier!

Jaff. Speak aloud thy burden'd soul.

And tell thy troubles to thy tortur'd friend.

Pie. Friend! Couldst thou yet be a friend, a generous friend,

I might hope comfort from thy noble sorrows.

Heaven knows, I want a friend!

Jaff. And I a kind one,

That would not thus scorn my repenting virtue,

Or think, when he's to die, my thoughts are idle.

Pie. No! live, I charge thee, Jaffier.

Jaff. Yes, I will live:

But it shall be to see thy fall reveng'd
At such a rate as Venice long shall groan for.

Pie. Wilt thou?

Jaff. I will, by Heaven!

Pie. Then still thou'rt noble.

And I forgive thee. [Embraces.] Oh!—Yet—shall I trust thee?

Jaff. No; I've been false already.

Pie. Dost thou love me?

Jaff. Rip up my heart, and satisfy thy doubtings.

Pie. Curse on this weakness!

Jaff. Tears! Amazement! Tears!

I never saw thee melted thus before;
And know there's something labouring in thy bosom,

That must have vent; though I'm a villain, tell
me.

Pie. Seest thou that engine?

[Pointing to the wheel.]

Jaff. Why?

Pie. Is't fit a soldier, who has liv'd with honour, Fought nations' quarrels, and been crown'd with conquest,

Be exposed, a common carcass, on a wheel!

Jaff. Hah!

Pie. Speak! is't fitting?

Jaff. Fitting!

Pie. I'd have thee undertake

Something that's noble, to preserve my memory

From the disgrace that's ready to attain it.

Cap. The day grows late, sir.

Pie. I'll make haste. Oh Jaffier!

Though thou'st betray'd me, do me some way justice.

Jaff. What's to be done?

Pie. This and no more. [He whispers JAFFIER.]

Jaff. Hah! is't then so?

Pie. Most certainly.

Jaff. I'll do't.

Pie. Remember.

Cap. Sir—

Pie. Come, now I'm ready.

Captain, you should be a gentleman of honour;

Keep off the rabble, that I may have room

To entertain my fate, and die with decency.

You'll think on't! [To JAFFIER.]

Jaff. 'Twont grow stale before to-morrow.

[PIERRE and JAFFIER ascend the Scaffold.—
Executioner binds PIERRE.]

Pie. Now, Jaffier! now I'm going! Now—

Jaff. Have at thee,

Thou honest heart, then!—there— [Stabs him.]

And this is well, too. [Stabs himself.]

Pie. Now thou hast indeed been faithful!

This was done nobly!—We have deceived
senate,

Jaff. Bravely!

Pie. Ha! ha!—oh! oh!

[Falls down on the Scaffold, and dies.]

Jaff. Now, ye curs'd rulers,

Thus of the blood ye've shed, I make libation,

And sprinkle it. Mingling, may it rest upon
you,

And all your race! Oh, poor Belvidera!

Sir, [To Officer,] I have a wife; bear this in safety to her,

A token that, with my dying breath, I bless'd
her,

And the dear little infant left behind me.

I'm sick—I'm quiet.

[Dies.]

SCENE V.—An Apartment in PRIULI's House.

Enter PRIULI; BELVIDERA, distracted; and two of her Women.

Pri. Strengthen her heart with patience, pitying Heav'n!

Bel. Come, come, come, come, come; nay, come to bed,

Pri. Thee, my love. The winds! hark, how they whistle!

And the rain beats! Oh, how the weather shrinks me!

I say you shall not go, you shall not:

Whip your ill-nature; get you gone then. Oh!

Are you return'd? See, father, here he's come again!

Am I to blame to love him? O, thou dear one!

Why do you fly me? Are you angry still, then?

Jaffier, where art thou? Father, why do you do thus?

Stand off! don't hide him from me! He's there somewhere.

Stand off, I say! What, gone! Remember, tyrant, I may revenge myself for this trick, one day.

Enter Captain of the Guard, and whispers PRIULI.

Pri. News! what news?

Cap. Most sad, sir:

Jaffier, upon the scaffold, to prevent

A shameful death, stabb'd Pierre, and next himself;

Both fell together.

Bel. Ha! look there!

My husband bloody, and his friend too! Murder!

Who has done this? Speak to me, thou sad vision;

On these poor trembling knees, I beg it. Vanished:—

Here they went down.—Oh, I'll dig, dig the den up!

Hoa, Jaffier, Jaffier!

Peep up, and give me but a look. I have him!

I have got him, father! Oh!

My love! my dear! my blessing! Help me! help me!

They have hold of me, and drag me to the bottom!

Nay—now they pull so hard—farewell— [Dies.]

Pri. [Bending over her.] Oh! lead me into some place that's fit for mourning;

Where the free air, light, and the cheerful sun,

May never enter; hang it round with black;

Set up one taper, that may light a day,

As long as I've to live; and there all leave me:

Sparing no tears when you this tale relate,

But bid all cruel fathers dread my fate.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Palace Garden. A Storm, with thunder and lightning. Stage dark.

Enter ZANGA, through Archway.

Zan. Whether first nature, or long want of peace,
Has wrought my mind to this, I cannot tell;
But horrors now are not displeasing to me.

[Thunder.]

I like this rocking of the battlements.

Enter ISABELLA, through Archway.

Rage on, ye winds, burst clouds, and waters roar!
You bear a just resemblance to my fortune,
And suit the gloomy habit of my soul. [Advances.]
Who's there? My love!

Isa. Why have you left my bed?
Your absence more affrights me than the storm.

[Thunder.]

Zan. The dead alone in such a night can rest,
And I indulge my meditation here.

Woman, away! I choose to be alone.

Isa. I know you do; and therefore will not leave you,—

Excuse me, Zanga,—therefore dare not leave you.

Is this a night for walks of contemplation?

Something unusual hangs upon your heart,

And I will know it; by our loves, I will.

To you I sacrific'd my virgin fame;

Ask I too much, to share in your distress?

ACT, DRAMA,—NO. XVII.

Zan. In tears? Thou fool! Then hear me, and be plung'd

In hell's abyss, if ever it escape thee.

To strike thee with astonishment at once,

I hate Alonso. First, recover that,

And then thou shalt hear further.

Isa. Hate Alonso!

I own, I thought Alonso most your friend,

And that he lost the master in that name.

Zan. Hear then.—'Tis twice three years since that great man,—

Great let me call him for he conquer'd me,—

Made me the captive of his arm in fight;

He slew my father, and threw chains o'er me,

While I with pious rage pursu'd revenge.

I then was young; he plac'd me near his person,

And thought me not dishonoured by his service.

One day—may that returning day be night!

The stain, the curse of each succeeding year!—

For something, or for nothing, in his pride,

He struck me—while I tell it, do I live?—

He smote me on the cheek. I did not stab him;

For that were poor revenge. E'er since, his folly

Has striven to bury it beneath a heap

Of kindnesses, and thinks it is forgot.

Insolent thought! and like a second blow!

Affronts are innocent, where men are worthless;

And such alone can wisely drop revenge.

Isa. But with more temper, Zanga, tell your story;

To see your strong emotion, startles me.

Zan. Yes, woman, with the temper that befits it.

Has the dark adder venom? So have I,

When trod upon. Proud Spaniard, thou shalt feel
me!

For, from that day, that day of my dishonour,

I from that day have curs'd the rising sun,

Which never fail'd to tell me of my shame;

I from that day have bless'd the coming night,

Which promis'd to conceal it; but in vain;

The blow return'd for ever in my dream.

Yet on I toil'd, and groan'd for an occasion

Of ample vengeance; none is yet arriv'd.

Howe'er, at present, I conceive warm hopes

Of what may wound him sore in his ambition.

Life of his life, and dearer than his soul.

[Stage becomes gradually lighter.]

By nightly march he purpos'd to surprise
The Moorish camp:—but I have taken care,
They shall be ready to receive his favour:—
Failing in this, a cast of utmost moment,
Would darken all the conquests he has won.

Isa. Just as I entered, an express arriv'd.

Zan. To whom?

Isa. His friend Don Carlos.

Zan. Be propitious,

O Mahomet, on this important hour,
And give at length my famished soul revenge!
What is revenge, but courage to call in
Our honour's debts, and wisdom to convert
Other's self-love into our own protection?
But see the morning ray breaks in upon us:
I'll seek Don Carlos, and inquire my fate. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Hall in the Palace.

Enter CARLOS, with a letter, and MANUEL.

Man. My lord Don Carlos, what brings your express?

Car. Alonso's glory, and the Moors' defeat.
The field is strow'd with twice ten thousand slain:
Though, he suspects, his measures were betray'd.
He'll soon arrive. O, how I long to embrace
The first of heroes, and the best of friends!
I lov'd fair Leonora long before
The chance of battle gave me to the Moors;
And, while I groan'd in bondage, I deputed
This great Alonso, whom her father honours,
To be my gentle advocate in love.

Man. And what success?

Car. Alas, the cruel maid!

Indeed, her father—who, though high at court
And powerful with the king, has wealth at heart,
To heal his devastations from the Moors,—
Knowing I'm richly freighted from the East,
My fleet now sailing in the sight of Spain,— Heaven guard it safe through such a dreadful storm!—

Caresses me and urges her to wed.

Man. Her aged father
Leads her this way.

Car. She looks like radiant Truth
Brought forward by the hand of hoary Time.
You to the port with speed; 'tis possible,
Some vessel has arriv'd. [Exit MANUEL.]
Heaven grant it bring
Tidings which Carlos may receive with joy!

Enter ALVAREZ and LEONORA.

Alv. Don Carlos, I am labouring in your favour
With all a parent's soft authority,
And earnest counsel.

Car. Angels second you!
For all my bliss or misery hangs on it.

Alv. Daughter, the happiness of life depends
On our discretion, and a prudent choice.
Don Carlos is of ancient, noble blood;
And then, his wealth might mend a prince's fortune:
For him the sun is labouring in the mines,
A faithful slave, and turning earth to gold:
His keels are freighted with that sacred power
By which even kings and emperors are made.
Sir, you have my good wishes, and, I hope,
My daughter is not indispos'd to hear you.

[Exit ALVAREZ.]

Car. O, Leonora, why art thou in tears?
Because I am less wretched than I was?
Before your father gave me leave to woo you,
Hush'd was your bosom and your eye serene,

Leon. Think you my father too indulgent to me,
That he claims no dominion o'er my tears?

A daughter, sure, may be right dutiful,
Whose tears alone are free from a restraint.

Car. Ah, my torn heart!

Leon. Regard not me, my lord;
I shall obey my father.

Car. Disobey him,
Rather than come thus coldly—than come thus,
With absent eyes and alienated mien,
Suffering address, the victim of my love.
Love calls for love: Not all the pride of beauty,
Those eyes that tell us what the sun is made of,
Those lips whose touch is to be bought with life,
Those hills of driven snow, which seen are felt,—
All these possess'd are nought, but as they are
The proof, the substance, of an inward passion,
And the rich plunder of a taken heart.

Leon. I pray, my lord, no more.

Car. Must I despair, then? Do not shake me thus.

Heavens! what a proof I gave but two nights past
Of matchless love! To fling me at thy feet,
I slighted friendship, and I flew from fame,
Nor heard the summons of the next day's battle;
But, darting headlong to thy arms, I left
The promis'd fight—I left Alonso too
To stand the war, and quell a world alone.

[Trumpets sound.]

Leon. The victor comes. My lord, I must withdraw.

Car. And must you go?

Leon. Why should you wish me to stay?
Your friend's arrival will bring comfort to you,
My presence none; it pains you and myself:
For both our sakes, permit me to withdraw.

[Exit LEONORA.—Trumpets sound.]

Enter ALONSO, with eight Attendants.

Car. Alonso!

Alon. Carlos, I am whole again;
Clasp'd in thy arms, it makes my heart entire.

Car. Whom dare I thus embrace—the conqueror of Africk?

Alon. Yes, much more: Don Carlos' friend:
The conquest of the world would cost me dear,
Should it beget one thought of distance in thee.
'Twas Carlos conquer'd, 'twas his cruel chains
Inflam'd me to a rage unknown till then,
And threw my former actions far behind.

Car. I love fair Leonora!—how I love her!
Yet still I find, I know not how it is,
Another heart, another soul, for thee.
Thy friendship warms, it raises, it transports;
Like music, pure the joy without alloy,
Whose very rapture is tranquillity:
While love, like wine, gives a tumultuous bliss,
Heighten'd indeed beyond all mortal pleasures;
But mingles pangs and madness in the bowl.

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. Manuel, my lord, returning from the port,
On business, both of moment and of haste,
Humbly begs leave to speak in private with you.

[Retires.]

Car. In private?—Ha!—Alonso, I'll return;
No business can detain me long from thee.

[Exit CARLOS.]

Zan. My lord Alonso, I obey'd your orders.

Alon. Will the fair Leonora pass this way?

Zan. She will, my lord, and soon.

Alon. Come near me, Zanga; [ZANGA advances.]

For I dare open all my heart to thee.
 Never was such a day of triumph known:
 There's not a wounded captive in my train,
 That slowly follow'd my proud chariot wheels
 With half a life, and beggary, and chains,
 But is a god to me: I am most wretched.
 In his captivity, thou know'st, Don Carlos,
 My friend—and never was a friend more dear—
 Deputed me his advocate in love.
 What did I do? I lov'd myself. Indeed,
 One thing there is might lessen my offence,—
 If such offence admits of being lessen'd!—
 I thought him dead; for, by what fate I know not,
 His letters never reach'd me.

Zan. [Aside.] Thanks to Zanga,
 Who thence contriv'd that evil which has happen'd.
 Alon. Yes,—curs'd of Heav'n!—I lov'd myself;
 and now,

In a late action rescu'd from the Moors,
 I have brought home my rival in my friend.

Zan. We hear, my lord, that in that action too
 Your interposing arm preserv'd his life.

Alon. It did,—with more than the expense of mine;

For oh! this day is mention'd for their nuptials.

Zan. My lord, she comes.

Alon. I'll take my leave, and die. [Exit ALONSO.]

Zan. Had'st thou a thousand lives, thy death would please me.

Unhappy fate! My country overcome!

My six years' hope of vengeance quite expir'd!—
 Would nature were!—I will not fall alone:
 But others' groans shall tell the world my death.

[Exit.]

Enter LEONORA and ALONSO.

Alon. When nature ends, with anguish like to this,

Sinners shall take their last leave of the sun,
 And bid his light adieu.

Leon. The mighty conqueror
 Dismay'd? I thought you gave the foe your sorrows.

Alon. O cruel insult! are those tears your sport,
 Which nothing but a love for you could draw?
 Africk I quell'd, in hope by that to purchase
 Your leave to sigh unscorn'd:—but I complain not;
 'Twas but a world, and you are—Leonora.

Leon. That passion which you boast of, is your guilt,

A treason to your friend.

Alon. O Leonora!

What could I do! In duty to my friend,

I saw you; and to see, is to admire.

For Carlos did I plead, and most sincerely;

You know I did: I sought but your esteem;

If that is guilt, an angel had been guilty.

Leon. If from your guilt none suffer'd but yourself,

It might be so:—Farewell. [Going.]

Alon. Who suffers with me? [Takes her hand.]

Leon. [Weeps.] Enjoy your ignorance, and let me go.

Alon. What mean these tears?

Leon. I weep by chance; nor have my tears a meaning;—

But O! when first I saw Alonso's tears,
 I knew their meaning well.

Alon. Heavens! what is this?

Leon. Alonso, pardon me the injury
 Of loving you. I've struggled with my passion,
 And struggled long; let that be some excuse.

You well may wonder at such words as these,
 I start at them myself; they fright my nature.
 Great is my fault: but name not me alone;
 Give him a little blame, who took such pains
 To make me guilty.

Alon. Blame you! You know, I think your love a blessing

Beyond all human blessings; 'tis the price
 Of sighs and groans, and a whole year of dying:—
 But O,—the curse of curses!—O my friend!

Leon. Was it for you, my lord, to be so quick
 In finding out objections to our love?

Think you so strong my love, or weak my virtue,
 It was unsafe to leave that part to me?

Alon. Is not the day then fix'd for your espousals?

Leon. Iudeed, my father, once had thought that way;

Yet, marking how the marriage pain'd my heart,
 Long he stood doubtful; but at last resolv'd,
 Your counsel, which determines him in all,
 Should finish the debate.

Alon. O agony!

Must I not only lose her,—but be made
 Myself the instrument?—Not only die,
 But plunge the dagger in my heart myself?

Leon. What! do you tremble lest you should be mine?

For what else can you tremble? Not for that,
 My father places in your power to alter.

Alon. What's in my power?—O yes, to stab my friend.

Leon. To stab your friend were barbarous indeed:
 Spare him,—and murder me.

Alon. First perish all!

No, Leonora! I am thine for ever:
 The groans of friendship shall be heard no more.
 For whatsoever crimes I can commit,
 I've felt the pangs already.

Leon. Hold, Alonso;

And hear a maid whom doubly thou hast conquered.

I love thy virtue, as I love thy person,

And I adore thee for the pains it gave me:

But, as I felt the pains, I'll reap the fruit.

I'll shine out in my turn, and show the world,

Thy great example was not lost upon me:

Thus then I tear me from thy hopes for ever.

Shall I contribute to Alonso's crimes?

No; though the life-blood gushes from my heart,

You shall not be ashamed of Leonora.

Nay, never shrink: take back the bright example

You lately lent—O take it while you may,

While I can give it you, and be immortal.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

The SCENE continues.

Enter MANUEL and ZANGA.

Zan. If this be true, I cannot blame your pain
 For wretched Carlos: 'tis but human in you.
 But when arriv'd your dismal news?

Man. This hour.

Zan. What, not a vessel sav'd?—And is Alvarez
 Determin'd to deny his daughter to him?
 That treasure was on shore:—Must that too join
 The common wreck?

Man. Alvarez pleads, indeed,
That Leonora's heart is disinclin'd,
And pleads that only : so it was this morning,
When he concurred : the tempest broke the match ;
And sunk his favour, when it sunk the gold.
The love of gold is double in his heart,
The vice of age, and of Alvarez too.

Zan. How does Don Carlos bear it ?

Man. Like a man
Whose heart feels most a human heart can feel.
And reasons best a human heart can reason.

Zan. But is he then in absolute despair ?—

Man. Never to see his Leonora more :—
And, quite to quench all future hope, Alvarez
Urges Alonso to espouse his daughter
This very day ; for he has learnt their loves.

Zan. Ha !—Was not that receiv'd with ecstasy
By Don Alonso ?

Man. Yes, at first ; but soon
A damp came o'er him,—it would kill his friend.

Zan. Not, if his friend consented ; and, since now

He can't himself espouse her,—

Man. Yet, to ask it
Has something shocking to a generous mind ;
At least, Alonso's spirit startles at it.
But I must leave you : Carlos wants support
In his severe affliction. [Exit MANUEL.]

Zan. Ha ! it dawns,—
It rises to me like a new-found world
“ To mariners long time distress'd at sea, } Out
“ Sore from a storm, and all their } sometimes.
viands spent.”

Ho ! Isabella !

Enter ISABELLA.

I thought of dying ; better things come forward :
Vengeance is still alive ; from her dark covert,
With all her snakes erect upon her crest,
She stalks in view, and fires me with her charms.—
When, Isabella, arriv'd Don Carlos here ?

Isa. Two nights ago.

Zan. That was the very night
Before the battle.—Memory, set down that :
It has the essence of a crocodile,
Though yet but in the shell : I'll give it birth.
What time did he return ?

Isa. At midnight.

Zan. So !—

Say, did he see that night his Leonora ?

Isa. No, my good lord.

Zan. No matter.

Go, and fetch my tablets hither. [Exit ISABELLA.]
Two nights ago, my father's sacred shade
Thrice stalk'd around my bed, and smil'd upon me :
He smil'd !—a joy then little understood.

Enter ISABELLA, with the Tablets.

It must be so :—and if so, it is vengeance
Worth waking of the dead for.

[ZANGA takes the Tablets ; writes ; then reads, as to himself.]

Thus it stands :
The father's fix'd ;—Don Carlos cannot wed ;—
Alonso may ;—but that will hurt his friend ;—
Nor can he ask his leave ;—or, if he did,
He might not gain it.—It is hard, to give
Our own consent to ills, though we must bear them.
Were it not then a masterpiece, worth all
The wisdom I can boast,—first to persuade Alonso to request it of his friend ;

His friend to grant : then from that very grant,—
The strongest proof of friendship man can give,—
To work out a cause

Of jealousy, to rack Alonso's peace ?—
I have turn'd o'er the catalogue of woes
Which sting the heart of man, and find none equal ;
It is the hydra of calamities,
The seven-fold death : the jealous are the damn'd.

Isa. Alonso comes this way.

Zan. Most opportunely.

Withdraw.

[Exit ISABELLA.]

Ye subtle demons which reside
In courts, and do your work with bows and smiles,—
That little enginry more mischievous
Than fleets and armies, and the cannon's murder,—
Teach me to look a lie !—give me your maze
Of gloomy thought and intricate design,
To catch the man I hate, and then devour !

Enter ALONSO.

My lord, I give you joy.

Alon. Of what, good Zanga !

Zan. Is not the lovely Leonora yours ?

Alon. What will become of Carlos ?

Zan. He's your friend ;

And since he can't espouse the fair himself,
Will take some comfort from Alonso's fortune.

Alon. Alas ! thou little know'st the force of love ;
Love reigns, a sultan, with unrival'd sway,
Puts all relations, friendship's self, to death,
If once he's jealous of it. I love Carlos ;
Yet well I know what pangs I felt this morning
At his intended nuptials : for myself
I then felt pains, which now for him I feel.

Zan. You will not wed her then ?

Alon. Not instantly :

Insult his broken heart the very moment !

Zan. I understand you : But you'll wed here-
after,

When your friend's gone, and his first pain assuag'd ?

Alon. Am I to blame for that ?

Zan. My lord, I love

Your very errors, they are born from virtue.
Your friendship—and what nobler passion claims
The heart !—does lead you blindfold to your ruin :
Consider,—wherefore did Alvarez break
Don Carlos' match, and wherefore urge Alonso's ?
'Twas the same cause, the love of wealth : Tomorrow

May see Alonso in Don Carlos' fortune :

A higher bidder is a better friend ;

And there are princes sigh for Leonora.

When your friend's gone, you'll wed ? Why then the cause,

Which gives you Leonora now, will cease,
Carlos has lost her ; should you lose her too,
Why then you heap new torments on your friend
By that respect which labour'd to relieve him.

[Aside.] 'Tis well : he is disturb'd ; it makes him pause.

Alon. Think'st thou, my Zanga, should I ask
Don Carlos,
His goodness would consent that I should wed
her ?

Zan. I know, it would.

Alon. But then, the cruelty
To ask it, and for me to ask it of him !

Zan. Methinks you are severe upon your friend.
Who was it gave him liberty and life ?

Alon. That is the very reason which forbids it.
Were I a stranger, I could freely speak :

In me it so resembles a demand,
Exact of a debt; it shocks my nature.

Zan. My lord, you know the sad alternative.
Is Leonora worth one pang, or not?
Warily as you, I wish Don Carlos well:
But I am likewise Don Alonso's friend:
There all the difference lies between us two.
In me, my lord, you hear another self,—
And, give me leave to add, a better too,
Clear'd from those errors which, though caus'd by virtue,

Are such as may hereafter give you pain.
Don Lopez of Castile would not demur thus.

Alon. Perish the name! What! sacrifice the fair
To age and illness, because set in gold?
I'll to Don Carlos, if my heart will let me:
I have not seen him since his sore affliction;
But shunn'd it, as too terrible to bear.
How shall I bear it now? I'm struck already.

[Exit Alonso.]

Zan. Half of my work is done. I must secure
Don Carlos, ere Alonso speaks with him.

[ZANGA beckons to MANUEL, who enters;

ZANGA whispers him.—Exit MANUEL.

Proud, hated Spain, oft drench'd in Moorish blood,
Dost thou not feel a deadly foe within thee?
Shake not thy towers where'er I pass along,
Conscious of ruin, and their great destroyer?
Shake to their centre, if Alonso's dear.
Look down, O holy prophet! see me torture
This Christian dog, this infidel, which dares
To smite thy votaries, and spurn thy law;
And yet hopes pleasure from two radiant eyes,
That look as they were lighted up for thee.
Shall he enjoy thy paradise below?
Blast the cold thought, and curse him with her charms!—

But see the melancholy lover comes. [Retires.]

Enter CARLOS.

* Car. Hope, thou hast told me lies from day to day
For more than twenty years: Vile promiser!
None here are happy, but the very fool,
Or very wise: and I want fool enough,
To smile in vanities, and hug a shadow;
Nor have I wisdom, to elaborate
An artificial happiness from pains:
Even joys are pains, because they cannot last.
How many lift the head, look gay, and smile
Against their consciences!—and this we know,
Yet knowing disbelief: and try again
What we have tried, and struggle with conviction:
Each new experience gives the former credit,
And reverend grey threescore is but a voucher
That thirty told us true.

Zan. My noble lord,— [Advances.]
I mourn your fate: But are no hopes surviving?

Car. No hopes: Alvarez has a heart of steel:
'Tis fix'd, 'tis past, 'tis absolute despair.

Zan. You wanted not to have your heart made tender

By your own pains, to feel a friend's distress.

Car. I understand you well: Alonso loves;
I pity him.

Zan. I dare be sworn, you do;
Yet he has other thoughts.

Car. What canst thou mean?

Zan. Indeed, he has; and fears to ask a favour,
A stranger from a stranger might request;
What costs you nothing, yet is all to him;
Nay, what, indeed, will to your glory add,
For nothing more than wishing your friend well.

Car. I pray be plain: his happiness is mine.

Zan. He loves to death; but so reveres his friend,

He can't persuade his heart to wed the maid
Without your leave, and that he fears to ask;
In perfect tenderness, I urg'd him to it,
Knowing the deadly sickness of his heart,
Your overflowing goodness to your friend,
Your wisdom, and despair yourself to wed her.
I wrung a promise from him he would try:
And now I come, a mutual friend to both,
Without his privity, to let you know it,
And to prepare you kindly to receive him.

Car. Ha! if he weds, I am undone indeed;
Not Don Alvarez' self can then relieve me.

Zan. Alas! my lord, you know—his heart is steel

'Tis fix'd, 'tis past, 'tis absolute despair.

Car. O cruel Heaven! and is it not enough

That I must never, never see her more?

Ask my consent!—Must I then give her to him?

Lead to his nuptial sheets the blushing maid?
Oh!—Leonora!—never, never, never! [Crosses.]

Zan. [Aside.] A storm of plagues upon him! he refuses.

Car. What! wed her!—and to-day!

Zan. To-day, or never.

To-morrow may some wealthier lover bring,

And then Alonso is thrown out, like you:

Then whom shall he condemn for his misfortune?

Carlos is an Alvarez to his love.

Car. O torment! Whither shall I turn?

Zan. To peace.

Car. Which is the way?

Zan. His happiness is yours:

I dare not disbelieve you.

Car. Kill my friend:

Or worse!—Alas, and can there be a worse?

A worse there is; nor can my nature bear it.

Zan. You have convinc'd me, 'tis a dreadful task

I find, Alonso's quitting her this morning

For Carlos' sake, in tenderness to you,

Betray'd me to believe it less severe

Than I perceive it is.

Car. Thou dost upbraid me.

Zan. No, my good lord:—But, since you can't comply,

'Tis my misfortune that I mention'd it;

For, had I not, Alonso would indeed

Have died, as now; but not by your decree.

Car. By my decree! Do I decree his death?

I do.—Shall I then lead her to his arms?

O!—Which side shall I take?—Be stabb'd—or stab!

'Tis equal death, a choice of agonies.

Go, Zanga, go; defer the dreadful trial,

[Puts ZANGA by him.]

Though but a day; something, perchance, may happen

To soften all to friendship and to love:

Go, stop my friend; let me not see him now,

But save us from an interview of duty.

Zan. My lord, I'm bound in duty to obey
you.

[Aside.] If I do not bring him, may Alonso prosper!
[Exit ZANGA.]

Car. What is this world?—Thy school, O misery!

Our only lesson is to learn to suffer;

And he who knows not that, was born for nothing.

Though deep my pangs, and heavy at my heart,

My comfort is, each moment takes away

A grain, at least, from the dead load that's on me,
 And gives it a nearer prospect of the grave.
 But,—put it most severely,—should I live,
 Live long?—Alas! there is no length in time;
 Not in thy time, O man! What's fourscore years?
 Nay, what indeed the age of time itself,
 Since cut from out eternity's wide round?
 Yet, Leonora,—she can make time long,
 Its nature alter, as she alter'd mine.
 While in the lustre of her charms I lay,
 Whole summer suns roll'd unperceiv'd away;
 I years for days, and days for moments told,
 And was surpris'd, to hear that I grew old.
 Now fate does rigidly its dues regain,
 And every moment is an age of pain. [Going.]

Enter ZANGA and ALONSO.

[ZANGA stops CARLOS, who is going.]

Zan. Is this Don Carlos? this the boasted friend?
 How can you turn your back upon his sadness?
 Look on him; and then leave him, if you can.
 Whose sorrows thus depress him? Not his own;
 This moment he could wed, without your leave.

Car. I cannot yield; nor can I bear his griefs.
 Alonso!—[Crossing to him, and taking his hand.]
 Alon. O Carlos!

Car. Pray, forbear. [ZANGA gets next ALONSO.
 Alon. Art thou undone, and shall ALONSO smile?—
 Alonso!—who, perhaps, in some degree
 Contributed to cause thy dreadful fate.

I was deputed guardian of thy love:
 But O! I lov'd myself.—Pour down afflictions
 On this devoted head! Make me your mark!
 And be the world by my example taught,
 How sacred it should hold the name of friend.

Car. You charge yourself unjustly:
 The crime was mine,
 Who plac'd thee there, where only thou could'st fail.

Alon. You cast in shades the failures of a friend,
 And soften all; but think not you deceive me:
 I know my guilt, and I implore your pardon,
 As the sole glimpse I can obtain of peace.

Car. Pardon for him who but this morning threw
 Fair Leonora from his heart, all bath'd
 In ceaseless tears, and blushing with her love?
 Yes 'twas in thee, through fondness to thy friend,
 To shut thy bosom against ecstasies:
 For which, while this pulse beats, it beats to thee,
 While this blood flows, it flows for my Alonso,
 And every wish is levell'd at thy joy.

Zan. [Aside to ALONSO.] My lord, my lord, this is your time to speak.

Alon. Because he's kind; it therefore is the worst.

Do I not see him quite possess'd with anguish,
 And shall I pour in new? No, fond desire;
 No, love:—one pang at parting, and farewell!
 I have no other love but Carlos now.

[Runs to CARLOS.

Car. Alas! my friend, why with such eager grasp

Dost press my hand?

Alon. If after death our forms
 Shall be transparent, naked every thought,
 And friends meet friends, and read each other's hearts,

Thou'lt know one day that thou wast held most dear,

Farewell!

[Going.]

Car. [Holds him.] Alonso, stay.—He cannot speak,

Least it should grieve me. Shall I be outdone,
 And lose in glory, as I lose in love?
 I take it much unkindly, my Alonso,
 You think so meanly of me, not to speak,
 When well I know your heart is near to bursting.
 Have you forgot how you have bound me to you?
 Your smallest friendship's liberty and life.

Alon. There, there it is, my friend; it cuts me
 there.

How dreadful is it to a generous mind
 To ask, when sure he cannot be denied!

Car. How greatly thought! In all, he towers above me.

Then you confess, you would ask something of me.

Alon. No, on my soul.

Zan. [Aside to ALONSO.] Then lose her.

Car. [Aside.] Glorious spirit!

Why, what a pang has he run through for this!
 By Heaven, I envy him his agonies.

Why was not mine the most illustrious lot
 Of starting at one action from below,
 And flaming up into consummate greatness?
 Ha!—Angels, strengthen me!—It shall be so.

My Alonso,
 Since thy great soul disdains to make request,
 Receive with favour that I make to thee.

Alon. What means my Carlos?

Car. Pray, observe me well.

Fate and Alvarez tore her from my heart,
 And, plucking up my love, they had well nigh
 Pluck'd up life too; for they were twin'd together.
 Of that no more.—What now does reason bid?
 I cannot wed:—Farewell my happiness!
 But, O my soul, with care provide for hers.
 In life how weak, how helpless is a woman!
 So properly the object of affliction,
 That heav'n is pleas'd to make mistress become her,
 And dresses her most amiably in tears.
 Take then my heart in dowry with the fair;
 Be thou her guardian, and thou must be mine:
 Shut out the thousand pressing ills of life
 With thy surrounding arms:—Do this; and then
 Set down the liberty and life thou gav'st me
 As little things, as essays of thy goodness,
 And rudiments of friendship so divine.

Alon. There is a grandeur in thy goodness to me
 Which, with thy foes, would render thee ador'd.
 And canst thou, canst thou part with Leonora?

Car. I do not part with her,—I give her thee.

Alon. Carlos! [Runs and embraces him.]

But think not words were ever made
 For such occasions;—silence, tears, embraces
 Are languid eloquence.—I'll seek relief
 In absence, from the pain of so much goodness;
 There thank the blest above, thy sole superiors,
 Adore, and raise my thoughts of them by thee.

[Cross and exit ALONSO.]

Zan. [Aside.] Thus far success has crown'd my boldest hope.

My next care is, to hasten these new nuptials;
 And then my master-works begin to play.

[Exit ZANGA.]

Car. He's gone; and now
 I must unslunge my overburthen'd heart,
 And let it flow. I would not grieve my friend
 With tears, nor interrupt my great design:
 Great, sure, as ever human breast durst think of:
 But now my sorrows, long with pain suppress'd,
 Burst their confinement with impetuous sway,
 O'erwhelm all bounds, and bear even life away.

So, till the day was won, the Greek renown'd
With anguish wore the arrow in his wound ;
Then drew the shaft from out his tortur'd side,
Let gush the torrent of his blood, and died.

[Exit.

ACT III.

SCENE.—A Corridor in the Palace.

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. O Joy,—thou welcome stranger!—twice three years

I have not felt thy vital beam ; but now
It warms my veins, and plays around my heart.
A fiery instinct lifts me from the ground,
And I could mount !—The spirits numberless
Of my dear countrymen, which yesterday
Left their poor bleeding bodies on the field,
Are all assembled here, and o'er-inform me.—
My Isabella !

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. What commands my Moor ?

Zan. My fair ally ! my lovely minister !
'Twas well Alvarez, by my arts impell'd,
To plunge Don Carlos in the last despair,
And so prevent all future molestation,
Finish'd the nuptials soon as he resolv'd them.
This conduct ripen'd all for me, and ruin.
Scarce had the priest the holy rite perform'd,
When I, by sacred inspiration, forg'd
That letter which I trusted to thy hand ;
That letter, which in glowing terms conveys
From happy Carlos to fair Leonora
The most profound acknowledgment of heart,
For wondrous transports which he never knew.
This is a good subservient artifice,
To aid the nobler workings of my brain.

Isa. I quickly dropt it in the bride's apartment,
As you commanded.

Zan. With a lucky hand ;
For soon Alonso found it : I observ'd him
From out my secret stand : He took it up ;
But scarce was it unfolded to his sight,
When he, as if an arrow pierc'd his eye,
Started, and trembling dropt it on the ground.
Pale and aghast awhile my victim stood,
Disguis'd a sigh or two, and puff'd them from him ;
Then rubb'd his brow, and took it up again :
At first, he look'd as if he meant to read it ;
But, check'd by rising fears, he crush'd it thus,
And thrust it, like an adder, in his bosom.

Isa. But if he read it not, it cannot sting him,
At least not mortally.

Zan. At first, I thought so ;
But further thought informs me otherwise,
And turns this disappointment to account :
He more shall credit it, because unseen,
If 'tis unseen ; as thou anon may'st find.

Isa. That would, indeed, commend my Zanga's skill.

Zan. This, Isabella, is Don Carlos' picture :
Take it ; and so dispose of it, that, found,
It may rise up a witness of her love ;
Under her pillow, in her cabinet,
Or elsewhere, as shall best promote our end.

Isa. I'll weigh it as its consequence requires ;
Then do my utmost to deserve your smile.

[Exit ISABELLA.

Zan. Is that Alonso prostrate on the ground ?
Now he starts up, like flame from sleeping embers,
And wild distraction glares from either eye.
If thus a slight surmise can work his soul,
How will the fulness of the tempest tear him !

[Retires.

Enter ALONSO, with a Letter.

Alon. And yet, it cannot be :—I am deceiv'd :—
I injure her :—She wears the face of heaven.

Zan. [Aside.] He doubts.

Alon. I dare not look on this again :
If the first glance, which gave suspicion only,
Had such effect, so smote my heart and brain,
The certainty would dash me all in pieces.
It cannot—Ha ! it must, it must be true.

Zan. [Aside.] Hold there, and we succeed.—

[ALONSO sees him, and starts.

He has descried me.

I'll seem to go, to make my stay more sure.

Alon. Hold, Zanga, turn.

Zan. My lord !

Alon. Shut close the doors,
That not a spirit find an entrance here.

Zan. [Shuts the door.] My lord's obey'd.

Alon. I see that thou art frightened :
If thou dost love me, I shall fill thy heart
With scorpion's stings.

Zan. If I do love my lord !

Alon. Come near me : Let me rest upon thy bosom.

What pillow like the bosom of a friend !
And I am sick at heart.

Zan. Speak, sir, O speak,
And take me from the rack !

Alon. I am most happy : mine is victory,
Mine the king's favour, mine the nation's shout,
And great men make their fortunes of my smiles.
O curse of curses ! in the lap of blessing
To be most curs'd ! My Leonora's false !

Zan. Save me, my lord !

Alon. My Leonora's false. [Gives him the letter.

Zan. Then Heaven has lost its image here on earth.

[ZANGA, while reading the letter, trembles, and shows the utmost concern.]

Alon. Good-natur'd man ! he makes my pains his own.

I durst not read it ; but I read it now
In thy concern.

Zan. Did you not read it, then ?

Alon. Mine eye just touch'd it, and could bear
no more.

Zan. [Tears the letter.] Thus perish all that gives Alonso pain !

Alon. Why didst thou tear it ?

Zan. Think of it no more :

'Twas your mistake, and groundless are your fears.
Alon. And didst thou tremble then for my mistake ?

Or give the whole contents ; or, by the pangs
That feed upon my heart, thy life's in danger.

[Drawing his sword.

Zan. Is this Alonso's language to his Zanga ?
Draw forth your sword, and find the secret here.
For whose sake is it, think you, I conceal it ?
Wherefore this rage ? Because I seek your peace ?
I have no interest in suppressing it,
But what good-natur'd tenderness for you

Obliges me to have: Not mine the heart
That will be rent in two, not mine the fame
That will be damn'd, though all the world should know it.

Alon. Then my worst fears are true, and life is past.

Zan. What has the rashness of my passion utter'd!

I know not what.—But, grant I did confess,
What is a letter? Letters may be forg'd.
For Heaven's sweet sake, my lord, lift up your heart:

Some foe to your repose—

Alon. So Heaven look on me,
As I can't find the man I have offended.

Zan. [Aside.] Indeed!—Our innocence is not our shield:

They take offence who have not been offended;
They seek our ruin too, who speak us fair,
And death is often ambush'd in their smiles:
We know not whom we have to fear. 'Tis certain,
A letter may be forg'd; and, in a point
Of such dreadful consequence as this,
One would rely on nought that might be false.
Think, have you any other cause to doubt her?
Away, you can find none. Resume your spirit;
All's well again.

Alon. Oh that it were!

Zan. It is;

For who would credit that which, credited,
Makes hell superfluous by superior pains,
Without such proofs as cannot be withstood?
Has she not ever been to virtue train'd?
Is not her fame as spotless as the sun,
Her sex's envy, and the boast of Spain?

Alon. O Zanga, it is that confounds me most;
That, full in opposition to appearance,—

Zan. No more, my lord; for you condemn yourself.

What is absurdity, but to believe
Against appearance?—you can't yet, I find,
Subdue your passion to your better sense;
And, truth to tell, it does not much displease me.
'Tis fit, our indiscretions should be check'd
With some degree of pain.

Alon. What indiscretion?

Zan. Come, you must bear to hear your faults
from me:

Had you not sent Don Carlos to the court
The night before the battle, that foul slave
Who forg'd the senseless scroll which gives you pain,

Had wanted footing for his villany.

Alon. I sent him not.

Zan. Not sent him?—Ha!—That strikes me.

I thought he came on message to the king.
Is there another cause could justify
His shunning danger, and the promis'd fight?
But I, perhaps, may think too rigidly;
So long an absence, and impatient love.—

Alon. In my confusion, that had quite escap'd me.
'Tis clear as day:—for Carlos is so brave,
He lives not but on fame; he hunts for danger,
And is enamour'd of the face of death:
How then could he decline the next day's battle,
But for the transports—O, it must be so!—
Inhuman! by the loss of his own honour,
To buy the ruin of his friend!

Zan. You wrong him;

He knew not of your love.

Alon. [Starts.] Ha!

Zan. [Aside.] That stings home.

Alon. Indeed, he knew not of my treacherous love.

Proofs rise on proofs, and still the last the strongest:
The eternal law of things declares it true,
Which calls for judgments on distinguish'd guilt,
And loves to make our crime our punishment.
Love is my torture; love was first my crime;
For she was his, my friend's; and he—O horror!
Confided all in me. O, sacred faith,
How dearly I abide thy violation!

Zan. Were then their loves far gone?

Alon. The father's will

There bore a total sway; and he, as soon
As news arriv'd that Carlos' fleet was seen
From off our coast, fir'd with the love of gold,
Determin'd that the very sun which saw
Carlos return, should see his daughter wed.

Zan. Indeed, my lord, then you must pardon me,
If I presume to mitigate the crime.

Consider, strong allurements soften guilt;
Long was his absence, ardent was his love,
At midnight his return, the next day destin'd
For his espousals,—'twas a strong temptation.

Alon. Temptation!

Zan. 'Twas but gaining of one night.

Alon. One night!

Zan. That crime could ne'er return again.

Alon. Again! By Heaven, thou dost insult thy lord.

Temptation! one night gain'd! O stings and death!
And am I then undone? Alas, my Zanga,
And dost thou own it too? Deny it still,
And rescue me one moment from distraction.

Zan. My lord, I hope the best.

Alon. False, foolish hope,
And insolent to me! Thou know'st it false:
It is as glaring as the noontide sun.

Devil! this morning, after three years' coldness,
To rush at once into a passion for me!

'Twas time to feign, 'twas time to get another,
When her first fool was sated with her beauties.

Zan. What says my lord? Did Leonora then
Never before disclose her passion for you?

Alon. Never.

Zan. Throughout the whole three years?

Alon. O never, never!

Why, Zanga, should'st thou strive? It is all in vain;

Though thy soul labours, it can find no reed
For hope to catch at. Ah! I'm plunging down
Ten thousand thousand fathoms in despair.

Zan. Hold, sir, I'll break your fall:—Wave every fear,

And be a man again:—Had he enjoyed her,
Be most assur'd, he had resign'd her to you
With less reluctance.

Alon. Ha! resign her to me!

Resign her!—Who resign'd her!—Double death!—
How could I doubt so long?—my heart is broke.
First love her to distraction! then resign her!

Zan. But was it not with utmost agony?

Alon. Grant that: he still resign'd her; that's enough.

Would he pluck out his eye to give it me?
Tear out his heart?—She was his heart no more.—
Nor was it with reluctance he resign'd her;
By Heaven, he ask'd, he courted me, to wed:
I thought it strange; 'tis now no longer so.

Zan. Was 't his request? Are you right sure of that?—

I fear, the letter was not all a tale.

Alon. A tale! There's proof equivalent to sight.

Zan. I should distrust my sight on this occasion.

Alon. And so should I, by Heaven, I think, I should.

What! Leonora, the divine? by whom
We guess'd at angels! O! I'm all confusion.

Zan. You now are too much ruffled, to think clearly.

Since bliss and horror, life and death, hang on it,
Go to your chamber, there maturely weigh
Each circumstance; consider, above all,
That it is jealousy's peculiar nature,
To swell small things to great; nay, out of nought
To conjure much; and then to lose its reason
Amid the hideous phantoms it has form'd.

Alon. Had I ten thousand lives, I'd give them all
To be deceiv'd. I fear, 'tis doomday with me:
And yet, she seem'd so pure, that I thought Heaven
Borrow'd her form for virtue's self to wear,
To gain her lovers with the sons of men.
O Leonora! Leonora!— [Exit ALONSO.

Enter ISABELLA.

Zan. Thus far it works auspiciously: My patient
Thrives underneath my hand in misery:
He's gone to think;—that is, to be distracted.

Isa. I overheard your conference; and saw you,
To my amazement, tear the letter.

Zan. There,
There, Isabella, I outdid myself:
For, tearing it, I not secure it only
In its first force, but superadd a new;
For after tearing it, as loath to show
The foul contents, if I should swear it now
A forgery, my lord would disbelieve me;
Nay, more would disbelieve, the more I swore.—
But, is the picture happily dispos'd of?

Isa. It is.

Zan. That's well.— [Exit ISABELLA.

Ah! what is well? O pang to think!
O dire necessity! Is this my province?
Whither, my soul, ah! whither art thou sunk
Beneath thy sphere!—
Does this become a soldier? This become
Whom armies follow'd, and a people lov'd?
My martial glory withers at the thought.
But, great my end; and, since there are no other,
These means are just: they shine with borrow'd light,

Illustrious from the purpose they pursue:
And greater, sure, my merit, who, to gain
A point sublime, can such a task sustain.
Late time shall wonder; that my joys will raise;
For wonder is involuntary praise. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Alonso's Apartment in the Palace.—
Chairs, a Sofa, and a Table.

Enter ALONSO and ZANGA.

Alon. O, what a pain to think, when every thought,
Perplexing thought, in intricacies runs,
And reason knits the inextricable toil
In which herself is taken!—
No more I'll bear this battle of the mind,
This inward anarchy; but find my way,

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XVIII.

And, to her trembling heart presenting death,
Force all the secret from her. [Going.

Zan. O forbear!—

You totter on the very brink of ruin.

Alon. What dost thou mean?

Zan. [Aside.] That will discover all,
And kill my hopes. What can I think or do?

Alon. What dost thou murmur?

Zan. Force the secret from her!

What's perjury, to such a crime as this?
Will she confess it then? O groundless hope!
But, rest assur'd, she'll make this accusation,
Or false or true, your ruin with the king;
Such is her father's power.

Alon. No more; I care not;

Rather than groan beneath this load, I'll die.

Zan. But, for what better will you change this load?

Grant, you should know it:—Would not that be worse?

Alon. No; it would cure me of my mortal pangs
By hatred and contempt; I should despise her;
And all my love-bred agonies would vanish.

Zan. Ah! were I sure of that, my lord,—

Alon. What then?

Zan. You should not hazard life to gain the secret.

Alon. What dost thou mean? Thou know'st
I'm on the rack;

I'll not be play'd with! speak, if thou hast aught,
Or I this instant fly to Leonora. [Going.

Zan. That is, to death. My lord, I am not yet
Quite so far gone in guilt, to suffer it;
Though gone too far, Heaven knows.—'Tis I am guilty:—

I have ta'en pains, as you I know observ'd,
To hinder you from diving in the secret,
And turn'd aside your thoughts from the detection.

Alon. Thou dost confound me.

Zan. I confound myself;

And frankly own, though to my shame I own it,
Nought but your life in danger could have torn
The secret out, and made me own my crime.

Alon. Speak quickly, Zanga, speak.

Zan. Not yet, dread sir:

First, I must be convinc'd that, if you find
The fair one guilty, scorn, as you assur'd me,
Shall conquer love and rage, and heal your soul.

Alon. O, 't will, by Heaven!

Alon. Alas! I fear it much,

And scarce can hope so far:—but I of this Exact your solemn oath, that you'll abstain
From all self-violence, and save my lord.

Alon. I trebly swear.

Zan. You'll bear it like a man?

Alon. A god.

Zan. Such have you been to me,
And pour'd forth miracles of kindness on me:
And what return is now within my power,
But to confess, expose myself to justice,
And as a blessing claim my punishment?
Know then, Don Carlos—

Alon. O!

Zan. You cannot bear it.

Alon. Go on; I'll have it, though it blast mankind;

I'll have it all, and instantly: Go on.

Zan. Don Carlos did return at dead of night,—
[Retires.

Enter LEONORA.

Leon. My Lord Alonso, you are absent from us,
And quite undo our joy.

Alon. I'll come, my love :

Be not our friends deserted by us both ;
I'll follow you this moment.

Leon. My good lord,

I do observe severity of thought

Upon your brow :—aught hear you from the Moors ?

Alon. No, my delight.

Leon. What then employ'd your mind ?

Alon. Thou, love, and only thou :—so Heaven befriend me,

As other thought can find no entrance here !

Leon. How good in you, my lord, whom nations' cares

Solicit, and a world in arms obeys,
To drop one thought on me !

[He shows the utmost impatience.]

Alon. Know then, to thy comfort,

Thou hast me all, my throbbing heart is full
With thee alone ; I've thought of nothing else ;
Nor shall, I from my soul believe, till death.—
My life, our friends expect thee.

Leon. I obey.

[Exit LEONORA.]

Alon. Is that the face of curs'd hypocrisy ?

If she is guilty, stars are made of darkness,
And beauty shall no more belong to Heaven.—
Don Carlos did return at dead of night,—
Proceed, good Zanga,—so thy tale began.

Zan. [Advances.] Don Carlos did return at dead of night :

That night, by chance,—ill chance for me !—did I
Command the watch that guards the palace-gate :
He told me, he had letters for the king,
Despatch'd from you :—

Alon. The villain lied.

Zan. My lord,

I pray forbear.—Transported at his sight,
After so long a bondage, and your friend,—
Who could suspect him of an artifice—
No further I inquir'd, but let him pass ;
False to my trust, at least imprudent in it.
Our watch reliev'd, I went into the garden
As is my custom when the night's serene,
And took a moonlight walk : When soon I heard
A rustling in an arbour that was near me,
And saw two lovers in each other's arms
Embracing and embrac'd. Anon, the man
Arose ; and, falling back some paces from her,
Gaz'd ardently awhile, then rush'd at once,
And throwing all himself into her bosom,
There softly sigh'd,—O night of ecstasy !
When shall we meet again ?—Don Carlos then led Leonora forth.

Alon. O ! O ! my heart !—[He sinks on to a sofa.]

Zan. [Aside.] Groan on, and with the sound refresh my soul !—

'Tis through his brain, his eyeballs roll in anguish.—
My lord, my lord, why will you rack me thus ?

[Goes to the sofa, and raises ALONSO.]

Speak to me, let me know that you still live :—
I'm your own Zanga,

So lov'd, so cherish'd, and so faithful to you.

Alon. O she was all !

My fame, my friendship, and my love of arms,
All stoop'd to her ; my blood was her possession ;
Deep in the secret foldings of my heart
She liv'd with life, and far the dearer she.
To think on't 'tis the torment of the damn'd,
And not to think on't 'tis impossible.

How fair the cheek that first alarm'd my soul !

How bright the eye that set it on a flame !

How soft the breast on which I laid my peace

For years to slumber, unawak'd by care !

How fierce the transport ! how sublime the bliss !

How deep, how black, the horror and despair

Zan. You said, you'd bear it like a man.

Alon. I do :

Am I not most distracted ?

Zan. Pray, be calm.

Alon. As hurricanes,—be thou assur'd of that.

Zan. Is this the wise Alonso ?

Alon. Villain, no ;

He died in the arbour, he was murder'd there :

I am his demon though.—My wife !—My wife !

Zan. [Aside.] He weeps, he weeps.

Alon. [Seizes him.] O villain, most accurs'd !

If thou didst know it, why didst let me wed ?

Zan. Hear me, my lord, your anger will abate.

I knew it not : I saw them in the garden ;

But saw no more than you might well expect

To see in lovers destin'd for each other.

By Heaven, I thought their meeting innocent :

Who could suspect fair Leonora's virtue,

Till after-proofs conspir'd to blacken it ;

Sad proofs ! which came too late, which broke not out,—

Eternal curses on Alvarez' haste !—

Till holy rites had made the wanton yours :

And then, I own, I labour'd to conceal it,

In duty and compassion to your peace.

Alon. Live now ;—be damn'd hereafter ;—for I want thee.—

O night of ecstasy !—Ha ! was't not so ?—

I will enjoy this murder.—Let me think,—

The jasmine bower ;—'tis secret and remote ;—

Go, wait me there :—and take thy dagger with thee. [Exit ZANGA.]

How the sweet sound still sings within my ear !

When shall we meet again ? To-night, in hell.—

Enter LEONORA.

Ha ! I'm surpris'd,—I stagger at her charms.

Leon. My lord, excuse me : See, a second time

I come in embassy from all your friends,

Whose joys are languid, uninspir'd by you.

Alon. This moment, Leonora, I was coming

To thee, and all.—But, sure, or I mistake,

Or thou canst well inspire my friends with joy.

Leon. Why sighs my lord ?

Alon. I sigh'd not, Leonora.

Leon. I thought you did : Your sighs are mine,
my lord,

And I shall feel them all.

Alon. Dost flatter me ?

Leon. If my regards for you are flattery,
Full far indeed I stretch'd the compliment
In this day's solemn rite.

Alon. What rite ?

Leon. You sport me.

Alon. Indeed, I do ; my heart is full of mirth.

Leon. And so is mine :—I look on cheerfulness,
As on the health of virtue.

Alon. Virtue !—Damn—

Leon. What says my lord ?

Alon. Thou art exceeding fair.

Leon. Beauty alone is but of little worth

But when the soul and body, of a piece,

Both shine alike, then they obtain a price,

And are a fit reward for gallant actions,
Heaven's pay on earth for such great souls as yours ;—

If fair and innocent, I am your due.

Alon. [Aside.] Innocent !

Leon. How !—My lord, I interrupt you. [Going.]

Alon. [Holds her.] No, my best life, I must not part with thee;—

This hand is mine: O, what a hand is here!
So soft, souls sink into it and are lost!

Leon. In tears, my lord?

Alon. What less can speak my joy?—

[Starts from her.]

O, I could gaze upon thy looks for ever,
And drink in all my being from thine eyes!
And I could snatch a flaming thunderbolt,
And hurl destruction—

Leon. My lord, you fright me.

Is this the fondness of your nuptial hour?—

[Approaches him:—he turns from her.]

Why, when I woo your hand, is it denied me?
Your very eyes, why are they taught to shun me?
Acquaint me with the secret of your heart,
That heart, which I have purchas'd with my own;
Lay it before me then, it is my due:
Unkind Alonso!—though I might demand it,
Behold, I kneel: See, Leonora kneels;
The bride foregoes the homage of her day,
And deigns to be a beggar for her own!

[She catches hold of him.]

Speak then, I charge you, speak; or I expire,
And load you with my death. My lord!—my lord!

Alon. Ha! ha! ha!

[He breaks from her, and throws himself into a chair at the back of the stage; LEONORA sinks upon the floor.]

Leon. [Rising.] Are these the joys which fondly I conceiv'd?

And is it thus a wedded life begins?
What did I part with when I gave my heart?
The maid that loves,
Goes out to sea upon a shatter'd plank,
And puts her trust in miracles for safety.
Where shall I sigh? Where pour out my complaints?

He that should hear, should succour, should redress,
He is the source of all.

Alon. [Advances.] Go to thy chamber:

I soon will follow: that which now disturbs thee
Shall be clear'd up, and thou shalt not condemn me.

[Exit LEONORA.]

O, how like innocence she looks!—What! stab her,
And rush into her blood!—I never can.

Mine is the guilt,—mine,—to supplant my friend:
How then? Why thus: No more; it is determin'd.

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. [Aside.] I fear'd his heart would fail him:
—She must die.—

Can I not rouse the snake that's in his bosom,
To sting out human nature, and effect it?

Alon. This vast and solid earth, that blazing sun,
Those skies through which it rolls, must all have end:

What then is man? the smallest part of nothing.
Day buries day, month month, and year the year;
Our life is but a chain of many deaths:

Can then death's self be fear'd? Our life, much rather:

Life is the desert, life the solitude;

Death joins us to the great majority;

'Tis to be born to Platos and to Casars,

'Tis to be great for ever:

'Tis pleasure, 'tis ambition, then, to die.

Zan. [Advances.] I think, my lord,—you tal'd of death?

Alon. I did.

Zan. I give you joy,—then Leonora's dead?

Alon. No, Zanga, no; the greatest guilt is mine,
Who might have mark'd his tameness to resign her,
Who might have mark'd her sudden turn of love;
These, and a thousand tokens more; and yet,
For which the saints absolve my soul, did wed
Zan. Whither tends this?

Alon. To shed a woman's blood,
Would stain my sword, and make my wars inglorious;

But just resentment to myself bears in it
A stamp of greatness above vulgar minds:
He who, superior to the checks of nature,
Dares make his life the victim of his reason,
Does in some sort that reason deify,
And take a flight at heaven.

Zan. Alas, my lord!

'Tis not your reason, but her beauty finds
Those arguments, and throws you on your sword.
You cannot close an eye that is so bright,
You cannot strike a breast that is so soft,
That has ten thousand ecstasies in store
For Carlos—No, my lord;—I mean for you.

Alon. O, through my heart and marrow!—Pr'y—thee, spare me;

Nor more upbraid the weakness of thy lord:
I own, I tried—I quarrell'd with my heart,
And push'd it on, and bade it give her death:
But—O!—her eyes struck first, and murder'd me.

Zan. I know not what to answer to my lord:
Men are but men:

Farewell then, my best lord! since you must die.
Oh, that I were to share your monument,
And in eternal darkness close these eyes
Against those scenes which I am doom'd to suffer!

Alon. What dost thou mean?

Zan. And is it then unknown?

Sure, you distrust that ardent love I bear you;
Else could you doubt, when you are laid in dust,
But it will cut my poor heart through and through,
To see those revel on your sacred tomb,
Who brought you thither by their lawless loves?
For there they'll revel; and exult to find
Him sleep so fast, who else would mar their joys.

Alon. Distraction!—But Don Carlos, well thou know'st,

Is sheath'd in steel, and bent on other thoughts.

Zan. Yes, till the fever of his blood returns;
While her last kiss still glows upon his cheek;
But when he finds Alonso is no more,
How will he rush like lightning to her arms!
There sigh, there languish, there pour out his soul!
But not in grief:—Sad obsequies to thee!
But thou wilt be at peace: nor see, nor hear,
The burning kiss, the sigh of ecstasy,
Their throbbing hearts that jostle one another:
Thank Heaven, these torments will be all my own!

Alon. I'll ease thee of that pain. Let Carlos die:
O'ertake him on the road, and see it done:
'Tis my command. [Gives his signet.]

Zan. I dare not disobey.

Alon. My Zanga, now I have thy leave to die.

Zan. Ah, sir, think, think again:—Are all men buried

In Carlos' grave?—You know not womankind:

When once the throbbing of the heart has broke

The modest zone with which it first was tied,

Each man she meets will be a Carlos to her.

Alon. That thought has more of hell than had the former:

Another, and another, and another!

And each shall cast a smile upon my tomb!

I am convinc'd; I must not, will not die.

Zan. You cannot die : nor can you murder her :
What then remains ? In nature no third way,
But to forget,—and, so, to love again.

Alon. Oh !

Zan. If you forgive, the world will call you—good ;

If you forget, the world will call you—wise ;
If you receive her to your grace again,
The world will call you—very, very kind.

Alon. Zanga, I understand thee well :—She dies,
Though my arm tremble at the stroke,—she dies.

Zan. That's truly great. What, think you, 'twas set up

The Greek and Roman name in such a lustre,
But doing right in stern despite to nature ;
Shutting their ears to all her little cries,
When great, august, and godlike justice call'd ?
At Aulis one pour'd out a daughter's life,
And gain'd more glory than by all his wars ;
Another slew a sister in just rage ;
A third—the theme of all succeeding times !
Gave to the cruel axe a darling son :
Nay more, for justice some devote themselves,
As he at Carthage ;—an immortal name !
Yet there is one step left above them all,
Above their history, above their fable ;
A wife, bride, mistress, unenjoy'd :—Do that,
And tread upon the Greek and Roman glory.

Alon. 'Tis done—again ? new transports fire
my brain !

I had forgot it, 'tis my bridal night.
Friend, give me joy ; we must be gay together :
See that the festival be duly honour'd.
And when with garlands the full bowl is crown'd,
And music gives her elevating sound,
And golden carpets spread the sacred floor,
And a new day the blazing tapers pour,
Thou, Zanga, thou my solemn friends invite
From the dark realms of everlasting night ;
Call Vengeance, call the Furies, call Despair :
And Death, our chief invited guest, be there !
He with pale hand shall lead the bride, and spread
Eternal curtains round our nuptial bed. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Gallery in the Palace.

Enter ALONSO and ZANGA.

Alon. Is Carlos murder'd ?

Zan. I obey'd your order :

Six ruffians overtook him on the road ;
He fought as he was wont, and four he slew ;
Then sunk beneath an hundred wounds to death.
His last breath blest Alonzo, and desir'd
His bones might rest near yours.

Alon. O Zanga ! Zanga !

But I'll not think : it is a day of darkness,
Of contradictions, and of many deaths.
Where's Leonora then ? Quick, answer me :
I'm deep in horrors ; I'll be deeper still.
I find, thy artifice did take effect ;
And she forgives my late deportment to her.

Zan. I told her, from your childhood you were wont,

On any great surprise, but chiefly then
When cause of sorrow bore it company,
To have your passion shake the seat of reason ;

A momentary ill, which soon blew o'er :
Then did I tell her of Don Carlos' death,
Closely suppressing by what means he fell,
And laid the blame on that : at first, she doubted :
But such the honest artifice I used,
That she, at length, was fully satisfied.
But what design you, sir, and how ?

Alon. I'll tell thee.

Thus I've ordain'd it : In the jasmine bower,
The place which she dishonour'd with her guilt,
There will I meet her : the appointment's made,
And calmly spread, for I can do it now,
The blackness of her crime before her sight,
And then, with all the cool solemnity
Of public justice, give her to the grave.

[Exit ALONSO.]

Zan. Why, get thee gone : horror and night go with thee !

Sisters of Acheron go hand in hand,
Go dance around the bower, and close them in ;
And tell them that I sent you to salute them !
Profane the ground, and for the ambrosial rose
And breath of jessamine, let hemlock blacken
And deadly-nightshade poison all the air !
For the sweet nightingale—may ravens croak,
Toads pant, and adders rustle through the leaves !
May serpents, winding up the trees, let fall
Their hissing necks upon them from above,
And mingle kisses—such as I would give them !

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Bower in the Palace Garden. LEONORA discovered sleeping in the Bower.

Enter ALONSO.

Alon. Ye amaranths, ye roses like the morn,
Sweet myrtles, and ye golden orange groves,
Are you not blasted as I enter in ?
Joy-giving, love-inspiring, holy bower,
Know, in thy fragrant bosom thou receiv'st—
A murderer.— [He advances.]

Ha ! she sleeps :

The day's uncommon heat has overcome her.
Then take, my longing eyes, your last full gaze.
O, what a sight is here ! How dreadful fair !
Who would not think that being innocent ?
O my distracted heart !—O cruel Heaven !
To give such charms as those, and then call man,
Mere man, to be your executioner !
But see, she smiles :—I never shall smile more !—
It strongly tempts me to a parting kiss.

[Going towards her :—he starts back.]
Ha ! smile again ! She dreams of him she loves.
Curse on her charms ! I'll stab her through them all.

[As he is going to strike, she awakes.]

Leon. My lord, your stay was long ; and yonder lull

Of falling water tempted me to rest,
Dispirited with noon's excessive heat.

Alon. Ye powers, with what an eye she mends the day !

While they were closed, I should have given the blow.

Leon. [Rises.] What says my lord ?

Alon. Why, this Alonso says :

If love were endless, men were gods : 'tis that Does counterbalance travail, danger, pain ;
'Tis Heaven's expedient to make mortals bear
The light, and cheat them of the peaceful grave.

Leon. Alas ! my lord, why talk you of the grave ?
Your friend is dead : in friendship you sustain
A mighty loss ; repair it with my love.

Alon. Thy love? Thou piece of witchcraft—I would say,
Thou brightest angel,—I could gaze for ever.
Where hadst thou this,—enchantress, tell me, where,—

Which with a touch works miracles, boils up
My blood to tumult, and turns round my brain?
But O, those eyes! those murderers! O whence, Whence didst thou steal their burning orbs? From heaven?

Thou didst, and 'tis religion to adore them.

Leon. My best Alonso, moderate your thought:
Extremes still fright me, though of love itself.

Alon. Extremes indeed! It hurried me away;
But I come home again:—And now for justice:—
And now for death. [Draws his dagger.

Enter ZANGA,

It is impossible. [Drops the dagger.
I leave her to just Heaven. [Exit ALONSO.

Leon. [Takes up the dagger.] Ha! a dagger.

Zan. With her hand, which held the steel in vain!

That dagger found, will cause her to inquire,—
What can be done?—That's something still:—If not,—

'Tis all I can; it shall be so.

Leon. O Zanga, I am sinking in my fears:

Alonso dropt this dagger as he left me,

And left me in a strange disorder too.

What can this mean! Angels preserve his life!

Zan. Yours, madam, yours!

Leon. What, Zanga, dost thou say?

Zan. Carry your goodness then to such extremes,

So blinded to the faults of him you love,

That you perceive not he is jealous?

Leon. Heavens!—

And yet a thousand things recur that swear it.

Jealous! It sickens at my heart. Unkind,

Ungenerous, groundless, weak, and insolent!

Why? wherefore? on what shadow of occasion?

O, how the great man lessens to my thought!

How could so mean a vice as jealousy

Live in a throng of such exalted virtues?—

I scorn and hate,—yet love him and adore.

I cannot, will not, dare not think it true,

'Till from himself I know it. [Exit LEONORA.

Zan. This succeeds

Just to my wish:—Now she with violence

Upbraids him; he, not doubting she is guilty,

Rages no less; and, if on either side

The waves run high, there still lives hope of ruin.

Enter ALONSO.

My lord,—

Alon. O Zanga, hold thy peace! I am no coward:

But Heaven itself did hold my hand; I felt it;

By the well-being of my soul, I did:

I'll think of vengeance at another season.

Zan. My lord, her guilt—

Alon. Perdition on thee, Moor,

For that one word!—I love her to distraction:—

If 'tis my shame, why, be it so:—I love her;

Nor can I help it; 'tis impos'd upon me

By some superior and resistless power:

I could not hurt her, to be lord of earth;

It shocks my nature like a stroke at heaven.

But see, my Leonora comes!—Begone.

[Exit ZANGA.

Enter LEONORA, with ALONSO's dagger.

O, seen for ever, yet for ever new,

The conquer'd thou dost conquer o'er again,
Inflicting wound on wound!

Leon. Alas! my lord,

What need of this to me?

Alon. Ha! dost thou weep?

Leon. Have I no cause?

Alon. If love is thy concern,

Thou hast no cause: none ever lov'd like me:

Oh, that this one embrace would last for ever!

Leon. These tears declare how much I taste the joy

Of being folded in your arms and heart;

My universe does lie within that space:—

This dagger bore false witness.

Alon. Ha! my dagger?—

It rouses horrid images:—Away,
Away with it; and let us talk of love.

Leon. It touches you.

Alon. Let us talk of love.

Leon. Of death.

Alon. As thou lov'st happiness,—

Leon. Of murder.

Alon. Then must I fly, for thy sake and my own.

Leon. [Holding him.] Nay, by my injuries, you first must hear me!

Alon. Yet, yet dismiss me; I am all in flames.

Leon. Who has most cause? You or myself?

What act

Of my whole life encourag'd you to this?

Or of your own, what guilt has drawn it on you?

You find me kind, and think me kind to all:

The weak, ungenerous error of your sex!

He that can stoop to harbour such a thought,

Deserves to find it true.

Alon. O sex, sex, sex!

The language of you all!—Ill-fated woman!

Why wilt thou force me back into the gulf

Of agonies, I had block'd up from thought?

But, since thou hast replung'd me in my torture,

I will be satisfied:—Confess, confess,—

Where did I find this picture?

Leon. Ha! Don Carlos?

By my best hopes, more welcome than thy own.

Alon. I know it: but is vice so very rank,

That thou should'st dare to dash it in my face?

Nature is sick of thee, abandoned woman!

Leon. Repent.

Alon. Is that for me?

Leon. Fall, ask my pardon.

Alon. Astonishment!

Leon. Dar'st thou persist to think I am dishonest?

Alon. I know thee so.

Leon. This blow then to thy heart!—

[She stabs herself.

Alon. Ho! Zanga! Isabella! Ho!—She bleeds:—

Descend, ye blessed angels, to assist her!

Leon. This is the only way I would wound thee,
Though most unjust:—now, think me guilty still.

Enter ISABELLA.

Alon. Bear her to instant help. The world to save her!

Leon. [Supported by ISABELLA.] Unhappy man

Well may'st thou gaze and tremble:

But fix thy terror and amazement right;

Not on my blood, but on thy own distraction.

What hast thou done? Whom censur'd?—Leonora

When thou had'st censur'd, thou would'st save her life!

O inconsistent!—Should I live in shame?

Or stoop to any other means but this,

To assert my virtue? No: she who disputes,
Admits it possible she might be guilty.
While aught but truth could be my inducement to
it,

While it might look like an excuse to thee,
I scorn'd to vindicate my innocence:
But now, I let thy rashness know, the wound
Which least I feel, is that my dagger made.

[Exit LEONORA, in the arms of ISABELLA.]

Alon. Ha! Was this woman guilty? And if not,— How my thought darkens that way! Grant, kind
Heaven,

That she prove guilty, or give being end.
Is that my hope then?
Is it in man the sore distress to bear,
When hope itself is blacken'd to despair!
When all the bliss I pant for is to gain
In hell a refuge from severer pain! [Exit.]

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. How stands the great account 'twixt me and vengeance?

Though much is paid, yet still it owes me much;
And I will not abate a single groan.—
Ha! That were well:—but that were fatal too:—
Why, be it so:—Revenge, so truly great,
Would come too cheap, if bought with less than life.

Come death, come hell, then! 'tis resolv'd, 'tis done.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. Ah! Zanga, see me tremble:—Has not yet
Thy cruel heart its fill?—Poor Leonora—

Zan. Welters in blood, and gasps for her last breath:—

What then? We all must die.

Isa. Alonso raves;
And, in the tempest of his grief, has thrice
Attempted on his life: At length, disarm'd,
He calls his friends, that save him, his worst foes,
And importunes the skies for swift perdition:—
After pause,

He started up and call'd aloud for Zanga,
For Zanga rav'd; and see, he seeks you here,
To learn that truth which most he dreads to know.

Zan. Begone. [Exit ISABELLA.]
Now, now, my soul, consummate all!

Enter ALONSO.

Alon. O Zanga! [Falls on ZANGA.]

Zan. Do not tremble so; but speak.

Alon. I dare not.

Zan. You will drown me with your tears.

Alon. Have I not cause?

Zan. As yet you have no cause.

Alon. Dost thou too rave?

Zan. Your anguish is to come:
You much have been abus'd.

Alon. Abus'd! By whom?

Zan. To know, were little comfort.

Alon. O! 'twere much.

Zan. Indeed?

Alon. By Heaven:—O give him to my fury!

Zan. Born for your use, I live but to oblige you:—
Know then, 'twas I.

Alon. Am I awake?

Zan. For ever:—

Thy wife is guiltless; that's one transport to me;
And I, I let thee know it; that's another:—
I urg'd Don Carlos to resign his mistress;

I forg'd the letter; I dispos'd the picture;—
I hated, I despis'd, and I destroy.

Alon. Oh!— [Swoons, and falls to the earth.]

Zan. Why, this is well:—why, this is blow for blow!

Where are you? Crown me, shadow me with laurels,
Ye spirits, which delight in just revenge!
Let Europe and her pallid sons go weep,
Let Africa and her hundred thrones rejoice.
O my dear countrymen, look down and see
How I bestride your prostrate conqueror!

[Stands over ALONSO.]

I tread on haughty Spain, and all her kings.
But this is mercy, this is my indulgence,
'Tis peace, 'tis refuge from my indignation:
I must awake him into horrors.—Hoe!
Alonso,—hoe! the Moor is at the gate:
Awake,—invincible, omnipotent!—
Thou who dost all subdue.

Alon. Inhuman slave!

[Raising himself on his knee.]

Zan. Fallen Christian, thou mistak'st my character.

Look on me. Whom am I? I know, thou say'st,
The Moor, a slave, an abject beaten slave:—
Eternal woes to him that made me so!—
But, look again: Have six years' cruel bondage
Extinguish'd majesty so far, that nought
Shines here, to give an awe of one above thee?
When the great Moorish king Abdallah fell,
Fell by thy hand accurst, I fought fast by him,
His son, though through his fondness in disguise,
Less to expose me to the ambitious foe!—

[Alonso starts up from the ground.]

Ha! does it rouse thee?—O'er my father's corse
I stood astride, till I had clove thy crest;
I then was made the captive of a squadron,
And sunk into thy servant:—But, O!—what,
What were my wages?—Hear nor heaven nor earth!—

My wages were a blow,—by Heaven, a blow!—
And from a mortal hand.

Alon. O villain! villain!

[Rushing towards ZANGA.]

Zan. All strife is vain.

[Draws a dagger.]

Alon. Is thus my love return'd? [Starts back.]
Is this my recompense? Make friends of tigers!

Lay not your young, O mothers, on the breast,
For fear they turn to serpents as they lie,
And pay you for their nourishment with death.
Carlos is dead, and Leonora dying:
Both innocent, both murder'd, both by me!—
O shame! O guilt! O horror! O remorse!
O punishment! Had Satan never fallen,
Hell had been made for me. O Leonora!
Leonora! Leonora!

Zan. Must I despise thee too, as well as hate
thee?

Complain of grief? Complain, thou art a man.
Priam from fortune's lofty summit fell;
Great Alexander 'midst his conquests mourn'd;
Heroes and demigods have known their sorrows;
Cæsars have wept; and I have had my blow.
But 'tis reveng'd, and now my work is done.
Yet ere I fall, be it one part of vengeance,
To make even thee confess that I am just.
Thou seest a prince, whose father thou hast slain,
Whose native country thou hast laid in blood,
Whose sacred person,—Oh!—thou hast profan'd,
Whose reign extinguish'd: What was left to me,
So highly born? No kingdom, but revenge;
No treasure, but thy tortures and thy groans.

If cold white mortals censure this great deed,
Warn them, they judge not of superior beings,
Souls made of fire, and children of the sun,
With whom Revenge is Virtue. Fare thee well!
Now, fully satisfied, I should take leave.
But one thing grieves me; since thy death is near,
I leave thee my example how to die.

[As he is going to stab himself, ALONSO rushes on him, and wrests his dagger from him:— at this moment,—

Enter ALVAREZ, with ALONSO's eight Attendants.
The Attendants seize ZANGA. ALONSO puts ZANGA's dagger in his bosom.

Alon. No, monster,—thou shalt not escape by death.

My father,——

Alv. O Alonso!—Isabella,
Touch'd with remorse to see her mistress' pangs,
Told all the dreadful tale.

Alon. What groan was that?

Zan. As I have been a vulture to thy heart,
So will I be a raven to thine ear,—

MANUEL enters, and whispers ALVAREZ.

And true as ever snuff'd the scent of blood,
As ever flap its heavy wing against
The window of the sick, and croak'd despair:
Thy wife is dead.

Alv. The dreadful news is true.

Alon. Prepare the rack: invent new torments for him.

Zan. This too is well: Thy fix'd and noble mind
Turns all occurrence to its own advantage,
And I'll make vengeance of calamity.
Were I not thus reduc'd, thou would'st not know
That, thus reduced, I dare defy thee still.
Torture thou may'st, but thou shalt ne'er despise me.

The blood will follow where the knife is driven,
The flesh will quiver where the pincers tear,
And sighs and cries by nature grow on pain:
But these are foreign to the soul: not mine
The groans that issue, nor the tears that fall:

They disobey me: On the rack I scorn thee,
As when my falchion clove thy helm in battle.

Alv. Peace, villain!

Zan. While I live, old man, I'll speak:—
And well I know, thou dar'st not kill me yet:
For that would rob thy bloodhounds of their prey.

Alon. Who call'd Alonso?

Again?—'Tis Carlos' voice, and I obey.
O, how I laugh at all that this can do!

[Stabs himself.

The wounds that pain'd, the wounds that murder'd me,

Were given before; I am already dead,
This only marks my body for the grave.

Afric, thou art reveng'd.—O Leonora!— [Dies.

Zan. Good ruffians, give me leave;—My blood is yours,

The wheel's prepar'd, and you shall have it all:

Let me but look one moment on the dead,

And pay yourselves with gazing on my pangs.

[Attendants loose ZANGA: he goes to ALONSO's body.

Is this Alonso? Where's his haughty mien?

[Stoops, and takes his hand.

Is that the hand which smote me? Heavens, how pale!

And art thou dead? So is my enmity: [Rises.

I war not with the dust: The great, the proud,

The conqueror of Afric was my foe:

A lion preys not upon carcases.

This was thy only method to subdue me.

Terror and doubt fall on me; all thy good

Now blazes, all thy guilt is in the grave.

Never had man such funeral applause;

If I lament thee, sure thy worth was great.

O vengeance, I have follow'd thee too far,

And, to receive me, hell blows all her fires.

[ZANGA rushes out, followed by four of the Attendants.

Alv. Dreadful effect of jealousy: a rage

In which the wise with caution will engage,

Reluctant long, and tardy to believe,

Where sway'd by nature we ourselves deceive,—

Where our own folly joins the villain's art,

And each man finds a Zanga in his heart.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Beverley's Lodgings.

Enter Mrs. BEVERLEY, followed by CHARLOTTE.

Mrs. B. Be comforted, my dear, all may be well yet. And now, methinks, the lodging begins to look with another face. Oh, sister, sister, if these were all my hardships: if all I had to complain of were no more than quitting my house, servants, equipage, and show, your pity would be weakness.

Cha. Is poverty nothing, then?

Mrs. B. Nothing in the world, if it affected only me. While we had a fortune, I was the happiest of the rich; and now 'tis gone, give me but a bare subsistence, and my husband's smiles, and I'll be the happiest of the poor. To me, now, these lodgings want nothing but their master!—Why do you look so at me?

Cha. That I may hate my brother.

Mrs. B. Don't talk so, Charlotte.

Cha. Has he not undone you?—Oh, this pernicious vice of gaming! But methinks his usual hours of four or five in the morning might have contented him; 'twas misery enough to wake for him till then. Need he have stayed out all night?—I shall learn to detest him.

Mrs. B. Not for the first fault. He never slept from me before.

Cha. Slept from you! No, no, his nights have nothing to do with sleep. How has this one vice driven him from every virtue! Nay, from his affections too! The time was, sister—

Mrs. B. And is. I have no fear of his affections. Would I knew that he were safe!

Cha. From ruin and his companions. But that's impossible. His poor little boy, too! What must become of him?

Mrs. B. Why, want shall teach him industry.—From his father's mistakes he shall learn prudence, and from his mother's resignation, patience. Poverty has no such terrors in it as you imagine. There's no condition of life, sickness and pain excepted, where happiness is excluded. The husbandman, who rises early to his labour, enjoys more welcome rest at night for't. His bread is sweeter to him; his home happier; his family dearer; his enjoyments surer. The sun that rouses him in the morning, sets in the evening to release him. All situations have their comforts, if sweet contentment dwell in the heart. But my poor Beverley has none. The thought of having ruined those he loves, is misery for ever to him. Would I could ease his mind of that!

Cha. If he alone were ruined, 'twere just he should be punished. He is my brother, 'tis true; but when I think of what he has done, of the fortune you brought him, of his own large estate too, squandered away upon this vilest of passions, and among the vilest of wretches! Oh, I have no patience! My own little fortune is untouched, he says. Would I were sure on't!

Mrs. B. And so you may—'twould be a sin to doubt it.

Cha. I will be sure on't—'twas madness in me to give it to his management. But I'll demand it from him this morning. I have a melancholy occasion for it.

Mrs. B. What occasion?

Cha. To support a sister.

[Takes her hand.]

Mrs. B. No; I have no need on't. Take it, and reward a lover with it. The generous Lewson deserves much more. Why won't you make him happy!

Cha. Because my sister's miserable.

Mrs. B. You must not think so. I have my jewels left yet. And when all's gone, these hands shall toil for our support. The poor should be industrious. Why those tears, Charlotte.

Cha. They flow in pity for you.

Mrs. B. All may be well yet. When he has nothing to lose, I shall fether him in these arms again; and then what is it to be poor?

Cha. Cure him but of this destructive passion, and my uncle's death may retrieve all yet.

Mrs. B. Ay, Charlotte, could we cure him! But the disease of play admits no cure but poverty; and the loss of another fortune would but increase his shame and his affliction. Will Mr. Lewson call this morning?

Cha. He said so last night. He gave me hints, too, that he had suspicions of our friend Stukely.

Mrs. B. Not of treachery to my husband? That he loves play, I know, but surely he's honest.

Cha. He would fain be thought so; therefore I doubt him. Honesty needs no pains to set itself off.

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. Your old steward, madam. I had not the heart to deny him admittance, the good old man begg'd so hard for't.

[Exit Lucy.]

Enter JARVIS.

Mrs. B. Is this well, Jarvis? I desired you to avoid me.

Jar. Did you, madam? I am an old man, and had forgot. Perhaps, too, you forbade my t-rans; but I am old, madam, and age will be forgetful.

Mrs. B. The faithful creature! how he moves me!

[To CHARLOTTE.]

Jar. I have forgot those apartments too. I remember none such in my young master's house; and yet I have lived in't these five-and-twenty years. His good father would not have dismissed me.

Mrs. B. He had no reason, Jarvis.

Jar. I was faithful to him while he lived, and when he died he bequeathed me to his son. I have been faithful to him too.

Mrs. B. I know it, Jarvis, I know it.

Jar. I am an old man, madam, and have not a long time to live. I asked but to have died with him, and he dismissed me.

Mrs. B. Pr'ythee no more of this! [Weeping.] 'Twas his poverty that dismissed you.

Jar. Is he indeed so poor then? Oh! he was the joy of my old heart. But must his creditors have all? And have they sold his house too? His father built it when he was but a prating boy. The times that I have carried him in these arms! And, Jarvis, says he, when a beggar has asked charity of me, why should people be poor? You shan't be poor, Jarvis; if I were a king, nobody should be poor. Yet he is poor. And then he was so brave! Oh, he was a brave little boy. And yet so merciful, he'd not have hurt the guat that stung him.

Mrs. B. Speak to him, Charlotte, for I cannot.

Jar. I have a little money, madam; it might have been more, but I have loved the poor. All that I have is yours.

Mrs. B. No, Jarvis; we have enough yet. I thank you though, and will deserve your goodness.

Jar. But shall I see my master? And will he let me attend him in his distresses? I'll be no expense to him; and 'twill kill me to be refused.—Where is he, madam?

Mrs. B. Not at home, Jarvis. You shall see him another time.

[Retires, and sits.]

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XIX.

Cha. To-morrow, or the next day.—Oh, Jarvis! what a change is here!

[Apart to JARVIS.]

Jar. A change indeed, madam! my old heart aches at it. And yet, methinks—But here's somebody coming.

[Retires.]

Enter LUCY, with STUKELY.

Lucy. Mr. Stukely, madam.

[Exit.]

Stu. Good morning to you, ladies. Mr. Jarvis, your servant. Where's my friend, madam?

[To Mrs. BEVERLEY, who rises, and advances.]

Mrs. B. I should have asked that question of you. Have you seen him to-day?

Stu. No, madam.

Cha. Not last night?

Stu. Last night! Did he not come home, then?

Mrs. B. No.—Were you not together.

Stu. At the beginning of the evening, but not since. Where can he have stayed?

Cha. You call yourself his friend, sir, why do you encourage him in this madness of gaming?

Stu. You have asked me that question before, madam; and I told you my concern was, that I could not save him: Mr. Beverley is a man, madam; and if the most friendly entreaties have no effect upon him, I have no other means. My purse has been his, even to the injury of my fortune. If that has been encouragement, I deserve censure; but I meant it to retrieve him.

Mrs. B. I don't doubt it, sir, and I thank you. But where did you leave him last night?

Stu. At Wilson's, madam, if I ought to tell, in company I did not like. Possibly he may be there still. Mr. Jarvis knows the house, I believe.

Jar. [Coming forward.] Shall I go, madam?

Mrs. B. No; he may take it ill.

Cha. He may go as from himself.

Stu. And, if he pleases, madam, without naming me. I am faulty myself, and should conceal the errors of a friend. But I can refuse nothing here.

[Bowling to the Ladies.]

Jar. I would fain see him, methinks.

Mrs. B. Do so, then; but take care how you upbraid him—I have never upbraided him.

Jar. Would I could bring him comfort! [Exit.]

Stu. Don't be too much alarmed, madam. All men have their errors, and their times of seeing them. Perhaps my friend's time is not come yet. But he has an uncle; and old men don't live for ever. You should look forward, madam: we are taught how to value a second fortune by the loss of a first.

[Knocking.]

Mrs. B. Hark! No—that knocking was too rude for Mr. Beverley. Pray Heaven he be well!

Stu. Never doubt it, madam. You shall be well too. Everything shall be well. [Knocking again.]

Mrs. B. The knocking is a little loud, though.—Who waits there? Will none of you answer? None of you, did I say? Alas, what was I thinking of! I had forgot myself. [Retires, weeping—sits.]

Cha. I'll go, sister—But don't be alarmed so.

[Exit.]

Stu. [Goes to Mrs. B.] What extraordinary accident have you to fear, madam?

Mrs. B. [Rising, and advancing.] I beg your pardon; but 'tis ever thus with me in Mr. Beverley's absence. No one knocks at the door, but I fancy it is a messenger of ill news.

Stu. You are too fearful, madam; 'twas but one night of absence; and if ill thoughts intrude (as love is always doubtful), think of your worth and beauty, and drive them from your breast.

U

Mrs. B. What thoughts? I have no thoughts that wrong my husband.

Stu. Such thoughts indeed would wrong him. The world is full of slander; and every wretch that knows himself unjust charges his neighbour with like passions, and by the general frailty hides his own—If you are wise, and would be happy, turn a deaf ear to such reports. 'Tis ruin to believe them.

Mrs. B. Ay, worse than ruin. 'Twould be to sin against conviction. Why was it mentioned?

Stu. To guard you against rumour. The sport of hal mankind is mischief; and for a single error they make men devils. If their tales reach you, disbelieve them.

Mrs. B. What tales? What told? By whom? I have heard nothing—or, if I had, with all his errors, my Beverley's firm faith admits no doubt—It is my safety, my seat of rest and joy, while the storm threatens round me. I'll not forsake it. [Stukely sighs, and looks down.] Why turn you, sir, away? and why that sigh?

Stu. I was attentive, madam; and sighs will come, we know not why. Perhaps I have been too busy—If it should seem so, impute my zeal to friendship, that meant to guard you against evil tongues. Your Beverley is wronged, slandered most vilely—My life upon his truth.

Mrs. B. And mine too. Who is't that doubts it? But no matter—I am prepared, sir—Yet why this caution?—You are my husband's friend; I think you mine too; the common friend of both. [Pauses.] I had been unconcerned else.

Stu. For Heaven's sake, madam, be so still! I meant to guard you against suspicion, not to alarm it.

Mrs. B. Nor have you, sir. Who told you of suspicion? I have a heart it cannot reach.

Stu. Then I am happy—I would say more—but am prevented.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Cha. What a heart has that Jarvis! A creditor, sister. But the good old man has taken him away—"Don't distress his wife—Don't distress his sister," I could hear him say. "'Tis cruel to distress the afflicted"—And when he saw me at the door, he begged pardon that his friend had knocked so loud.

Stu. I wish I had known of this. Was it a large demand, madam?

Cha. I heard not that; but visits such as these we must expect often—Why so distressed, sister? This is no new affliction.

Mrs. B. No, Charlotte; but I am faint with watching—quite sunk and spiritless—Will you excuse me, sir? I'll to my chamber, and try to rest a little. [Exit.]

Stu. Good thoughts go with you, madam. My bait is taken then. [Aside.]—Poor Mrs. Beverley! How my heart grieves to see her thus!

Cha. Cure her, and be a friend then.

Stu. How cure her, madam?

Cha. Reclaim my brother.

Stu. Ay, give him a new creation, or breathe another soul into him. I'll think on't, madam. Advice, I see, is thankless.

Cha. Useless I am sure it is, if, through mistaken friendship, or other motives, you feed his passion with your purse, and sooth it by example. Physicians, to cure fevers, keep from the patient's thirsty lip the cup that would inflame him. You give it to his hands. [A knocking.] Hark, sir!—These are my brother's desperate symptoms—Another creditor!

Stu. One not so easily got rid of—What, Lewson!—

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. Madam, your servant—Yours, sir. I was inquiring for you at your lodgings.

Stu. This morning! You had business then?

Lew. You'll call it by another name, perhaps. Where's Mr. Beverley, madam?

Cha. We have sent to inquire for him.

Lew. Is he abroad then? He did not use to go out so early.

Cha. No, nor stay out so late.

Lew. Is that the case? I am sorry for it. But Mr. Stukely, perhaps, may direct you to him.

Stu. I have already, sir. But what was your business with me?

Lew. To congratulate you upon your late successes at play. Poor Beverley!—But you are his friend: and there's a comfort in having successful friends.

Stu. And what am I to understand by this?

Lew. That Beverley's a poor man, with a rich friend; that's all.

Stu. Your words would mean something, I suppose. Another time, sir, I shall desire an explanation.

Lew. And why not now? I am no dealer in long sentences. A minute or two will do for me.

Stu. But not for me, sir. I am slow of apprehension, and must have time and privacy. A lady's presence engages my attention. Another morning I may be found at home.

Lew. Another morning, then, I'll wait upon you.

Stu. I shall expect you, sir. Madam, your servant. [Exit.]

Cha. What mean you by this?

Lew. To hint to him that I know him.

Cha. How know him? Mere doubt and supposition!

Lew. I shall have proof soon.

Cha. And what then? Would you risk your life to be his punisher?

Lew. My life, madam! Don't be afraid. But let it content you that I know this Stukely—'Twould be as easy to make him honest as brave.

Cha. And what do you intend to do?

Lew. Nothing, till I have proof.—But, methinks, madam, I am acting here without authority. Could I have leave to call Mr. Beverley brother, his concerns would be my own. Why will you make my services appear officious? [Takes her hand.]

Cha. You know my reasons, and should not press me. But I am cold, you say; and cold I will be, while a poor sister's destitute.—Misfortunes press too hard upon her; yet, till to-day, she has borne them nobly. Till I see her condition ameliorated, love has no joys for me.

Lew. Where is she?

Cha. Gone to her chamber. Her spirits failed her.

Lew. I hear her coming. [Aside.] Let what has passed with Stukely be a secret—She has already too much to trouble her.

Enter Mrs. BEVERLEY.

Mrs. B. Good morning, sir; I heard your voice, and, as I thought, inquiring for me. Where's Mr. Stukely, Charlotte?

Cha. This moment gone—You have been in tears, sister; but here's a friend shall comfort you.

Lew. Or, if I add to your distresses, I'll beg your pardon, madam. The sale of your house and furniture was finished yesterday.

Mrs. B. I know it, sir; I know too your generous reasons for putting me in mind of it. But you have obliged me too much already.

Lew. There are trifles, madam, which I know you have set a value on; those I have purchased, and will deliver. I have a friend, too, that esteems you—He has bought largely, and will call nothing his, till he has seen you. If a visit to him would not be painful, he has begged it may be this morning.

Mrs. B. Not painful in the least. My pain is from the kindness of my friends. Why am I to be obliged beyond the power of return?

Lew. You shall repay us at your own time. I have a coach waiting at the door.—Shall we have your company, madam? [TO CHARLOTTE.]

Cha. No; my brother may return soon; I'll stay and receive him.

Mrs. B. [TO CHAR.] He may want a comforter, perhaps. But don't upbraid him, Charlotte. We shan't be absent long. Come, sir, since I must be so obliged.

Lew. 'Tis I that am obliged. An hour, or less, will be sufficient for us. We shall find you at home, madam?

[Exeunt LEWSON and Mrs. BEVERLEY on one side, and CHARLOTTE on the other.]

SCENE II.—Stukely's Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY.

Stu. That Lewson suspects me, 'tis too plain. Yet why should he suspect me? I appear the friend of Beverley as much as he. But I am rich, it seems; and so I am, thanks to another's folly and my own wisdom. To what use is wisdom, but to take advantage of the weak? This Beverley's my fool; I cheat him, and he calls me friend. But more business must be done yet—His wife's jewels are unsold; so is the reversion of his uncle's estate: I must have these too. And then there's a treasure above all—I love his wife—Before she knew this Beverley I loved her; but, like a cringing fool, bowed at a distance, while he stepped in and won her—Never, never will I forgive him for it. My pride, as well as love, is wounded by this conquest. Those hints this morning were well thrown in—Already they have fastened on her. If jealousy should weaken her affections, want may corrupt her virtue; my heart rejoices in the hope!—These jewels may do much—He shall demand them of her; which, when mine, shall be converted to special purposes—What now, Bates?

Enter BATES.

Bates. Is it a wonder then to see me? The forces are all in readiness, and only wait for orders. Where's Beverley?

Stu. At last night's rendezvous, waiting for me. Is Dawson with you?

Bates. Dressed like a nobleman; with money in his pocket, and a set of dice that shall deceive the devil.

Stu. That fellow has a head to undo a nation; but for the rest, they are such low-mannered, ill-looking dogs, I wonder Beverley has not suspected them.

Bates. No matter for manners and looks. Do you supply them with money, and they are gentlemen by profession—The passion of gaming casts such a mist before the eyes, that the nobleman shall be surrounded with sharpeners, and imagine himself in the best company.

Stu. There's that William's, too. It was he, I suppose, that called at Beverley's with the note this morning. What directions did you give him?

Bates. To knock loud, and be clamorous. Did not you see him?

Stu. No, the fool sneaked off with Jarvis. Had he appeared within doors, as directed, the note had been discharged. I waited there on purpose. I want the women to think well of me; for Lewson's grown suspicious; he told me so himself.

Bates. What answer did you make him?

Stu. A short one—That I would see him soon for further explanation.

Bates. We must take care of him. But what have we to do with Beverley? Dawson and the rest are wondering at you.

Stu. Why, let them wonder. I have designs above their narrow reach. They see me lend him money, and they stare at me. But they are fools. I want him to believe me beggared by him.

Bates. And what then?

Stu. Ay, there's the question; but no matter; at night you may know more. He waits for me at Wilson's—I told the women where to find him.

Bates. To what purpose?

Stu. To save suspicion. It looked friendly, and they thanked me.—Old Jarvis was despatched to him.

Bates. And may entreat him home—

Stu. No; he expects money from me; but I'll have none. His wife's jewels must go—Women are easy creatures, and refuse nothing where they love. Follow to Wilson's, but be sure he sees you not. You are a man of character, you know; of prudence and discretion. Wait for me in an outer room; I shall have business for you presently.—Come, sir.

Let drudging fools by honesty grow great;
The shorter road to riches is deceit. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Gaming-house, with Table, Box, Dice, &c.

BEVERLEY discovered sitting.

Bev. [Rises and comes forward.] Why, what a world is this! The slave that digs for gold receives his daily pittance, and sleeps contented; while those for whom he labours convert their good to mischief, making abundance the means of want. O shame! shame! Had fortune given me but little, that little had still been my own. But plenty leads to waste; and shallow streams maintain their currents, while swelling rivers beat down their banks, and leave their channels empty. What had I to do with play? I wanted nothing—My wishes and my means were equal. The poor followed me with blessings, love scattered roses on my pillow, and morning waked me to delight—Oh, bitter thought, that, leads to what I was, by what I am! I would forget both—Who's there!

Enter a Waiter.

Wai. A gentleman, sir, inquires for you.

Bev. He might have used less ceremony. Stukely, I suppose?

Wai. No, sir, a stranger.

Bev. Well, show him in. [Exit Waiter.] A messenger from Stukely then; from him that has undone me! yet all in friendship—And now he lends me his little, to bring back fortune to me.

Enter JARVIS.

Jarvis!—Why this intrusion?—Your absence had been kinder.

Jar. I came in duty, sir. If it be troublesome—

Bev. It is—I would be private—hid even from myself. Who sent you hither?

Jar. One that would persuade you home again. My mistress is not well—her tears told me so.

Bev. Go with thy duty there then—I have no business for thee.

Jar. Yes, sir; to lead you from this place. I am your servant still. Your prosperous fortune blessed my old age: If that has left you, I must not leave you.

Bev. Not leave me! Recall past time, then; or, through this sea of storms and darkness, show me a star to guide me.—But what canst thou?

Jar. The little that I can, I will. You have been generous to me.—I would not offend you, sir—but—

Bev. No. Think'st thou I'd ruin thee too? I have enough of shame already—My wife! my wife! Wouldst thou believe it, Jarvis? I have not seen her all this long night—I, who have loved her so, that every hour of absence seemed as a gap in life! But other bonds have held me—Oh, I have played the boy! dropping my counters in the stream, and reaching to redeem them, lost myself!

Jar. For pity's sake, sir!—I have no heart to see this change.

Bev. Nor I to bear it—How speaks the world of me, Jarvis?

Jar. As of a good man dead—Of one who, walking in a dream, fell down a precipice. The world is sorry for you.

Bev. Ay, and pities me—Says it not so? But I was born to infamy. I'll tell thee what it says; it calls me villain, a treacherous husband, a cruel father, a false brother, one lost to nature and her charities; or, to say all in one short word, it calls me—gamester. Go to thy mistress—I'll see her presently.

[Runs back and sits.]

Jar. And why not now? [Following him.] Rude people press upon her; loud, bawling creditors; wretches who know no pity—I met one at the door—he would have seen my mistress: I wanted means of present payment, so promised it to-morrow. But others may be pressing, and she has grief enough already. Your absence hangs too heavy on her.

Bev. Tell her I'll come then. But what hast thou to do with my mistresses? Thy honesty has left thee poor. Keep what thou hast; lest, between thee and the grave, misery steal in. I have a friend shall counsel me—This is that friend.

Enter STUKELY.

Stu. How fares it, Beverley? (BEVERLEY rises and advances.) Honest Mr. Jarvis, well met. That viper, Williams! Was it not he that troubled you this morning?

Jar. My mistress heard him then? I am sorry that she heard him.

Bev. And Jarvis promised payment.

Stu. That must not be. Tell him I'll satisfy him.

Jar. Will you, sir. Heaven will reward you for it.

Bev. Generous Stukely! Friendship like yours, had it ability like will, would more than balance the wrongs of fortune.

Stu. You think too kindly of me. Make haste to Williams; his clamours may be rude, else.

[To JARVIS.]

Jar. And my master will go home again. Alas! sir, we know of hearts there breaking for his absence.

[Exit.]

Bev. 'Would I were dead!

Stu. Pr'ythee, be a man, and leave dying to disease and old age. Fortune may be ours again; at least we'll try for't.

Bev. No; it has fooled us on too far.

Stu. Ay, ruined us; and therefore we'll sit down contented. These are the despondings of men without money; but let the shining ore chink in the pocket, and folly turns to wisdom. We are Fortune's children. True, she's a fickle mother; but shall we droop because she's peevish? No; she has smiles in store, and these her frowns are meant to brighten them.

Bev. Is this a time for levity? But you are single in the ruin, and, therefore, may talk lightly of it: with me 'tis complicated misery.

Stu. You censure me unjustly; I but assumed these spirits, to cheer my friend. Heaven knows, he wants a comforter.

Bev. What new misfortune?

Stu. I would have brought you money, but lenders want securities. What's to be done? All that was mine is yours already.

Bev. And there's the double weight that sinks me, I have undone my friend too; one who, to save a drowning wretch, reached out his hand, and perished with him.

Stu. Have better thoughts.

Bev. Whence are they to proceed? I have nothing left.

Stu. [Sighing.] Then we're indeed undone—What! nothing? No moveables, nor useless trinkets! Baubles locked up in caskets, to starve their owners? I have ventured deeply for you.

Bev. Therefore this heart-ache; for I am lost beyond all hope.

Stu. No; means may be found to save us. Jarvis is rich—who made him so? This is no time for ceremony.

Bev. And is it for dishonesty? The good old man! Shall I rob him too? My friend would grieve for't. No; let the little that he has, buy food and clothing for him.

Stu. Good morning then.

[Going.]

Bev. So hasty! why, then, good morning.

Stu. And when we meet again, upbraid me. Say it was I that tempted you. Tell Lewson so, and tell him, I have wronged you. He has suspicions of me, and will thank you.

Bev. No; we have been companions in a rash voyage, and the same storm has wrecked us both: Mine shall be self-upbraidings.

Stu. And will they feed us? You deal unkindly by me. I have sold and borrowed for you while land or credit lasted: and now, when fortune should be tried, and my heart whispers me success, I am deserted—turned loose to beggary, while you have boards.

Ber. What hoards? Name them, and take them!

Stu. Jewels.

Ber. And shall this thriftless hand seize them too? My poor, poor wife! Must she lose all? I would not wound her so.

Stu. Nor I, but from necessity. One effort more, and fortune may grow kind. I have unusual hopes.

Ber. Think of some other means then.

Stu. I have, and you rejected them.

Ber. Pr'ythee, let me be a man.

Stu. Ay, and your friend a poor one. But I have done: And for these trinkets of a woman, why, let her keep them, to deck out pride with, and show a laughing world that she has finery to starve in.

Ber. No; she shall yield up all. My friend demands it. But need we have talked lightly of her? The jewels that she values are truth and innocence. Those will adorn her ever; and, for the rest, she wore them for a husband's pride, and to his wants will give them. Alas! you know her not. Where shall we meet?

Stu. No matter; I have changed my mind. Leave me to a prison; 'tis the reward of friendship.

Ber. Perish mankind first! Leave you to a prison! No! fallen as you see me, I'm not that wretch: Nor would I change this heart, o'er-charged as 'tis with folly and misfortune, for one most prudent and most happy, if callous to a friend's distresses.

Stu. You are too warm.

Ber. In such a cause, not to be warm is to be frozen. Farewell—I'll meet you at your lodgings.

Stu. Reflect a little. The jewels may be lost—better not hazard them—I was too pressing.

Ber. And I ungrateful. Reflection takes up time—I have no leisure for't—within an hour expect me. [Exit.]

Stu. The thoughtless, shallow prodigal! We shall have sport at night, then—but hold—the jewels are not ours yet—the lady may refuse them—the husband may relent too—'tis more than probable—I'll write a note to Beverley, and the contents shall spur him to demand them. But am I grown this rogue through avarice? No; I have warmer motives, love and revenge. Ruin the husband, and the wife's virtue may be bid for.

Enter BATES.

Look to your men, Bates; there's money stirring. We meet to-night upon this spot. Hasten, and tell them. Beverley calls upon me at my lodgings, and we return together. Hasten, I say, the rogues will scatter else.

Bates. Not till their leader bids them.

Stu. Come on, then—give them the word, and follow me; I must advise with you. This is a day of business. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Beverley's Lodgings.

Enter BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Cha. Your looks are changed too; there's wildness in them. My wretched sister! How will it grieve her to see you thus!

Ber. No, no; a little rest will ease me. And for your Lewson's kindness to her, it has my thanks; I have no more to give him.

Cha. Yes; a sister and her fortune. I trifle with him, and he complains. My looks, he says, are cold upon him. He thinks too—

Ber. That I have lost your fortune. He dares not think so.

Cha. Nor does he; you are too quick at guessing. He cares not if you had. That care is mine; I lent it you to husband, and now I claim it.

Ber. You have suspicions then?

Cha. Cure them, and give it me.

Ber. To stop a sister's chidings?

Cha. To vindicate her brother.

Ber. How if he needs no vindication?

Cha. I would fain hope so.

Ber. Ay, would and cannot—Leave it to time, then; 'twill satisfy all doubts.

Cha. Mine are already satisfied.

Ber. 'Tis well. And when the subject is renewed, speak to me like a sister, and I will answer like a brother.

Cha. To tell me I'm a beggar. Why, tell it now. I, that can bear the ruin of those dearer to me—the ruin of a sister and her infant—can bear that too.

Ber. No more of this—you wring my heart.

Cha. Unthinking rioter! whose home was heaven to him!—an angel dwelt there, and a little cherub, that crown'd his days with blessings. How he has lost this heaven, to league with devils!

Ber. Forbear, I say; reproaches come too late; they search, but cure not. And, for the fortune you demand, we'll talk to-morrow on't—our tempers may be milder.

Cha. Or, if 'tis gone, why, farewell all. But I'll upbraid no more. What Heaven permits, perhaps it may ordain. Yet, that the husband, father, brother, should be its instruments of vengeance! 'Tis grievous to know that!

Ber. If you're my sister, spare the remembrance—it wounds too deeply. To-morrow shall clear all; and when the worst is known, it may be better than your fears. Comfort my wife—and for the pains of absence I'll make atonement.

Cha. She comes! Look cheerfully upon her.—Affections such as hers are prying, and lend those eyes that read the soul.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and LEWSON.

Mrs. B. My life! [Embrace.]

Ber. My love! how fares it? I have been a truant husband.

Mrs. B. But we meet now, and that heals all.—Doubts and alarms I have had; but in this dear embrace I bury and forget them. My friend here, [Pointing to Lewson,] has been indeed a friend. Charlotte, 'tis you must thank him: your brother's thanks and mine are of too little value.

Ber. Yet what we have, we'll pay. I thank you, sir, and am obliged. I would say more, but that your goodness to the wife upbraids the husband's follies. Had I been wise, she had not trespassed on your bounty.

Lew. Nor has she trespassed. The little I have done, acceptance overpays.

Cha. So friendship thinks—

Mrs. B. And doubles obligations by striving to conceal them—We'll talk another time on't—You are too thoughtful, love.

Bev. No, I have reason for these thoughts.

Cha. And hatred for the cause—'Would you had that too!

Bev. I have—the cause was avarice.

Cha. And who the tempter?

Bev. A ruined friend—ruined by too much kindness.

Lew. Ay, worse than ruined; stabbed in his fame, mortally stabbed—riches can't cure him.

Bev. Or, if they could, those I have drained him of. Something of this he hinted in the morning—that Lewson had suspicions of him—Why these suspicions?

Lew. At school we knew this Stukely. A cunning, plodding boy he was, sordid and cruel, slow at his task, but quick at shifts and tricking. He schemed out mischief, that others might be punished; and would tell his tale with so much art, that for the lash he merited, rewards and praise were given him. Show me a boy with such a mind, and time, that ripens manhood in him, shall ripen vice too—I'll prove him, and lay him open to you—I'll then, be warned—I know him, and therefore shun him.

Bev. As I would those that wrong him. You are too busy, sir.

Mrs. B. No, not too busy—Mistaken, perhaps—That had been milder.

Lew. No matter, madam. I can bear this, and praise the heart that prompts it. Pity such friendship should be so placed!

Bev. Again, sir! But I'll bear too. You wrong him, Lewson, and will be sorry for't.

Cha. Ay, when 'tis proved he wrongs him. The world is full of hypocrites.

Bev. And Stukely one—so you would infer, I think. I'll bear no more of this—my heart aches for him—I have undone him.

Lew. The world says otherwise.

Bev. The world is false then. I have business with you, love. [To Mrs. BEVERLEY.] We'll leave them to their rancour.

Cha. No; we shall find room within for't. Come this way, sir. [To LEWSON.]

Lew. Another time my friend will thank me; that time is hastening too.

[Exeunt with CHARLOTTE.
Bev. They hurt me beyond bearing. Is Stukely false! Then honesty has left us! 'I were sinning against Heaven to think so.

Mrs. B. I never doubted him.

Bev. No; you are charity. Meekness and enduring patience live in that heart, and love that knows no change. Why did I ruin you?

Mrs. B. You have not ruined me. I have no wants when you are present, nor wishes in your absence, but to be blest with your return. Be but resigned to what has happened, and I am rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

Bev. My generous girl!—But memory will be busy; still crowding on my thoughts, to sour the present by the past. I have another pang too.

Mrs. B. Tell it, and let me cure it.

Bev. That friend—that generous friend, whose fame they have traduced—I have undone him too. While he had means, he lent me largely; and now a prison must be his portion.

Mrs. B. No; I hope otherwise.

Bev. To hope must be to act. The charitable wish feeds not the hungry. Something must be done.

Mrs. B. What?

Bev. In bitterness of heart he told me, just now he told me, I had undone him. Could I hear that, and think of happiness? No; I have disclaimed it while he is miserable.

Mrs. B. The world may mend with us, and then we may be grateful. There's comfort in that hope.

Bev. Ay; 'tis the sick man's cordial, his promised cure; while, in preparing it, the patient dies. What now?

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. A letter, sir.

Bev. The hand is Stukely's. [Delivers it, and exit.

[Opens it, and reads it to himself.

Mrs. B. And brings good news—at least I'll hope so—What says he, love?

Bev. Why this—too much for patience. Yet he directs me to conceal it from you. [Reads.] "Let your haste to see me be the only proof of your esteem for me. I have determined, since we parted, to bid adieu to England; choosing rather to forsake my country, than owe my freedom in it to the means we talked of. Keep this a secret at home, and hasten to the ruined R. STUKELY."—Ruined by friendship! I must relieve or follow him. [Going in a state of distraction.

Mrs. B. Follow him, did you say? Then I am lost, indeed!

Bev. Oh, this infernal vice! how has it sunk me! A vice, whose highest joy was poor to my domestic happiness. Yet how have I pursued it! turned all my comforts to bitterest pangs, and all my smiles to tears. Damned, damned infatuation!

Mrs. B. Be cool, my life! What are the means the letter talks of? Have you—have I those means? Tell me, and ease me. I have no life while you are wretched.

Bev. No, no; it must not be. 'Tis I alone have sinned; 'tis I alone must suffer. You shall reserve those means, to keep my child and his wronged mother from want and wretchedness.

Mrs. B. What means?

Bev. I came to rob you of them—but cannot—dare not. Those jewels are your sole support: I should be more than monster to request them.

Mrs. B. My jewels! Trifles, not worth speaking of, if weighed against a husband's peace; but let them purchase that, and the world's wealth is of less value. [Embrace.

Bev. How little do I seem before such virtues!

Mrs. B. No more, my love. I kept them till occasion called to use them; now is the occasion, and I'll resign them cheerfully.

Bev. Why, we'll be rich in love then. But this excess of kindness melts me. Yet for a friend one would do much. He has denied me nothing.

Mrs. B. Come to my closet—But let him manage wisely. We have no more to give him.

Bev. Where learnt my love this excellence? 'Tis Heaven's own teaching: that Heaven, which to an angel's form has given a mind more lovely. I am unworthy of you, but will deserve you better.

Henceforth my follies and neglects shall cease,
And all to come be penitence and peace;
Vice shall no more attract me with her charms,
Nor pleasure reach me, but in these dear arms.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Stukely's Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and BATES.

Stu. So runs the world, Bates. Fools are the natural prey of knaves; Nature designed them so, when she made lambs for wolves. The laws, that fear and policy have framed, Nature disclaims; she knows but two, and those are force and cunning. The nobler law is force; but then there's danger in't; while cunning, like a skilful miner, works safely and unseen.

Bates. And therefore wisely. Force must have nerves and sinews; cunning wants neither. The dwarf that has it shall trip the giant's heels up.

Stu. And bind him to the ground. Why, we'll erect a shrine for Nature, and be her oracles. Conscience is weakness; fear made it, and fear maintains it. The dread of shame, inward reproaches, and fictitious burnings, swell out the phantom. Nature knows none of this; her laws are freedom.

Bates. Sound doctrine, and well delivered!

Stu. We are sincere, too, and practise what we teach. Let the grave pedant say as much. But now to business. The jewels are disposed of; and Beverley again worth money. If my design succeeds, this night we finish with him. Go to your lodgings, and be busy. You understand conveyances, and make ruin sure.

Bates. Better stop here. The sale of this reversion may be talked of. There's danger in it.

Stu. No, 'tis the mark I aim at. We'll thrive and laugh. You are the purchaser, and there's the payment. [Giving him a pocket-book.] He thinks you rich; and so you shall be. Inquire for titles, and deal hardly; 'twill look like honesty.

Bates. How, if he suspects us?

Stu. Leave it to me. I study hearts, and when to work upon them. Go to your lodgings; and if we come, be busy over papers. Talk of a thoughtless age, of gaming and extravagance; you have a face for't.

Bates. A feeling too, that would avoid it. We push too far; but I have cautioned you. If it ends ill, you'll think of me—and so, adieu. [Exit.]

Stu. This fellow sins by halves; his fears are conscience to him. I'll turn these fears to use. Rogues that dread shame, will still be greater rogues to hide their guilt. Lewson grows troublesome—We must get rid of him—He knows too much. I have a tale for Beverley. He shall call Lewson to account—If it succeeds, 'tis well; if not, we must try other means. [Knocking.] But here he comes—I must dissemble.

Enter BEVERLEY.

Look to the door there! [In a seeming fright.]—My friend! I thought of other visitors.

Bev. No; these shall guard you from them. [Offering notes.] Take them, and use them cautiously. The world deals hardly by us.

Stu. And shall I leave you destitute? No; your wants are the greatest. Another climate may treat me kinder. The shelter of to-night takes me from this.

Bev. Let these be your support then. Yet is there need of parting? I may have means again; we'll share them, and live wisely.

Stu. No: I should tempt you on. 'Tis nature in me; ruin can't cure it. Even now I would be gaming. Taught by experience as I am, and knowing this poor sum is all that's left us, I am for venturing still; and say I am to blame. Yet will this little supply our wants? No, we must put it out to usury. Whether 'tis madness in me, or some restless impulse of good fortune, I yet am ignorant; but—

Bev. Take it, and succeed then. I'll try no more.

Stu. 'Tis surely impulse; it pleads so strongly. But you are cold—We'll e'en part here then. And for this last reserve, keep it for better uses; I'll have none on't. I thank you though, and will seek fortune singly. One thing I had forgot—

Bev. What is it?

Stu. Perhaps, 'twere best forgotten. But I am open in my nature, and zealous for the honour of my friend. Lewson speaks freely of you.

Bev. Of you I know he does.

Stu. I can forgive him for't; but, for my friend, I'm angry.

Bev. What says he of me?

Stu. That Charlotte's fortune is embezzled. He talks on't loudly.

Bev. He shall be silenced, then? How heard you of it?

Stu. From many. He questioned Bates about it. You must account with him, he says.

Bev. Or he with me—and soon, too.

Stu. Speak mildly to him. Cautions are best.

Bev. I'll think on't—But whither go you?

Stu. From poverty and prisons—No matter whither. If fortune changes, you may hear from me.

Bev. May these be prosperous, then. [Offering the notes, which he refuses.] Nay, they are yours—I have sworn it, and will have nothing. Take them, and use them.

Stu. Singly I will not. My cares are for my friend; for his lost fortune and ruined family. All separate interests I disclaim. Together we have fallen; together we must rise. My heart, my honour, and affections, all will have it so.

Bev. I am weary of being fooled.

Stu. And so am I. Here let us part, then. These bodings of good fortune shall all be stifled; call them folly, and forget them—farewell.

Bev. No; stay a moment. How my poor heart's distracted! I have these bodings too; but whether caught from you, or prompted by my good or evil genius, I know not. The trial shall determine. And yet, my wife—

Stu. Ay, ay, she'll chide.

Bev. No; my chidings are all here.

[Pointing to his heart.]

Stu. I'll not persuade you.

Bev. I am persuaded; by reason too; the strongest reason, necessity. Oh, could I but regain the height I have fallen from, Heaven should forsake me in my latest hour, if I again mixed in these scenes, or sacrificed the husband's peace, his joy, and best affections, to avarice and infamy.

Stu. I have resolved like you; and, since our motives are so honest, why should we fear success?

Bev. Come on, then. Where shall we meet?

Stu. At Wilson's. Yet if it hurts you, leave me: I have misled you often.

Bev. We have misled each other. But come! Fortune is fickle, and may be tired with plaguing us.—There let us rest our hopes.

Stu. Yet think a little—

Bev. I cannot—thinking but distracts me.

When desperation leads, all thoughts are vain ;
Reason would lose what rashness may obtain.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Beverley's Lodgings.

Enter Mrs. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Cha. 'Twas all a scheme, a mean one ; unworthy of my brother.

Mrs. B. No, I am sure it was not. Stukely is honest too ; I know he is. This madness has undone them both.

Cha. My brother irrecoverably. You are too spiritless a wife. A mournful tale, mixed with a few kind words, will steal away your soul. The world's too subtle for such goodness. Had I been by, he should have asked your life sooner than those jewels.

Mrs. B. He should have had it then. [Hastily.] I live but to oblige him. She who can love, and is beloved like me, will do as much. Men have done more for mistresses, and women for a base betrayer : and shall a wife do less ? Your chidings hurt me, Charlotte.

Cha. And come too late ; they might have saved you else. How could he use you so ?

Mrs. B. 'Twas friendship did it. His heart was breaking for a friend.

Cha. The friend that has betrayed him.

Mrs. B. Pr'ythee don't think so.

Cha. To-morrow he accounts with me.

Mrs. B. And fairly—I will not doubt it.

Cha. Unless a friend has wanted. I have no patience—Sister ! sister ! we are bound to curse this friend.

Mrs. B. My Beverley speaks nobly of him.

Cha. And Lewson truly. But I displease you with this talk. To-morrow will instruct us.

Mrs. B. Stay till it comes then—I would not think so hardly.

Cha. Nor I, but from conviction. Yet we have hope of better days. My uncle is infirm, and of an age that threatens hourly : or if he live, you never have offended him ; and for distresses so unmerited he will have pity.

Mrs. B. I know it, and am cheerful.

Cha. My Lewson will be kind too. While he and I have life and means, you shall divide with us. And see, he's here !

Enter LEWSON.

We were just speaking of you.

Lew. 'Tis best to interrupt you then. Few characters will bear a scrutiny ; and where the bad outweighs the good, he's safest that's least talked of. What say you, madam ? [To CHARLOTTE.]

Cha. That I hate scandal, though a woman—therefore talk seldom of you.

Mrs. B. Or, with more truth, that, though a woman, she loves to praise—therefore talk always of you. I'll leave you to decide it. [Exit.]

Lew. [Taking her hand.] How good and amiable ! I came to talk in private with you, of matters that concern you.

Cha. What matters ?

Lew. First answer me sincerely to what I ask.

Cha. Propose your question.

Lew. 'Tis now a tedious twelvemonth since, with an open and kind heart, you said you loved me. And when, in consequence of such sweet words, I pressed for marriage, you gave a voluntary promise that you would live for me.

Cha. You think me changed, then ? [Angrily.]

Lew. I did not say so.

Cha. Why am I doubted ?

Lew. My doubts are of myself. I have my faults, and you have observation. If, from my temper, my words or actions, you have conceived a thought against me, or even a wish for separation, all that has passed is nothing.

Cha. Why, now I'll answer you. Your doubts are prophecies—I am really changed. [They part.]

Lew. Indeed !

Cha. I could torment you now, as you have me ; but it is not in my nature. That I am changed, I own ; for what at first was inclination, is now grown reason in me ; and from that reason, had I the world, nay, were I poorer than the poorest, and you too wanting bread—I would be yours, and happy.

Lew. My kindest Charlotte ! [Taking her hand.] Thanks are too poor for this, and words too weak ! But if we loved so, why should our union be delayed ?

Cha. For happier times. The present are too wretched.

Lew. I may have reasons that press it now.

Cha. What reasons ?

Lew. The strongest reasons ; unanswerable ones.

Cha. Be quick and name them.

Lew. First promise, that to-morrow, or the next day, you will be mine for ever.

Cha. I do—though misery should succeed.

Lew. Thus then I seize you ! And with you every joy on this side heaven !

Cha. Now, sir, your secret.

Lew. Your fortune's lost.

Cha. My fortune lost ! [Aside.] Where learned you this sad news ?

Lew. From Bates, Stukely's prime agent. I have obliged him, and he's grateful. He told it me in friendship, to warn me from my Charlotte.

Cha. 'Twas honest in him, and I'll esteem him for it.

Lew. He knows much more than he has told.

Cha. For me it is enough. And for your generous love, I thank you from my soul. If you'd oblige me more, give me a little time.

Lew. Why time ? It robs us of our happiness.

Cha. I have a task to learn first. The little pride this fortune gave me must be subdued ; and for a life of obligations, I have not learned to bear it.

Lew. Mine is that life. You are too noble.

Cha. Leave me to think on't.

Lew. To-morrow then you'll fix my happiness.

Cha. All that I can I will.

Lew. It must be so ; we live but for each other. Keep what you know a secret ; and when we meet to-morrow, more may be known. Farewell.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room, with a Gaming-house in the back scene.

Enter BEVERLEY and STUKELY.

Bev. Whither would you lead me ? [Angrily.]

Stu. Where we may vent our curses.

Bev. Ay, on yourself, and those damned counsels that have destroyed me. A thousand fiends were in that bosom, and all let loose to tempt me—I had resisted else.

Stu. Go on, sir. I have deserved this from you.

Rev. And curses everlasting. Time is too scanty for them—

Stu. What have I done?

Rev. What the arch-devil of old did—soothed with false hopes for certain ruin.

Stu. Myself unhurt; nay, pleased at your destruction—so your words mean. Why, tell it to the world. I am too poor to find a friend in't.

Rev. A friend! What's he? I had a friend.

Stu. And have one still.

Rev. Ay; I'll tell you of this friend. He found me happiest of the happy. Fortune and honour crowned me; and love and peace lived in my heart. One spark of folly lurked there; that too he found; and by deceitful breath blew it into flames, that have consumed me. This friend were you to me.

Stu. A little more, perhaps. The friend, who gave his all to save you; and not succeeding, chose ruin with you. But no matter, I have undone you, and am a villain.

Rev. No; I think not. The villains are within.

Stu. What villains?

Rev. Dawson and the rest. We have been dupes to sharpers.

Stu. How know you this? I have had doubts as well as you; yet still as fortune changed, I blushed at my own thoughts. But you have proofs, perhaps!

Rev. Ay, damned ones. Repeated losses. Night after night, and no reverse. Chance has no hand in this.

Stu. I think more charitably; yet I am peevish in my nature, and apt to doubt. The world speaks fairly of this Dawson; so it does of the rest. We have watched them closely too. But 'tis a right usurped by losers, to think the winners knaves. We'll have more manhood in us.

Rev. I know not what to think—This night has stung me to the quick—blasted my reputation too. I have bound my honour to these vipers; played meanly upon credit, till I tired them; and now they shun me, to rifle one another. What's to be done?

Stu. Nothing. My counsels have been fatal.

Rev. By Heaven, I'll not survive this shame. Traitor! 'tis you have brought it on me. [Seizing him.] Show me the means to save me, or I'll commit a murder here, and next upon myself.

Stu. Why, do it then, and rid me of ingratitude.

Rev. Pr'ythee forgive this language—I speak I know not what. Rage and despair are in my heart, and hurry me to madness. My home is horror to me—I'll not return to it. Speak quickly; tell me, if, in this wreck of fortune, one hope remains? Name it, and be my oracle. [Kneels.]

Stu. To vent your curses on. You have bestowed them liberally. Take your own counsel; and should a desperate hope present itself, 'twill suit your desperate fortune. I'll not advise you.

Rev. What hope? By Heaven I'll catch at it, however desperate. I am so sunk in misery, it cannot lay me lower.

Stu. You have an uncle.

Rev. [Rises.] Ay, what of him?

Stu. Old men live long by temperance; while their heirs starve on expectation.

Rev. What mean you?

Stu. That the reversion of his estate is yours, and will bring money to pay debts with. Nay, more, it may retrieve what's past.

Rev. Or leave my child a beggar.

Stu. And what's his father? A dishonourable one; engaged for sums he cannot pay. That should be thought of.

Rev. It is my shame. The poison that inflames me. Where shall we go? To whom? I'm impatient till all's lost.

Stu. All may be yours again. Your man is Bates. He has large funds at his command, and will deal justly by you.

Rev. I am resolved. Tell them within we'll meet them presently; and with full purses, too. Come, follow me.

Stu. No; I'll have no hand in this; nor do I counsel it. Use your discretion, and act from that. You'll find me at my lodgings.

Rev. Succeed what will, this night I'll dare the worst.

'Tis loss of fear to be completely curst.

[Exit.]

Stu. [Looks after him.] Why, lose it then for ever. Fear is the mind's worst evil: and 'tis a friendly office to drive it from the bosom. Thus far has fortune crowned me. Yet Beverley is rich; rich in his wife's best treasure, her honour and affections. I would supplant him there too. But 'tis the curse of thinking minds to raise up difficulties. Fools may conquer women. Fearless of dangers which they see not, they press on boldly, and, by persisting, prosper. Yet may a tale of art do much. Charlotte is sometimes absent. The seeds of jealousy are sown already. If I mistake not, they have taken root too. Now is the time to ripen them, and reap the harvest. The softest of her sex, if wronged in love, or thinking that she's wronged, becomes a tigress in revenge.—I'll instantly to Beverley's. No matter for the danger. When beauty leads us on, 'tis indiscretion to reflect, and cowardice to doubt. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—Beverley's Lodgings.

Enter Mrs. BEVERLEY and LUCY.

Mrs. B. Did Charlotte tell you any thing?

Lucy. No, madam.

Mrs. B. She looked confused, methought; said she had business with her Lewson; which when I pressed to know, tears only were her answer.

Lucy. She seemed in haste too. Yet her return may bring you comfort.

Mrs. B. No, my kind girl; I was not born for it. But why do I distress thee? Thy sympathizing heart bleeds for the ills of others. What pity that thy mistress can't reward thee! But there's a Power above, that sees, and will remember all. [Knocking.] Hark! there's some one entering.

Lucy. Perhaps 'tis my master, madam. [Exit.]

Mrs. B. Let him be well too, and I am satisfied. [Goes to the door, and listens.] No, 'tis another's voice.

Enter LUCY and STUKELY.

Lucy. Mr. Stukely, madam.

[Exit.]

Stu. To meet you thus alone, madam, was what I wished. Unseasonable visits, when friendship warrants them, need no excuse—therefore I make none.

Mrs. B. What mean you, sir? And where is your friend?

Stu. Men may have secrets, madam, which their best friends are not admitted to. We parted in the morning, not soon to meet again.

Mrs. B. You mean to leave us then—to leave your country too? I am no stranger to your reasons, and pity your misfortunes.

Stu. Your pity has undone you. Could Beverley do this? That letter was a false one; a mean contrivance to rob you of your jewels. I wrote it not.

Mrs. B. Impossible! Whence came it then?

Stu. Wronged as I am, madam, I must speak plainly.

Mrs. B. Do so, and ease me. Your hints have troubled me. Reports, you say, are stirring. Reports of whom? You wished me not to credit them. What, sir, are these reports?

Stu. I thought them slander, madam; and cautioned in friendship, lest from officious tongues the tale had reached you with double aggravation.

Mrs. B. Proceed, sir.

Stu. It is a debt due to my fame; due to an injured wife too. We are both injured.

Mrs. B. How injured? And who has injured us?

Stu. My friend—your husband.

Mrs. B. You would resent for both then; but know, sir, my injuries are my own, and do not need a champion.

Stu. Be not too hasty, madam. I come not in resentment, but for acquittance. You thought me poor; and to the feigned distresses of a friend gave up your jewels.

Mrs. B. I gave them to a husband.

Stu. Who gave them to a—

Mrs. B. What? Whom did he give them to?

Stu. A mistress.

Mrs. B. No; on my life he did not.

Stu. Himself confessed it, with curses on her avarice.

Mrs. B. I'll not believe it. He has no mistress; or, if he has, why is it told to me?

Stu. To guard you against insults. He told me, that, to move you to compliance, he forged that letter, pretending I was ruined, ruined by him too. The fraud succeeded; and what a trusting wife bestowed in pity was lavished on a wanton.

Mrs. B. Then I am lost indeed! And my affections are too powerful for me. His follies I have borne without upbraiding, and saw the approach of poverty without a tear. My affections, my stroug affections, supported me through every trial.

Stu. Be patient, madam.

Mrs. B. Patient! The barbarous, ungrateful man! And does he think that the tenderness of my heart is his best security for wounding it? But he shall find that injuries such as these can arm my weakness for vengeance and redress.

Stu. Ha! then I may succeed. [Aside.—Redress is in your power.

Mrs. B. What redress?

Stu. Forgive me, madam, if, in my zeal to serve you, I hazard your displeasure. Think of your wretched state. Already want surrounds you—Is it in patience to bear that? To see your helpless little one robbed of his birthright? A sister too, with unavailing tears, lamenting her lost fortune? No comfort left you, but ineffectual pity from the few, outweighed by insults from the many.

Mrs. B. Am I so lost a creature? Well, sir, my redress?

Stu. To be resolved is to secure it. The marriage vow, once violated, is, in the sight of Heaven, dissolved—Start not, but hear me. 'Tis now the summer of your youth: time has not cropped the roses from your cheek, though sorrow long has washed them: then use your beauty wisely, and, freed by injuries, fly from the cruellest of men, for shelter with the kindest.

Mrs. B. And who is he?

Stu. A friend to the unfortunate; a bold one too, who, while the storm is bursting on your brow, and lightning flashing from your eyes, dares tell you that he loves you. [Kneels.

Mrs. B. 'Would that these eyes had Heaven's own lightning, that, with a look, thus I might blast thee! Am I then fallen so low? Has poverty so humbled me, that I should listen to a hellish offer, and sell my soul for bread? Oh, villain! villain! [He rises.] But now I know thee, and thank thee for the knowledge.

Stu. If you are wise, you shall have cause to thank me.

Mrs. B. An injured husband too shall thank thee.

Stu. Yet know, proud woman, I have a heart as stubborn as your own! as haughty and imperious; and, as it loves, so can it hate.

Mrs. B. Mean, despicable villain! I scorn thee and thy threats. Was it for this that Beverley was false?—that his too-credulous wife should, in despair and vengeance, give up her honour to a wretch? But he shall know it, and vengeance shall be his.

Stu. Why, send him for defiance then—Tell him I love his wife; but that a worthless husband forbids our union. I'll make a widow of you, and court you honourably.

Mrs. B. Oh, coward, coward! thy soul will shrink at him: yet in the thought of what may happen, I feel a woman's fears. [Rings.] Keep thy own secret, and begone. Your absence, sir, would please me.

Stu. I'll not offend you, madam. [Exit.

Mrs. B. Why opens not the earth, to swallow such a monster? Be conscience, then, his punisher, till Heaven, in mercy, gives him penitence, or dooms him in its justice. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Stukely's Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and BATES, meeting.

Bates. Where have you been?

Stu. Fooling my time away—playing my tricks, like a tame monkey, to entertain a woman. No matter where—I have been vexed and disappointed.—Tell me of Beverley; how bore he his last shock?

Bates. Like one (so Dawson says) whose senses had been numbed with misery. When all was lost, he fixed his eyes upon the ground, and stood some time, with folden arms, stupid and motionless; then snatching his sword, that hung against the wainscot, he sat him down, and, with a look of fixed attention, drew figures on the floor. At last, he started up, looked wild, and trembled; and, like a woman, seized with her sex's fits, laughed out aloud, while the tears trickled down his face—so left the room.

Stu. Why, this was madness.

Bates. The madness of despair.

Stu. We must confine him then—A prison would do well. [Knocking.] Hark, that knocking may be his—Go that way down. [Exit BATES.] Who's there?

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. An enemy—an open and avowed one.

Stu. Why am I thus broke in upon? This house is mine, sir, and should protect me from insult and ill-manners.

Lew. Guilt has no place of sanctuary: wherever found, 'tis virtue's lawful game. The fox's hold, and tiger's den, are no security against the hunter.

Stu. Your business, sir?

Lew. To tell you that I know you. Why this confusion? That look of guilt and terror? Is Beverley awake, or has his wife told tales? The man that dares like you, should have a soul to justify his deeds, and courage to confront accusers: not, with a coward's fear, to shrink beneath reproof.

Stu. Who waits there? [Aloud, and in confusion.]

Lew. By Heaven, he dies, that interrupts us!—[Drawing his sword.]—You should have weighed your strength, sir; and then, instead of climbing to high fortune, the world had marked you for what you are—a little, paltry villain!

Stu. You think I fear you.

Lew. I know you fear me—This is to prove it.—[Strikes him.] You wanted privacy—A lady's presence took up your attention. Now we are alone, sir. Why, what a wretch! [Flings him from him.] The vilest insect in creation will turn when trampled on; yet has this thing undone a man!—by cunning and mean arts undone him! But we have found you, sir; traced you through all your labyrinths. If you would save yourself, fall to confession, no mercy will be shown else.

Stu. First prove me what you think me; till then your threatenings are in vain—And for this insult, vengeance may yet be mine.

Lew. Infamous coward! why, take it now then—[Threatening—STUKELY retires.] Alas, I pity thee! Yet, that a wretch like this should overcome a Beverley! It fills me with astonishment! A wretch, so mean of soul, that even desperation cannot animate him to look upon an enemy. You should not have thus soared, sir, unless, like others of your black profession, you had a sword, to keep the fools in awe your villany has ruined.

Stu. Villany! 'Twere best to curb this license of your tongue—for know, sir, while there are laws, this outrage on my reputation will not be borne with.

Lew. Laws! Darest thou seek shelter from the laws—those laws, which thou and thy infernal crew live in the constant violation of! Talk'st thou of reputation too, when, under friendship's sacred name, thou hast betrayed, robbed, and destroyed?

Stu. Ay, rail at gaming—'tis a rich topic, and affords noble declamation. Go, preach against it in the city—you'll find a congregation in every tavern. If they should laugh at you, fly to my lord, and sermonize it there: he'll thank you, and reform.

Lew. And will example sanctify a vice? No, wretch; the custom of my lord, or of the cit that apes him, cannot excuse a breach of law, or make the gamester's calling reputable.

Stu. Rail on, I say. But is this zeal for beggared Beverley? Is it for him that I am treated thus? No; he and his wife might both have groined in prison, had but the sister's fortune escaped the wreck, to have rewarded the disinterested love of honest Mr. Lewson.

Lew. How I detest thee for the thought. But thou art lost to every human feeling. Yet, let me tell thee, and may it wring thy heart, that, though my friend is ruined by thy snares, thou hast, unknowingly, been kind to me.

Stu. Have I? It was, indeed, unknowingly.

Lew. Thou hast assisted me in love—given me the merit that I wanted: since, but for thee, my Charlotte had not known 'twas her dear self I sighed for, and not her fortune.

Stu. Thank me, and take her then.

Lew. And as a brother to poor Beverley, I will pursue the robber that has stripped him, and snatch him from his gripe.

Stu. Then know, imprudent man, he is within my gripe; and should my friendship for him be slandered once again, the hand that has supplied him shall fall and crush him.

Lew. Why, now there's spirit in thee! This is, indeed, to be a villain! But I shall reach thee yet—Fly where thou wilt, my vengeance shall pursue thee—And Beverley shall yet be saved—be saved from thee, thou monster! nor owe his rescue to his wife's dishonour. [Exit.]

Stu. [Pausing.] Then ruin has enclosed me!—Curse on my coward heart! I would be bravely villainous; but 'tis my nature to shrink at danger, and he has found me. Yet fear brings caution, and that, security. More mischief must be done, to hide the past. Look to yourself, officious Lewson—there may be danger stirring. How now, Bates?

Enter BATES.

Bates. What is the matter? 'Twas Lewson, and not Beverley, that left you—I heard him loud—You seem alarmed too.

Stu. Ay, and with reason. We are discovered.

Bates. I feared as much, and, therefore, cautioned you; but you were peremptory.

Stu. Thus fools talk ever; spending their idle breath on what is past, and trembling at the future. We must be active; Beverley, at worst, is but suspicious; but Lewson's genius, and his hate to me, will lay all open. Means must be found to stop him.

Bates. What means?

Stu. Dispatch him—Nay, start not—Desperate occasions call for desperate deeds—We live but by his death.

Bates. You cannot mean it?

Stu. I do, by Heaven!

Bates. Good night, then.

[Going.]

Stu. Stay—I must be heard, then answered.—Perhaps the motion was too sudden; and human weakness starts at murder, though strong necessity compels it. I have thought long of this; and my first feelings were like yours; a foolish conscience awed me, which soon I conquered. The man that would undo me, nature cries out, undo. Brutes know their foes by instinct; and, where superior force is given, they use it for destruction. Shall man do less? Lewson pursues us to our ruin! and shall we, with the means to crush him, fly from our hunter, or turn, and tear him? 'Tis folly even to hesitate.

Bates. He has obliged me, and I dare not.

Stu. Why, live to shame, then—to beggary and punishment. You would be privy to the deed, yet want the soul to act it. Nay, more, had my designs been levelled at his fortune, you had stepped in the foremost—And what is life without its comforts?—Those you would rob him of, and, by a lingering death, add cruelty to murder. Henceforth, adieu to half-made villains—There's danger in them. What you have got is yours—keep it, and hide with it—I'll deal my future bounty to those that merit it.

Bates. What's the reward?

Stu. Equal division of our gains. I swear it, and will be just.

Bates. Think of the means then.

Stu. He's gone to Beverley's—Wait for him in the street—'Tis a dark night, and fit for mischief—A dagger would be useful.

Bates. No more.

Stu. Consider the reward. When the deed's done, I have other business with you. Send Dawson to me.

Bates. Think it already done—and so, farewell.

[Exit.]

Stu. Why, farewell, Lewson, then; and farewell to my fears. This night secures me—I'll wait the event within.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Street.—Stage darkened.

Enter BEVERLEY.

Bev. How like an outcast do I wander! Loaded with every curse that drives the soul to desperation! The midnight robber, as he walks his rounds, sees, by the glimmering lamp, my frantic looks, and dreads to meet me. Whither am I going? My home lies there: all that is dear on earth it holds too; yet are the gates of death more welcome to me—I'll enter it no more—Who passes there? 'Tis Lewson—He meets me in a gloomy hour; and, memory tells me, he has been meddling with my fame.

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. Beverley! well met. I have been busy in your affairs.

Bev. So I have heard, sir: and now I must thank you as I ought.

Lew. To-morrow I may deserve your thanks. Late as it is, I go to Bates. Discoveries are making that an arch villain trembles at.

Bev. Discoveries are made, sir, that you should tremble at. Where is this boasted spirit, this high demeanour, that was to call me to account? You say I have wronged my sister—Now say as much. But, first be ready for defence as I am for resentment.

[Draws.]

Lew. What mean you? I understand you not.

Bev. The coward's stale acquaintance! who, when he spreads foul calumny abroad, and dreads just vengeance on him, cries out, "What mean you? I understand you not."

Lew. Coward and calumny! Whence are those words? But I forgive and pity you.

Bev. Your pity had been kinder to my fame: but you have traduced it—told a vile story to the public ear, that I have wronged my sister,

Lew. 'Tis false! Show me the man that dares accuse me.

Bev. I thought you brave, and of a soul superior to low malice; but I have found you, and will have vengeance. This is no place for argument.

Lew. Nor shall it be for violence. Imprudent man! who, in revenge for fancied injuries, would pierce the heart that loves him! But honest friendship acts from itself, unmoved by slander. You know me not.

Bev. Yes, for the slanderer of my fame—buzzing in every ear foul breach of trust, and family dishonour.

Lew. Have I done this? Who told you so?

Bev. The world—'Tis talked of everywhere. It pleased you to add threats too—You were to call me to account—Why, do it now, then: I should be proud of such an arbiter.

Lew. Put up your sword, and know me better. I never injured you. The base suggestion comes from Stukely: I see him and his aims.

Bev. What aims? I'll not conceal it—'twas Stukely that accused you.

Lew. To rid him of an enemy—Perhaps of two—He fears discovery, and frames a tale of falsehood, to ground revenge and murder on.

Bev. I must have proof of this.

Lew. Wait till to-morrow then.

Bev. I will.

Lew. Good night—I go to serve you—Forget what's past, as I do; and cheer your family with smiles—To-morrow may confirm them, and make all happy.

[Exit.]

Bev. How vile and how absurd is man! His boasted honour is but another name for pride, which easier bears the consciousness of guilt, than the world's just reproofs! But 'tis the fashion of the times; and in defence of falsehood and false honour, men die martyrs. I knew not that my nature was so bad.

Enter BATES and JARVIS.

Jar. This way the noise was; and yonder's my poor master.

Bates. I heard him at high words with Lewson.

Jar. I heard him too. Misfortunes vex him.

Bates. Go to him, and lead him home. I'll not be seen by him.

[Exit.]

Bev. [Starting.] What fellow's that! [Seeing JARVIS.] Art thou a murderer, friend? Come, lead the way—I have a hand as mischievous as thine; a heart as desperate too—Jarvis! to bed, old man—the cold will chill thee.

Jar. Why are you wandering at this late hour? Your sword drawn too? For Heaven's sake sheathe it, sir—the sight distracts me.

Bev. Whose voice was that?

[Wildly.]

Jar. 'Twas mine, sir: Let me entreat you to give the sword to me.

Bev. Ay, take it—quickly take it. Perhaps I am not so cursed, but Heaven may have sent thee at this moment to snatch me from perdition.

Jar. Then I am blessed.

Bev. Continue so, and leave me—my sorrows are contagious. No one is blessed that's near me.

Jar. I came to seek you, sir.

Bev. And now thou hast found me, leave me—My thoughts are wild, and will not be disturbed.

Jar. Such thoughts are best disturbed.

Bev. I tell thee that they will not. Who sent thee hither?

Jar. My weeping mistress. Alas, sir, forget your griefs, and let me lead you to her. The streets are dangerous.

Ber. Be wise, and leave me then. The night's black horrors are suited to my thoughts. These stones shall be my resting-place. [Lies down.] Here shall my soul brood o'er its miseries; till, with the fiends of hell, and guilty of the earth, I start and tremble at the morning's light.

Jar. For pity's sake, sir! [Endeavours to raise him.] Upon my knees I beg you to quit this place, and these sad thoughts. Let patience, not despair, possess you. Rise, I beseech you. There's not a moment of your absence that my poor mistress does not groan for.

Ber. Have I undone her, and is she still so kind? [Starting up.] It is too much. My brain can't hold it. Oh, Jarvis, how desperate is that wretch's state, which only death or madness can relieve.

Jar. [Rising.] Appease his mind, good Heaven, and give him resignation. Alas, sir! could beings in the other world perceive the events of this, how would your parents' blessed spirits grieve for you, even in heaven.—Let me conjure you, by their honoured memories—by the sweet innocence of your yet helpless child, and by the ceaseless sorrows of my poor mistress, to rouse your manhood, and struggle with these griefs!

Ber. Thou virtuous, good old man. Thy tears and thy entreaties have reached my heart, through all its miseries.

Jar. Be but resign'd, sir, and happiness may yet be yours.—Hark! I hear voices—Come this way: we may reach home unnoticed.

Ber. Well, lead me then—unnoticed didst thou say? Alas! I dread no looks, but of those wretches I have made at home. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and DAWSON.

Stu. Come hither, Dawson; my limbs are on the rack, and my soul shivers in me, till this night's business be complete.—Tell me thy thoughts! is Bates determined, or does he waver?

Daw. At first he seemed irresolute:—wished the employment had been mine: and muttered curses on his coward hand, that trembled at the deed.

Stu. And did he leave you so?

Daw. No; we walked together, and, sheltered by the darkness, saw Beverley and Lewson in warm debate; but soon they cooled, and then I left them, to hasten hither; but not till 'twas resolved Lewson should die.

Stu. Thy words have given me life. That quarrel too was fortunate; for, if my hopes deceive me not, it promises a grave to Beverley.

Daw. You misconceive me—Lewson and he were friends.

Stu. But my prolific brain shall make them enemies. If Lewson falls, he falls by Beverley. Ask me no questions, but do as I direct. This writ [takes out a pocket-book] for some days past I have treasured here, till a convenient time called for its use.—That time is come; take it, and give it to an officer.—It must be served this instant.

[Gives a paper.]

Daw. On Beverley!

Stu. Look at it.—It is for the sums that I have lent him.

Daw. Must he to prison then?

Stu. I ask obedience, not replies. This night a gaol must be his lodging. 'Tis probable he's not gone home yet.—Wait at his door, and see it executed.

Daw. Upon a beggar! He has no means of payment.

Stu. Dull and insensible. If Lewson dies, who was it killed him? Why, he that was seen quarrelling with him: and I, that knew of Beverley's intents, arrested him in friendship.—A little late, perhaps; but 'twas a virtuous act, and men will thank me for it. Now, sir, you understand me.

Daw. Most perfectly; and will about it.

Stu. Haste, then; and when 'tis done, come back, and tell me.

Daw. Till then, farewell. [Exit.]

Stu. Now tell thy tale, fond wife; and, Lewson, if again thou canst insult me,

Not avarice now, but vengeance fires my breast,
And one short hour must make me curst or bless'd. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Stukely's Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY, BATES, and DAWSON.

Bates. Poor Lewson! But I told you enough last night. The thought of him is horrible to me.

Stu. In the street, did you say? and no one near him?

Bates. By his own door; he was leading me to his house. I pretended business with him, and stabbed him to the heart, while he was reaching at the bell.

Stu. And did he fall so suddenly?

Bates. The repetition pleases you, I see.—I told you he fell without a groan.

Stu. What heard you of him this morning?

Bates. That the watch found him in their rounds, and alarmed the servants. I mingled with the crowd just now, and saw him dead in his own house.—The sight terrified me.

Stu. Away with terrors, till his ghost rise and accuse us. We have no living enemy to fear, unless 'tis Beverley; and him we have lodged safe in prison.

Bates. Must he be murdered too?

Stu. No; I have a scheme to make the law his murderer. At what hour did Lewson fall?

Bates. The clock struck twelve as I turned to leave him.—'Twas a melancholy bell, I thought, ringing for his death.

Stu. The time was lucky for us—Beverley was arrested at one, you say? [To DAWSON.]

Daw. Exactly.

Stu. Good. We'll talk of this presently. The women were with him, I think.

Daw. And old Jarvis. I would have told you of them last night, but your thoughts were too busy.—'Tis well you have a heart of stone; the tale would melt it else.

Stu. Out with it, then.

Daw. I traced him to his lodgings; and, pretending pity for his misfortunes, kept the door open while the officers seized him. 'Twas a damned deed! but no matter—I followed my instructions.

Stu. And what said he?

Daw. He upbraided me with treachery, called you a villain, acknowledged the sums you had lent him, and submitted to his fortune.

Stu. And the women—

Daw. For a few minutes, astonishment kept them silent. They looked wildly at one another, while the tears streamed down their cheeks. But rage and fury soon gave them words; and then, in the very bitterness of despair, they cursed me, and the monster that had employed me.

Stu. And you bore it with philosophy?

Daw. Till the scene changed, and then I melted. I ordered the officers to take away their prisoner. The women shrieked, and would have followed him; but we forbade them. 'Twas then they fell upon their knees, the wife fainted, the sister raving, and both, with all the eloquence of misery, endeavouring to soften us. I never felt compassion till that moment; and, had the officers been moved like me, we had left the business undone, and fled with curses on ourselves. But their hearts were steeled by custom. The sighs of beauty, and the pangs of affection, were beneath their pity. They tore him from their arms, and lodged him in prison, with only Jarvis to comfort him.

Stu. There let him lie, till we have farther business with him. You saw him quarrelling with Lewson in the street, last night? [To BATES.]

Bates. I did: his steward, Jarvis, saw him too.

Stu. And shall attest it: here's matter to work upon—An unwilling evidence carries weight with him. Something of my design I have hinted t'you before.—Beverley must be the author of this murder, and we the parties to convict him. But how to proceed will require time and thought. Come along with me—the room within is fitted for privacy. But no compassion, sir! [To DAWSON.] We want leisure for't. This way. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Beverley's Lodgings.—Mrs. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE discovered sitting.

Mrs. B. No news of Lewson yet?

Cha. None. He went out early, and knows not what has happened. [Clock strikes.]

Mrs. B. The clock strikes eight. [Rising.] I'll wait no longer.

Cha. [Rising.] Stay but till Jarvis comes. He has sent twice to stop us till we see him.

Mrs. B. Oh, what a night was last night! I would not pass another such to purchase worlds by it. My poor Beverley, too! What must he have felt? I wanted love for him, or they had not forced him from me. They should have parted soul and body first.—I was too tame.

Cha. You must not talk so.—All that we could we did; and Jarvis did the rest. The faithful creature will give him comfort. See where he comes. His looks are cheerful too.

Enter JARVIS.

Mrs. B. Are these then cheerful! Alas, he weeps! Speak to him, Charlotte, I have no tongue to ask him questions.

Cha. How does your master, Jarvis?

Jar. I am old and foolish, madam; and tears will come before my words. But don't you weep [To Mrs. B.]; I have a tale of joy for you.

Mrs. B. Say but he's well, and I have joy enough.

Jar. All shall be well. I have news for him that will make his poor heart bound again. Fy upon old age! How childish it makes me! I have a tale of joy for you, and my tears drown it.

Mrs. B. What is it, Jarvis?

Jar. Yet why should I rejoice when a good man dies? Your uncle, madam, died yesterday.

Mrs. B. My uncle!—Oh, heavens!

Cha. How heard you of his death?

Jar. His steward came express, madam. I met him in the street, inquiring for your lodgings. I should not rejoice, perhaps; but he was old, and my poor master a prisoner. Now he shall live again. Oh, 'tis a brave fortune! and, 'twas death to me to see him a prisoner.

Cha. How did he pass the night, Jarvis?

Jar. Like a man dreaming of death and horrors. When they led him to his cell, he flung himself upon a wretched bed, and lay speechless till day-break. I spoke to him, but he would not hear me; and when I persisted, he raised his hand at me, and knit his brow so—I thought he would have struck me. I bid him be of comfort—Begone, old wretch, says he—My wife! my child! my sister! I have undone them all, and will know no comfort! Then, falling upon his knees, he imprecated curses upon himself.

Mrs. B. This is too horrible! But we have stayed too long. Let us haste to comfort him, or die with him. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Prison.—BEVERLEY is discovered sitting in the back-ground.

Bev. Why, there's an end then; I have judged deliberately, and the result is death! How the self-murderer's account may stand, I know not. [Rises.] But this I know—the load of hateful life oppresses me too much. The horrors of my soul are more than I can bear. [Offers to kneel.] Father of mercy!—I cannot pray—Despair has laid his iron hand upon me, and sealed me for perdition. Conscience! conscience! thy clamours are too loud! Here's that shall silence thee. [Takes a phial out of his pocket, and looks at it.] Thou art most friendly to the miserable. Come, then, thou cordial for sick minds—Come to my heart. [Drinks.] Oh, that the grave would bury memory as well as body! For, if the soul sees and feels the sufferings of those dear ones it leaves behind, the Everlasting has no vengeance to torment it deeper—I'll think no more on't—Reflection comes too late—Once there was a time for't—but now 'tis past.—Who's there?

Enter JARVIS.

Jar. One, that hoped to see you with better looks. Why do you turn so from me? I have brought comfort with me. And see who comes to give it welcome!

Bev. My wife and sister! Why, 'tis but one pang more, then, and farewell, world! [Aside.]

Enter Mrs. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Mrs. B. Where is he? [Runs and embraces him.] Oh, I have him! I have him! And now they shall never part us more. I have news, love, to make you happy for ever.—Alas, he hears us not!—Speak to me, love. I have no heart to see you thus.

Bev. This is a sad place.

Mrs. B. We come to take you from it—to tell you the world goes well again—that Providence has seen our sorrows, and sent the means to help them.—Your uncle died yesterday.

Bev. My uncle! No, do not say so! Oh, I am sick at heart!

Mrs. B. Indeed! I meant to bring you comfort.

Bev. Tell me he lives, then. If you would bring me comfort, tell me he lives!

Mrs. B. And if I did—I have no power to raise the dead—He died yesterday.

Bev. And I am heir to him?

Jar. To his whole estate, sir. But bear it patiently—pray, bear it patiently.

Bev. Well, well. [Pausing.] Why, fame says I am rich then?

Mrs. B. And truly so. Why do you look so wildly?

Bev. Do I? The news was unexpected. But has he left me all?

Jar. All, all, sir. He could not leave it from you.

Bev. I am sorry for it.

Mrs. B. Why are you disturbed so?

Bev. Has death no terrors in it?

Mrs. B. Not an old man's death. Yet, if it troubles you, I wish him living.

Bev. And I, with all my heart. For I have a tale to tell shall turn you into stone! or, if the power of speech remain, you shall kneel down and curse me.

Mrs. B. Alas! what tale is this? And why are we to curse you? I'll bless you for ever.

Bev. No; I have deserved no blessings. The world holds not such another wretch. All this large fortune, this second bounty of Heaven, that might have healed our sorrows, and satisfied our utmost hopes, in a cursed hour I sold last night.

Mrs. B. Impossible!

Bev. That devil, Stukely, with all hell to aid him, tempted me to the deed. To pay false debts of honour, and to redeem past errors, I sold the reversion—sold it for a scanty sum, and lost it among villains.

Cha. Why, farewell all then!

Bev. Liberty and life—Come, kneel and curse me.

Mrs. B. Then hear me, Heaven! [Kneels.] Look down with mercy on his sorrows! Give softness to his looks, and quiet to his heart! On me, on me, if misery must be the lot of either, multiply misfortunes! I'll bear them patiently, so he is happy! These hands shall toil for his support! And every duty of a fond and faithful wife be doubly done, to cheer and comfort him! So hear me! so reward me! [Rises.]

Bev. I would kneel too, but that offended Heaven would turn my prayers into curses. For I have done a deed to make life horrible to you—

Mrs. B. What deed?

Jar. Ask him no questions, madam. This last misfortune has hurt his brain. A little time will give him patience.

Enter STUKELY.

Bev. Why is this villain here?

Stu. To give you liberty and safety.—There, madam, is his discharge. [Giving a paper to Mrs. BEVERLEY.] The arrest last night was meant in friendship, but came too late.

Cha. What mean you, sir?

Stu. The arrest was too late, I say; I would have kept his hands from blood, but was too late.

Mrs. B. His hands from blood! Whose blood?

Stu. From Lewson's blood.

Cha. No, villain! Yet what of Lewson? Speak quickly.

Stu. You are ignorant then! I thought I heard the murderer at confession.

Cha. What murderer? And who is murdered? Not Lewson? Say he lives, and I'll kneel and worship you.

Stu. In pity, so I would; but that the tongues of all cry murder. I came in pity, not in malice, to save the brother, not kill the sister. Your Lewson's dead.

Cha. Oh, horrible.

Bev. Silence, I charge you. Proceed, sir.

Stu. No. Justice may stop the tale—and here's an evidence.

Enter BATES.

Bates. The news, I see, has reached you. But take comfort, madam. [To CHARLOTTE.] There's one without inquiring for you. Go to him, and lose no time.

Cha. O misery! misery!

[Exit.]

Mrs. B. Follow her, Jarvis. If it be true, that Lewson's dead, her grief may kill her.

Bates. Jarvis must stay here, madam. I have some questions for him.

Stu. Rather let him fly. His evidence may crush his master.

Bev. Why, ay; this looks like management.

Bates. He found you quarrelling with Lewson in the streets last night. [To BEVERLEY.]

Mrs. B. No; I am sure he did not.

Jar. Or if I did—

Mrs. B. 'Tis false, old man. They had no quarrel; there was no cause for quarrel.

Bev. Let him proceed, I say. Oh! I am sick! sick! Reach a chair. [He sits.]

Mrs. B. You droop and tremble, love. Yet you are innocent! If Lewson's dead, you killed him not.

Enter DAWSON.

Stu. Who sent for Dawson?

Bates. 'Twas I. We have a witness, too, you little think of—without there!

Stu. What witness?

Bates. A right one. Look at him.

Enter LEWSON and CHARLOTTE.

Stu. Lewson! O villains! villains!

[To BATES and DAWSON.]

Mrs. B. Risen from the dead? Why, this is unexpected happiness!

Cha. Or is it his ghost? [To STUKELY.] That sight would please you, sir.

Jar. What riddle's this?

Bev. Be quick and tell it. My minutes are but few.

Mrs. B. Alas! why so? You shall live long, and happily.

Lew. While shame and punishment shall rack that viper! [Pointing to STUKELY.] The tale is short. I was too busy in his secrets, and therefore doomed to die. Bates, to prevent the murder, undertook it. I kept aloof, to give it credit—

Cha. And gave me pangs unutterable.

Lew. I felt them all, and would have told you—But vengeance wanted ripening. The villain's scheme was but half executed. The arrest by Dawson followed the supposed murder. And now, depending on his once wicked associates, he comes to fix the guilt on Beverley.

Mrs. B. Oh! execrable wretch!

Bates. Dawson and I are witnesses of this.

Lew. And of a thousand frauds. His fortune ruined by sharpers and false dice; and Stukely sole contriver and possessor of all.

Daw. Had he but stopt on this side murder, we had been villains still.

Lew. How does my friend? [To BEVERLEY.]

Bev. [Still sitting.] Why, well. Who's he that asks me?

Mrs. B. 'Tis Lewson, love. Why do you look so at him?

Bev. They told me he was murdered. [Wildly,

Mrs. B. Ay; but he lives to save us.

Bev. Lend me your hand. The room turns round.

Mrs. B. O Heaven!

Lew. This villain here disturbs him. Remove him from his sight—And, for your lives, see that you guard him. [STUKELY is taken off by DAWSON and BATES.] How is it, sir?

Bev. 'Tis here—and here. [Pointing to his head and heart.] And now it tears me.

Mrs. B. You feel convulsed too—What is't disturbs you?

Bev. O! I have been too hasty! A furnace rages in this heart—Down, restless flames! [Laying his hand on his heart.] Down to your native hell—There you shall rack me. Oh! for a pause from pain! Where's my wife? Can you forgive me, love?

Mrs. B. Alas! for what?

Bev. For meanly dying.

Mrs. B. No—do not say it.

Bev. As truly as my soul must answer it.—Had Jarvis stayed this morning, all had been well.

But pressed by shame—pent in a prison—tormented with my pangs for you—driven to despair and madness—I took the advantage of his absence, corrupted the poor wretch he left to guard me, and—swallowed poison.

Lew. O, fatal deed!

Bev. Ay, most accursed. And now I go to my account. Bend me, and let me kneel. [Kneels.] I'll pray for you too. Thou Power that madest me, hear me! If for a life of frailty, and this too hasty deed of death, thy justice dooms me, here I acquit the sentence; but if, enthroned in mercy where thou sittest, thy pity has beheld me, send me a gleam of hope, that in these last and bitter moments my soul may taste of comfort! and for these mourners here, Oh! let their lives be peaceful, and their deaths happy! Now I die.

Mrs. B. Restore him, Heaven! Oh, save him! save him! or let me die too.

Bev. No; live, I charge you. We have a little one. Though I have left him, you will not leave him. To Lewson's kindness I bequeath him. Is not this Charlotte? We have lived in love, though I have wronged you. Can you forgive me, Charlotte?

Cha. Forgive you! Oh, my poor brother!

Bev. Lend me your hand, love—so—raise me—No—I will not be! my life is finish'd. Oh! for a few short moments, to tell you how my heart bleeds for you. That even now, thus dying, as I am, dubious and fearful of hereafter, my bosom pang is for your miseries! Support her, Heaven! And now I go. Oh, mercy! mercy! [Dies.]

Lew. How is it, madam?

Cha. Her grief is speechless.

Lew. Remove her from this sight. Some ministering angel bring her peace!

[CHARLOTTE and JARVIS lead Mrs. B. away, but she rushes back, and throws herself on the corpse.]

THE MAN OF THE WORLD.

A COMEDY.

BY CHARLES MACKLIN.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

MELVILLE.

COUNSELLOR PLAUSIBLE.

SERGEANT EITHERSIDE.

SAM.

JOHN.

TOMLINS.

LADY RODOLPHA LUMBERCOURT.

LADY MACSYCOPHANT.

CONSTANTIA.

BETTY HINT.

NANNY.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter BETTY and SAM.

Betty. The postman is at the gate, Sam; pray step and take in the letters.

Sam. John the gardener is gone for them, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. Bid John bring them to me, Sam: tell him I am here in the library.

Sam. I'll send him to your ladyship in a crack. [Exit.]

Enter NANNY.

Nanny. Miss Constantia desires to speak to you, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. How is she now?—any better, Nanny?

Nanny. Something;—but very low spirited still. I verily believe it is as you say.

Betty. O! I would take my book oath of it. I cannot be deceived in that point, Nanny.—Ay, ay, her business is done—she is certainly breeding, depend upon it.

Nanny. Why, so the housekeeper thinks too.

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXI.

Betty. Nay, I know the father, the man that ruined her.

Nanny. The deuce you do!

Betty. As sure as you are alive, Nanny; or I am greatly deceived—and yet—I can't be deceived neither.—Was not that the cook that came galloping so hard over the common just now?

Nanny. The same: how very hard he galloped; he has been but three quarters of an hour, he says, coming from Hyde-park-corner.

Betty. And what time will the family be down?

Nanny. He has orders to have dinner ready by five; there are to be lawyers, and a great deal of company here—he fancies there is to be a private wedding to-night, between our young Master Charles and Lord Lumbercourt's daughter, the Scotch lady, who, he says, is just come post from Bath, in order to be married to him.

Betty. Ay, ay, Lady Rodolpha—nay, like enough, for I know it has been talked of a good while: well, go tell Miss Constantia that I will be with her immediately.

Nanny. I shall, Mrs. Betty. [Exit.]

Betty. So!—I find they all believe the impertinent creature is breeding—that's pure! it will soon reach my lady's ears, I warrant.

Enter JOHN.

Well, John, ever a letter for me?

John. No, Mrs. Betty; but here is one for Miss Constantia.

Betty. Give it me—Hum! my lady's hand.

John. And here is one, which the postman says is for my young master—but it's a strange direction—[Reading] "To Charles Egerton, Esq."

Betty. O! yes, yes; this is for Master Charles, John; for he has dropped his father's name of Macsycophant, and has taken up that of Egerton—the parliament has ordered it.

John. The parliament!—pr'ythee, why so, Mrs. Betty?

Betty. Why, you must know, John, that my lady, his mother, was an Egerton, by her father; she stole a match with our old master, for which all her family, on both sides, have hated Sir Pertinax, and the whole crew of the Macsycophants, ever since; and so, John, my lady's uncle, Sir Stanley Egerton, dying an old bachelor, and, as I said before, mortally hating our old master, and all the crew of the Macsycophants, left his whole estate to Master Charles, who was his godson; but on condition that he should drop his father's name of Macsycophant, and take up that of Egerton, and that is the reason, John, why the parliament has made him change his name.

John. I am glad that Master Charles has got the estate, however, for he is a sweet-tempered gentleman.

Betty. As ever lived.—But come, John; as I know you love Miss Constantia, and are fond of being where she is, I will make you happy; you shall carry this letter to her.

John. Shall I, Mrs. Betty? I am much obliged to you.—Where is she?

Betty. In the housekeeper's room, settling the dessert. Give me Mr. Egerton's letter, and I'll leave it on the table in his dressing-room: I see it is from his brother Sandy.—So—now go and deliver your letter to your sweetheart, John.

John. That I will; and I am much beholden to you for the favour of letting me carry it to her: for though she should never have me, yet I shall always love her, and wish to be near her, she is so sweet a creature. Your servant, Mrs. Betty.

[Exit.

Betty. Your servant, John.—Ha, ha, ha! poor fellow! he perfectly doats on her; and daily follows her about with nosegays and fruit, and the first of everything in the season. Ay, and my young master, Charles, too, is in as bad a way as the gardener:—in short, everybody loves her, and that's one reason why I hate her. For my part, I wonder what the deuce the men see in her—a creature that was taken in for charity; I'm sure she's not so handsome. I wish she was out of the family once; if she was, I might then stand a chance of being my lady's favourite myself—ay, and perhaps of getting one of my young masters for a sweetheart, or at least the chaplain: but as to him, there would be no such great catch if I should get him. I will try for him, however; and my first step shall be to tell the doctor all I have discovered about Constantia's intrigues with her spark at Hadley. Yes, that will do; for the doctor loves to talk with me—loves to hear me talk, too; and I verily believe—he, he, he! that he has a sneaking kindness for me, and this story will make him have a good opinion of my honesty, and that, I am sure, will be one step towards—O! bless me, here he comes, and my young master with him. I'll watch an opportunity to speak to him as soon as he is alone, for I will blow her up. I am as resolved, as great a favourite and as cunning as she is. [Exit.

Enter EGERTON, SIDNEY following, as if in earnest conversation.

Sid. Nay, dear Charles, but why are you so impetuous? Why do you break from me so abruptly?

Eger. I have done, sir; you have refused. I have nothing more to say upon the subject. I am satisfied.

Sid. Come, come, correct this warmth—it is the only weak ingredient in your nature, and you ought to watch it carefully. Because I will not abet an unwarrantable passion by an abuse of my sacred character, in marrying you beneath your rank, and in direct opposition to your father's hopes and happiness—you blame me, you angrily break from me, and call me unkind.

Eger. Dear Sidney, for my warmth I stand condemned; but for my marriage with Constantia, I think I can justify it upon every principle of filial duty, honour, and worldly prudence.

Sid. Only make that appear, Charles, and you know you may command me.

Eger. I am sensible how unseemly it appears in a son to descant on the unamiable passions of a parent; but, as we are alone, and friends, I cannot help observing, in my own defence, that when a father will not allow the use of reason to any of his family—when his pursuit of greatness makes him a slave abroad, only to be a tyrant at home—when a narrow partiality to Scotland, on every trivial occasion, provokes him to enmity even with his wife and children, only because they give a national preference where they think it most justly due; and when, merely to gratify his own ambition, he would marry his son into a family he detests; sure, Sidney, a son thus circumstanced (from the dignity of human reason, and the feelings of a loving heart) has a right—not only to protest against the blindness of a parent, but to pursue those measures that virtue and happiness point out.

Sid. The violent temper of Sir Pertinax, I own, cannot be defended on many occasions, but still—your intended alliance with Lord Lumbercourt—

Eger. [With impatience.] O! contemptible!—a trifling, quaint, haughty, voluptuous, servile tool! the mere lackey of party and corruption; who, for the prostitution of near thirty years, and the ruin of a noble fortune, has had the despicable satisfaction, and the infamous honour, of being kicked up and kicked down, kicked in and kicked out, just as the insolence, compassion, or convenience of leaders predominated: and now, being forsaken by all parties, his whole political consequence amounts to the power of franking a letter, and the right honourable privilege of not paying a tradesman's bill.

Sid. Well, but, dear Charles, you are not to wed my lord, but his daughter.

Eger. Who is as disagreeable to me for a companion, as her father for a friend or an ally.

Sid. What, her Scotch accent, I suppose, offends you?

Eger. No, upon my honour; not in the least; I think it entertaining in her: but, were it otherwise, in decency, and indeed in national affection, being a Scotchman myself, I can have no objection to her on that account: besides, she is my near relation.

Sid. So I understand. But pray, Charles, how came Lady Rodolpha, who I find was born in England, to be bred in Scotland?

Eger. From the dotage of an old, formal, obstinate, stiff, rich, Scotch grandmother, who, upon a promise of leaving this grandchild all her fortune, would have the girl sent to her to Scotland, when she was but a year old, and there has she been ever since, bred up with this old lady, in all the vanity and unlimited indulgence that fondness and admiration could bestow on a spoiled child, a fancied beauty, and a pretended wit: and is this a woman fit to make my happiness? this the partner that Sidney would recommend to me for life?—to you, who best know me, I appeal.

Sid. Why, Charles, it is a delicate point, unfit for me to determine; besides, your father has set his heart upon the match.

Eger. All that I know; but still I ask and insist upon your candid judgment: is she the kind of woman that you think could possibly contribute to my happiness? I beg you will give me an explicit answer.

Sid. The subject is disagreeable; but, since I must speak, I do not think she is.

Eger. I know you do not; and I am sure you never will advise the match.

Sid. I never will—I never will.

Eger. You make me happy; which, I assure you, I never could be with your judgment against me in this point.

Sid. But pray, Charles, suppose I had been so indiscreet as to have agreed to marry you to Constantia, would she have consented, think you?

Eger. That I cannot say positively; but I suppose so.

Sid. Did you never speak to her upon that subject then?

Eger. In general terms only: never directly requested her consent in form. But I will this very moment; for I have no asylum from my father's arbitrary design, but my Constantia's arms. Pray do not stir from hence; I will return instantly. I know she will submit to your advice; and I am sure you will persuade her to my wish, as my life, my peace, my earthly happiness, depend on my Constantia. [Exit.

Sid. Poor Charles! he little dreams that I love Constantia too; but to what degree I knew not myself, till he importuned me to join their hands. Yes—I love—but must not be a rival, for he is dear to me as fraternal affinity.

Enter BETTY.

Betty. I beg pardon for my intrusion, sir. I hope, sir, I don't disturb your reverence?

Sid. Not in the least, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. I humbly beg you will excuse me, sir; but I wanted to break my mind to your honour—about a scruple that lies upon my conscience; and indeed I should not have presumed to trouble you, sir, but that I know you are my young master's friend, and my old master's friend, and, indeed, a friend to the whole family; for, to give you your due, sir, you are as good a preacher as ever went into a pulpit.

Sid. Ha, ha, ha! do you think so, Mrs. Betty?

Betty. Ay, in truth do I; and as good a gentleman, too, as ever came into a family, and one that never gives a servant a bad word, nor that does any one an ill turn, neither behind their back nor before their face.

Sid. Ha, ha, ha! why, you are a mighty well-spoken woman, Mrs. Betty, and I am mightily beholden to you for your good character of me.

Betty. Indeed, sir, it is no more than you deserve, and what all the world and all the servants say of you.

Sid. I am much obliged to them, Mrs. Betty; but, pray, what are your commands with me?

Betty. Why, I'll tell you, sir—to be sure, I am but a servant, as a body may say—and every tub should stand upon its own bottom; but—[She lays her hand familiarly on his shoulder, speaking in a deep whisper]—my young master is now in the china-room, in close conference with Miss Constantia. I know what they are about, but that is no business of mine; and, therefore, I made bold to listen a little—because, you know, sir, one would be sure, before one took away anybody's reputation.

Sid. Very true, Mrs. Betty—very true, indeed.

Betty. Oh! heavens forbid that I should take away any young woman's good name, unless I had a good reason for it; but, sir, [In a tone of vulgar positiveness] if I am in this place alive, as I listened, with my ear close to the door, I heard my young master ask Miss Constantia the plain marriage question; upon which I started and trembled, nay, my very conscience stirred within me so, that I could not help peeping through the key-hole.

Sid. Ha, ha, ha! and so your conscience made you peep through the key-hole, Mrs. Betty?

Betty. It did, indeed, sir; and there I saw my young master upon his knees—Lord bless us—and what do you think he was doing?—kissing her hand as if he would eat it, and protesting, and assuring her, he knew that you, sir, would consent to the match, and then the tears ran down her cheeks as fast—

Sid. Ay!

Betty. They did indeed. I would not tell your reverence a lie for the world.

Sid. I believe it, Mrs. Betty; and what did Constantia say to all this?

Betty. Oh!—Oh! she is sly enough; she looks as if butter would not melt in her mouth; but all is not gold that glisters—smooth water, you know, sir, runs deepest: I am sorry my young master makes such a fool of himself; but, um—take my word for it, he is not the man; for, though she looks as modest as a maid at a christening—yet—ah!—when sweethearts meet, in the dusk of the evening, and stay together a whole hour, in the dark grove, and embrace, and kiss, and weep at parting—why, then, you know, sir, it is easy to guess all the rest.

Sid. Why, did Constantia meet anybody in this manner.

Betty. [With affected modesty.] O! heavens! I beg, sir, you will not misapprehend me; for, I assure you, I do not believe they did any harm—that is, not in the grove; at least, not when I was there; and she may be honestly married, for aught I know. O! lud, sir, I would not say an ill thing of Miss Constantia for the world. I only say they did meet in the dark walk; and all the servants observe that Miss Constantia wears her stays very loose, looks very pale, is sick in the morning and after dinner; and, as sure as my name is Betty Hint, something has happened that I won't name; but, nine months hence, a certain person in this family may ask me to stand godmother: for I think I know what's what, when I see it, as well as another.

Sid. No doubt you do, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. I do, indeed, sir: [Going] and so, your servant, sir. [Returning.] But I hope your worship won't mention my name in this business; or that you had an item from me.

Sid. I shall not, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. For, indeed, sir, I am no busybody, nor do I love fending nor proving; and I assure you, sir, I hate all titling and tattling, and gossiping and backbiting, and taking away a person's good name.

Sid. I observe you do, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. I do, indeed, sir. I am the farthest from it in the world.

Sid. I dare say you are.

Betty. I am, indeed, sir; and so your humble servant.

Sid. Your servant, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. [Aside, in an exulting air.] So! I see he believes every word I say—that's charming. I'll do her business for her, I'm resolved. [Exit.]

Sid. What can this ridiculous creature mean by her dark walk, her private spark, her kissing, and all her slanderous insinuations against Constantia, whose conduct is as unblamable as innocence itself? I see envy is as malignant in a paltry waiting wench, as in the vainest or most ambitious lady of the court. It is always an infallible mark of the basest nature; and merit in the lowest, as well as in the highest station, must feel the shaft of envy's constant agents—falsehood and slander. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter CONSTANTIA and EGERTON.

Con. Mr. Sidney is not here, sir.

Eger. I assure you I left him, and begged he would stay till I returned.

Con. His prudence, you see, sir, has made him retire; therefore we had better defer the subject till he is present; in the mean time, sir, I hope you will permit me to mention an affair that has greatly alarmed and perplexed me: I suppose you guess what it is?

Eger. I do not, upon my word.

Con. That is a little strange. You know, sir, that you and Mr. Sidney did me the honour of breakfasting with me this morning in my little study.

Eger. We had that happiness, madam.

Con. Just after you left me, upon opening my book of accounts, which lay in the draw of the reading-desk, to my great surprise, I there found this case of jewels, containing a most elegant pair of ear-rings, a necklace of great value, and two bank-bills in this pocket-book, the mystery of which, sir, I presume, you can explain?

Eger. I can.

Con. They were of your conveying, then?

Eger. They were, madam.

Con. I assure you they startled and alarmed me.

Eger. I hope it was a kind of alarm, such as blushing virtue feels, when, with her hand, she gives her heart and last consent.

Con. It was not, indeed, sir.

Eger. Do not say so, Constantia: come, be kind at once; my peace and worldly bliss depend upon this moment.

Con. What would you have me do?

Eger. What love and virtue dictate.

Con. O! sir, experience but too severely proves, that such unequal matches as ours, never produce aught but contempt and anger in parents, censure from the world, and a long train of sorrow and repentance in the wretched parties; which is but too often entailed upon their hapless issue.

Eger. But that, Constantia, cannot be our case: my fortune is independent and ample; equal to luxury and splendid folly. I have a right to choose the partner of my heart.

Con. But I have not, sir; I am a dependant on my lady—a poor, forsaken, helpless orphan; your benevolent mother found me, took me to her bosom, and there supplied my parental loss, with every tender care, indulgent dalliance—and with all the sweet persuasion that maternal fondness, religious precept, polished manners, and hourly example could administer—she fostered me: [Weeps] and shall I now turn viper, and with black ingratitude sting the tender heart that thus hath cherished me? Shall I seduce her house's heir, and kill her peace? No; though I loved to the mad extreme of female fondness; though every worldly bliss that woman's vanity or man's ambition could desire, followed the indulgence of my love, and all the contempt and misery of this life, the denial of that indulgence, I would discharge my duty to my benefactress—my earthly guardian, my more than parent.

Eger. My dear Constantia, your prudence, your gratitude, and the cruel virtue of your self-denial, do but increase my love, my admiration, and my misery.

Con. Sir, I must beg you will give me leave to return these bills and jewels.

Eger. Pray do not mention them: sure my kindness and esteem may be indulged so far without suspicion or reproach—I beg you will accept of them; nay, I insist.

Con. I have done, sir; my station here is to obey. I know, sir, they are gifts of a virtuous mind; and mine shall convert them to the tenderest and most grateful use.

Eger. Hark! I hear a coach: it is my father. Dear girl, retire and compose yourself. I will send my lady and Sidney to you; and by their judgment we will be directed: will that satisfy you?

Con. I can have no will but my lady's. With your leave, I will retire; I would not see her in this confusion.

Eger. Dear girl, adieu! [Exit CONSTANTIA.

Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir Pertinax and my lady are come, sir; and my lady desires to speak with you in her own room: Oh! here she is, sir. [Exit.]

Enter Lady MACSYCOPHANT.

Lady M. [Greatly agitated.] Dear child, I am glad to see you: why did not you come to town yesterday, to attend the levee? your father is incensed to the utmost at your not being there.

Eger. Madam, it is with extreme regret I tell you, that I can be no longer a slave to his temper, his politics, and his scheme of marrying me to this woman; therefore you had better consent at once to my going out of the kingdom, and my taking Constantia with me—for without her I never can be happy.

Lady M. As you regard my peace, or your own character, I beg you will not be guilty of so rash a step. You promised me you never would marry her without my consent. I will open it to your father. Pray, dear Charles, be ruled: let me prevail.

Sir P. [Without, in great anger.] Sir, wull ye do as ye are bid, and haud your gab, you rascal! You are so full of gab, you scoundrel. Take the chesnut gelding, return to toon directly, and see what is become of my Lord Lumbercourt.

Lady M. Here he comes. I will get out of his way. But, I beg, Charles, while he is in this ill humour, that you will not oppose him, let him say what he will—when his passion is a little cool, I will return, and try to bring him to reason—but do not thwart him.

Eger. Madam, I will not.

[Exit Lady MACSYCOPHANT.]

Sir P. [Without.] Here, you Tomlins, where is my son Egerton?

Tom. [Without.] In the library, sir.

Sir P. [Without.] As soon as the lawyers come, be sure bring me word.

Enter Sir PERTINAX, with great haughtiness, and in anger.—EGERTON bows two or three times most submissively low.

Sir P. Weel, sir! vary weel! vary weel: are nat ye a fine spark? are ye nat a fine spark, I say? ah! you are a—so you wou'd not come up till the levee?

Eger. Sir, I beg your pardon; but I was not very well; besides, I did not think my presence there was necessary.

Sir P. [Snapping him up.] Sir, it was necessary; I tauld you it was necessary; and, sir, I must now tell you that the whole tenor of your conduct is most offensive.

Eger. Sir, I am sorry you think so, sir; I am sure I do not mean to offend you.

Sir P. I care not what you intend. Sir, I tell you, you do offend. What is the meaning of this conduct, sir?—neglect the levee!—death, sir, you—what is your reason, I say, for thus neglecting the levee, and disobeying my commands?

Eger. [With a stifled filial resentment.] Sir, I am not used to levees; nor do I know how to dispose of myself; nor what to say or do in such a situation.

Sir P. [With a proud angry resentment.] Zounds, sir, do you not see what others do? gentle and simple, temporal and spiritual, lords, members, judges, generals, and bishops; aw crowding, bustling, and pushing foremost intil the middle of the circle, and there waiting, watching, and striving to catch a look or a smile fra the great mon, which they meet wi' an amicable reesibility of aspect—a modest cadence of body, and a conciliating co-operation of the whole mon; which expresses an officious promptitude for his service, and indicates that they luock upon themselves as the suppliant appendages of his power, and the enlisted Swiss of his poleetical fortune; this, sir, is what you ought to do, and this, sir, is what I never once omitted for this five-and-thirty years, let who would be minister.

Eger. [Aside.] Contemptible!

Sir P. What is that you mutter, sir?

Eger. Only a slight reflection, sir, not relative to you.

Sir P. Sir, your absenting yourself fra the levee at this juncture is suspicious—it is looked upon as a kind of disaffection, and aw your countrymen are highly offended at your conduct. For this, sir, they do not look upon you as a friend or weel-wisher either to Scotland or Scotchmen.

Eger. [With a quick warmth.] Then, sir, they wrong me, I assure you; but, pray, sir, in what particular can I be charged, either with coldness or offence to my country.

Sir P. Why, sir, ever since your mother's uncle, Sir Stanley Egerton, left you his three thousand pounds a-year, and that you have, in compliance with his will, taken up the name of Egerton, they think you are grown proud—that you have estranged yourself fra the Macsycophants—have associated with your mother's family—with the opposeetion—and with those who do not wish well to Scotland; besides, sir, the other day, in a conversation, at dinner, at your cousin Campbell M'Kenzie's, before a whole table full of your ain relations, did you not publicly wish a total extinguishment to aw party, and of aw national distinctions whatever, relative to the three kingdoms?—[With great anger.]—And, you blockhead—was that a prudent wish before so many of your ain countrymen? or was it a filial language to hold before me?

Eger. Sir, with your pardon, I cannot think it unfilial or imprudent.—[With a most patriotic warmth.]—I own I do wish—most ardently wish for a total extinction of all party; particularly—that those of English, Irish, and Scotch, might never more be brought into contest or competition, unless, like loving brothers, in generous emulation for one common cause.

Sir P. How, sir! do you persist? what! wou'd you banish aw party, and aw distinction between English, Irish, and your ain countrymen?

Eger. [With great dignity of spirit.] I would, sir.

Sir P. Then damn you, sir, you are nae true Scot. Ay, sir, you may look as angry as you will, but again I say, you are nae true Scot.

Eger. Your pardon, sir, I think he is the true Scot and the true citizen, who wishes equal justice to the merit and demerit of every subject of Great Britain; amongst whom I know but of two distinctions.

Sir P. Weel, sir, and what are those—what are those?

Eger. The knave and the honest man.

Sir P. Pshaw! rideeculous.

Eger. And he who makes any other—let him be of the north, or of the south—of the east, or of the west—in place, or out of place, is an onemy to the whole, and to the virtues of humanity.

Sir P. Ay, sir, this is your brother's impudent doctrine, for the which I have banished him for ever fra my presence, my heart, and my fortune. Sir, I will have no son of mine, because truly he has been educated in an English seminary, presume, under the mask of candour, to speak against his native land, or against my principles. Scotchmen, sir, Scotchmen, wherever they meet throughout aw the globe, should unite, and stick together, as it were in a political phalanx. However, nae mair of that now; I will talk at large to you about that anon. In the meanwhile, sir, notwithstanding your contempt of my advice, and your disobedience till my commands, I will convince you of my paternal attention till your welfare, by my management of this voluptuary—this Lord Lumbercourt, whose daughter you are to marry. You ken, sir, that the fellow has been my patron above these five-and-thirty years.

Eger. True, sir.

Sir P. Vary weel. And now, sir, you see, by his prodigality, he is become my dependant; and, accordingly, I have made my bargain with him; the devil a baubee he has in the world but what comes through these clutches; for his whole estate, which has three implectic boroughs upon it—mark—is now in my custody at lurse; the which estate, on my paying off his debts, and allowing him a life rent of five thousand pounds per annum, is to be made over till me for my life, and at my death is to descend till ye and your issue. The peerage of Lumbercourt, you ken, will follow of course. So, sir, you see, there are three impleecit boroughs, the whole patrimony of Lumbercourt, and a peerage at one slap. Why, it is a stroke—a hit—a hit. Zounds! sir, a mon may live a century, and not make sic an hit again.

Eger. It is a very advantageous bargain, indeed, sir; but what will my lord's family say to it?

Sir P. Why, mon, he cares not if his family were aw at the devil, so his luxury is but gratified; only let him have his race-horse to feed his vanity; his harridan to drink drams with him, scrat his face, and burn his perriwig, when she is in her maudlin hysterics; and three or four discontented patriotic dependants to abuse the ministry, and settle the affairs of the nation, when they are aw intoxicated; and then, sir, the fellow has aw his wishes, and aw his wants, in this world and the next.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Lady Rodolpha is come, sir.

Sir P. And my lord?

Tom. Not yet, sir; he is about a mile behind, the servants say.

Sir P. Let me know the instant he arrives.

Tom. I shall, sir. [Exit.

Sir P. Step you out, Charles, and receive Lady Rodolpha; and, I desire you will treat her with as much respect and gallantry as possible; for my lord has hinted that you have been very remiss as a lover. Adzooks, Charles, you should administer a whole torrent of flattery till her; for a woman ne'er thinks a mon loves her, till he has made an idiot of her understanding by flattery: flattery is the prime bliss of the sex, the nectar and ambrosia of their charms, and you can ne'er gi' 'em o'er muckle on't; so, there's a guid lad, gang and mind your flattery. [Exit EGERTON.] Hah! I must keep a devilish tight hand upon this party. Ah! I am frightened out of my wits, lest his mother's family should seduce him to desert to their party, which would totally ruin my whole scheme, and break my heart. A fine time of day for a blockhead to turn patriot—when the character is exploded, marked, proscribed! Why the common people, the very vulgar, have found out the jest, and laugh at a patriot now-a-days, just as they do at a conjurer, a magician, or any other impostor in society.

Enter TOMLINS and Lord LUMBERCOURT.

Tom. Lord Lumbercourt.

[Exit.

Lord L. Sir Pert'nax, I kiss your hand.

Sir P. Your lordship's most devoted.

Lord L. Why, you stole a march upon me this morning; gave me the slip, Mac; though I never wanted your assistance more in my life. I thought you would have called upon me.

Sir P. My dear lord, I beg ten millions of pardons for leaving town before you; but ye ken that your lordship, at dinner yesterday, settled it that we should meet this morning at the levee.

Lord L. That I acknowledge, Mac; I did promise to be there, I own.

Sir P. You did, indeed; and accordingly I was at the levee, and waited there till every soul was gone, and, seeing you did not come, I concluded that your lordship was gone before.

Lord L. Why, to confess the truth, my dear Mac, those old sinners, Lord Freakish, General Jolly, Sir Anthony Soaker, and two or three more of that set, laid hold of me last night at the Opera; and, as the General says, "from the intelligence of my head this morning," I believe we drank pretty deep ere we parted; ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! nay, if you were with that party, my lord, I do not wonder at not seeing your lordship at the levee.

Lord L. The truth is, Sir Pertinax, my fellow let me sleep too long for the levee. But I wish I had seen you before you left town; I wanted you dreadfully.

Sir P. I am heartily sorry that I was not in the way; but on what account did you want me?

Lord L. Ha, ha, ha! a cursed awkward affair—and—Ha, ha, ha!—yet I can't help laughing at it, neither, though it vexed me confoundedly.

Sir P. Vexed you, my lord! Zounds, I wish I had been with you! But, for Heaven's sake, my lord, what was it that could possibly vex your lordship?

Lord L. Why, that impudent, teasing, dunning rascal, Mahogany, my upholsterer:—you know the fellow?

Sir P. Perfectly, my lord.

Lord L. The impudent scoundrel has sued me up to some damned kind of a—something or other in the law, that I think they call an execution.

Sir P. The rascal!

Lord L. Upon which, sir, the fellow, by way of asking pardon—ha, ha, ha!—had the modesty to wait on me two or three days ago, to inform my honour—ha, ha, ha!—as he was pleased to dignify me, that the execution was now ready to be put in force against my honour; but that, out of respect to my honour, as he had taken a great deal of my honour's money, he would not suffer his lawyer to serve it, till he had first informed my honour, because he was not willing to affront my honour—ha, ha, ha!—a son of a w—!

Sir P. I never heard of so impudent a dog.

Lord L. Now, my dear Mac—ha, ha, ha!—as the scoundrel's apology was so very satisfactory, and his information so very agreeable, I told him that, in honour, I thought that my honour could not do less than to order his honour to be paid immediately.

Sir P. Vary weel, vary weel; you were as complaisant to the scoundrel till the full, I think, my lord.

Lord L. You shall hear, you shall hear, Mac:—so, sir, with great composure, seeing a smart oaken cudgel that stood very handily in a corner of my dressing-room, I ordered two of my fellows to hold the rascal, and another to take the cudgel, and return the scoundrel's civility with a good drubbing, as long as the stick lasted.

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! admirable! as good a stroke of humour as ever I heard of. And, did they drub him, my lord?

Lord L. Most liberally, most liberally, sir; and there I thought the affair would have rested, till I should think proper to pay the scoundrel; but this morning, just as I was stepping into my chaise, my servants about me, a fellow, called a tipstaff, stepped up, and begged the favour of my footman, who threshed the upholsterer, and of the two that held him, to go along with him upon a little business to my Lord Chief Justice.

Sir P. The devil!

Lord L. And at the same instant, I, in my turn, was accosted by two other very civil scoundrels, who, with a most insolent politeness, begged my pardon, and informed me that I must not go into my own chaise!

Sir P. How, my lord, not into your ain carriage?

Lord L. No, sir; for that they, by order of the sheriff, must seize it, at the suit of a gentleman—one Mr. Mahogany, an upholsterer.

Sir P. An impudent villain!

Lord L. It is all true, I assure you; so you see, my dear Mac, what a damned country this is to live in, where noblemen are obliged to pay their debts just like merchants, cobblers, peasants, or mechanics—is not that a scandal, dear Mac, to this nation?

Sir P. My lord, it is not only a scandal, but a national grievance.

Lord L. Sir, there's not a nation in the world has such a grievance to complain of.

Sir P. Vary true, my lord, vary true; and it is monstrous that a mon of your lordship's condition is not entitled to run one of these mechanics through the body, when he is impertinent about his money; but our laws shamefully, on these occasions, make no distinction of persons amongst us.

Lord L. A vile policy, indeed, Sir Pertinax. But, sir, the scoundrel has seized upon the house, too; that I furnished for the girl I took from the Opera.

Sir P. I never heard of sic an a scoundrel.

Lord L. Ay, but what concerns me moat, I am afraid, my dear Mac, that the villain will send down to Newmarket, and seize my string of horses.

Sir P. Your string of horses? zounds! we must prevent that at all events, that would be sic a disgrace. I will despatch an express to town directly, to put a stop till the rascal's proceedings.

Lord L. Pr'ythee do, my dear Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. O! it shall be done, my lord.

Lord L. Thou art an honest fellow, Sir Pertinax, upon honour.

Sir P. O! my lord, it is my duty to oblige your lordship to the utmost stretch of my abeility.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Colonel Toper presents his compliments to you, sir, and having no family down with him in the country, he and Captain Hardbottle, if not inconvenient, will do themselves the honour of taking a family diinner with you.

Sir P. They are two of our militia officers—does your lordship know them?

Lord L. By sight only.

Sir P. I am afraid, my lord, they will interrupt our business.

Lord L. Not at all: I should be glad to be acquainted with Toper; they say he's a damned jolly fellow.

Sir P. O! devilish jolly, devilish jolly; he and the captain are the two hardest drinkers in the country.

Lord L. So I have heard; let us have them by all means, Mac; they will enliven the scene. How far are they from you?

Sir P. Just across the meadows; not half a mile, my lord; a step, a step.

Lord L. O! let's have the jolly dogs, by all means.

Sir P. My compliments—I shall be proud of their company. [Exit TOMLINS.] Guif ye please, my lord, we will gang and chat a bit with the women: I have not seen Lady Rodolpha since she returned fra the Bath. I long to have a little news from her about the company there.

Lord L. O! she'll give you an account of them, I warrant you.

Lady R. [Without.] Ha, ha, ha! weel, I vow, cousin Egerton, you have a vast deal of shrewd humour. But, Lady Macsycophant, which way is Sir Pertinax?

Lady M. [Without.] Straight forward, madam.

Lord L. Here the hairbrain comes: it must be her by the noise.

Lady R. [Without.] Allons, gude folks; fallow me—sans ceremonie.

Enter LADY RODOLPHA, LADY MACSYCOPHANT, EGERTON, and SIDNEY.

Lady R. [To Sir P.] Sir Pertinax, your most devoted, most obsequious, most obedient vassal.

[Curtseys very low.]

Sir P. [Bowing formally.] Lady Rodolpha, down till the ground, my congratulations and duty attend you; and I should rejoice to kiss your ladyship's footsteps.

Lady R. Oh! Sir Pertinax, your humeility is most sublimely complaisant; at present unanswerable; but I shall intensely study to return it, fifty fold.

Sir P. Your ladyship does me singular honour. Weel, madam; ha! you look gaily. Weel, and how, how is your ladyship after your jaunt till Bath?

Lady R. Never better, Sir Pertinax; as weel as youth, health, riotous spirits, and a careless happy heart can make me.

Sir P. I am mightily glad till hear it, my lady.

Lord L. Ay, ay; Rodolpha is always in spirits, Sir Pertinax. Vive la bagatelle is the philosophy of our family—ha, Rodolpha—ha!

Lady R. Traith it is, my lord; and upon honour, I am determined it shall never be changed with my consent. Weel, I vow—ha, ha, ha! Vive la bagatelle would be a most brilliant motto for the chariot of a belle of fashion. What say you till my fancy, Lady Macsycophant?

Lady M. It would have novelty, at least, to recommend it, madam.

Lady R. Which of aw charms is the most delightful that can accompany wit, taste, love, or friendship; for novelty I take to be the true je ne sçai quoi of all worldly bliss. Cousin Egerton, should not you like to have a wife with Vive la bagatelle upon her wedding chariot?

Eger. O! certainly, madam.

Lady R. Yes, I think it would be quite out of the common, and singularly ailegant.

Eger. Indisputably, madam; for as a motto is a word to the wise, or rather a broad hint to the whole world of a person's taste and principles, Vive la bagatelle would be most expressive, at first sight, of your ladyship's characteristic.

Lady R. [Curtseys.] Oh! Maister Egerton, you touch my very heart with your approbation—ha, ha, ha!—that is the vary spirit of my intention, the instant I commence bride. Weel! I am immensely proud that my fancy has the approbation of so sound an understanding, and so polished a taste, as that of the all-accomplished—[Curtseys very low]—Mr. Egerton.

Sir P. Weel, but, Lady Rodolpha, I wanted to ask your ladyship some questions about the company at the Bath; they say you had aw the world there.

Lady R. O, yes! there was a vary great mob there, indeed, but vary little company. Aw canaille, except our ain party. The place was crowded with your little purse-proud mechanics: an odd kind of queer-looking animals, that have started intill fortune fra lottery-tickets, rich prizes at sea, gambling in 'Change Alley, and sic like caprices of fortune; and away they aw crowd to the Bath, to learn genteelity, and the names, titles, intrigues, and bon-mots of us people of fashion—ha, ha, ha!

Lord L. Ha, ha, ha! I know them; I know the things you mean, my dear, extremely well. I have observed them a thousand times, and wondered where the devil they all came from—ha, ha, ha!

Lady M. Pray, Lady Rodolpha, what were your diversions at Bath?

Lady R. Guid traith, my lady, the company were my diversion; and better nae human follies ever afford—ha, ha, ha!—sic an a mixture, and sic oddities! ha, ha, ha! a perfect gallimaufry. Lady Kunegunda M'Kenzie and I used to gang about till every part of this human chaos, on purpose to reconnoitre the monsters, and pick up their frivolities—ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! why that must have been a high entertainment till your ladyship.

Lady R. Superlative and inexhaustible, Sir Pertinax—ha, ha, ha!—Madam, we had in one group, a peer and a sharper, a duchess and a pinmaker's wife, a boarding-school miss and her grandmother, a fat parson, a lean general, and a yellow admiral—ha, ha, ha! aw speaking together, and bawling and wrangling in fierce contention, as if the fame and fortune of aw the parties were to be the issue of the conflict.

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! pray, madam, what was the object of their contention?

Lady R. O! a vary important one, I assure you; of no less consequence, madam, than how an odd trick at whist was lost, or might have been saved.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady R. In another party, Sir Pertinax, ha, ha, ha! we had what was called the cabinet council, which was composed of a duke and a haberdasher, a red hot patriot and a sneering courtier, a discarded statesman and his scribbling chaplain, with a busy, bawling, muckle-headed, prerogative lawyer; all of whom were every minute ready to gang together by the lugs, about the in and the out meenistry; ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! weel, that is a droll motley cabinet, I vow.—Vary whimsical, upon honour. But they are all great politicians at Bath, and settle a meenistry there with as much ease as they do the tune of a country dance.

Lady R. Then, Sir Pertinax, in a retired part of the room—in a by corner—snug—we had a Jew and a bishop.

Sir P. A Jew and a bishop! ha, ha—a devilish guid connexion that;—and pray, my lady, what were they about?

Lady R. Why, sir, the bishop was striving to convert the Jew; while the Jew, by intervals, was stily picking up intelligence fra the bishop, about the change in the meenistry, in hopes of making a stroke in the stock.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! admirable! admirable! I honour the amouse! ha! it was devilish clever of him, my lord, devilish clever. The Jew distilling the bishop's brains.

Lord L. Yes, yes; the fellow kept a sharp lookout. I think it was a fair trial of skill on both sides, Mr. Egerton.

Eger. True, my lord; but the Jew seems to have been in the fairer way to succeed.

Lord L. O! all to nothing, sir; ha, ha, ha! Well, child, I like your Jew and your bishop much. It's devilish clever. Let us have the rest of the history, pray, my dear.

Lady R. Guid traith, my lord, the sum total is—that there we aw danced, and wrangled, and flattered, and slandered, and gambled, and cheated, and mingled, and jumbled together, even like the animal assembly in Noah's ark.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord L. Ha, ha, ha! Well, you are a droll girl, Rodolpha: and, upon my honour, ha, ha, ha! you have given us as whimsical a sketch as ever was hit off. What say you, Mr. Sidney?

Sid. Upon my word, my lord, the lady has made me see the whole assembly in distinct colours.

Lady R. O! Maister Sidney, your approbation makes me as vain as a reigning toast before her looking-glass.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Colonel Topper and Captain Hardbottle are come, sir.

Sir P. O! vary weel. Dinner directly.

Tom. It is ready, sir.

Sir P. My lord, we attend your lordship. [Exit.]

Lord L. Lady Mac, your ladyship's hand, if you please. [Exit with Lady M.]

Sir P. And here, Lady Rodolpha, is an Arcadian swain that has a hand at your ladyship's devotion.

Lady R. [Giving her hand to EGERTON.] And I, sir, have one at his. There, sir; as to hearts, ye ken, cousin, they are not brought into the account of human dealings now-a-days.

Eger. O! madam, they are mere temporary baubles, especially in courtship; and no more to be depended upon than the weather, or a lottery ticket.

Lady R. Ha, ha, ha!—two excellent similes, I vow, Mr. Egerton.—Excellent, for they illustrate the vagaries and inconstancy of my dissipated heart, as exactly as if you had meant to describe it. [Exit with EGERTON.]

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! what a vast fund of spirits and guid humour she has, Maister Sidney.

Sid. A great fund, indeed, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Come, let us till dinner.—Hah! by this time to-morrow, Maister Sidney, I hope we shall have everything ready for you to put the last hand till the happiness of your friend and pupil; and then, sir, my cares will be over for this life; for as to my other son, I expect nae guid of him, nor should I grieve, were I to see him in his coffin:—but this match—O! it will make me the happiest of aw human beings. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Library.Enter Sir PERTINAX and EGERTON.

Sir P. Zounds! sir, I will not hear a word about it: I insist upon it you are wrong: you should have paid your court till my lord, and not have scrupled swallowing a bumper or twa, or twenty, till oblige him.

Eger. Sir, I did drink his toast in a bumper.

Sir P. Yes, you did; but how, how?—just as a bairn takes physic—with aversions and wry faces, which my lord observed: then, to mend the matter, the moment that he and the Colonel got intill a drunken dispute about religion, you sliely slunged away.

Eger. I thought, sir, it was time to go, when my lord insisted upon half pint bumpers.

Sir P. Sir, that was not levelled at you, but at the Colonel, in order to try his bottom; but they aw agreed that you and I should drink oot of sma' glasses.

Eger. But, sir, I beg pardon: I did not choose to drink any more.

Sir P. But, zoons! sir, I tell you there was a necessity for your drinking mair.

Eger. A necessity! in what respect, pray, sir?

Sir P. Why, sir, I have a certain point to carry, independent of the lawyers, with my lord, in this agreement of your marriage—about which I am afraid we shall have a warm squabble—and therefore I wanted your assistance in it.

Eger. But how, sir, could my drinking contribute to assist you in your squabble?

Sir P. Yes, sir, it would have contributed—and gently have contributed to assist me.

Eger. How so, sir?

Sir P. Nay, sir, it might have prevented the squabble entirely; for, as my lord is proud of you for a son-in-law, and is fond of your little French songs, your stories, and your bon-mots, when you are in the humour; and guin you had but stayed, and been a little jolly, and drank half a score bumpers with him, till he had got a little tipsy, I am sure, when we had him in that mood, we might have settled the point as I could wish it, among ourselves, before the lawyers came: but now, sir, I do not ken what will be the consequence.

Eger. But when a man is intoxicated, would that have been a seasonable time to settle business, sir?

Sir P. The most seasonable, sir: for, sir, when my lord is in his cups, his suspicion is asleep, and his heart is aw jollity, fun, and guid fellowship; and, sir, can there be a happier moment than that for a bargain, or to settle a dispute with a friend?—What is it you shrug up your shoulders at, sir?

Eger. At my own ignorance, sir; for I understand neither the philosophy nor the morality of your doctrine.

Sir P. I know you do not, sir; and, what is worse, you never wull understand it, as you proceed:—in one word, Charles, I have often told you, and now again I tell you, once for aw, that the manœuvres of pliability are as necessary to rise in the world, as wrangling and logical subtlety are to rise at the bar: why, you see, sir, I have acquired a noble fortune—a princely fortune—and how do you think I raised it?

Eger. Doubtless, sir, by your abilities.

Sir P. Doubtless, sir, you are a blockhead: nae, sir, I'll tell you how I raised it:—sir, I raised it—by booing—[Bows very low—]—by booing: sir, I never could stand straight in the presence of a great mon, but always booded, and booded, and booded—as it were by instinct.

Eger. How do you mean by instinct, sir?

Sir P. How do I mean by instinct?—Why, sir, I mean by—by—by the instinct of interest, sir, which is the universal instinct of mankind. Sir, it is wonderful to think what a cordial, what an amicable—nay, what an infallible influence booing has upon the pride and vanity of human nature. Charles, answer me sincerely, have you a mind to be convinced of the force of my doctrine, by example and demonstration?

Eger. Certainly, sir.

Sir P. Then, sir, as the greatest favour I can confer upon you, I'll give you a short sketch of the stages of my booing, as an excitement, and a landmark for you to boo by, and as an infallible nostrum for a man of the world to rise in the world.

Eger. Sir, I shall be proud to profit by your experience.

Sir P. Vary weel, sir; sit ye down then, sit you down here; [they sit—]—and now, sir, you must recall to your thoughts, that your grandfather was a man, whose penurious income of captain's half-pay was the sum total of his fortune; and, sir, aw my provision fra him was a modicum of Latin, an expertness in arithmetic, and a short system of worldly counsel; the principal ingredients of which were, a persevering industry, a rigid economy, a smooth tongue, a pliability of temper, and a constant attention to make every mon well pleased with himself.

Eger. Very prudent advice, sir.

Sir P. Therefore, sir, I lay it before you. Now, sir, with these materials, I set out, a raw-boned stripling, fra the North, to try my fortune with them here in the South; and my first step in the world was a beggarly clerkship in Sawney Gordon's counting-house, here, in the city of London, which you'll say afforded but a barren sort of a prospect.

Eger. It was not a very fertile one, indeed, sir.

Sir P. The reverse, the reverse: weel, sir, seeing myself in this unprofitable situation, I reflected deeply; I cast about my thoughts morning, noon, and night, and marked every man, and every mode of prosperity; at last I concluded that a matrimonial adventure, prudently conducted, would be the readiest gait I could gang for the bettering of my condition, and accordingly I set about it: now, sir, in this pursuit, beauty! beauty!—ah! beauty often struck my een, and played about my heart; and fluttered, and beat, and knocked, and knocked; but the devil an entrance I ever let it get; for I observed, sir, that beauty is, generally, a—proud, vain, saucy, expensive, impertinent sort of a commodity.

Eger. Very justly observed.

Sir P. And therefore, sir, I left it to prodigals and coxcombs, that could afford to pay for it; and, in its stead, sir, mark I—I looked out for an ancient, weel-jointed, superannuated dowager; a consumptive, toothless, phthisic, wealthy widow; or a shrivelled, cadaverous piece of deformity, in the shape of an izzard, or an appersi—and—or, in short, any thing, any thing that had the siller—the siller—for that, sir, was the north star of my affections. Do you take me, sir? was nae that right?

Eger. O! doubtless, doubtless, sir.

Sir P. Now, sir, where do you think I ganged to look for this woman with the siller?—nae till court, nae till play-houses or assemblies—nae, sir, I ganged till the kirk, till the Anabaptist, Independent, Bradlonian, and Muggletonian meetings; till the morning and evening service of churches and chapels of ease, and till the midnight, melting, conciliating love-feasts of the Methodists; and there, sir, at last I fell upon an old, slighted, antiquated, musty maiden, that looked—ha, ha, ha!—she looked just like a skeleton in a surgeon's glass-case. Now, sir, this miserable object was religiously angry with herself and aw the world; had nae comfort but in metaphysical visions and supernatural deliriums—ha, ha, ha! Sir, she was as mad—as mad as a bedlamite.

Eger. Not improbable, sir: there are numbers of poor creatures in the same condition.

Sir P. O, numbers, numbers. Now, sir, this cracked creature used to pray, and sing, and sigh, and groan, and weep, and wail, and gnash her teeth, constantly, morning and evening, at the Tabernacle at Moorfields: and as soon as I found she had the siller, aha! guid traith, I plumped me down upon my knees, close by her—cheek by jowl—and prayed, and sighed, and sung, and groaned, and gnashed my teeth as vehemently as she could do for the life of her; ay, and turned up the whites of mine een, till the strings awmost cracked again. I watched her motions, handed her till her chair, waited on her home, got most religiously intimate with her in a week—married her in a fortnight, buried her in a month;—touched the siller, and with a deep suit of mourning, a melancholy port, a sorrowful visage, and a joyful heart, I began the world again;—and this, sir, was the first boo—that is, the first effectual boo—I ever made till the vanity of human nature.—[Rise.]—Now, sir, do you understand this doctrine?

Eger. Perfectly well, sir.

Sir P. Ay, but was it not right? was it not ingenious, and weel hit off?

Eger. Certainly, sir: extremely well.

Sir P. My next boo, sir, was till your ain mother, whom I ran away with fra the boarding-school: by the interest of whose family I got a guid smart place in the treasury; and, sir, my very next step was intill parliament; the which I entered with as ardent and as determined an ambition as ever agitated the heart of Cæsar himself. Sir, I boomed, and watched, and hearkened, and ran about, backwards and forwards, and attended, and dangled upon the then great mon, till I got intill the very bowels of his confidence, and then, sir, I wriggled and wrought, and wriggled, till I wriggled myself among the very thick of them: ha! I got my snack of the clothing, the foraging, the contracts, the lottery tickets, and aw the political bousses: till at length, sir, I became a much wealthier mon than one half of the golden calves I had been so long a booing to: and was nae that booing to some purpose?

Eger. It was, indeed, sir.

Sir P. But are you convinced of the guid effects and of the utility of booing?

Eger. Thoroughly, sir.

Sir P. Sir, it is infallible. But, Charles, ah! while I was thus booing, and wriggling, and raising this princely fortune, ah! I met with many heart-sores and disappointments fra the want of literature, eloquence, and other popular abeilities. Sir, guin I could but have spoken in the hoose, I should have done the deed in half the time; but the instant I opened my mouth there they aw fell a laughing at me; aw which deficiencies, sir, I de-tearmained at any expense, to have supplied by the polished education of a son, who I hoped would one day raise the house of Maccyphont till the highest pitch of ministerial ambition. This, sir, is my plan: I have done my part of it; Nature has done hers; you are popular, you are eloquent, aw parties like and respect you: and now, sir, it only remains for you to be directed—completion follows.

Eger. Your liberality, sir, in my education, are obligations I shall ever remember with the deepest filial gratitude.

Sir P. Vary weel, sir: but, Charles, have you had any conversation yet with Lady Rodolpha, about the day of your marriage—your liveries—your equipage—or your domestic estabishment?

Eger. Not yet, sir.

Sir P. Poh! why there again, now, you are wrong—vary wrong.

Eger. Sir, we have not had an opportunity.

Sir P. Why, Charles, you are very tardy in this business.

Lord L. [Sings without, flushed with wine.] "What have we with day to do?"

Sir P. Oh, here comes my lord.

Lord L. "Sons of care, 'twas made for you."

Enter Lord LUMBERCOURT, drinking a cup of coffee; TOMLINS attending him.

"Sons of care, 'twas made for you."—Very good coffee, indeed, Mr. Tomlins.—"Sons of care, 'twas made for you." Here, Mr. Tomlins.

Tom. Will your lordship please to have another dish?

Lord L. No more, Mr. Tomlins.—[Exit TOMLINS.]—Ha, ha, ha, my host of the Scotch pints, we have had warm work.

Sir P. Yes, you pushed the bottle about, my lord, with the joy and vigour of a bacchanal.

Lord L. That I did, my dear Mac; no loss of time with me: I have but three motions, old boy, charge—toast—fire—and off we go: ha, ha, ha! that's my exercise.

Sir P. And fine warm exercise it is, my lord, especially with the half-pint glasses.

Lord L. Zounds! it does execution point blank: ay, ay, none of your pimping acorn glasses for me, but your manly, old English half-pint bumpers, my dear; they try a fellow's stamina at once: but where's Egerton?

Sir P. Just at hand, my lord; there he stands.

Lord L. My dear Egerton.

Eger. Your lordship's most obedient.

Lord L. I beg pardon, I did not see you: I am sorry you left us so soon after dinner: had you stayed, you would have been highly entertained. I have made such examples of the commissioner, the captain, and the colonel.

Eger. So I understand, my lord.

Lord L. But, Egerton, I have slipped from the company for a few moments, on purpose to have a little chat with you. Rodolpha tells me she fancies there is a kind of demur on your side, about your marriage with her.

Sir P. A demur! how so, my lord?

Lord L. Why, as I was drinking my coffee with the women just now, I desired they would fix the wedding night, and the etiquette of the ceremony; upon which the girl burst into a loud laugh, telling me she supposed I was joking, for that Mr. Egerton had never yet given her a single glance or hint upon the subject.

Sir P. My lord, I have been just now talking to him about his shyness to the lady.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Counsellor Plausible is come, sir, and Sergeant Eitherside.

Sir P. Why then we can settle the business this very evening, my lord.

Lord L. As well as in seven years; and, to make the way as short as possible, pray, Mr. Tomlins, present your master's compliments and mine to Lady Rodolpha, and let her ladyship know we wish to speak with her directly.—[Exit TOMLINS.]
—He shall attack her this instant, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Aye, this is doing business effectually, my lord.

Lord L. O! I will pit them in a moment, Sir Pertinax; that will bring them into the heat of the action at once, and save a great deal of awkwardness on both sides. O, here your dulcinea comes, sir.

Enter Lady RODOLPHA, singing.

Lady R. Weel, Sir Pertinax, I attend your commands, and yours, my paternal lord.—[Lady R. curtsies very low.]

Lord L. Why, then, my filial lady, we are to inform you that the commission for your ladyship and this enamoured cavalier, commanding you to serve your country, jointly and inseparably, in the honourable and forlorn hope of matrimony, is to be signed this very evening.

Lady R. This evening, my lord!

Lord L. This evening, my lady. Come, Sir Pertinax, let us leave them to settle their liveries, wedding suits, carriages, and all their amorous equipage for the nuptial campaign.

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! excellent! excellent! Weel, I vow, my lord, you are a great officer:—this is as guid a manœuvre to bring on a rapid engagement as the ablest general of them aw could have started.

Lord L. Ay, ay! leave them together; they'll soon come to a right understanding, I warrant you, or the needle and loadstone have lost their sympathy.—

[Exit with Sir PERTINAX.—Lady RODOLPHA stands in amazement.

Eger. [Aside.] What a dilemma am I in!

Lady R. [Aside.] Why, this is downright tyranny! it has quite damped my spirits; and my betrothed, yonder, seems planet-struck, too, I think.

Eger. [Aside.] A whimsical situation, mine.

Lady R. [Aside.] Ha, ha, ha! methinks we look like a couple of cautious generals, that are obliged to take the field, but neither of us seems willing to come till action.

Eger. [Aside.] I protest I know not how to address her.

Lady R. [Aside.] He will nae advance, I see: what am I to do in this affair? guid traith, I will even do, as I suppose many brave heroes have done before me—clap a guid face on the matter; and so conceal an aching heart under a swaggering countenance.—[She advances with a smothered laugh.]

—Sir, as we have, by the commands of our guid fathers, a business of some little consequence to transact, I hope you will excuse my taking the liberty of recommending a chair till you, for the repose of your body, in the embarrassed deliberation of your perturbed spirits.

Eger. [Much embarrassed.] Madam, I beg your pardon.—[Hands her a chair, then one for himself.]
—Please to sit, madam.—[They sit down with great ceremony: he sits at a distance from her.

Lady R. [Aside.] Aha! he's resolved not to come too near till me, I think.

Eger. [Aside.] A pleasant interview, this—hem, hem!

Lady R. [Aside, mimicking.] Hem! he will not open the congress, I see: then I will.—Come, sir, when will you begin?

Eger. [Surprised.] Begin! what, madam?

Lady R. To make love till me.

Eger. Love, madam!

Lady R. Ay, love, sir. Why, you have never said a word till me on the subject, nor cast a single glance at me, nor heaved one tender sigh, nor even secretly squeezed my loof: now, sir, th'of our fathers are so tyrannical as to dispose of us without the consent of our hearts, yet you, sir, I hope, have more humanity than to think of marrying me without administering some of the preliminaries usual on those occasions.

Eger. Madam, I own your reproach is just; I shall, therefore, no longer disguise my sentiments; but fairly let you know my heart. [Rises.

Lady R. [Rising.] That's right, that is right, cousin!—but sit you down, sit you down again;—[They sit.]—I shall return your frankness and your passion, cousin, with a melting tenderness equal till the amorous enthusiasm of an ancient heroine.

Eger. Madam, if you will hear me—

Lady R. But remember, you must begin with fervency, and a most rapturous vehemency; for you are to consider, cousin, that our match is nae to arise fra the union of hearts and a long decorum of ceremonious courtship, but is instantly to start at once, out of necessity, or mere accident—ha, ha, ha!—like a match in an ancient romance, where, you ken, cousin, the knight and the damsel are mutually smitten and dying for each other at first sight, or by an amorous sympathy, before they exchange a single glance. So, now cousin, with the true romantic enthusiasm, you are to suppose me the lady of the enchanted castle; and you—ha, ha, ha! you are to be the knight of the sorrowful countenance—ha, ha, ha!—and, upon honour, you look the character admirably—ha, ha, ha!

Eger. Trifling creature!

Lady R. Come, sir, why do you nae begin to ravish me with your valour, your vows, your knight-errantry, and your amorous frenzy?—Nay, nay, nay! guin you do nae begin at once, the lady of the enchanted castle will vanish in a twinkling.

Eger. [Rises.] Lady Rodolpha, I know your talent for raillery well;—[She rises]—but at present, in my case, there is a kind of cruelty in it.

Lady R. Raillery! upon honour, cousin, you mistake me quite and clean. I am serious, very serious; ay, and I have cause to be serious; nay, I will submit my case even to yourself. Can any puir lassie be in a mair lamentable condition, than to be sent four hundred miles, by the command of a positive grandmother, to marry a man who, I find, has no more affection for me than if I had been his wife these seven years?

Eger. Madam, I am extremely sorry—

Lady R. [Weeps.] But it is vary weel, cousin—I see your unkindness and aversion plain enough; and, sir, I must tell you fairly, you are the ainly man that ever slighted my person, or that drew tears fra these een.—But it is vara weel, it's vara weel: I will return till Scotland to-morrow morning, and let my grandmother know how I hae been affronted by your slights, your contempts, and your aversions.

Eger. If you are serious, madam, your distress gives me a deep concern; but affection is not in our power, and you will forgive me when I tell you, I can never have that honour which is intended me, by a connexion with your ladyship.

Lady R. How, sir—are you serious? And so you persist in slighting me?

Eger. I beg your pardon, madam: but I must be explicit, and at once declare, that I never can give my hand where I cannot give my heart.

Lady R. [Angrily.] Why, then, sir, I must tell you, that your declaration is sic an affront as nae woman of spirit can, or ought to bear; and here I make a solemn vow, never to pardon it but on one condition.

Eger. If that condition be in my power, madam—

Lady R. [Eagerly.] Sir, it is in your power.

Eger. Then, madam, you may command me.

Lady R. [In a peremptory tone.] Why, then, sir, the condition is this, you must here give me your word and honour, that nae importunity, command, or menace of your father—in fine, that nae consideration whatsoever, shall induce you to take me, Rodolpha Lumbercourt, to be your wedded wife.

Eger. I most solemnly promise I never will.

Lady R. And I, sir, most solemnly and sincerely—[Curtseys—thank you for—[Curtseys—your resolution, and your agreeable aversion—ha, ha, ha! for you have made me as happy as a pair wretch relieved in the vara instant of intended execution.

Eger. Pray, madam, how am I to understand all this?

Lady R. Why, sir, your frankness and sincerity demand the same behaviour on my side, therefore, without further disguise or ambiguity, know, sir, that I myself—[With a deep sigh]—am as deeply smitten with a certain swain, as I understand you are with your Constantia.

Eger. Indeed, madam!

Lady R. O! sir, notwithstanding a' my show of courage and mirth, here I stand as errant a trembling Thisbe as ever sighed or mourned for her Pyramus: and, sir, a' my extravagant levity and ridiculous behaviour in your presence now, and ever since your father prevailed upon mine to consent till this match, has been a premeditated scheme to provoke your gravity and guid sense intill a cordial disgust, and a positive refusal.

Eger. But, madam, if I may presume so far, pray, who is your lover?

Lady R. Why, in that too, I shall surprise you, perhaps, more than ever. In the first place, he is a beggar, and in disgrace with an unforgiving father; and, in the next place, he is—[Curtseys]—your ain brother.—So you see, cousin Charles, th'of I cou'd nae mingle affections with you, I have nae ganged out of the family.—But now, sir, let me ask one question—pray, how is your mither affected in this business?

Eger. She knows of my passion, and will, I am sure, be a friend to the common cause.

Lady R. Ah, that's lucky. Our first step then must be to take her advice upon our conduct, so as to keep our fathers in the dark till we can hit off some measure that will wind them about till our ain purpose, and the common interest of our ain passion; so come along, cousin Charles. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter Sir PERTINAX and Counsellor PLAUSIBLE.

Sir P. No, no.—Come away, Counsellor Plausible, come away, I say, let 'em chew upon it. Why, counsellor, did you ever see so impertinent, so meddling, and so obstinate a blockhead as that Serjeant Eitherside? Confound the fellow, he has put me out of aw temper.

Plaus. He is very positive, indeed, Sir Pertinax: and no doubt was intemperate and rude. But, Sir Pertinax, I would not break off the match notwithstanding, for certainly, even without the boroughs, it is an advantageous bargain both to you and your son.

Sir P. But, zounds! Plausible, do you think I will give up the nomination till three boroughs? Why, I would rather give him twenty, nay, thirty thousand pounds in any other part of the bargain:—especially at this juncture, when votes are likely to become so valuable. Why, man, if a certain affair comes on, they will rise above five hundred per cent.

Plaus. You judge very rightly, Sir Pertinax; but what shall we do in this case? for Mr. Serjeant insists that you positively agreed to my lord's having the nomination to the three boroughs during his own life.

Sir P. Why, yes: in the first sketch of the agreement, I believe I did consent: but at that time, mon, my lord's affairs did not appear to be half so desperate as I now find they turn out. Sir, he must acquiesce in whatever I demand, for I have got him into sic an hobble that he cannot—Plaus. No doubt, Sir Pertinax, you have him absolutely in your power.

Sir P. Vara weel: and ought nae a man to make his vantage of it?

Plaus. No doubt you ought; no manner of doubt. But, Sir Pertinax, there is a secret spring in this business that you do not seem to perceive; and which, I am afraid, governs the matters respecting these boroughs.

Sir P. What spring do you mean, counsellor?

Plaus. Why, this Serjeant Eitherside: I have some reason to think, that my lord is tied down, by some means or other, to bring the Serjeant in, the very first vacancy, for one of these boroughs; now that, I believe, is the sole motive why the Serjeant is so strenuous that my lord should keep the boroughs in his own power; fearing that you might reject him for some man of your own.

Sir P. Odswounds and death! Plausible, you are clever, devilish clever. By the blood, you have hit upon the vara string that has made aw this discord. Oh! I see it—I see it now. But hault—hault—bide a wee bit, a wee bit, mon; I have a thought come intill my head—yes, I think, Plausible, with a little twist in our negotiation, that this vara string, properly tuned, may be still made to produce the vara harmony we wish for. Yes, yes, I have it:—this Serjeant, I see, understands business; and, if I am not mistaken, knows how to take a hint.

Plaus. O! nobody better, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Why, then, Plausible, the short road is the best with sic a man. You must even come up till his mark at once, and assure him from me that I will secure him a seat for one of these vara boroughs.

Plaus. Oh! that will do, that will do, I'll answer for't.

Sir P. And further, I beg you will let him know that I think myself obliged to consider him, in this affair, as acting for me as weel as my lord, as a common friend till baith; and for the services he has already done us, make my special compliments till him; and, pray let this amicable bit of paper be my faithful advocate to convince him of what my gratitude further intends for his great—[Gives him a bank-note—equity in adjusting this agreement betwixt my lord and me.

Plaus. Ha, ha, ha!—upon my word, Sir Pertinax, this is noble. Ay, ay! this is an eloquent bit of paper, indeed.

Sir P. Maister Plausible, in aw human dealings, the most effectual method is that of ganging at once till the vara bottom of a mon's heart; for, if we expect that men should serve us, we must first win their affections by serving them. O! here they baith come.

Enter Lord LUMBERCOURT and Serjeant EITHERSIDE.

Lord L. My dear Sir Pertinax, what could provoke you to break off this business so abruptly? You are really wrong in the point; and if you will give yourself time to recollect, you will find that my having the nomination to the boroughs for my life, was a preliminary article: I appeal to Mr. Serjeant Eitherside here, whether I did not always understand it so.

Serj. I assure you, Sir Pertinax, that in all his lordship's conversation with me upon this business, and in his positive instructions, both he and I always understood the nomination to be in my lord, durante vita.

Sir P. Why, then, my lord, to shorten the dispute, aw that I can say in answer till your lordship is, that there has been a total mistake betwixt us in that point: and, therefore, the treaty must end here. I give it up. O! I wash my hands of it for ever.

Plaus. Well, but, gentlemen, gentlemen, a little patience. Sure this mistake, somehow or other, may be rectified. Pr'ythee, Mr. Serjeant, let you and I step into the next room by ourselves, and reconsider the clause relative to the boroughs, and try if we cannot hit upon a medium that will be agreeable to both parties.

Serj. [With great warmth.] Mr. Plausible, I have considered the clause fully; am entirely master of the question; my lord cannot give up the point. It's unkind and unreasonable to expect it.

Plaus. Nay, Mr. Serjeant, I beg you will not misunderstand me. Do not think I want his lordship to give up any point without an equivalent. Sir Pertinax, will you permit Mr. Serjeant and me to retire a few moments to reconsider this point?

Sir P. With aw my heart, Maister Plausible; anything to oblige his lordship—anything to accommodate his lordship—anything.

Plaus. What say you, my lord?

Lord L. Nay, I submit it entirely to you and Mr. Serjeant.

Plaus. Come, Mr. Serjeant, let us retire.

Lord L. Ay, ay, go, Mr. Serjeant, and hear what Mr. Plausible has to say.

Serj. Nay, I'll wait on Mr. Plausible, my lord, with all my heart; but I am sure I cannot suggest the shadow of a reason for altering my present opinion:—impossible, impossible.

Plaus. [Pulls EITHERSIDE, and shows him the bank note.] Well, well, Mr. Serjeant, do not be positive. I am sure, reason and your client's convenience, will always make you alter your opinion.

Serj. Ay, ay—reason and my client's convenience, Mr. Plausible, will always controul my opinion, depend upon it—ay, ay! there you are right, sir, I attend you. [Exit Lawyers.

Sir P. I am sorry, my lord, extremely sorry, indeed, that this mistake has happen'd, Lord L. Upon my honour, and so am I, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. But come, now, after aw, your lordship must allow you have been in the wrong: come, my dear lord, you must allow me that now.

Lord L. How so, my dear Sir Pertinax?

Sir P. Not about the boroughs, my lord; for those I do not mind of a bawbee; but about your distrust of my friendship.—Why, do you think, now, I appeal till your ain breast, my lord—do you think, I say, that I should ever have slighted your lordship's nomination till these boroughs?

Lord L. Why, really, I do not think you would, Sir Pertinax; but one must be directed by one's lawyer, you know.

Sir P. Ha! my lord, lawyers are a dangerous species of animals to have any dependence upon: they are always starting punctilios and difficulties among friends. Why, my lord, it is their interest that aw mankind should be at variance; for disagreement of every kind is the vara manure with which they enrich and fatten the land of litigation; and, as they find that that constantly promotes the best crop, depend upon it, they will always be sure to lay it on as thick as they can.

Lord L. Come, come, my dear Sir Pertinax, you must not be angry with the Serjeant for his insisting so warmly on this point—for those boroughs, you know, are my sheet anchor.

Sir P. I know it, my lord; and, as an instance of my promptness to study, and of my acquaintance till your lordship's inclination, as I see that this Serjeant Eitherside wishes you weel, and you of him, I think, now, he would be as guid a man to be returned for one of those boroughs as could be pitched upon; and, as such, I humbly recommend him till your lordship's consideration.

Lord L. Why, my dear Sir Pertinax, to tell you the truth, I have already promised him. He must be in for one of them, and that is one reason why I insisted so strenuously; he must be in.

Sir P. And why not? odswunds! why not? is nae your word a fiat? and will it nae be always so till me? are ye nae my friend, my patron—and are we nae, by this match of our children, to be united intill one interest?

Lord L. So I understand it, I own, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. My lord, it can nae be otherwise; then, for Heaven's sake, as your lordship and I can have but one interest for the future, let us have nae mair words about these paltry boroughs, but conclude the agreement just as it stands: otherwise there must be new writings drawn up, new consultations of lawyers; new objections and delays will arise; creditors will be impatient and impertinent, so that we shall nae finish the Lord knows when.

Lord L. You are right, you are right; say no more, Mac, say no more. Split the lawyers—you judge the point better than all Westminster Hall could. It shall stand as it is: yes, you shall settle it your own way; for your interest and mine are the same, I see plainly.

Sir P. No doubt of it, my lord.

Lord L. O! here the lawyers come.

Enter Counsellor PLAUSIBLE and Serjeant EITHERSIDE.

Lord L. So, gentlemen—Well, what have you done!—How are your opinions now?

Serj. My lord, Mr. Plausible has convinced me—fully convinced me.

Plaus. Yes, my lord, I have convinced him: I have laid such arguments before Mr. Serjeant as were irresistible.

Serj. He has, indeed, my lord; besides, as Sir Pertinax gives his honour that your lordship's nomination shall be sacredly observed, why, upon a nearer review of the whole matter, I think it will be the wiser measure to conclude the agreement just as it is drawn.

Lord L. I am very glad you think so, Mr. Serjeant, because that is my opinion too: so, my dear Eitherside, do you and Mr. Plausible dispatch the business now as soon as possible.

Serj. My lord, every thing will be ready in less than an hour. Come, Mr. Plausible, let us go and fill up the blanks, and put the last hand to the writings on our part.

Plaus. I attend you, Mr. Serjeant.

[Exeunt Lawyers.]

Lord L. And, while the lawyers are preparing the writings, Sir Pertinax, I will go and saunter with the women.

Sir P. Do, do, my lord; and I will come to you presently.

Lord L. Very well, my dear Mac, I shall expect you. [Exit.]

Sir P. So! a little flattery, mixed with the finesse of a gilded promise on one side, and a quantum sufficit of the aurum palpabile on the other, have at last made me the happiest father in Great Britain. Ha! my heart expands itself, as it were, through every part of my whole body, at the completion of this business, and feels nothing but dignity and elevation.—Hauld! hauld! bide a wee—bide a wee! I have but one little matter mair in this affair to adjust; and then, Sir Pertinax, you may dictate till fortune herself, and send her to govern fools! while you show and convince the world that wise men always govern her. What's there?

Enter SAM.

Tell my son Egerton I would speak with him here in the library. [Exit SAM.] Now I have settled the grand point with my lord, this, I think, is the proper juncture to feel the political pulse of my spark, and, once for aw, to set it to the exact measure that I would have it constantly beat.

Enter EGERTON.

Come hither, Charles.

Eger. Your pleasure, sir.

Sir P. About two hours since I told you, Charles, that I received a letter express, complaining of your brother's activity at an election in Scotland, against a particular friend of mine, which has given great offence; and, sir, you are mentioned in the letter as well as he: to be plain, I must roundly tell you, that on this interview depends my happiness as a father and as a man; and my affection to you, sir, as a son, for the remainder of our days.

Eger. I hope, sir, I shall never do anything either to forfeit your affection, or disturb your happiness.

Sir P. I hope so too: but to the point. The fact is this: there has been a motion made this vara day to bring on the grand affair, which is settled for Friday seven-night. Now, sir, as you are popular, have talents, and are weel heard, it is expected, and I insist upon it, that you endeavour to atone, sir, for your late misconduct, by preparing, and taking a larger share in that question, and supporting it with aw your power.

Eger. Sir, I hope you will not so exert your influence, as to insist upon my supporting a measure by an obvious, prostituted sophistry, in direct opposition to my character and conscience.

Sir P. Conscience! why, you are mad! Did you ever hear any man talk of conscience in political matters? Conscience, quotha? I have been in parliament these three and thraty years, and never heard the term made use of before. Sir, it is an unparliamentary word, and you will be laughed at for it.

Eger. Then, sir, I must frankly tell you, that you work against my nature; you would connect me with men I despise, and press me into measures I abhor; for know, sir, that the malignant ferment which the venal ambition of the times provokes in the heads and hearts of other men, I detest.

Sir P. What are you about, sir? malignant ferment and venal ambition! Sir, every man should be ambitious to serve his country, and every man should be rewarded for it: and pray, sir, would nae you wish to serve your country? Answer me that. I say, would nae you wish to serve your country?

Eger. Only show me how I can serve my country, and my life is hers. Were I qualified to lead her armies, to steer her fleets, and to deal her honest vengeance on her insulting foes; or could my eloquence pull down a state leviathan, mighty by the plunder of his country, black with the treasons of her disgrace, and send his infamy down to a free posterity, as a monumental terror to corrupt ambition, I would be foremost in such service, and act with the unremitting ardour of a Roman spirit!

Sir P. Why, are you mad, sir? you have certainly been bit by some mad Whig or other. Oh! you are young, vara young, in these matters; but experience will convince you, sir, that every man in public business has twa consciences—a religious and a political conscience. Why, you see a merchant now, or a shopkeeper, that kens the science o' the world, always looks upon an oath at a custom-house, or behind a counter, only as an oath in business, a thing of course, a mere thing of course, that has nothing to do with religion; and just so it is at an election: for instance, now, I am a candidate, pray observe, and I gang till a perriwig-maker, a hatter, or a hosier, and I give ten, twenty, or thraty guineas, for a perriwig, a hat, or a pair of hose; and so on, through a majority of voters; jara weel, what is the consequence?—why this commercial intercourse, you see, begets a friendship betwixt us—a commercial friendship—and in a day or twa, these men gang and give their suffrages; weel, what is the inference? Pray sir, can you, or any lawyer, divine, or casuist, ca' this a bribe?—nae, sir, in fair political reasoning, it is ainly generosity on the one side, and gratitude on the other; so, sir, let me have nae more of your religious or philosophical refinements, but prepare, attend, and speak till the question, or you are nae son of mine. Sir, I insist upon it.

Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir, my lord says the writings are now ready, and his lordship and the lawyers are waiting for you and Mr. Egerton.

Sir P. Vara weel, we'll attend his lordship.—[Exit SAM.]—Come, sir, let us gang down and finish this business.

Eger. [Stopping Sir P.] Sir, with your permission, I beg you will first hear a word or two upon this subject.

Sir P. Weel, sir, what would you say?

Eger. I have often resolved to let you know my aversion to this match—

Sir P. How, sir?

Eger. But my respect, and fear of disobliging you, have hitherto kept me silent.

Sir P. Your aversion!—your aversion, sir! How dare you use sic language to me? Your aversion!—Look ye, sir, I shall cut the matter vara short: consider, my fortune is nae inheritance; aw mine ain acquisition; I can make ducks and drakes of it: so do not provoke me, but sign the articles directly.

Eger. I beg your pardon, sir, but I must be free on this occasion, and tell you at once, that I can no longer dissemble the honest passion that fills my heart for another woman.

Sir P. How! another woman? and, you villain, how dare you love another woman without my leave? But what other woman?—what is she?—Speak, sir, speak.

Eger. Constantia.

Sir P. Constantia! oh, you profligate!—what, a creature taken in for charity!

Eger. Her poverty is not her crime, sir, but her misfortune: her birth is equal to the noblest; therefore, sir—

Sir P. Haud your jabbering, you villain, haud your jabbering; none of your roinance or refinement till me. I have but one question to ask you—but one question, and then I have done with you for ever—for ever—therefore, think before you answer—will you marry the lady, or will you break my heart?

Eger. Sir, my presence shall not offend you any longer; but when reason and reflection take their turn, I am sure you will not be pleased with yourself for this unparental passion. [Going.]

Sir P. Tarry, I command you; and I command you, likewise, not to stir, till you have given me answer, a definitive answer:—will you marry the lady, or will you not?

Eger. Since you command me, sir, know, then, that I cannot, will not marry her. [Exit.]

Sir P. [Throws himself in a chair in a furious passion—then rises and stands.] Oh, the villain has shot me through the head! he has cut my vitals! I shall run distracted! the fellow destroys aw my measures, aw my schemes: there never was sic a bargain as I have made with this foolish lord: possession of his whole estate, with three boroughs upon it—six members. Why, what an acquisition! what consequence, what dignity, what weight till the house of Macsycophant! O, damn the fellow!—three boroughs, only for sending down six broomsticks!—O, miserable—O, miserable, ruined, undone! For these five-and-twenty years, ever since this fellow came intill the world, have I been secretly preparing him for ministerial dignity; and, with the fellow's eloquence, abilities, popularity, these boroughs, and proper connexions, he might certainly, in a little time, have done the deed; and sure never were times so favourable, every thing conspires, for aw the auld political post-horses are broken-winded and foundered, and cannot get on; and as till the rising generation, the vanity of surpassing one another in what they foolishly call taste and elegance, binds them hard and foot in the chains of luxury, which will always set them up till the best bidder; so that, if they can but get wherewithal to supply their dissipation, a minister may convert the political morals of aw sic voluptuaries, intill a vote that would sell the nation till Prester John, and their boasted liberties till the great Mogul. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter Sir PERTINAX and BETTY HINT.

Sir P. Come this way, Betty—come this way: you are a guid girl, and I will reward you for this discovery. Oh, the villain! offer her marriage!

Betty. It is true, indeed, sir, I would not tell your honour a lie for the world; but, in truth, it lay upon my conscience, and I thought it my duty to tell your worship.

Sir P. You are right, you are right; it was your duty to tell me, and I'll reward you for it. But you say Maister Sidney is in love with her too: pray how came you by that intelligence?

Betty. O, sir, I know when folks are in love, let them strive to hide it as much as they will. I know it by Mr. Sidney's eyes, when I see him stealing a sly look at her—by his trembling—his breathing short—his sighing when they are reading together. Besides, sir, he has made love-verses upon her, in praise of her virtue, and her playing upon the music. Ay! and I suspect another thing, sir—she has a sweetheart, if not a husband, not far from hence.

Sir P. Wha—Constantia?

Betty. Ay, Constantia, sir. Lord, I can know the whole affair, sir, only for sending over to Hadley, to farmer Hilford's youngest daughter, Sukey Hilford.

Sir P. Then send this instant, and get me a particular account of it.

Betty. That I will, sir.

Sir P. In the mean time, keep a strict watch upon Constantia, and be sure you bring me word of whatever new matter you can pick up about her, my son, or this Hadley husband or sweetheart.

Betty. Never fear, sir.

[Exit.]

Sir P. This love of Sidney's for Constantia is not unlikely. There is something promising in it. Yes, I think it is nae impossible to convert it into a special and immediate advantage. It is but trying. Wha's there? If it misses, I am but where I was.

Enter TOMLINS.

Where is Maister Sidney?

Tom. In the dining-room, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Tell him I would speak with him. [Exit

TOMLINS.] 'Tis more than probable. Spare to speak and spare to speed. Try—try—always try the human heart; try as guid a maxim in politics as in war. Why suppose this Sidney now should be privy till his friend Charles's love for Constantia—what then—guid traith, it is natural to think that his ain love will demand the preference—ay, and obtain it, too. Yes, self—self is an eloquent advocate on these occasions, and seldom loses his cause. I hae the general principle of human nature at least to encourage me in the experiment; for only make it a man's interest to be a rascal, and I think we may safely depend upon his integrity—in serving himself.

Enter SIDNEY.

Sid. Sir Pertinax, your servant:—Mr. Tomlins told me you desired to speak with me.

Sir P. Yes, I wanted to speak with you upon a vera singular business. Maister Sidney, give me your hand. Guin it did nae look like flattery, which I detest, I would tell you, Maister Sidney, that you are an honour till your cloth, your country, and till human nature.

Sid. Sir, you are very obliging.

Sir P. Sit you down, Maister Sidney; sit you down here by me. [They sit.] My friend, I am under the greatest obligations till you for the care you have taken of Charles. The principles, religious, moral, and political, that you have infused intill him, demand the warmest return of gratitude both fra him and fra me.

Sid. Your approbation, sir, next to that of my own conscience, is the best test of my endeavours, and the highest applause they can receive.

Sir P. Sir, you deserve it, richly deserve it. And now, sir, the same care that you have had of Charles, the same my wife has taken of her favourite Constantia—and sure, never were accomplishments, knowledge, or principles, social and religious, infused intill a better nature.

Sid. In truth, sir, I think so too.

Sir P. She is besides a gentlewoman, and of as guid a family as any in this country.

Sid. So I understand, sir.

Sir P. Sir, her father had a vast estate; the which he dissipated and melted in feastings, and friendships, and charities, and hospitalities, and sic kind of nonsense—but to the business. Maister Sidney, I love you—yes, I love you—and I have been looking out and contriving how to settle you in the world. Sir, I want to see you comfortably and honourably fixed at the head of a respectable family; and guin you were mine ain son a thousand times, I cou'd nae make a more valuable present till you for that purpose, as a partner for life, than this same Constantia, with sic a fortune down with her as you yourself shall deem to be competent, and an assurance of every canonical contingency in my power to confer or promote.

Sid. Sir, your offer is noble and friendly; but though the highest station would derive lustre from Constantia's charms and worth, yet—were she more amiable than love could paint her in the lover's fancy—and wealthy beyond the thirst of the miser's appetite—I could not, would not wed her.

[Rises.]

Sir P. Not wed her!—odswunds, man!—you surprise me! Why so—what hinders?

Sid. I beg you will not ask a reason for my refusal, but, briefly and finally, it cannot be; nor is it a subject I can long converse upon.

Sir P. Weel, weel, weel, sir, I have done, I have done. [SIDNEY sits down.] Sit you down, man; sit you down again; sit you down; I shall mention it no more;—not but I must confess honestly till you, friend Sidney, that the match, had you consented to my proposal, besides profiting you, would have been of singular service till me likewise. However, you may still serve me as effectually as if you had married her.

Sid. Then, sir, I am sure I will, most heartily.

Sir P. I believe it, friend Sidney, and I thank you: I have nae friend to depend upon but yourself. My heart is almost broke—I cannot help these tears—And, to tell you the fact at once, your friend Charles is struck with a most dangerous malady—a kind of insanity—You see I cannot help weeping when I think of it—in short—this Constantia, I am afraid, has cast an evil eye upon him. Do you understand me?

Sid. Not very well, sir.

Sir P. Why, he is grievously smitten with the love of her; and, I am afraid, will never be cured without a little of your assistance.

Sid. Of my assistance! pray, sir, in what manner?

Sir P. In what manner?—lord, Maister Sidney, how can you be so dull? Now, then, my vara guid friend, guin you would but give him that hint, and take an opportunity to speak a good word for him intill the wench; and guin you wou'd likewise cast about a little, now, and contrive to bring them together once! why, in a few days after, he would nae care a pinch of snuff for her. [SIDNEY starts up.] What is the matter with you, man? What the devil gars you start, and look so astounded?

Sid. Sir, you amaze me! In what part of my mind or conduct have you found that baseness, which entitles you to treat me with this indignity?

Sir P. Indignity! What indignity do you mean, sir? Is asking you to serve a friend with a wench an indignity? Sir, am I not your patron and benefactor, eh?

Sid. You are, sir, and I feel your bounty at my heart; but the virtuous gratitude that sowed the deep sense of it there, does not inform me that, in return, the tutor's sacred function, or the social virtue of the man, must be debased into the pupil's pander, or the patron's prostitute.

Sir P. [Rising.] How! what, sir?—do you dispute? Are you nae my dependent, eh? and do you hesitate about an ordinary civility, which is practised every day by men and women of the first fashion? Sir, let me tell you, however nice you may be, there is nae a client about the court that wou'd nae jump at sic an opportunity to oblige his patron.

Sid. Indeed, sir, I believe the doctrine of pimping for patrons, as well as that of prostituting eloquence and public trust for private lucre, may be learned in your party schools; for where faction and public venality are taught as measures necessary to good government and general prosperity, there every vice is to be expected.

Sir P. Oho! oho! vara weel, vara weel; fine slander upon ministers! fine sedition against government! O, ye villain!—You—you—you are a black sheep, and I'll mark you. I am glad you show yourself. Yes, yes; you have taken off the mask at last: you have been in my service for many years, and I never knew your principles before.

Sid. Sir, you never affronted them before; if you had, you should have known them sooner.

Sir P. It is vara weel; I have done with you. Ay, ay; now I can account for my son's conduct—his aversions till courts, till ministers, levees, public business, and his disobedience till my commands. Ah! you are a Judas—a perfidious fellow: you have ruined the morals of my son, you villain! But I have done with you. However, this I will prophesy at our parting, for your comfort, that guin you are so very squeamish about bringing a lad and a lass together, or about doing sic an harmless innocent job for your patron, you will never rise in the church.

Sid. Through my conduct, sir, should not make me rise in her power, I am sure it will in her favour, in the favour of my own conscience, too, and in the esteem of all worthy men; and that, sir, is a power and dignity beyond what patrons, or any minister can bestow. [Exit.]

Sir P. What a rigorous, saucy, stiff-necked rascal it is! I see my folly now; I am undone by mine ain policy. This Sidney is the last man that should have been about my son. The fellow, indeed, hath given him principles that might have done vara weel among the ancient Romans, but are damn'd unfit for the modern Britons. Well, guin I had a thousand sons, I never wou'd suffer one of these English university-bred fellows to be about a son of mine again; for they have sic an a pride of literature and character, and sic saucy English notions of liberty continually fermenting in their thoughts, that a man is never sure of them. But what am I to do? Zoons! he must nae marry this beggar; I cannot set down tamely under that. Stay—haud a wee. By the blood, I have it! Yes, I have hit upon it.

Enter BETTY HINT.

Betty. O, sir! I have got the whole secret out.

Sir P. About what?

Betty. About Miss Constantia. I have just got all the particulars from farmer Hilford's youngest daughter, Sukey Hilford.

Sir P. Weel, weel, but what is the story?—quick—quick—what is it?

Betty. Why, sir, it is certain that Miss Constantia has a sweetheart, or a husband; a sort of a gentleman, or a gentleman's gentleman, they don't know which, that lodges at Gaffer Hodge's; for Sukey says she saw them together last night, in the dark walk, and Mrs. Constantia was all in tears.

Sir P. Zoons, I am afraid this is too guid news to be true.

Betty. O! sir, 'tis certainly true.—Besides, sir, she has just writ a letter to her gallant, and I have sent John Gardener to her, who is to carry it to him to Hadley. Now, sir, if your worship would seize it—see, see, sir—here John comes, with the letter in his hand.

Sir P. Step you out, Betty, and leave the fellow till me.

Betty. I will, sir,

[Exit.]

Enter JOHN, with a packet and a letter.

John. [Putting the packet into his pocket.] There, go you into my pocket. There's nobody in the library, so I'll e'en go through the short way. Let me see—what is the name?—Mel—Meltil—O, no! Melville, at Gaffer Hodge's.

Sir P. What letter is that, sir?

John. Letter, sir!

Sir P. Give it me, sir.

John. An't please you, sir, it is not mine.

Sir P. Deliver it this instant, sirrah, or I'll break your head.

John. There, there, your honour.

Sir P. Begone, rascal. This, I suppose, will let us intill the whole business.

John. [Aside.] You have got the letter, old Surly, but the packet is safe in my pocket. I'll go and deliver that, however, for I will be true to poor Mrs. Constantia in spite of you. [Exit.]

Sir P. [Reading the letter.] Um—um—“and bless my eyes with the sight of you.” Um—um—“throw myself into your dear arms.”—Zoons, this letter is invaluable. Aha, madam! yes, this will do—this will do, I think. Let me see how it is directed—“To Mr. Melville.” Vary weel.

Enter BETTY.

O, Betty, you are an excellent wench—this letter is worth a million.

Betty. Is it as I suspected—to her gallant?

Sir P. It is, it is. Bid Constantia pack out of the house this instant, and let them get a chaise ready to carry her wherever she pleases. But first send my wife and son hither.

Betty. I shall, sir.

Sir P. Do so; begone. [Exit BETTY.] Aha, Maister Charles. I believe I shall cure you of your passion for a beggar now. I think he cannot be so infatuated as to be a dupe. Let me see, how am I to act now? Why, like a true politician, I must pretend most sincerity where I intend most deceit.

Enter EGERTON and Lady MACSYCOPHANT.

Weel, Charles, notwithstanding the misery you have brought upon me, I have sent for you and your mother, in order to convince you both of my affection and my readiness to forgive, nay, and even to indulge your perverse passion. Sir, since I find this Constantia has got hold of your heart, and that your mother and you think that you can never be happy without her, why, I'll nae longer oppose your inclinations.

Eger. Dear sir, you snatch me from the sharp—est misery ; on my knees, let my heart thank you for this goodness.

Lady M. Let me express my thanks too, and my joy ; for had you not consented to his marrying her, we all should have been miserable.

Sir P. Weel, I am glad I have found a way to please you both at last. But, my dear Charles, suppose, now, that this spotless vestal—this wonder of virtue—this idol of your heart, should be a concealed wanton after aw ? or should have an engagement of marriage, or an intrigue with another man, and is only making a dupe of you aw this time—I say, only suppose it, Charles—what would you think of her ?

Eger. I should think her the most deceitful, and most subtle of her sex : and, if possible, would never think of her again.

Sir P. Will you give me your honour of that ?

Eger. Most solemnly, sir.

Sir P. Enough ; I am satisfied. You make me young again. Your prudence has brought tears of joy fra my very vitals. I was afraid you were fascinated with the charms of a crack. Do you ken this hand ?

Eger. Mighty well, sir.

Sir P. And you, madam ?

Lady M. As well as I do my own, sir : it is Constantia's.

Sir P. It is so ; and a better evidence it is than any that can be given by the human tongue. Here is a warm, rapturous, lascivious letter, under the hypocritical syren's ain hand—her ain hand, sir. Ay, ay ; here—take and read it yourself.

Eger. [Reads.] “ I have only time to tell you, that the family have come down sooner than I expected, and that I cannot bless my eyes with the sight of you till the evening. The notes and jewels, which the bearer of this will deliver to you, were presented to me since I saw you, by the son of my benefactor.”—

Sir P. [Interrupting.] Now mark.

Eger. [Reads.] “ All which I beg you will convert to your immediate use.”—

Sir P. Mark, I say.

Eger. [Reads.] “ For my heart has no room for any wish or fortune, but what contributes to your relief and happiness.”—

Sir P. Oh, Charles, Charles ! do you see, sir, what a dupe she makes of you ? But mark what follows.

Eger. [Reads.] “ O, how I long to throw myself into your dear, dear arms ; to sooth your fears, your apprehensions, and your sorrows. I have something to tell you of the utmost moment, but will reserve it till we meet this evening in the dark walk.”

Sir P. In the dark walk—in the dark walk—ah, an evil-eyed curse upon her ! Yes, yes, she has been often in the dark walk, I believe. But read on.

Eger. [Reads.] “ In the mean time, banish all fears, and hope the best from fortune, and your ever dutiful

“ CONSTANTIA HARRINGTON.”

Sir P. There—there's a warm epistle for you :—in short, the hussy, you must know, is married till the fellow.

Eger. Not unlikely, sir.

Lady M. Indeed, by her letter I believe she is.

Sir P. Now, madam, what amends can you make me for countenancing your son's passion for sic a strumpet ? And you, sir, what have you to say for your disobedience and your frenzy ? O, Charles, Charles !

Eger. Pray, sir, be patient ; compose yourself a moment : I will make you any compensation in my power.

Sir P. Then instantly sign the articles of marriage.

Eger. The lady, sir, has never yet been consulted ; and I have some reason to believe that her heart is engaged to another man.

Sir P. Sir, that's nae business of yours. I know she will consent, and that's aw we are to consider. O, here comes my lord.

Enter Lord LUMBERCOURT.

Lord L. Sir Pertinax, everything is ready, and the lawyers wait for us.

Sir P. We attend your lordship. Where is Lady Rodolpha ?

Lord L. Giving some female consolation to poor Constantia. Why, my lady—ha, ha, ha !—I hear your vestal has been flirting.

Sir P. Yes, yes, my lord ; she's in vary guid order for any man that wants a wife and an heir till his estate intill the bargain.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Sir, there is a man below that wants to speak to your honour upon particular business.

Sir P. I cannot speak till anybody now—he must come another time :—haud—stay—what, is he a gentleman ?

Tom. He looks something like one, sir—a sort of a gentleman—but he seems to be in a kind of a passion ; for when I asked his name, he answered hastily—It is no matter, friend ; go tell your master there is a gentleman here that must speak to him directly.

Sir P. Must ? ha !—vary peremptory indeed :—pr'ythee, let us see him, for curiosity's sake.

[Exit.]

Enter Lady RODOLPHA.

Lady R. O ! my Lady Macsycophant, I am come an humble advocate for a weeping piece of female frailty, wha begs she may be permitted to speak till your ladyship, before you finally reprobate her.

Sir P. I beg your pardon, Lady Rodolpha, but it must not be ; see her she shall not.

Lady M. Nay, there can be no harm, my dear, in hearing what she has to say for herself.

Sir P. I tell you it shall not be.

Lady M. Well, my dear, I have done.

Enter TOMLINS and MELVILLE.

Tom. Sir, that is my master.

[Exit.]

Sir P. Weel, sir, what is your urgent business with me ?

Mel. To shun disgrace, and punish baseness.

Sir P. Punish baseness ! what does the fellow mean ? Wha are you, sir ?

Mel. A man, sir, and one whose fortune once bore as proud a sway as any within this country's limits.

Lord L. You seem to be a soldier, sir.

Mel. I was, sir ; and have the soldier's certificate to prove my service—rags and scars. In my heart for ten long years, in India's parching clime, I bore my country's cause, and in noblest dangers sustained it with my sword; at length, ungrateful peace has laid me down where welcome war first took me up—in poverty, and the dread of cruel creditors. Paternal affection brought me to my native land, in quest of an only child: I found her, as I thought, amiable as parental fondness could desire; but foul seduction has snatched her from me, and hither am I come, fraught with a father's anger, and a soldier's honour, to seek the seducer, and glut revenge.

Lady M. Pray, sir, who is your daughter?

Mel. I blush to own her—but—Constantia.

Eger. Is Constantia your daughter, sir?

Mel. She is; and was the only comfort that nature, fortune, or my own extravagance had left me.

Sir P. Guid traith, then, I fancy you will find but very little comfort fra her; for she is nae better than she should be. She has had nae damage in this mansion. I am told she is with bairn; but you may gang till Hadley, till one farmer Hodge's, and there you may learn the whole story, and wha the father of the bairn is, fra a cheeld they call Melville.

Mel. Melville!

Sir P. Yes, sir, Melville.

Mel. O, would to Heaven she had no crime to answer but her commerce with Melville! No, sir, he is not the man; it is your son, your Egerton, that has seduced her; and here, sir, are the evidence of his seduction.

Eger. Of my seduction.

Mel. Of yours, sir, if your name be Egerton.

Eger. I am that mau, sir; but pray what is your evidence?

Mel. These bills, and these gorgeous jewels, not to be had in her menial state, but at the price of chastity! Not an hour since she sent them, imprudently sent them, by a servant of this house: contagious infamy started from their touch.

Eger. Sir, do you but clear her conduct with Melville, and I will instantly satisfy your fears concerning the jewels and her virtue.

Mel. Sir, you give me new life; you are my better angel, I believe in your words—your looks. Know, then, I am that Melville.

Sir P. How, sir, you that Melville that was at farmer Hodge's?

Mel. The same, sir; it was he brought my Constantia to my arms; lodged and secreted me—once my lowly tenant, now my only friend. The fear of inexorable creditors made me change my name from Harrington to Melville, till I could see and consult some who once called themselves my friends.

Eger. Sir, suspend your fears and anger but for a few minutes; I will keep my word with you religiously, and bring your Constantia to your arms, as virtuous and as happy as you could wish her.

[Exit with Lady MACSYCOPHANT.

Sir P. The clearing up of this wench's virtue is damned unlucky; I am afraid it will ruin aw our affairs again; however, I have one stroke still in my head that will secure the bargain with my lord, let matters gang as they will.—[Aside.]—But I wonder, maister Melville, that you did nae pick up some little matter of siller in the Indies. Ah! there have been bonny fortunes snapt up there, of late years, by some of the military blades.

Mel. It is very true, sir; but it is an observation among soldiers, that there are some men who never meet with anything in the service but blows and ill-fortune. I was one of those, even to a proverb.

Sir P. Ah! 'tis pity, sir, a great pity, now, that you did nae get a mogul, or some sic an animal, intill your clutches. Ah! I should like to have the strangling of a nabob, the rummaging of his gold dust, his jewel-closet, and aw his magazines of bars and ingots. Ha, ha, ha! guid traith, naw, sic an a fellow would be a bonny cheeld to bring till this town, and to exhibit him riding on an elephant; upon honour, a man might raise a poll-tax by him, that would gang near to pay the debts of the nation. [Retires back.

Enter EGERTON, CONSTANTIA, Lady MACSYCOPHANT, and SIDNEY.

Eger. Sir, I promised to satisfy your fears concerning your daughter's virtue; and my best proof is, that I have made her the partner of my heart, and the tender guardian of my earthly happiness for life.

Sir P. [Rushes forward.] How! married!

Eger. I know, sir, at present, we shall meet your anger; but time, reflection, and our dutiful conduct, we hope, will reconcile you to our happiness.

Sir P. Never, never; and, could I make you, her, and aw your issue beggars, I would move hell, heaven, and earth, to do it.

Lord L. Why, Sir Pertinax, this is a total revolution, and will entirely ruin my affairs.

Sir P. My lord, with the consent of your lordship and Lady Rodolpha, I have an expedient to offer, that will not only punish that rebellious villain, but answer every end that your lordship and the lady proposed by the intended match with him.

Lord L. I doubt it much, Sir Pertinax—I doubt it much. But, what is it, sir? What is your expedient?

Sir P. My lord, I have another son, Sandy—Eh, he's a guid lad—and, provided the lady and your lordship have nae objection till him, every article of that rebel's intended marriage shall be amply fulfilled upon Lady Rodolpha's union with my younger son.

Lord L. Why, that is an expedient, indeed, Sir Pertinax. But what say you, Rodolpha?

Lady R. Nay, nay, my lord, as I ha nae reason to have the least affection till my cousin Egerton, and as my intended marriage with him was entirely an act of obedience till my grandmother, provided my cousin Sandy will be as agreeable till her ladyship as my cousin Charles here would have been, I have nae the least objection till the change. Ay, ay; one brother is as good to Rodolpha as another.

Sir P. I'll answer, madam, for your grandmother. Now, my lord, what say you?

Lord L. Nay, Sir Pertinax, so the agreement stands, all is right again. Come, child, let us be gone. Ay, ay; so my affairs are made easy, it is equal to me whom she marries. I say, Sir Pertinax, let them be but easy, and rat me if I care if she incorporates with the clam of Tartary. [Exit.

Sir P. As to you, my Lady Macsycophant, I suppose you concluded, before you gave your consent till this match, that there would be an end of aw intercourse betwixt you and me. You shall have a jointure; but not a bawbee besides, living or dead, shall you, or any of your issue, ever see of mine: and so, madam, live with your Constantia, with your son, and with that damned black sheep there.

[Exit.]

Lady R. Weel, cousin Egerton, in spite of the ambitious frenzy of your father, and the thoughtless dissipation of mine, Don Cupid has at last carried his point in favour of his devotees. But I must now take my leave; and so, guid folks, I will leave you with the fag end of an auld north-country wish: "May mutual love and guid humour be the guest of your hearts, the theme of your tongues, and the blithsome subjects of aw your tricksey dreams through the rugged road of this deceitful world; and may our fathers be an example till ourselves, to treat our bairns better than they have treated us."

[Exit.]

Eger. You seem melancholy, sir.

Mel. These precarious turns of fortune, sir, will press upon the heart; for, notwithstanding my Constantia's happiness, and mine in her's, I own I cannot help feeling some regret, that my misfortunes should be the cause of any disagreement between a father and the man to whom I am under the most endearing obligations.

Eger. You have no share in his disagreement; if affluence can procure content and ease, they are within our reach. My fortune is ample, and shall be dedicated to the happiness of this domestic circle.—

"My scheme, though mock'd by knave, coquette, and fool,

To thinking minds will prove this golden rule:
In all pursuits, but chiefly in a wife,
Not wealth, but morals, make the happy life."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Court of a Castle, surrounded with Woods.

Enter Lady RANDOLPH.

Lady R. Ye woods and wilds, whose melancholy gloom
Accords with my soul's sadness, and draws forth
The voice of sorrow from my bursting heart,
Farewell awhile; I will not leave you long;
For in your shades I deem some spirit dwells,
Who, from the chiding stream, or groaning oak,
Still hears and answers to Matilda's moan.
Oh, Douglas! Douglas! if departed ghosts
Are e'er permitted to review this world,
Within the circle of that wood thou art,
And with the passion of immortals hear'st
My lamentations; hear'st thy wretched wife
Weep for her husband slain, her infant lost.
My brother's timeless death I seem to mourn,
Who perish'd with thee on this fatal day.
Oh, disregard me not; though I am call'd
Another's now, my heart is wholly thine;
Incapable of change, affection lies
Buried, my Douglas, in thy bloody grave.
But Randolph comes, whom fate has made my lord,
To chide my anguish, and defraud the dead.

Enter Lord RANDOLPH.

Lord R. Again these weeds of woe! Say, dost thou well
To feed a passion which consumes thy life?
The living claim some duty; vainly thou
Bestow'st thy cares upon the silent dead.

Lady R. Silent, alas! is he, for whom I mourn:
Childless, without memorial of his name,
He only now in my remembrance lives.

Lord R. Time, that wears out the trace of deepest anguish,
Has pass'd o'er thee in vain.

Sure thou art not the daughter of Sir Malcolm—
Strong was his rage, eternal his resentment:
For, when thy brother fell, he smiled to hear
That Douglas' son in the same field was slain.

Lady R. Oh! rake not up the ashes of my fathers:
Implacable resentment was their crime,
And grievous has the expiation been.

Lord R. Thy grief wrests to its purposes my words.

I never ask'd of thee that ardent love,
Which in the breasts of fancy's children burns,
Decent affection, and complacent kindness,
Were all I wish'd for—but I wish'd in vain.
Hence with the less regret my eyes behold
The storm of war that gathers o'er this land:
If I should perish by the Danish sword,
Matilda would not shed one tear the more.

Lady R. Thou dost not think so: woful as I am,
I love thy merit, and esteem thy virtues—
But whither go'st thou now?

Lord R. Straight to the camp,
Where every warrior on tip-toe stands
Of expectation, and impatient asks
Each who arrives, if he is come to tell,
The Danes are landed.

Lady R. Oh, may adverse winds
Far from the coast of Scotland drive their fleet!
And every soldier of both hosts return
In peace and safety to his pleasant home!

Lord R. Thou speak'st a woman's, hear a warrior's wish:

Right from their native land, the stormy north,
May the wind blow, till every keel is fix'd
Immoveable in Caledonia's strand!
Then sha'ld our foes repent their bold invasion,

And roving armies shun the fatal shore.
 Lady, farewell : I leave thee not alone :
 Yonder comes one, whose love makes duty light.

[Exit.

Enter ANNA.

Anna. Forgive the rashness of your Anna's love :
 Urged by affection, I have thus presumed
 To interrupt your solitary thoughts ;
 And warn you of the hours that you neglect,
 And lose in sadness.

Lady R. So to lose my hours
 Is all the use I wish to make of time.

Anna. To blame thee, lady, suits not with my state :

But sure I am, since death first prey'd on man,
 Never did sister thus a brother mourn.
 What had your sorrows been, if you had lost,
 In early youth, the husband of your heart ?

Lady R. Oh !

Anna. Have I distress'd you with officious love,
 And ill-tim'd mention of your brother's fate ?
 Forgive me, lady : humble though I am,
 The mind I bear partakes not of my fortune :
 So fervently I love you, that to dry
 These piteous tears, I'd throw my life away.

Lady R. What power directed thy unconscious tongue

To speak as thou hast done ? To name—

Anna. I know not ;

But since my words have made my mistress tremble,
 I will speak no more ; but silent mix
 My tears with hers.

Lady R. No, thou shalt not be silent.

I'll trust thy faithful love, and thou shalt be Henceforth th' instructed partner of my woes.
 But what avails it ? Can thy feeble pity
 Roll back the flood of never-ebbing time ?
 Compel the earth and ocean to give up
 Their dead alive ?

Anna. What means my noble mistress ?

Lady R. Didst thou not ask what had my sorrows been,

If I, in early youth, had lost a husband ?—
 In the cold bosom of the earth is lodged,
 Mangled with wounds, the husband of my youth ;
 And in some cavern of the ocean lies
 My child and his !

Anna. Oh ! lady most revered !

The tale, wrapt up in your amazing words,
 Deign to unfold.

Lady R. Alas ! an ancient feud,
 Hereditary evil, was the source
 Of my misfortunes. Ruling fate decreed,
 That my brave brother should in battle save
 The life of Douglas' son, our house's foe :
 The youthful warriors vow'd eternal friendship.
 To see thy vaunted sister of his friend,
 Impatient, Douglas to Balarno came,
 Under a borrow'd name.—My heart he gain'd,
 Nor did I long refuse the hand he begg'd :
 My brother's presence authorized our marriage.
 Three weeks, three little weeks, with wings of
 down,

Had o'er us flown, when my loved lord was call'd
 To fight his father's battles ; and with him,
 In spite of all my tears, did Malcolm go,
 Scarce were they gone, when my stern sire was told,
 That the false stranger was Lord Douglas' son.
 Frantic with rage, the baron drew his sword,
 And question'd me. Alone, forsaken, faint,
 Kneeling beneath his sword, falt'ring, I took

An oath equivocal, that I ne'er would Wed one of Douglas' name. Sincerity !
 Thou first of virtues, let no mortal leave
 Thy onward path ! although the earth should gape,
 And from the gulf of hell destruction cry
 To take dissimulation's winding way.

Anna. Alas ! how few of woman's fearful kind
 Durst own a truth so hardy !

Lady R. The first truth
 Is easiest to avow. This moral learn,
 This precious moral, from my tragic tale—
 In a few days the dreadful tidings came,
 That Douglas and my brother both were slain.
 My lord ! my life ! my husband !—Mighty Heaven !
 What had I done to merit such affliction ?

Anna. My dearest lady ! many a tale of tears
 I've listened to ; but never did I hear
 A tale so sad as this.

Lady R. In the first days
 Of my distracting grief, I found myself—
 As women wish to be, who love their lords.
 But who durst tell my father ? The good priest,
 Who join'd our hands, my brother's ancient tutor,
 With his lov'd Malcolm, in the battle fell ;
 They two alone were privy to the marriage.
 On silence and concealment I resolved,
 Till time should make my father's fortune mine.
 That very night on which my son was born,
 My nurse, the only confidant I had,
 Set out with me to reach her sister's house :
 But nurse nor infant have I ever seen,
 Or heard of, Anna, since that fatal hour.

Anna. Not seen, or heard of ! Then perhaps he lives.

Lady R. No, it was dark December ; wind and rain

Had beat all night. Across the Carron lay
 The destin'd road ; and in its swelling flood
 My faithful servant perished with my child.
 Oh ! had I died, when my lov'd husband fell !
 Had some good angel oped to me the book
 Of providence, and let me read my life,
 My heart had broke, when I beheld the sum
 Of ills which, one by one, I have endured !

Anna. That Power, whose ministers good angels are,

Hath shut the book, in mercy to mankind.
 But we must leave this theme : Glenalvon comes :
 I saw him bend on you his thoughtful eyes,
 And hitherwards he slowly stalks his way.

Lady R. I will avoid him. An ungracious person
 Is doubly irksome in an hour like this.

Anna. Why speaks my lady thus of Randolph's heir ?

Lady R. Because he's not the heir of Randolph's virtues.

Subtle and shrewd, he offers to mankind
 An artificial image of himself ;
 And he with ease can vary to the taste
 Of different men, its features ;
 Yet is he brave and politic in war,
 And stands aloft in these unruly times.
 Why I describe him thus I'll tell hereafter ;
 Stay, and detain him till I reach the castle.

[Exit Lady RANDOLPH.

Anna. Oh, happiness ! where art thou to be found !

I see thou dwellest not with birth and beauty,
 Though graced with grandeur, and in wealth ar-
 ray'd :

Nor dost thou, it would seem, with virtue dwell,
 Else had this gentle lady miss'd thee not.

Enter GLENALVON.

Gle. What dost thou muse on, meditating maid?
Like some entranced and visionary seer,
On earth thou stand'st, thy thoughts ascend to heaven.

Anna. Would that I were, e'en as thou say'st, a seer,

To have my doubts by heavenly vision clear'd!

Gle. What dost thou doubt of? What hast thou to do

With subjects intricate? Thy youth, thy beauty,
Cannot be questioned: think of these good gifts;
And then thy contemplations will be pleasing.

Anna. Let women view yon monument of woe,
Then boast of beauty; who so fair as she?
But I must follow; this revolving day
Awakes the memory of her ancient woes.

[Exit ANNA.]

Gle. [Solus.] So!—Lady Randolph shuns me;
by and by

I'll woo her as the lion woos his bride.
The deed's a doing now, that makes me lord
Of these rich valleys, and a chief of power.
The season is most apt; my sounding steps
Will not be heard amidst the din of arms.
Randolph has liv'd too long: his better fate
Had the ascendant once, and kept me down:
When I had seiz'd the dame, by chance he came,
Rescued, and had the lady for his labour:
I 'scap'd unknown! a slender consolation!
Heav'n is my witness that I do not love
To sow in peril, and let others reap
The jocund harvest. Yet I am not safe:
By love, or something like it, stung, inflamed,
Madly I blabb'd my passion to his wife,
And she has threatened to acquaint him of it.
The way of woman's will I do not know:
But well I know the baron's wrath is deadly.
I will not live in fear; the man I dread
Is as a Dane to me: ay, and the man
Who stands betwixt me and my chief desire.
No bar but he; she has no kinsman near;
No brother in his sister's quarrel bold;
And for the righteous cause, a stranger's cause,
I know no chief that will defy Glenalvon. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Court, &c.

Enter Servants and a Stranger at one door, and Lady
RANDOLPH and ANNA at another.

Lady R. What means this clamour? Stranger, speak secure:

Hast thou been wrong'd? Have these rude men presumed

To vex the weary traveller on his way?

1 Serv. By us no stranger ever suffer'd wrong:
This man, with outery wild, has call'd us forth;
So sore afraid he cannot speak his fears.

Enter Attendants, Lord RANDOLPH, and a Young Man, with their swords drawn and bloody.

Lady R. Not vain the stranger's fears! How fares my lord?

Lord R. That it fares well, thanks to this gallant youth,

Whose valour saved me from a wretched death!

As down the winding dale I walk'd alone,

At the crossway, four arm'd men attacked me:

Rovers, I judge, from the licentious camp;

Who would have quickly laid Lord Randolph low,

Had not this brave and generous stranger come

Like my good angel in the hour of fate,

And, mocking danger, made my foes his own.

They turn'd upon him; but his active arm Struck to the ground, from whence they rose no more,

The fiercest two: the others fled again,

And left him master of the bloody field.

Speak, Lady Randolph; upon beauty's tongue

Dwell accents pleasing to the brave and bold.

Speak, noble dame, and thank him for thy lord.

Lady R. My lord, I cannot speak what now I feel;

My heart o'erflows with gratitude to Heav'n,

And to this noble youth.

Have you not learned of him whom we should thank?

Whom call the saviour of Lord Randolph's life?

Lord R. I ask'd that question, and he answer'd not;

But I must know who my deliverer is.

[To the Stranger.]

Str. A low-born man, of parentage obscure,

Who naught can boast but his desire to be

A soldier, and to gain a name in arms.

Lord R. Whoe'er thou art, thy spirit is ennobled

By the great King of kings! thou art ordain'd

And stamp'd a hero by the sovereign hand

Of nature! Blush not, flower of modesty

As well as valour, to declare thy birth.

Str. My name is Norval! on the Grampian hills

My father feeds his flocks: a frugal swain,

Whose constant cares were to increase his store,

And keep his only son, myself, at home.

For I had heard of battles, and I long'd

To follow to the field some warlike lord:

And Heav'n soon granted what my sire denied.

This moon, which rose last night, round as my shield,

Had not yet filled her horns, when, by her light,

A band of fierce barbarians, from the hills,

Rush'd like a torrent down upon the vale,

Sweeping our flocks and herds. The shepherds fled

For safety and for succour. I alone,

With bended bow, and quiver full of arrows,

Hover'd about the enemy, and mark'd

The road he took: then hastened to my friends,

Whom, with a troop of fifty chosen men,

I met advancing. The pursuit I led,

Till we o'ertook the spoil-encumbered foe.

We fought and conquer'd. Ere a sword was drawn,

An arrow from my bow had pierced their chief,

Who wore that day the arms which now I wear.

Returning home in triumph, I disdain'd

The shepherd's slothful life; and, having heard

That our good king had summon'd his bold peers

To lead their warriors to the Carron side,

I left my father's house, and took with me

A chosen servant to conduct my steps:

Yon trembling coward, who forsook his master.

Journeying with this intent, I pass'd these towers,

And, Heav'n-directed, came this day to do

The happy deed that gilds my humble name.

Lord R. He is as wise as brave. Was ever tale
With such a gallant modesty rehearsed?

My brave deliverer! thou shalt enter now
A nobler list, and, in a monarch's sight,
Contend with princes for the prize of fame.
I will present thee to our Scottish king,
Whose valiant spirit ever valour loved—
Ha! my Matilda! wherefore starts that tear?

Lady R. I cannot say: for various affections,
And strangely mingled, in my bosom swell;
I joy, that thou art safe; and I admire
Him and his fortunes, who hath wrought thy safety,

Obscure and friendless, he the army sought,
Bent upon peril, in the range of death
Resolved to hunt for fame, and with his sword
To gain distinction which his birth denied.
In this attempt, unknown he might have perish'd,
And gain'd, with all his valour, but oblivion.
Now graced by thee, his virtues serve no more
Beneath despair. The soldier now of hope,
He stands conspicuous;
On this my mind reflected, whilst you spoke,
And bless'd the wonder-working hand of Heaven.

Lord R. Pious and grateful ever are thy thoughts!
My deeds shall follow where thou point'st the way.
Next to myself, and equal to Glenalvon,
In honour and command shalt Norval be.

Nor. I know not how to thank you. Rude I am
In speech and manners; never, till this hour,
Stood I in such a presence; yet, my lord,
There's something in my breast, which makes me bold

To say, that Norval ne'er will shame thy favour.

Lady R. I will be sworn thou wilt not. Thou shalt be

My knight; and ever, as thou didst to-day,
With happy valour guard the life of Randolph.

Lord R. Well hast thou spoke. Let me forbid reply. [To NORVAL.]

We are thy debtors still; thy high desert
O'ertops our gratitude. I must proceed,
As was at first intended, to the camp;
Some of my train, I see, are speeding hither,
Impatient, doubtless, of their lord's delay.
Go with me, Norval, and thine eyes shall see
The chosen warriors of thy native land,
Who languish for the fight, and beat the air
With brandish'd swords.

Nor. Let us begone, my lord.

Lord R. [To Lady RANDOLPH.] About the time that the declining sun

Shall his broad orbit o'er yon hills suspend,
Expect us to return. This night once more
Within these walls I rest; my tent I pitch
To-morrow in the field. Prepare the feast.
Free is his heart, who for his country fights:
He, in the eve of battle, may resign
Himself to social pleasure; sweetest then,
When danger to a soldier's soul endears
The human joy that never may return.

[Exit RANDOLPH and NORVAL.]

Lady R. Wretch that I am! Alas! why am I so?
At every happy parent I repine!

How bless'd the mother of yon gallant Norval!
She for a living husband bore her pains,
And heard him bless her when a man was born;
She nursed her smiling infant on her breast,
Tended the child, and rear'd the pleasing boy;
She, with affection's triumph, saw the youth
In grace and comeliness surpass his peers:
Whilst I to a dead husband bore a son,
And to the roaring waters gave my child.

Anna. Alas! alas! why will you thus resume

Your grief afresh? I thought that gallant youth
Would, for a while, have won you from your woe.
On him intent you gazed, with a look
Much more delighted than your pensive eye
Has deign'd on other objects to bestow.

Lady R. Delighted, say'st thou? Oh! even there mine eye

Found fuel for my life-consuming sorrow;
I thought that, had the son of Douglas lived,
He might have been like this young gallant stranger.
While thus I mused, a spark from fancy fell
On my sad heart, and kindled up a fondness
For this young stranger, wand'ring from his home,
And like an orphan cast upon my care.
I will protect thee (said I to myself).

With all my power, and grace with all my favour.
Anna. Sure, Heaven will bless so generous a resolve.

You must, my noble dame, exert your power;
You must awake: devices will be framed,
And arrows pointed at the breast of Norval.

Lady R. Glenalvon's false and crafty head will work

Against a rival in his kinsman's love,
If I deter him not: I only can.
Bold as he is, Glenalvon will beware
How he pulls down the fabric that I raise.
I'll be the artist of young Norval's fortune.

Enter GLENALVON.

Gle. Where is my dearest kinsman, noble Randolph?

Lady R. Have you not heard, Glenalvon, of the base—

Gle. I have: and, that the villains may not 'scape,
With a strong band I have begirt the wood.
If they lurk there, alive they shall be taken,
And torture force from them th' important secret,
Whether some foe of Randolph hired their swords,
Or if—

Lady R. That care becomes a kinsman's love.
I have a counsel for Glenalvon's ear. [Exit ANNA.]

Gle. To him your counsels always are commands.

Lady R. I have not found so; thou art known to me.

Gle. Known!

Lady R. And most certain is my cause of knowledge.

Gle. What do you know? By Heaven,
You much amaze me! No created thing,
Yourself except, durst thus accost me.

Lady R. Is guilt so bold? and dost thou make a merit

Of thy pretended meekness? Thus to me,
Who, with a gentleness which duty blames,
Have hitherto concealed what, if divulged,
Would make thee nothing; or, what's worse than
that,

An outcast beggar, and unpitied too:
For mortals shudder at a crime like thine.

Gle. Thy virtue awes me. First of womankind!
Permit me yet to say, that the fond man,
Whom love transports beyond strict virtue's bounds,
If he is brought by love to misery,
In fortune ruin'd, and in mind forlorn,
Unpitied cannot be. Pity's the alms,
Which, on such beggars, freely is bestowed;
For mortals know, that love is still their lord,
And o'er their vain resolves advances still;
As fire, when kindled by our shepherds, moves
Through the dry heath before the fanning wind.

Lady R. Reserve these accents for some other ear:

To love's apology I listen not.
Mark thou my words; for it is meet thou shouldst.
His brave deliverer Randolph here retains.
Perhaps his presence may not please thee well;
But at thy peril practise aught against him;
Let not thy jealousy attempt to shake
And loosen the good root he has in Randolph:
Whose favourites I know thou hast supplanted.
Thou look'st at me, as if thou fain wouldst pry
Into my heart. 'Tis open as my speech.
I give this early caution, and put on
The curb, before thy temper breaks away.
The friendless stranger my protection claims:
His friend I am, and be not thou his foe. [Exit.

Gle. Child that I was, to start at my own shadow,
And be the shallow fool of coward conscience!
I am not what I have been; what I should be.
The darts of destiny have almost pierced
My marble heart. Had I one grain of faith
In holy legends, and religious tales,
I should conclude, there was an arm above
That fought against me, and malignant turn'd
To catch myself, the subtle snare I set.
Why, rape and murder are not simple means!
Th' imperfect rape to Randolph gave a spouse;
And the intended murder introduced
A favourite, to hide the son from me;
And, worst of all, a rival. Burning hell!
This were thy centre, if I thought she loved him!
'Tis certain she contemns me; nay, commands me,
And waves the flag of her displeasure o'er me,
In his behalf. And shall I thus be braved?
Curb'd, as she calls it, by dame Chastity?
Infernal fiends, if any fiends there are
More fierce than love, ambition, and revenge,
Rise up, and fill my bosom with your fires!
Darkly a project peers upon my mind,
Like the red moon when rising in the east,
Cross'd and divided by strange-coloured clouds.
I'll seek the slave who came with Norval hither,
And for his cowardice was spurned from him.
I've known such follower's rankled bosom breed
Venom most fatal to his heedless lord. [Exit.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Court, &c., as before.

Enter ANNA.

Anna. Thy vassals, grief, great nature's order break,
And change the noontide to the midnight hour.
Whilst Lady Randolph rests, I will walk forth,
And taste the air that breathes on yonder bank.

Enter Servant.

Serv. One of the vile assassins is secured,
That struck this morning at Lord Randolph's life.
We found the villain lurking in the wood;
With dreadful imprecations he denies
All knowledge of the crime. But this is not
His first essay: these jewels were conceal'd
In the most secret places of his garment;
Belike the spoils of some that he has murder'd.

Anna. Let me look on them. Ha! here is a
heart,

The chosen crest of Douglas' valiant name!
These are no vulgar jewels. Guard the wretch.
[Exit ANNA.

Enter Servants with a Prisoner.

Pri. I know no more than does the child unborn
Of what you charge me with.

1 Ser. You say so, sir!

But torture soon shall make you speak the truth.
Behold, the lady of Lord Randolph comes;
Prepare yourself to meet her just revenge.

Enter Lady RANDOLPH and ANNA.

Anna. Summon your utmost fortitude before
You speak with him.

Your dignity, your fame,
Are now at stake. Think of the fatal secret
Which in a moment from your lips may fly.

Lady R. Thou shalt behold me, with a desperate
heart,
Hear how my infant perished. See, he kneels.

[The Prisoner kneels.

Pri. Heav'n bless that countenance, so sweet and mild!

A judge like thee makes innocence more bold.

[Rises.

Oh, save me, lady, from these cruel men,
Who have attack'd and seized me; who accuse
Me of intended murder. As I hope
For mercy at the judgment-seat of Heaven,
The tender lamb, that never nipp'd the grass,
Is not more innocent than I of murder.

Lady R. Of this man's guilt what proof can ye produce.

1 Ser. We found him lurking in the hollow glen.
When view'd and call'd upon, amazed he fled;
We overtook him, and inquired from whence
And what he was: he said he came from far,
And was upon his journey to the camp.
Not satisfied with this, we search'd his clothes,
And found these jewels; whose rich value plead
Most powerfully against him. Hard he seems,
And old in villany. Permit us to try
His stubbornness against the torture's force.

Pri. Oh, gentle lady, by your lord's dear life,
Which these weak hands, I swear, did ne'er assail,
And by your children's welfare, spare my age!
Let not the iron tear my ancient joints,
And my gray hairs bring to the grave with pain.

Lady R. Account for these; thine own they cannot be;

For these I say: be steadfast to the truth:
Detected falsehood is most certain death.

[ANNA removes the Servants, and returns.

Pri. Alas! I'm sore beset! let never man,
For sake of lucre, sin against his soul!
Eternal Justice is in this most just!
I, guiltless now, must former guilt reveal.

Lady R. Oh! Anna, hear!—Once more I charge thee, speak

The truth direct; for these to me foretell
And certify a part of thy narration,
With which, if the remainder tallies not,
An instant and a dreadful death abides thee.

Pri. Then, thus abjured, I'll speak to you as just
As if you were the minister of Heaven,
Sent down to search the secret sins of men.
Some eighteen years ago, I rented land
Of brave Sir Malcolm, then Balmoro's lord;
But, falling to decay, his servants seized
All that I had, and then turn'd me and mine
(Four helpless infants, and their weeping mother)

Out to the mercy of the winter winds.
A little hovel by the river's side
Received us: there, hard labour, and the skill
In fishing, which was formerly my sport,
Supported life. While thus we poorly lived,
One stormy night, as I remember well,
The wind and rain beat hard upon our roof;
Red came the river down, and loud and oft
The angry spirit of the water shriek'd.
At the dead hour of night was heard the cry
Of one in jeopardy. I rose, and ran
To where the circling eddy of a pool,
Beneath the ford, used oft to bring within
My reach whatever floating thing the stream
Had caught. The voice was ceased; the person lost;

But looking sad and earnest on the waters,
By the moon's light I saw, whirl'd round and round,

A basket: soon I drew it to the bank,
And, nestled curious, there an infant lay.

Lady R. Was he alive?

Pri. He was.

Lady R. Inhuman that thou art!
How couldst thou kill what waves and tempests spar'd?

Pri. I am not so inhuman.

Lady R. Didst thou not?

Pri. The needy man, who has known better days,
One whom distress has spited at the world,
Is he, whom tempting fiends would pitch upon
To do such deeds as make the prosperous men
Lift up their hands, and wonder who could do them.
And such a man was I; a man declined,
Who saw no end of black adversity:
Yet, for the wealth of kingdoms, I would not
Have touch'd that infant with a hand of harm.

Lady R. Ha! dost thou say so? Then perhaps he lives!

Pri. Not many days ago he was alive.

Lady R. Oh! heavenly powers! did he then die so lately?

Pri. I did not say he died: I hope he lives.
Not many days ago these eyes beheld
Him, flourishing in youth, and health, and beauty.

Lady R. Where is he now?

Pri. Alas! I know not where.

Lady R. Oh! fate! I fear thee still. Thou rid-dler, speak
Direct and clear, else I will search thy soul.

Pri. Fear not my faith, though I must speak my shame.

Within the cradle where the infant lay,
Was stored a mighty store of gold and jewels;
Tempted by which, we did resolve to hide,
From all the world, the wonderful event,
And like a peasant breed this noble child.
That none might mark the change of our estate,
We left the country, travelled to the north,
Bought flocks and herds, and gradually brought forth

Our secret wealth. But Heaven's all-seeing eye
Beheld our avarice, and smote us sore.
For one by one all our own children died,
And he, the stranger, sole remain'd the heir
Of what indeed was his. Fain then would I,
Who with a father's fondness loved the boy,
Have trusted him, now in the dawn of youth,
With his own secret: but my anxious wife,
Foreboding evil, never would consent.
Meanwhile the stripling grew in years and beauty;
And, as we oft observed, he bore himself,

Not as the offspring of our cottage blood;
For nature will break out: mild with the mild,
But with the froward he was fierce as fire,
And night and day he talk'd of war and arms.
I set myself against his warlike bent:
But all in vain; for when a desperate band
Of robbers from the savage mountains came—

Lady R. Eternal Providence! what is thy name?

Pri. My name is Norval; and my name he bears.

Lady R. 'Tis he! 'tis he himself! It is my son;
Oh! sovereign mercy! 'twas my child I saw!

Pri. If I, amidst astonishment and fear,
Have of your words and gestures rightly judged,
Thou art the daughter of my ancient master;
The child I rescued from the flood is thine!

Lady R. With thee dissimulation now were vain.
I am, indeed, the daughter of Sir Malcolm;
The child thou rescu'dst from the flood is mine.

Pri. Bless'd be the hour that made me a poor man!

My poverty hath sav'd my master's house!

Lady R. Thy words surprise me: sure thou dost not feign!

The tear stands in thine eye: such love from thee
Sir Malcolm's house deserved not, if aright
Thou told'st the story of thine own distress.

Pri. Sir Malcolm of our barons was the flower:
The fastest friend, the best and kindest master.

But ah! he knew not of my sad estate.
After the battle, where his gallant son,
Your own brave brother, fell, the good old lord
Grew desperate and reckless of the world;
And never, as he erst was wont, went forth
To overlook the conduct of his servants.
By them I was thrust out, and them I blame:
May Heaven so judge me as I judge my master!
And God so love me as I love his race!

Lady R. His race shall yet reward thee.
Remember'st thou a little lonely hut,
That like a holy hermitage appears
Among the cliffs of Carron?

Pri. I remember

The cottage of the cliffs.

Lady R. 'Tis that I mean;
There dwells a man of venerable age,
Who in my father's service spent his youth:
Tell him I sent thee, and with him remain,
Till I shall call upon thee to declare,
Before the king and nobles, what thou now
To me hast told. No more but this, and thou
Shalt live in honour all thy future days;
Thy son so long, shall call thee father still.
And all the land shall bless the man who saved
The son of Douglas, and Sir Malcolm's heir.
Remember well my words: if thou shouldst meet
Him, whom thou call'st thy son, still call him so;
And mention nothing of his noble father.

Pri. Fear not that I shall mar so fair an harvest,
By putting in my sickle ere 'tis ripe.
Why did I leave my home and ancient dame?
'To find the youth, to tell him all I knew,
And make him wear these jewels in his arms,
Which might, I thought, be challenged, and so bring

To light the secret of his noble birth.

[Lady RANDOLPH goes towards the Servants.]

Lady R. This man is not th' assassin you suspected,

Though chance combined some likelihoods against him.

He is the faithful bearer of the jewels
To their right owner, whom in haste he seeks.

'Tis meet that you should put him on his way,
Since your mistaken zeal has dragged him hither.

[Exeunt Stranger and Servants.]

My faithful Anna! dost thou share my joy?
I know thou dost. Unparallel'd event!
Reaching from Heaven to earth, Jehovah's arm
Snatch'd from the waves, and brings me to my son!
Judge of the widow, and the orphan's father,
Accept a widow's and a mother's thanks
For such a gift!—What does my Anna think
Of the young eaglet of a valiant nest?
How soon he gaz'd on bright and burning arms,
Spurn'd the low dunghill where his fate had thrown
him,

And tower'd up to the region of his sire!

Anna. How fondly did your eyes devour the boy?
Mysterious nature, with the unseen cord
Of powerful instinct, drew you to your own.

Lady R. The ready story of his birth believed,
Suppress'd my fancy quite, nor did he owe
To any likeness my so sudden favour:
But, now I long to see his face again,
Examine every feature, and find out
The lineaments of Douglas, or my own.
But, most of all, I long to let him know
Who his true parents are, to clasp his neck,
And tell him all the story of his father.

Anna. With wary caution you must bear yourself

In public, lest your tenderness break forth,
And in observers stir conjectures strange.
To-day the baron started at your tears.

Lady R. He did so, Anna! well thy mistress knows

If the least circumstance, mote of offence,
Should touch the baron's eye, his sight would be
With jealousy disorder'd.

Anna. That demon haunts you still:
Behold Glenalvon.

Lady R. Now I shun him not.

This day I brav'd him in behalf of Norval:
Perhaps too far: at least my nicer fears
For Douglas thus interpret. [Exit ANNA.]

Enter GLENALVON.

Gle. Noble dame!
The hovering Dane at last his men hath landed:
No band of pirates; but a mighty host,
That comes to settle where their valour conquers;
To win a country, or to lose themselves.

Lady R. How many mothers shall bewail their sons!

How many widows weep their husbands slain!
Ye dames of Denmark, e'en for you I feel,
Who, sadly sitting on the sea-beat shore,
Long look for lords that never shall return.

Gle. Oft has th' unconquer'd Caledonian sword
Widow'd the North. The children of the slain
Come, as I hope, to meet their fathers' fate.
The monster war, with her infernal brood,
Loud yelling fury, and life-ending pain,
Are objects suited to Glenalvon's soul.

Scorn is more grievous than the pains of death;
Reproach more piercing than the pointed sword.

Lady R. I scorn thee not but when I ought to scorn;

Nor e'er reproach, but when insulted virtue
Against audacious vice asserts herself.
I own thy worth, Glenalvon; none more apt
Than I to praise thy eminence in arms,
And be the echo of thy martial fame.

No longer vainly feed a guilty passion;
Go and pursue a lawful mistress, Glory.
Upon the Danish crests redeem thy fault,
And let thy valour be the shield of Randolph.

Gle. One instant stay, and hear an alter'd man.
When beauty pleads for virtue, vice abash'd
Flies its own colours, and goes o'er to virtue.
I am your convert; time will show how truly:
Yet one immediate proof I mean to give.
That youth for whom your ardent zeal to-day,
Somewhat too haughtily, defied your slave,
Amidst the shock of armies I'll defend,
And turn death from him with a guardian arm.

Lady R. Act thus, Glenalvon, and I am thy friend:

But that's thy least reward. Believe me, sir,
The truly generous is the truly wise;
And he, who loves not others, lives unblest'd.

[Exit Lady RANDOLPH.]

Gle. [Solus.] Amen! and virtue is its own reward.

I think, that I have hit the very tone
In which she loves to speak. Honey'd assent,
How pleasing art thou to the taste of man,
And woman also! flattery direct
Seldom disgusts. They little know mankind,
Who doubt its operation: 'tis my key,
And opens the wicket of the human heart.
How far I have succeeded now, I know not.
Yet I incline to think her stormy virtue
Is lull'd awhile; 'tis her alone I fear:
Whilst she and Randolph live, and live in faith
And amity, uncertain is my tenure.

That slave of Norval's I have found most apt:
I show'd him gold, and he has pawn'd his soul
To say and swear whatever I suggest.
Norval, I'm told, has that alluring look,
'Twixt man and woman, which I have observed
To charm the nicer and fantastic dames,
Who are, like Lady Randolph, full of virtue.
In raising Randolph's jealousy, I may
But point him to the truth. He seldom errs,
Who thinks the worst he can of womankind.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Court.—Flourish of Trumpets.

Enter Lord RANDOLPH, attended.

Lord R. Summon an hundred horse by break of day

To wait our pleasure at the castle gate.

Lady R. Alas! my lord! I've heard unwelcome news:

The Danes are landed.

Lord R. Ay, no inroad this
Of the Northumbrian, bent to take a spoil:

No sportive war, no tournament essay
Of some young knight, resolv'd to break a spear,
And stain with hostile blood his maiden arms.
The Danes are landed: we must beat them back,
Or live the slaves of Denmark.

Lady R. Dreadful times!

Lord R. The fenceless villages are all forsaken:

The trembling mothers and their children lodged
In well-girt towers and castles : whilst the men
Retire indignant. Yet, like broken waves,
They but retire more awful to return.

Lady R. Immense, as fame reports, the Danish host!

Lord R. Were it as numerous as loud fame reports,

An army knit like ours would pierce it through :
Brothers that shrink not from each other's side,
And fond companions, fill our warlike files :
For his dear offspring, and the wife he loves,
The husband and the fearless father arm.
In vulgar breasts heroic ardour burns,
And the poor peasant mates his daring lord.

Lady R. Men's minds are temper'd, like their swords, for war.

Hence, early graves ; hence the lone widow's life ;
And the sad mother's grief-embitter'd age.
Where is our gallant guest ?

Lord R. Down in the vale
I left him managing a fiery steed,
Whose stubbornness had foil'd the strength and skill

Of every rider. But behold he comes,
In earnest conversation with Glenalvon.

Enter NORVAL and GLENALVON.

Glenalvon, with the lark arise : go forth
And lead my troops that lie in yonder vale :
Private I travel to the royal camp :

Norval, thou go'st with me. But say, young man,
Where didst thou learn so to discourse of war,
And in such terms as I o'erheard to-day ?
War is no village science, nor its phrase
A language taught among the shepherd swains.

Nor. Small is the skill my lord delights to praise
In him he favours. Hear from whence it came.
Beneath a mountain's brow, the most remote
And inaccessible, by shepherds trod,

In a deep cave, dug by no mortal hand,
A hermit lived ; a melancholy man,
Who was the wonder of our wand'ring swains :
Austere and lonely, cruel to himself,

Did they report him ; the cold earth his bed,
Water his drink, his food the shepherd's alms.
I went to see him, and my heart was touch'd
With reverence and pity. Mild he spake,
And, entering on discourse, such stories told
As made me oft revisit his sad cell.

For he had been a soldier in his youth ;
And fought in famous battles, when the peers
Of Europe, by the bold Godfredo led,
Against th' usurping infidel display'd
The blessed cross, and won the Holy Land.
Pleased with my admiration, and the fire
His speech struck from me, the old man would shake

His years away, and act his young encounters ;
Then having show'd his wounds, he'd sit him
down,

And all the live-long day discourse of war
To help my fancy, in the smooth green turf
He cut the figures of the marshall'd hosts ;
Described the motions, and explain'd the use
Of the deep column, and the lengthen'd line,
The square, the crescent, and the phalanx firm.
For all that Saracen or Christian knew
Of war's vast art was to this hermit known.

[Trumpets at a distance.]

Lord R. From whence these sounds ?

Enter an Officer.

Offi. My lord, the trumpets of the troops of Lorn :
Their valiant leader hails the noble Randolph.

Lord R. Mine ancient guest ! does he the warriors lead ?

Has Denmark roused the brave old knight to arms ?

Offi. No ; worn with warfare, he resigns the sword ;

His eldest hope, the valiant John of Lorn,
Now leads his kindred bands.

Lord R. Glenalvon, go.

With hospitality's most strong request

Entreat the chief. [Exit GLENALVON.]

Offi. My lord, requests are vain.

He urges on, impatient of delay,
Stung with the tidings of the foe's approach.

Lord R. May victory sit on the warrior's plume !
Bravest of men ! his flocks and herds are safe ;
Remote from war's alarms his pastures lie,
By mountains inaccessible secured ;
Yet foremost he into the plain descends
Eager to bleed in battles not his own.

Such were the heroes of the ancient world
Contemners they of indolence and gain ;
But still for love of glory and of arms,
Prone to encounter peril, and to lift
Against each strong antagonist the spear.
I'll go and press the hero to my breast.

[Exit with Officer.]

Lady R. The soldier's loftiness, the pride and pomp
Investing awful war, Norval, I see,
Transport thy youthful mind.

Nor. Ah ! should they not ?
Bless'd be the hour I left my father's house ;
I might have been a shepherd all my days,
And stole obscurely to a peasant's grave ;
Now, if I live, with mighty chiefs I stand ;
And, if I fall, with noble dust I lie.

Lady R. There is a generous spirit in thy breast,
That could have well sustain'd a prouder fortune.
Since lucky chance has left us here alone,
Unseen, unheard, by human eye or ear,
I will amaze thee with a wond'rous tale.

Nor. Let there be danger, lady, with the secret,
That I may hug it to my grateful heart,
And prove my faith. Command my sword, my life :
These are the sole possessions of poor Norval.

Lady R. Know'st thou these gems ?

Nor. Durst I believe my eyes,
I'd say I knew them, and they were my father's.

Lady R. Thy father's, say'st thou ? Ah, they were thy father's !

Nor. I saw them once, and curiously inquired
Of both my parents, whence such splendour came.
But I was check'd, and more could never learn.

Lady R. Then learn of me ; thou art not Nor-val's son.

Nor. Not Norval's son !

Lady R. Nor of a shepherd sprung.

Nor. Lady, who am I, then ?

Lady R. Noble thou art,

For noble was thy sire.

Nor. I will believe—

Oh, tell me further ! Say, who was my father ?

Lady R. Douglas !

Nor. Lord Douglas, whom to-day I saw ?

Lady R. His younger brother.

Nor. And in yonder camp ?

Lady R. Alas !

Nor. You make me tremble—Sighs and tears !
Lives my brave father ?

Lady R. Ah, too brave indeed !

He fell in battle ere thyself was born.

Nor. Ah me, unhappy, ere I saw the light !

But does my mother live ? I may conclude,

From my own fate, her portion has been sorrow.

Lady R. She lives ! but wastes her life in constant woe,

Weeping her husband slain, her infant lost.

Nor. You that are skill'd so well in the sad story

Of my unhappy parents, and with tears

Bewail their destiny, now have compassion

Upon the offspring of the friends you loved.

Oh, tell me who and where my mother is !

Oppress'd by a base world, perhaps she bends

Beneath the weight of other ills than grief,

And, desolate, implores of Heav'n the aid

Her son should give. It is, it must be so—

Your countenance confesses that she is wretched !

Oh, tell me her condition ! Can the sword—

Who shall resist me in a parent's cause ?

Lady R. Thy virtue ends her woe—My son !
my son !

Nor. Art thou my mother ?

Lady R. I am thy mother, and the wife of Douglas ! [Falls upon his neck.]

Nor. Oh, Heaven and earth ! how wond'rous is my fate !

Ever let me kneel !

Lady R. Image of Douglas ! Fruit of fatal love !
All that I owe thy sire I pay to thee.

Nor. Respect and admiration still possess me,

Checking the love and fondness of a son ;

Yet I was filial to my humble parents.

But did my sire surpass the rest of men,

As thou excellest all of womankind ?

Lady R. Arise, my son. In me thou dost behold
The poor remains of beauty once admired.

Yet in my prime I equalled not thy father :

His eyes were like the eagle's, yet sometimes

Likely the dove's ; and, as he pleased, he won

All hearts with softness, or with spirit awed.

Nor. How did he fall ? Sure 'twas a bloody field
When Douglas died. Oh, I have much to ask !

Lady R. Hereafter thou shalt hear the lengthen'd tale

Of all thy father's and thy mother's woes.

At present this :—thou art the rightful heir

Of yonder castle, and the wide domains,

Which now Lord Randolph, as my husband, holds.

But thou shalt not be wrong'd ; I have the power

To right thee still. Before the king I'll kneel,

And call Lord Douglas to protect his blood.

Nor. The blood of Douglas will protect itself.

Lady R. But we shall need both friends and favour, boy,

To wrest thy lands and lordship from the gripe

Of Randolph and his kinsman. Yet I think

My tale will move each gentle heart to pity,

My life incline the virtuous to believe.

Nor. To be the son of Douglas is to me

Inheritance enough. Declare my birth,

And in the field I'll seek for fame and fortune.

Lady R. Thou dost not know what perils and injustice

Await the poor man's valour. Oh, my son !

The noblest blood in all the land's abashed,

Having no lackey but pale poverty.

Too long hast thou been thus attended, Douglas,

Too long hast thou been deemed a peasant's child ;

The wanton heir of some inglorious chief
Perhaps has scorn'd thee in thy youthful sports.

Whilst thy indignant spirit swelled in vain.

Such contumely thou no more shalt bear :

But how I purpose to redress thy wrongs

Must be hereafter told. Prudence directs

That we should part before yon chief's return.

Retire, and from thy rustic follower's hand

Receive a billet, which thy mother's care,

Anxious to see thee, dictated before

This casual opportunity arose

Of private conference. Its purport mark ;

For, as I there appoint, we meet again.

Leave me, my son ; and frame thy manners still

To Norval's, not to noble Douglas' state.

Nor. I will remember. Where is Norval now ?

That good old man !

Lady R. At hand conceal'd he lies,

An useful witness. But beware, my son,

Of yon Glenalvon ; in his guilty breast

Resides a villain's shrewdness, ever prone

To false conjecture. He hath griev'd my heart.

Nor. Has he indeed ? Then let yon false Glenalvon

Beware of me. [Exit.]

Lady R. There burst the smother'd flame,—

Oh, thou all-righteous and eternal king !

Who father of the fatherless art call'd,

Protect my son !—Thy inspiration, Lord !

Hath fill'd his bosom with that sacred fire,

Which in the breasts of his forefathers burn'd :

Set him on high like them, that he may shine

The star and glory of his native land !

Then let the minister of death descend,

And bear my willing spirit to its place.

Yonder they come. How do bad women find

Unchanging aspects to conceal their guilt

When I, by reason and by justice urged,

Full hardly can dissemble with these men

In nature's pious cause ?

Enter Lord RANDOLPH and GLENALVON.

Lord R. Yon gallant chief,

Of arms enamour'd, all repose disclaims.

Lady R. Be not, my lord, by his example sway'd.

Arrange the business of to-morrow now,

And when you enter speak of war no more. [Exit.]

Lord R. 'Tis so, by Heav'n ! her mien, her voice, her eye,

And her impatience to begone, confirm it.

Gle. He parted from her now. Behind the mount,

Amongst the trees, I saw him glide along.

Lord R. For sad sequester'd virtue she's re-nown'd.

Gle. Most true, my lord.

Lord R. Yet this distinguish'd dame

Invites a youth, the acquaintance of a day,

Alone to meet her at the midnight hour.

This assignation [Shows a letter] the assassin freed,

Her manifest affection for the youth,

Might breed suspicions in a husband's brain,

Whose gentle consort all for love had wedded ;

Much more in mine. Matilda never lov'd me.

Let no man after me a woman wed,

Whose heart he knows he has not ; though she brings

A mine of gold, a kingdom for her dowry.

For, let her seem, like the night's shadowy queen,

Cold and contemplative—he cannot trust her ;

She may, she will, bring shame and sorrow on him ;

The worst of sorrow and the worst of shames !

Gle. Yield not, my lord, to such afflicting thoughts,

But let the spirit of an husband sleep,
Till your own senses make a sure conclusion.
This billet must to blooming Norval go:
At the next turn awaits my trusty spy;
I'll give it him refitted for his master.
In the close thicket take your secret stand;
The moon shines bright, and your own eyes may judge

Of their behaviour.

Lord R. Thou dost counsel well.

Gle. Permit me now to make one slight essay;
Of all the trophies, which vain mortals boast,
By wit, by valour, or by wisdom won,
The first and fairest in a young man's eye
Is woman's captive heart. Successful love
With glorious fumes intoxicates the mind,
And the proud conqueror in triumph moves,
Air-born, exalted above vulgar men.

Lord R. And what avails this maxim?

Gle. Much, my lord:

Withdraw a little; I'll accost young Norval,
And with ironical derisive counsel
Explore his spirit. If he is no more
Than humble Norval, by thy favour raised,
Brave as he is, he'll shrink astonish'd from me.
But if he be the favourite of the fair,
Loved by the first of Caledonia's dames,
He'll turn upon me, as the lion turns
Upon the hunter's spear.

Lord R. 'Tis shrewdly thought.

Gle. When we grow loud, draw near. But let my lord

His rising wrath restrain.—

[Lord RANDOLPH retires.]

'Tis strange, by Heaven!

That she should run full tilt her fond career
To one so little known. She, too, that seem'd
Pure as the winter stream, when ice, emboss'd,
Whitens its course. Even I did think her chaste,
Whose charity exceeds not. Precious sex!
Whose deeds lascivious pass Glenalvon's thoughts!

Enter NORVAL.

His port I love: he's in a proper mood
To chide the thunder, if at him it roar'd.— [Aside.]
Has Norval seen the troops.

Nor. The setting sun

With yellow radiance lighten'd all the vale
And, as the warriors mov'd, each polish'd helm,
Corslet, or spear, glanced back his gilded beams.
The hill they climbed, and, halting at its top,
Of more than mortal size, tow'ring, they seem'd
An host angelic, clad in burning arms.

Gle. Thou talk'st it well; no leader of our host
In sounds more lofty speaks of glorious war.

Nor. If I shall e'er acquire a leader's name,
My speech will be less ardent. Novelty
Now prompts my tongue, and youthful admiration
Vents itself freely; since no part is mine
Of praise pertaining to the great in arms.

Gle. You wrong yourself, brave sir; your martial deeds

Have rank'd you with the great. But mark me, Norval:

Lord Randolph's favour now exalts your youth
Above his veterans of famous service.

Let me, who know these soldiers, counsel you.
Give them all honour: seem not to command;
Else they will scarcely brook your late-sprung power,
Which nor alliance props, nor birth adorns.

Nor. Sir, I have been accustom'd all my days
To hear and speak the plain and simple truth:
And, though I have been told that there are men
Who borrow friendship's tongue to speak their scorn,

Yet in such language I am little skill'd.
Therefore I thank Glenalvon for his counsel,
Although it sounded harshly. Why remind Me of my birth obscure? Why slur my power
With such contemptuous terms?

Gle. I did not mean

To gall your pride, which now I see is great.

Nor. My pride!

Gle. Suppress it as you wish to prosper.
Your pride's excessive. Yet, for Randolph's sake,
I will not leave you to its rash direction.
If thus you swell, and frown at high-born men,
Think you, will they endure a shepherd's scorn?

Nor. A shepherd's scorn!

Gle. Yes, if you presume
To bend on soldiers these disdainful eyes,
As if you took the measure of their minds,
And said in secret, you're no match for me,
What will become of you?

Nor. If this were told — [Aside.]
Hast thou no fears for thy presumptuous self?

Gle. Ha! dost thou threaten me?

Nor. Didst thou not hear?

Gle. Unwillingly I did; a nobler foe
Had not been questioned thus. But such as thee —
Nor. Whom dost thou think me?

Gle. Norval.

Nor. So I am —

And who is Norval in Glenalvon's eye?

Gle. A peasant's son, a wandering beggar-boy;

At best no more: even if he speaks the truth.

Nor. False as thou art, dost thou suspect my truth?

Gle. Thy truth; thou'rt all a lie; and false as hell

Is the vain-glorious tale thou told'st to Randolph.

Nor. If I were chain'd, unarm'd, and bedrid old,
Perhaps I should revile; but, as I am,
I have no tongue to rail. The humble Norval
Is of a race, who strive not but with deeds.

Did I not fear to freeze thy shallow valour,
And make thee sink too soon beneath my sword,
I'd tell thee — what thou art. I know thee well.

Gle. Didst thou not know Glenalvon, born to command

Ten thousand slaves like thee —

Nor. Villain, no more!

Draw and defend thy life. I did design
To have defy'd thee in another cause;
But Heaven accelerates its vengeance on thee.
Now for my own and Lady Randolph's wrongs.

Enter Lord RANDOLPH.

Lord R. Hold, I command you both. The man that stirs

Makes me his foe.

Nor. Another voice than thine,
That threat had vainly sounded, noble Randolph.

Gle. Hear him, my lord; he's wondrous condescending!

Mark the humility of shepherd Norval!

Nor. Now you may scoff in safety. [Sheathes his sword.]

Lord R. Speak not thus,
Taunting each other; but unfold to me
The cause of quarrel; then I will judge betwixt you.

Nor. Nay, my good lord, though I revere you much,
My cause I plead not, nor demand your judgment.
I blush to speak; I will not, cannot speak
The opprobrious words, that I from him have borne.
To the liege lord of my dear native land
I owe a subject's homage—but even him
And his high arbitration I'd reject.
Within my bosom reigns another lord;
Honour, sole judge and umpire of itself.
If my free speech offend you, noble Randolph,
Revoke your favours, and let Norval go
Hence as he came, alone, but not dishonoured.

Lord R. Thus far I'll mediate with impartial voice:

The ancient foe of Caledonia's land
Now waves his banners o'er her frightened fields;
Suspend your purpose till your country's arms
Repel the bold invader: then decide
The private quarrel.

Gle. I agree to this.

Nor. And I.

Enter Servant.

Serv. The banquet waits.

Lord R. We come.

[Exit with Servant.]

Gle. Norval,

Let not our variance mar the social hour,
Nor wrong the hospitality of Randolph.
Nor frowning anger, nor yet wrinkled hate,
Shall stain my countenance. Smooth thou thy brow:
Nor let our strife disturb the gentle dame.

Nor. Think not so lightly, sir, of my resentment.
When we contend again, our strife is mortal.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter DOUGLAS.

Dou. This is the place, the centre of the grove;
Here stands the oak, the monarch of the wood.
How sweet and solemn is this midnight scene:
The silver moon, unclouded, holds her way
Through skies where I could count each little star.
The fanning west wind scarcely stirs the leaves;
The river, rushing o'er its pebbled bed,
Imposes silence, with a stilly sound.
In such a place as this, at such an hour,
If ancestry can be in aught believed,
Descending spirits have conversed with man,
And told the secrets of the world unknown.

Enter Old NORVAL.

Old Nor. 'Tis he. But what if he should chide me hence.
His just reproach I fear.

[DOUGLAS turns aside, and sees him.]

Forgive, forgive;
Canst thou forgive the man, the selfish man,
Who bred Sir Malcolm's heir a shepherd's son?

Dou. Welcome to me. Thou art my father still:
Thy wished-for presence now completes my joy.
Welcome to me; my fortunes thou shalt share,
And ever honoured with thy Douglas live.

Old Nor. And dost thou call me father? Oh, my son!

I think that I could die, to make amends
For the great wrong I did thee. 'Twas my crime
Which in the wilderness so long conceal'd
The blossom of thy youth.

Dou. Not worse the fruit,
That in the wilderness the blossom blow'd.
Amongst the shepherds, in the humble cot,
I learn'd some lessons, which I'll not forget,
When I inhabit yonder lofty towers.
I, who was once a swain, will ever prove
The poor man's friend; and when my vassals bow,
Norval shall smooth the crested pride of Douglas.

Old Nor. Let me but live to see thine exaltation!
Yet grievous are my fears. Oh, leave this place,
And those unfriendly towers!

Dou. Why should I leave them?

Old Nor. Lord Randolph and his kinsman seek your life.

Dou. How know'st thou that?

Old Nor. I will inform you how.

When evening came, I left the secret place
Appointed for me by your mother's care,
And fondly trod in each accustomed path
That to the castle leads. Whilst thus I ranged,
I was alarm'd with unexpected sounds
Of earnest voices. On the persons came.
Unseen I lurk'd, and heard them name
Each other as they talk'd, Lord Randolph this,
And that Glenalvon. Still of you they spoke,
And of the lady; threat'ning was their speech,
Though but imperfectly my ear could hear it.
'Twas strange, they said, a wonderful discovery,
And ever and anon they vow'd revenge!

Dou. Revenge! For what?

Old Nor. For being what you are,
Sir Malcolm's heir: how else have offended.
When they were gone, I hid me to my cottage,
And there sat musing how I best might find
Means to inform you of their wicked purpose,
But I could think of none. At last, perplexed,
I issued forth, encompassing the tower
With many a weary step and wishful look.
Now Providence hath brought you to my sight,
Let not your too courageous spirit scorn
The caution which I give.

Dou. I scorn it not;
My mother warned me of Glenalvon's baseness;
But I will not suspect the noble Randolph.
In our encounter with the vile assassins,
I mark'd his brave demeanour; him I'll trust.

Old Nor. I fear you will too far.

Dou. Here in this place
I wait my mother's coming; she shall know
What thou hast told; her counsel I will follow,
And cautious ever are a mother's counsels.
You must depart: your presence may prevent
Our interview.

Old Nor. My blessing rest upon thee!
Oh, may Heaven's hand, which saved thee from the wave

And from the sword of foes, be near thee still;
Turning mischance, if aught hangs o'er thy head,
All upon mine!

[Exit.]

Dou. He loves me like a parent;
And must not, shall not, lose the son he loves,
Although his son has found a nobler father.
Eventful day! how hast thou changed my state!
Once on the cold and winter-shaded side
Of a bleak hill, mischance had rooted me,
Never to thrive, child of another soil;

Transplanted now to the gay sunny vale,
Like the green thorn of May my fortune flowers.
Ye glorious stars! high Heaven's resplendent host!
To whom I oft have of my lot complain'd,
Hear and record my soul's unaltered wish!
Dead or living, let me but be renown'd!
May Heaven inspire some fierce gigantic Dane,
To give a bold defiance to our host:
Before he speaks it out I will accept;
Like Douglas conquer, or like Douglas die.

Enter Lady RANDOLPH.

Lady R. My son! I heard a voice—

Dou. The voice was mine.

Lady R. Didst thou complain alone to nature's ear,

That thus in dusky shades, at midnight hours,
By stealth the mother and the son should meet?

[Embraces him.]

Dou. No; on this happy day, this better birth-day,

My thoughts and words are all of hope and joy.

Lady R. Sad fear and melancholy still divide
The empire of my breast with hope and joy.

Now hear what I advise—

Dou. First, let me tell

What may the tenour of your counsel change.

Lady R. My heart forebodes some evil!

Dou. 'Tis not good—

At eve, unseen by Randolph and Glenalvon,
The good old Norval in the grove o'erheard
Their conversation: oft they mentioned me,
With dreadful threatenings; you they sometimes named;

'Twas strange, they said, a wonderful discovery;
And ever and anon they vowed revenge!

Lady R. Defend us, gracious Heaven! we are betray'd;

They have found out the secret of thy birth:

It must be so. That is the great discovery:

Sir Malcolm's heir is come to claim his own,

And they will be revenged. Perhaps even now,

Armed and prepared for murder, they but wait

A darker and more silent hour, to break

Into the chamber where they think thou sleep'st.

This moment, this, Heaven hath ordained to save
thee!

Fly to the camp, my son!

Dou. And leave you here?

No; to the castle let us go together:

Call up the ancient servants of your house,

Who in their youth did eat your father's bread,

Then tell them loudly, that I am your son,

If in the breasts of men one spark remains

Of sacred love, fidelity, or pity,

Some in your cause will arm. I ask but few,

To drive these spoilers from my father's house.

Lady R. O Nature, Nature! what can check thy force?

Thou genuine offspring of the daring Douglas!

But rush not on destruction; save thyself,

And I am safe. To me they mean no harm.

Thy stay but risks thy precious life in vain.

That winding path conducts thee to the river;

Cross where thou see'st a broad and beaten way,

Which, running eastward, leads thee to the camp;

Instant demand admittance to Lord Douglas;

Show him these jewels, which his brother wore.

Thy look, thy voice, will make him feel the truth,

Which I, by certain proof, will soon confirm.

Dou. I yield me, and obey; but yet my heart
Bleeds at this parting. Something bids me stay

And guard a mother's life. Oft have I read
Of wondrous deeds by one bold arm achieved.
Our foes are two. No more; let me go forth,
And see if any shield can guard Glenalvon.

Lady R. If thou regard'st thy mother, or rever'st
Thy father's memory, think of this no more.

One thing I have to say before we part:

Long wert thou lost; and thou art found, my child,

In a most fearful season. War and battle

I have great cause to dread. Too well I see

Which way the current of thy temper sets;

To-day I've found thee. Oh! my long-lost hope,

If thou to giddy valour giv'st the rein,

To-morrow I may lose my son for ever!

The love of thee, before thou saw'st the light,

Sustain'd my life when thy brave father fell.

If thou shalt fall, I have not love nor hope

In this waste world! My son, remember me!

Dou. What shall I say? How can I give you comfort?

The god of battles of my life dispose

As may be best for you! for whose dear sake,

I will not bear myself as I resolved.

But yet consider as no vulgar name

That which I boast sounds amongst martial men,

How will inglorious caution suit my claim?

The post of fate unshrinking I maintain.

My country's foes must witness who I am;

On the invaders' heads I'll prove my birth,

Till friends and foes confess the genuine strain.

If in this strife I fall, blame not your son,

Who, if he liv'd not honour'd, must not live.

Lady R. I will not utter what my bosom feels.

Too well I love that valour which I warn.

Farewell, my son! my counsels are but vain.

[Embracing.]

And as high Heav'n hath will'd it, all must be.

Gaze not on me, thou wilt mistake the path:

I'll point it out again. [Exeunt.]

[Just as they are separating,

Enter from the Wood, Lord RANDOLPH and GLENALVON.

Lord R. Not in her presence.

Now—

Gle. I am prepar'd.

Lord R. No: I command thee, stay:

I go alone: it never shall be said

That I took odds to combat mortal man.

The noblest vengeance is the most complete.

[Exit—GLENALVON makes some steps to the same side of the stage, listens, and speaks.]

Gle. Demons of death, come settle on my sword,
And to a double slaughter guide it home!

The lover and the husband both must die.

Lord R. [Behind the scenes.] Draw, villain! draw!

Dou. [Without.] Assail me not, Lord Randolph;
Not as thou lov'st thyself. [Clashing of swords.]

Gle. Now is the time—

[He runs out.]

Enter Lady RANDOLPH, faint and breathless.

Lady R. Lord Randolph, hear me; all shall be thine own;

But spare! O spare my son!

Enter DOUGLAS, with a sword in each hand.

Dou. My mother's voice!

I can protect thee still.

Lady R. He lives! he lives!

For this, for this, to Heav'n eternal praise!

But sure, I saw thee fall.

Dou. It was Glenalvon.

Just as my arm had master'd Randolph's sword,
The villain came behind me; but I slew him.

Lady R. Behind thee! Ah! thou'rt wounded!
Oh, my child,

How pale thou look'st! And shall I lose thee now?

Dou. Do not despair: I feel a little faintness;
I hope it will not last. [Leaning on his sword.]

Lady R. There is no hope!

And we must part! The hand of death is on thee!

O, my belov'd child! O, Douglas, Douglas!

[DOUGLAS growing more and more faint.]

Dou. Too soon we part: I have not long been Douglas.

O destiny! hardly thou deal'st with me:

Clouded and hid, a stranger to myself,

In low and poor obscurity I've lived.

Lady R. Has Heaven preserved thee for an end like this?

Dou. Oh, had I fallen as my brave fathers fell,
Like them I should have smiled and welcomed death:

Turning with fatal arm the tide of battle.

But thus to perish by a villain's hand!

Cut off from nature's and from glory's course,

Which never mortal was so fond to run!

Lady R. Hear, justice, hear! are these the fruits of virtue? [DOUGLAS falls.]

Dou. Unknown I die; no tongue shall speak of
me;

Some noble spirits, judging by themselves,

May yet conjecture what I might have proved,

And think life only wanting to my fame:

But who shall comfort thee?

Lady R. Despair, despair!

Dou. Oh, had it pleased high Heaven to let me live

A little while!—my eyes, that gaze on thee;

Grow dim apace!—my mother— [Dies.]

Enter Lord RANDOLPH and ANNA.

Lord R. Thy words, thy words of truth have pierced my heart,

I am the stain of knighthood and of arms.

Oh! if my brave deliverer survives

The traitor's sword—

Anna. Alas! look there, my lord.

Lord R. The mother and her son! how curst I am!

Was I the cause? No: I was not the cause.

Yon matchless villain did seduce my soul—

To frantic jealousy.

Anna. My lady lives.

Lord R. But my deliverer's dead.

Lady R. [Recovering.] Where am I now? Still in this wretched world!

Grief cannot break a heart so hard as mine.

Lord R. Oh, misery!

Amidst thy raging grief I must proclaim

My innocence!

Lady R. Thy innocence!

Lord R. My guilt

Is innocence compared with what thou think'st at it.

Lady R. Of thee I think not: what have I to do

With thee, or any thing? My son! my son!

My beautiful! my brave! how proud was I

Of thee, and of thy valour! my fond heart

O'erflowed this day with transport, when I thought

Of growing old amidst a race of thine.

A little while

Was I a wife! a mother not so long?

What am I now?—I know.—But I shall be

That only whilst I please; for such a son,

And such a husband, make a woman bold.

[Runs out.]

Lord R. Follow her, Anna; I myself would follow,

But in this rage she must abhor my presence.

[Exit ANNA.]

Cursed, cursed Glenalvon, he escaped too well,

Though slain and baffled by the hand he hated.

Foaming with rage and fury to the last,

Cursing his conqueror, the felon died.

Enter ANNA.

Anna. My lord! my lord!

Lord R. Speak; I can hear of horror.

Anna. Horror, indeed!

Lord R. Matilda?—

Anna. Is no more:

She ran, she flew like lightning up the hill,

Nor halted till the precipice she gain'd,

Beneath whose low'ring top the river falls

Ingulf'd in rifted rocks.

Oh, had you seen her last despairing look!

Upon the brink she stood, and cast her eyes

Down on the deep; then, lifting up her head

And her white hands to Heaven, seeming to say,

Why am I forced to this? she plunged herself

Into the empty air.

Lord R. I will not vent,

In vain complaints, the passion of my soul.

I'll to the battle, where the man, that makes Me turn aside, must threaten worse than death.

Thou, faithful to thy mistress, take this ring,

Full warrant of my power. Let every rite

With cost and pomp upon their funerals wait;

For Randolph hopes he never shall return.

[Exeunt.]

END OF DOUGLAS.

ISABELLA;

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter VILLEROY and CARLOS.

Car. This constancy of yours will establish an immortal reputation among the women.

Vil. If it would establish me with Isabella—

Car. Follow her, follow her: Troy town was won at last.

Vil. I have followed her these seven years, and now but live in hopes.

Car. But live in hopes! Why hope is the ready road, the lover's baiting place; and, for aught you know, but one stage short of the possession of your mistress.

Vil. But my hopes, I fear, are more of my own making than hers; and proceed rather from my wishes, than any encouragement she has given me.

Car. That I can't tell: the sex is very various: there are no certain measures to be prescribed or followed, in making our approaches to the women. All that we have to do, I think, is to attempt them in the weakest part. Press them but hard, and they will all fall under the necessity of a surrender at last. That favour comes at once; and sometimes when we least expect it.

Vil. I shall be glad to find it so. [Going.] I'm going to visit her.

Car. What interest a brother-in-law can have with her, depend upon.

Vil. [Turns.] I know your interest, and I thank you.

Car. You are prevented; see the mourner comes: She weeps, as seven years were seven hours; So fresh, unfading is the memory Of my poor brother's, Biron's death; I leave you to your opportunity. [Exit VILLEROY. Though I have taken care to root her from our house,

I would transplant her into Villeroy's— There is an evil fate that waits upon her, To which I wish him wedded—only him: His upstart family, with haughty brow, (Though Villeroy and myself are seeming friends,) Looks down upon our house; his sister too, Whose hand I ask'd, and was with scorn refused, Lives in my breast, and fires me to revenge.—

[Looking.

They bend this way.—

Perhaps, at last, she seeks my father's doors;

They shall be shut, and he prepared to give

The beggar and her brat a cold reception.

That boy's an adder in my path. [Going.] They come,

I'll stand apart, and watch their motions. [Exit.

Enter VILLEROY and ISABELLA, with her Child.

Isa. Why do you follow me? you know I am A bankrupt every way; too far engaged Ever to make return: I own you have been More than a brother to me, my friend: And at a time when friends are found no more, A friend to my misfortunes.

Vil. I must be. Always your friend.

Isa. I have known and found you Truly my friend; and would I could be yours: But the unfortunate cannot be friends.

Pray begone,
Take warning, and be happy.

Vil. Happiness!

There's none for me without you.—

What serve the goods of fortune for? To raise
My hopes, that you at last will share them with me.

Isa. I must not hear you.

Vil. Thus, at this awful distance, I have served
A seven years' bondage. Do I call it bondage,
When I can never wish to be redeem'd?
No, let me rather linger out a life
Of expectation, that you may be mine,
Than be restored to the indifference
Of seeing you, without this pleasing pain:
I've lost myself, and never would be found,
But in these arms.

Isa. Oh, I have heard all this!

—But must no more—the charmer is no more:
My buried husband rises in the face
Of my dear boy, and chides me for my stay:
Canst thou forgive me, child! [Embracing Child.]

Vil. What can I say!

The arguments that make against my hopes
Prevail upon my heart, and fix me more;
When yet a virgin, free, and undisposed,
I loved, but saw you only with mine eyes:
I could not reach the beauties of your soul:
I have since lived in contemplation,
And long experience of your growing goodness:
What then was passion, is my judgment now,
Through all the several changes of your life,
Confirm'd and settled in adoring you.

Isa. Nay, then I must begone. If you are my friend,

If you regard my little interest,
No more of this.

I'm going to my father: he needs not an excuse
To use me ill: pray leave me to the trial.

Vil. I'm only born to be what you would have
me,

The creature of your power, and must obey,
In every thing obey you. I am going:
But all good fortune go along with you. [Exit.]

Isa. I shall need all your wishes—

[Crosses to Count BALDWIN'S house.—Knocks.
Lock'd! and fast!

Where is the charity that used to stand
In our forefathers' hospitable days
At great men's doors,
Like the good angel of the family,
With open arms taking the needy in,
To feed and clothe, to comfort and relieve them?
Now even their gates are shut against the poor.

[Knocks again.]

SAMPSON opens the door and comes out.

Samp. Well, what's to do now, I trow? You knock as loud as if you were invited; and that's more than I heard of; but I can tell you, you may look twice about for a welcome in a great man's family, before you find it, unless you bring it along with you.

Isa. I hope I bring my welcome along with me:
Is your lord at home?

Samp. My lord at home!

Isa. Count Baldwin lives here still?

Samp. Ay, ay, Count Baldwin does live here: and I am his porter; but what's that to the purpose, good woman, of my lord's being at home?

Isa. Why don't you know me, friend?

Samp. Not I, not I, mistress; I may have seen you before, or so; but men of employment must forget their acquaintances; especially such as we are never to be the better for.

[Going to shut the door.]

Nurse appears at the door.

Nurse. Handsomer words would become you, and mend your manners, Sampson: do you know who you prate to?

Isa. I am glad you know me, Nurse.

Nurse. [Coming out.] Marry, Heav'n forbid, madam, that I should ever forget you, or my little jewel: pray go in. [ISABELLA goes in with her Child.] Now my blessing go along with you, wherever you go, or whatever you are about. Fie,
Sampson, how could'st thou be such a Saracen?
A Turk would have been a better Christian, than to have done so barbarously by so good a lady.

Samp. Why, look you, Nurse, I know you of old: by your good will, you would have a finger in every body's pie, but mark the end on't: if I am called to account about it, I know what I have to say.

Nurse. Marry come up here; say your pleasure, and spare not. Refuse his eldest son's widow and poor child the comfort of seeing him? She does not trouble him so often.

Samp. Not that I am against it, Nurse, but we are but servants, you know; we must have no likings, but our lord's, and must do as we are ordered. But what is the business, Nurse? You have been in the family before I came into the world: what's the reason, pray, that this daughter-in-law, who has so good a report in every body's mouth, is so little set by by my lord?

Nurse. Why, I tell you, Sampson, more or less.
I'll tell the truth, that's my way, you know, without adding or diminishing.

Samp. Aye, marry, Nurse.

Nurse. My lord's eldest son, Biron by name, the son of his bosom, and the son that he would have loved best, if he had as many as king Pyramus of Troy—this Biron, as I was saying, was a lovely sweet gentleman, and, indeed, nobody could blame his father for loving him: he was a son for the king of Spain; Heaven bless him, for I was his nurse. But now I come to the point, Sampson;
this Biron, without asking the advice of his friends, hand over head, as young men will have their vagaries, not having the fear of his father before his eyes, as I may say, wilfully marries this Isa-bella.

Samp. How, wilfully! he should have had her consent, methinks.

Nurse. No, wilfully marries her; and which was worse, after she had settled all her fortune upon a nunnery, which she broke out of to run away with him. They say they had the church's forgiveness, but I had rather it had been his father's.

Samp. Why, in good truth, I think our young master was not in the wrong but in marrying without a portion.

Nurse. That was the quarrel, I believe, Sampson; upon this, my old lord would never see him: dis-inherited him; took his younger brother, Carlos, into favour, whom he never cared for before; and,
at last, forced Biron to go to the siege of Candy,
where he was killed.

Samp. Alack-a-day, poor gentleman!

Nurse. For which my old lord hates her, as if she had been the cause of his going there.

Samp. Alas, poor lady; she has suffered for it; she has lived a great while a widow.

Nurse. A great while indeed, for a young woman, Sampson.

Samp. Gad so; here they come; I won't venture to be seen.

[They retire and confer in the back ground.]

Enter from the door Count BALDWIN, followed by ISABELLA and her Child.

C. Bald. Whoever of your friends directed you, Misguided and abused you—There's your way:

[Pointing to door.]

What could you expect from me?

Isa. Oh, I have nothing to expect on earth!

But misery is very apt to talk:

I thought I might be heard.

C. Bald. What can you say?

Is there in eloquence, can there be in words,

A recompensing pow'r, a remedy,

A reparation of the injuries,

The great calamities, that you have brought

On me and mine? You have destroyed those hopes

I fondly raised, through my declining life,

To rest my age upon; and most undone me.

Isa. I have undone myself too.

C. Bald. Speak it again;

Say still you are undone; and I will hear you,

With pleasure hear you.

Isa. Would my ruin please you?

C. Bald. Beyond all other pleasures.

Isa. Then you are pleased—for I am most undone.

C. Bald. I pray'd but for revenge, and Heav'n has heard,

And sent it to my wishes: these gray hairs

Would have gone down in sorrow to the grave,

Which you have dug for me, without the thought,

The thought of leaving you more wretched here.

Isa. Indeed I am most wretched—

I lost with Biron all the joys of life:

But now its last supporting means are gone.

All the kind helps that Heav'n in pity raised,

In charitable pity to our wants,

At last have left us: now bereft of all,

But this last trial of a cruel father,

To save us both from sinking. Oh, my child!

Kneel with me, knock at nature in his heart:

[Both kneel to him.]

Let the resemblance of a once-loved son

Speak in this little one, who never wrong'd you,

And plead the fatherless and widow's cause.

Oh, if you ever hope to be forgiven,

As you will need to be forgiven too,

Forget our faults, that Heaven may pardon yours!

C. Bald. How dare you mention Heaven? Call to mind

Your perjured vows; your plighted, broken faith

To Heav'n, and all things holy; were you not

Devoted, wedded to a life recluse,

The sacred habit on, profess'd and sworn,

A votary for ever? Can you think

The sacrilegious wretch, that robs the shrine,

Is thunder-proof?

Isa. There, there, began my woes.

Oh! had I never seen my Biron's face,

Had he not tempted me, I had not fall'n,

But still continued innocent and free

Of a bad world, which only he had pow'r

To reconcile, and make me try again.

C. Bald. Your own inconstancy

Reconciled you to the world:

He had no hand to bring you back again,

But what you gave him. Circe, you prevail'd
Upon his honest mind; and what he did

Was first inspired by you.

Isa. Not for myself—for I am past the hopes

Of being heard—but for this innocent—

And then I never will disturb you more.

C. Bald. I almost pity the unhappy child:

But being yours—

Isa. Look on him as your son's;

And let his part in him answer for mine.

Oh, save, defend him, save him from the wrongs

That fall upon the poor!

C. Bald. It touches me—

And I will save him.—[Snatches the Child's hand.]

—But to keep him safe,

Never come near him more.

Isa. What! take him from me?

No, we must never part;—[Pulls the Child away from him.—] 'tis the last hold

Of comfort I have left; and when he fails

All goes along with him: Oh! could you be

The tyrant to divorce life from my life?

I live but in my child.

No, let me pray in vain, and beg my bread

From door to door, to feed his daily wants,

Rather than always lose him.

C. Bald. Then have your child, and feed him with your prayers. Away!

Isa. Then Heaven have mercy on me!

[Exit, with Child.]

C. Bald. You rascal slave, what do I keep you for? How came this woman in?

Samp. [Both advance.] Why, indeed, my lord, I did as good as tell her before, my thoughts upon the matter—

C. Bald. Did you so, sir? Now then tell her mine: tell her I sent you to her. There's one more to provide for. Begone, go all together.

Take any road but this to beg or starve in, but never, never see me more.

[Exit into his house.]

[Exit SAMPSON and Nurse, weeping.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter VILLEROY and CARLOS.

Vil. My friend, I fear to ask—but Isabella—

The lovely widow's tears, her orphan's cries,

Thy father must feel for them?—No, I read,

I read their cold reception in thine eyes—

Thou pitiest them—though Baldwin—but I spare
him

For Carlos's sake; thou art no son of his.

There needs not this to endear thee more to me.

[Embrace.]

Car. My Villeroy, the fatherless, the widow,
Are terms not understood within these gates—

You must forgive him; sir, he thinks this woman

Is Biron's fate, that hurried him to death—

I must not think on't, lest my friendship stagger.

My friend's, my sister's mutual advantage,

Have reconciled my bosom to its task.

Vil. Advantage! think not I intend to raise

An interest from Isabella's wrongs.

Your father may have interested ends

In her undoing ; but my heart has none ;
Her happiness must be my interest,
And that I would restore.

Car. Why, so, I mean.

These hardships, that my father lays upon her,
I'm sorry for, and wish I could prevent ;
But he will have his way. Since there's no hope
From her prosperity, her change of fortune
May alter the condition of her thoughts,
And make for you.

Vil. She is above her fortune.

Car. Try her again. Women commonly love
According to the circumstances they are in.

Vil. Common women may.

No, though I live but in the hopes of her,
And languish for th' enjoyment of those hopes ;
I'd rather pine in a consuming want
Of what I wish, than have the blessing mine,
From any reason but consenting love.
Oh ! let me never have it to remember,
I could betray her coldly to comply :
When a clear gen'rous choice bestows her on me,
I know too well the unequalled gift :
I would not have it, but to value it.

Car. Take your own way ; remember, what I offer'd

Came from a friend.

Vil. I understand it so.

I'll serve her for herself, without the thought
Of a reward. [Exit.]

Car. Agree that point between you.
If you marry her any way, you do my business.
I know him—What his generous soul intends Ripens my plots—I'll first to Isabella,—
I must keep up appearances with her too. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in ISABELLA's House.

ISABELLA sitting, and Nurse discovered. ISABELLA's Son at play.

Isa. Sooner, or later, all things pass away,
And are no more. The beggar and the king,
With equal steps, tread forward to their end ;
The reconciling grave
Swallows distinction first, that made us foes ;
Then all alike lie down in peace together.
When will that hour of peace arrive for me ?
In Heav'n I shall find it. Not in Heaven,
If my old tyrant father can dispose
Of things above. But there his interest
May be as poor as mine, and want a friend
As much as I do here. [Weeping.]

Nurse. Good madam, be comforted.

Isa. [Rises.] Do I deserve to be this outcast wretch,
Abandon'd thus, and lost ? But 'tis my lot,
The will of Heav'n, and I must not complain :
I will not for myself : let me bear all
The violence of your wrath ; but spare my child :
Let not my sins be visited on him :
They are ; they must ; a general ruin falls
On every thing about me : thou art lost,
Poor Nurse, by being near me.

Nurse. I can work, or beg, to do you service.

Isa. Could I forget

What I have been, I might the better bear
What I am destined to. Wild hurrying thoughts
Start every way from my distracted soul,
To find out hope, and only meet despair.
What answer have I ?

Enter SAMPSON.

Samp. Why, truly, very little to the purpose :
like a Jew as he is, he says you have had more already than the jewels are worth: he wishes you would rather think of redeeming 'em, than expect any more money upon 'em. [Exit SAMPSON.]

Isa. So :—poverty at home, and debts abroad !
My present fortune bad ; my hopes yet worse !
What will become of me ?
This ring is all I have left of value now ;
'Twas given me by my husband ; his first gift
Upon our marriage : I've always kept it
With my best care, the treasure next my life :
And now but part with it to support life,
Which only can be dearer. [Takes off the ring.]

Take it, Nurse,
'Twill stop the cries of hunger for a time ;
Take care of it :
Manage it as the last remaining friend
That would relieve us. [Exit Nurse.] Heav'n can only tell

Where we shall find another [goes back and sits.]

My dear boy ! [Embraces him.]
The labour of his birth was lighter to me
Than of my fondness now ; my fears for him
Are more than, in that hour of hovering death,
They could be for myself—He minds me not,
His little sports have taken up his thoughts :
Oh, may they never feel the pangs of mine ! [Rises.]
Thinking will make me mad : why must I think,
When no thought brings me comfort ?

Enter Nurse.

Nurse. Oh, madam ! you are utterly ruined and undone ; your creditors of all kinds are come in upon you ; they have mustered up a regiment of rogues, that are come to plunder your house, and seize upon all you have in the world: they are below. What will you do, madam ?

Isa. Do ! nothing ! no, for I am born to suffer.

Enter CARLOS, hastily.—Nurse goes back.

Car. Oh, sister ? can I call you by that name,
And be the son of this inhuman man.

Invererate to your ruin ?
Do not think I am akin to his barbarity.
I must abhor my father's usage of you.

Can you think
Of any way that I may serve you in ?
But what enrages most my sense of grief,
My sorrow for your wrongs, is, that my father,
Foreknowing well the storm that was to fall,
Has ordered me not to appear for you.

Isa. I thank your pity ; my poor husband fell
For disobeying him ; do not you stay
To venture his displeasure too for me.

Car. You must resolve on something. [Exit.]

Isa. Let my fate
Determine for me ; I shall be prepared.
The worst that can befall me is to die.
Hark, they are coming : let the torrent roar :
It can but overwhelm me in its fall ;
And life and death are now alike to me.

[Exit.—Nurse follows, leading the Child.]

SCENE III.—Antechamber in Isabella's House.

Enter CARLOS and VILLEROY, with Officers.

Vil. No farther violence—
The debt in all is but four thousand crowns ;

Were it ten times the sum, I think you know
My fortune very well can answer it.

You have my word for this : I'll see you paid.

Offi. That's as much as we can desire : so we have the money, no matter whence it comes.

Vil. To-morrow you shall have it.

Car. Thus far all's well—

And now my sister comes to crown the work.

Isa. [Without.] Where are these rav'n'ing blood-hounds, that pursue

In a full cry, gaping to swallow me ?

Enter ISABELLA, Nurse, and Child.—Nurse and Child stand a little back.

I meet your rage, and come to be devour'd ;
Say, which way are you to dispose of me ;
To dungeons, darkness, death ?

Car. Have patience.

Isa. Patience !

Offi. You'll excuse us, we are but in our office.

Debts must be paid.

Isa. My death will pay you all. [Distraughtly.]

Offi. While there is law to be had, people will have their own.

Vil. 'Tis very fit they should ; but pray be gone.

To-morrow certainly. [Exeunt Officers.]

Isa. What of to-morrow ?

Must I be reserved for fresh afflictions ?

Vil. For long happiness of life, I hope.

Isa. There is no hope for me.

The load grows light, when we resolve to bear :
I'm ready for my trial.

Car. Pray, be calm,

And know your friends.

Isa. My friends ! Have I a friend ?

Car. A faithful friend ; in your extremest need,

Villeroi came in to save you—

Isa. Save me ! How ?

Car. By satisfying all your creditors.

Isa. Which way ? for what ?

Vil. Let me be understood,

And then condemn me : you have given me leave

To be your friend ; and in that only name

I now appear before you. I could wish

There had been no occasion of a friend,

Because I know you hate to be obliged ;

And still more loath to be obliged by me.

Isa. 'Twas that I would avoid— [Aside.]

Vil. I'm most unhappy that my services

Can be suspected to design upon you ;

I have no farther ends than to redeem you

From fortune's wrongs ; to show myself at last,

What I have long profess'd to be, your friend :

Allow me that ; and to convince you more,

That I intend only your interest,

Forgive what I have done, and in amends

(If that can make you any, that can please you)

I'll tear myself for ever from my hopes,

Stifle this flaming passion in my soul,

And mention my unlucky love no more.

Isa. This generosity will ruin me. [Aside.]

Vil. Nay, if the blessing of my looking on you

Disturbs your peace, I will do all I can

To keep away, and never see you more. [Going.]

Car. [Stopping him.] You must not go.

Vil. Could Isabella speak

Those few short words, I should be rooted here,

And never move but upon her commands.

Car. [Goes to her.] Speak to him, sister ; do not throw away

A fortune that invites you to be happy.

In your extremity he begs your love ;

And has deserved it nobly. Think upon

Your lost condition, helpless and alone.

Though now you have a friend, the time must come

That you will want one ; him you may secure

To be a friend, a father, a husband to you.

Isa. A husband !

Car. You have discharged your duty to the dead,

And to the living ! 'tis a wilfulness

Not to give way to your necessities,

That force you to this marriage.

Nurse. [Leading forward the Child.] What must become of this poor innocence ?

[To the Child.]

Car. He wants a father to protect his youth,

And rear him up to virtue : you must bear

The future blame, and answer to the world,

When you refuse the easy, honest means

Of taking care of him.

Isa. Do not think I need

Your reasons to confirm my gratitude. —

I have a soul that's truly sensible

Of your great worth, and busy to contrive,

[To VILLEROY.]

If possible, to make you a return.

Vil. Oh, easily possible !

Isa. It cannot be your way : my pleasures are Buried, and cold in my dead husband's grave ;

And I should wrong the truth, myself, and you,

To say that I can ever love again.

I owe this declaration to myself :

But as a proof that I owe all to you,

If, after what I have said, you can resolve

To think me worth your love—[VILLEROY advances to her.]—Where am I going ?

You cannot think it ; 'tis impossible.

Vil. Impossible !

Isa. You should not ask me now, nor should I grant ;

I am so much obliged, that to consent

Would want a name to recommend the gift :

'Twould show me poor, indebted, and compelled,

Designing, mercenary : and I know

You would not wish to think I could be bought.

Vil. Be bought ! where is the price that can pretend

To bargain for you ? Not in Fortune's power.

The joys of Heav'n, and love, must be bestowed ;

They are not to be sold, and cannot be deserved.

Isa. Some other time I'll hear you on this subject.

Vil. Nay, then there is no time so fit for me.

[Following her.]

Since you consent to hear me, hear me now ;

That you may grant : you are above

[Takes her hand.]

The little forms which circumscribe your sex ;

We differ but in time, let that be mine.

Isa. You think fit

To get the better of me, and you shall ;

Since you will have it so—I will be yours.

[CARLOS exults apart.]

Vil. I take you at your word.

Isa. I give you all,

My hand : and would I had a heart to give :

But if it ever can return again,

'Tis wholly yours.

Vil. Oh ecstasy of joy !

Leave that to me. If all my services,

If all that man can folly say or do,

Can beget love, love shall be born again,

Oh, Carlos ! now my friend and brother too :

And, Nurse, I have eternal thanks for thee.

[Exeunt Nurse and Child.]

This night you must be mine.
Let me command in this, and all my life
Shall be devoted to you.

Isa. On your word,
Never to press me to put off these weeds,
Which best become my melancholy thoughts,
You shall command me.

Vil. Witness, Heaven and earth,
Against my soul, when I do anything
To give you a disquiet.

Car. I long to wish you joy.

Vil. You'll be a witness of my happiness?

Car. For once I'll be my sister's father,
And give her to you.

Vil. Next my Isabella,
Be near my heart: I am for ever yours. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Count Baldwin's House.

Enter Count Baldwin and Carlos.

C. Bald. Married to Villeroy, say'st thou?

Car. Yes, my lord.

Last night the priest perform'd his holy office,
And made them one.

C. Bald. Misfortune join them!
And may her violated vows pull down
A lasting curse, a constancy of sorrow
On both their heads.

Car. Soon he'll hate her;
Though warm and violent in his raptures now,
When full enjoyment palls his sicken'd sense,
And reason with satiety returns,
Her cold constrain'd acceptance of his hand
Will gall his pride, which (though of late o'er-power'd

By stronger passions) will, as they grow weak,
Rise in full force, and pour its vengeance on her.

C. Bald. Now, Carlos, take example to thy aid,
Let Biron's disobedience, and the curse
He took into his bosom, prove a warning,
A monitor to thee, to keep thy duty
Firm and unshaken.

Car. [Kneels.] May those rankling wounds,
Which Biron's disobedience gave my father,
Be heal'd by me.

C. Bald. With tears I thank thee, Carlos—
[Raises him.]

And may'st thou ever feel those inward joys,
Thy duty gives thy father—but, my son,
We must not let resentment choke our justice;

'Tis fit that Villeroy know he has no claim
From me, in right of Isabella.—Biron (Whose name brings tears), when wedded to this woman,

By me abandon'd, sunk the little fortune
His uncle left, in vanity and fondness:
I am possess'd of those your brother's papers,
Which now are Villeroy's, and, should aught remain,

In justice it is his; from me to him
You shall convey them—follow me, and take them.

[Exit Count Baldwin.]

Car. Yes, I will take them; but ere I part with them,

I will be sure my interest will not suffer
By these his high, refined, fantastic notions
Of equity and right.—What a paradox
Is man! My father here, who boasts his honour,
And even but now was warm in praise of justice,
Can steel his heart against the widow's tears,
And infant's wants: the widow and the infant
Of Biron; of his son, his fav'rite son.
'Tis ever thus weak minds, who court opinion,
And dead to virtuous feeling, hide their wants
In pompous affectation—Now to Villeroy—
Ere this his friends, for he is much beloved,
Crowd to his house, and with their nuptial songs
Awake the wedded pair: I'll join the throng,
And in my face, at least, bear joy and friendship.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Ball-room in Villeroy's House, and music across back ground, with MAURICE, and other friends of VILLEROY.

Enter a Servant.

Maur. Where's your master, my good friend?

Serv. Within, sir,

Preparing for the welcome of his friends.

Maur. Acquaint him we are here; yet stay,

[Exit Servant.]

The voice of music gently shall surprise him,
And breathe our salutations to his ear.
Strike up the strain to Villeroy's happiness,
To Isabella's—But he's here already.

Enter VILLEROY.

Vil. My friends,
Welcome all—

What means this preparation? [Seeing the music.]

Maur. A slight token

Of our best wishes for your growing happiness.—

You must permit our friendship—

Vil. You oblige me—

Maur. But your lovely bride,
That wonder of her sex, she must appear,
And add new brightness to this happy morning.

Vil. She is not yet prepared; and let her will,
My worthiest friend, determine her behaviour;
To win, and not to force her disposition,
Has been my seven years' task. She will anon
Speak welcome to you all. The music stays.

[VILLEROY and his friends seat themselves.]

EPITHALAMIUM.

Woman. Let all, let all be gay,
Begin the rapturous lay,
Let mirth, let mirth and joy,
Each happy hour employ,
Of this fair bridal day.

Vil. [Rises.] I thank you for this proof of your affection:

I am so much transported with the thoughts

Of what I am, I know not what I do.

My Isabella!—but, possessing her,

Who would not lose himself?—

Where's Carlos now?

Methinks I am but half myself without him.

Maur. This is wonderful! married, and yet in raptures.

Vil. Oh! when you all get wives, and such as mine

(If such another woman can be found),

You will rave too, dote on the dear content,

And prattle in their praise out of all bounds.
I cannot speak my bliss ! 'Tis in my head.
'Tis in my heart, and takes up all my soul—
The labour of my fancy.—

Enter ISABELLA and Child.

My Isabella ! Oh, the joy of my heart,
That I have leave at last to call you mine !
But let me look upon you, view you well.
This is a welcome gallantry indeed !
I durst not ask, but it was kind to grant,
Just at this time : dispensing with your dress
Upon this second day to greet our friends.

Isa. Black might be ominous :

I would not bring ill-luck along with me.

Vil. Oh ! if your melancholy thoughts could change

With shifting of your dress—Time has done cures
Incredible this way, and may again.

Isa. I could have wish'd, if you had thought it fit,

Our marriage had not been so public.

Vil. Do not you grudge me my excess of love ;
That was a cause it could not be conceal'd :
Besides, 'twould injure the opinion
I have of my good fortune, having you ;
And lessen it in other people's thoughts.

Enter CARLOS.

Vil. My Carlos too, who came in to the support
Of our bad fortune, has an honest right,
In better times to share the good with us.

Car. I come to claim that right, to share your joy ;

To wish you joy ; and find it in myself ;
For a friend's happiness reflects a warmth,
A kindly comfort into every heart
That is not envious.

[Leads the Child, and appears to fondle him.]

Vil. He must be a friend indeed,
Who is not envious of a happiness
So absolute as mine : there is the cause ;
Thank her for what I am, and what must be :

[Music flourish.]

I see you mean a second entertainment.

My dearest Isabella, you must hear
The raptures of my friends ; from thee they spring ;
Thy virtues have diffused themselves around,
And made them all as happy as myself.

Isa. I feel their favours with a grateful heart,
And willingly comply.

[VILLEROY, ISABELLA, CARLOS, and Child sit ; attendants stand at their backs.]

EPITHALAMIUM.

Man. Ye love-wing'd hours, your flight,
Your downy flight prepare,
Bring every soft delight
To soothe the brave and fair.
Hail, happy pair, thus in each other bless'd ;
Be ever free from care, of ev'ry joy possess'd !

DUET.

Take the gifts the gods intend ye ;
Grateful meet the proffer'd joy ;
Truth and honour shall attend ye ;
Charms that ne'er can change or cloy.

Oh, the raptures of possessing,
Taking beauty to thy arms !

Oh, the joy, the lasting blessing,
When with virtue beauty charms !
Purer flames shall gently warm ye ;
Love and honour both shall charm thee.

Car. You'll take my advice another time, sister.

[ISABELLA droops—all rise.]

Vil. When have you done ? A rising smile
Stole from her thoughts, just redd'ning on her cheek,

And you have dash'd it.

Car. I'm sorry for't.

Vil. My friends, you will forgive me, when I own,
I must prefer her peace to all the world !

Come, Isabella, let us lead the way :

Within we'll speak our welcome to our friends,
And crown the happy festival with joy.

[Exeunt.—Scene closes.]

SCENE III.—A Room.

Enter SAMPSON and Nurse, laughing.

Samp. Ay, marry, nurse, here's a master, indeed ! He'll double our wages for us ! If he comes on as fast with my lady as he does with his servants, we are all in the way to be well pleased.

Nurse. He's in a rare humour ; if she be in as good a one—

Samp. If she be, marry, we may e'en say, they have begot it upon one another.

Nurse. Well ; why don't you go back again to your old Count ? You thought your throat cut, I warrant you, to be turned out of a nobleman's service.

Samp. For the future, I will never serve in a house where the master or mistress of it lie single : they are out of humour with every body when they are not pleased themselves. Now, this matrimony makes every thing go well. There's mirth and money stirring about when those matters go on as they should do.

Nurse. Indeed, this matrimony, Sampson—

Samp. Ah, nurse ! this matrimony is a very good thing—but what, now my lady is married, I hope we shall have company come to the house : there's something always coming from one gentleman or other upon those occasions, if my lady loves company. This feasting looks well, nurse.

Nurse. Odso, my master ! we must not be seen.

[Exeunt.]

Enter VILLEROY, with a letter, and ISABELLA.

Vil. I must away this moment—see his letter, Sign'd by himself : alas ! he could no more ; My brother's desperate, and cannot die
In peace, but in my arms.

Isa. So suddenly !

Vil. Suddenly taken, on the road to Brussels,
To do us honour, love ; unfortunate !
Thus to be torn from thee, and all those charms,
Though cold to me and dead.

Isa. I'm sorry for the cause.

Vil. Oh ! could I think,
Could I persuade myself, that your concern
For me, or for my absence, were the spring,
The fountain of these melancholy thoughts,
My heart would dance, spite of the sad occasion,
And be a gay companion in my journey ;
But—

Enter CARLOS.

My good Carlos, why have you left my friends ?

Car. They are departed home.
They saw some sudden melancholy news
Had stolen the lively colour from your cheek—
You had withdrawn, the bride, alarm'd, had follow'd:

More ceremony had been constraint; and this Good-natured rudeness—

Vil. Was the more obliging.

There, Carlos, is the cause.

[Gives the letter.]

Car. Unlucky accident!

Th' Archbishop of Malines, your worthy brother—
With him to-night? Sister, will you permit it?

Vil. It must be so.

Isa. You hear it must be so.

Vil. Oh, that it must!

Car. To leave your bride so soon!

Vil. But having the possession of my love,

I am the better able to support

My absence in the hopes of my return.

Car. Your stay will be but short?

Vil. It will seem long!

The longer that my Isabella sighs:

I shall be jealous of this rival grief,

It takes so full possession of thy heart,

There is not room enough for mighty love.

Enter Servant, bows, and exits.

My horses wait: farewell, my love! You, Carlos,
Will act a brother's part, till I return.

And be the guardian here. All, all I have

That's dear to me, I give up to your care.

Car. And I receive her as a friend and brother.

Vil. Nay, stir not, love! for the night air is cold,

And the dews fall—Here be our end of parting;

Carlos will see me to my horse.

[Exit with CARLOS.]

Isa. Oh, may thy brother better all thy hopes!
Adieu.

A sudden melancholy bakes my blood!

Forgive me, Villeroy—I do not find

That cheerful gratitude thy service asks:

Yet, if I know my heart, and sure I do,

'Tis not averse from honest obligation.

I'll to my chamber, and to bed: my mind,

My harass'd mind is weary.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter BIRON and BELFORD.

Bir. The longest day will have an end; we are got home at last.

Bel. We have got our legs at liberty; and liberty is home, where'er we go; though mine lies most in England.

Bir. Pray, let me call this yours: for what I can command in Brussels, you shall find your own.
I have a father here, who perhaps, after seven years' absence, and costing him nothing in my travels, may be glad to see me. You know my story—How does my disguise become me?

Bel. Just as you would have it; 'tis natural, and will conceal you.

Bir. To-morrow you shall be sure to find me

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXVI.

here, as early as you please, this is the house, you have observed the street.

Bel. I warrant you: your directions will carry me to my lodgings.

[Exit.]

Bir. Good night, my friend.

The long-expected moment is arrived!

And if all here is well, my past sorrows

Will only heighten my excess of joy;

And nothing will remain to wish or hope for!

[Knocks.]

Enter SAMPSON.

Samp. Who's there? What would you have?

Bir. Is your lady at home, friend?

Samp. Why, truly, friend, it is my employment to answer impertinent questions: but for my lady's being at home, or no, that's just as my lady pleases.

Bir. But how shall I know whether it pleases her or no?

Samp. Why, if you'll take my word for it, you may carry your errand back again: she never pleases to see any body at this time of night, that she does not know; and by your dress and appearance
I am sure you must be a stranger to her.

Bir. But I have business; and you don't know how that may please her.

Samp. Nay, if you have business, she is the best judge whether your business will please her or no: therefore I will proceed in my office, and know of my lady whether or no she is pleased to be at home or no—

[Going.]

Enter Nurse.

Nurse. Who's that you are so busy withal? Methinks you might have found an answer in fewer words: but, Sampson, you love to hear yourself prate sometimes, as well as your betters, that I must say for you. Let me come to him? Who would you speak with, stranger?

Bir. With you, mistress, if you could help me to speak to your lady.

Nurse. Yes, sir, I can help you in a civil way:
but can nobody do your business but my lady?

Bir. Not so well; but if you carry her this ring, she'll know my business better.

Nurse. There's no love-letter in it, I hope; you look like a civil gentleman. In an honest way, I may bring you an answer.

[Exit.]

Bir. My old nurse, only a little older; they say the tongue grows always: mercy on me! then her's is seven years longer since I left her. Yet there is something in these servants' folly pleases me;
the cautious conduct of the family appears, and speaks in their impertinence. Well, mistress—

Nurse returns.

Nurse. I have delivered your ring, sir! pray
Heaven, you bring no bad news along with you!

Bir. Quite contrary, I hope.

Nurse. Nay, I hope so too; but my lady was very much surprised when I gave it her. Sir, I am but a servant, as a body may say; but if you'll walk in that I may shut the doors, for we keep very orderly hours, I can show you into the parlour, and help you to an answer, perhaps as soon as those that are wiser.

[Exit.]

Bir. I'll follow you—

Now all my spirits hurry to my heart,
And every sense has taken the alarm
At this approaching interview!

Heavens! how I tremble!

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. I've heard of witches, magic spells, and charms,
That have made nature start from her old course :
The sun has been eclipsed, the moon drawn down
From her career, still paler, and subdued
To the abuses of this under world !
Now I believe all possible. This ring,
This little ring, with necromantic force,
Has raised the ghost of pleasure to my fears ;
Conjured the sense of honour, and of love,
Into such shapes, they fright me from myself !
I dare not think of them——

Enter Nurse.Nurse. Madam, the gentleman's below.Isa. I had forgot, pray let me speak with him ;
[Exit Nurse.]

This ring was the first present of my love
To Biron, my first husband : I must blush
To think I have a second. Biron died
(Still to my loss) at Candy ; there's my hope.
Oh, do I live to hope that he died there ?
It must be so ; he's dead, and this ring left,
By his last breath, to some known faithful friend,
To bring me back again ;
That's all I have to trust to——

Enter BIRON. ISABELLA looks at him.

My fears were woman's——I have view'd him all :
And let me, let me say it to myself,
I live again, and rise but from his tomb.

Bir. Have you forgot me quite ?Isa. Forgot you !Bir. Then farewell my disguise, and my misfortunes.My Isabella ! [He goes to her, she shrieks, and faints.]Isa. Ha !Bir. Oh ! come again ;

Thy Biron summons thee to life and love ;
Thy once-loved, ever-loving husband calls——

Thy Biron speaks to thee.

Excess of love and joy, for my return,
Has overpower'd her——I was to blame

To take thy sex's softness unprepar'd :

But sinking thus, thus dying in my arms,

This ecstasy has made my welcome more

Than words could say. Words may be counterfeit,

False coin'd, and current only from the tongue,

Without the mind ; but passion's in the soul,

And always speaks the heart.

Isa. Where have I been ? Why do you keep him from me ?

I know his voice : my life, upon the wing,
Hears the soft lure that brings me back again ;
'Tis he himself, my Biron.

Do I hold you fast,

Never to part again ?

If I must fall, death's welcome in these arms.

Bir. Live ever in these arms.Isa. But pardon me,

Excuse the wild disorder of my soul ;

The joy, the strange surprising joy of seeing you,

Of seeing you again, distracted me——

Bir. Thou everlasting goodness !Isa. Answer me ;

What hand of Providence has brought you back
To your own home again ?

O, tell me all,

For every thought confounds me.

Bir. My best life ! at leisure, all.Isa. We thought you dead : kill'd at the siege of Candy.Bir. There I fell among the dead ;

But hopes of life reviving from my wounds,

I was preserved but to be made a slave :

I often writ to my hard father, but never had

An answer ; I writ to thee too——

Isa. What a world of woe

Had been prevented but in hearing from you !

Bir. Alas ! thou could'st not help me.Isa. You do not know how much I could have done :

At least, I'm sure I could have suffer'd all ;

I would have sold myself to slavery,

Without redemption ; given up my child,

The dearest part of me, to basest wants——

Bir. My little boy !Isa. My life but to have heard

You were alive.

Bir. No more, my love ; complaining of the past,

We lose the present joys. 'Tis over price,

Of all my pains, that thus we meet again——

I have a thousand things to say to thee——

Isa. 'Would I were past the hearing ! [Aside.]Bir. How does my child, my boy, my father, too ?
I hear he's living still.Isa. Well, both, both well ;

And may he prove a father to your hopes,

Though we have found him none.

Bir. Come, no more tears.Isa. Seven long years of sorrow for your loss,
Have mourn'd with me——Bir. And all my days to come

Shall be employ'd in a kind recompense

For thy afflictions——Can't I see my boy ?

Isa. He's gone to bed : I'll have him brought to you.Bir. To-morrow I shall see him ; I want rest Myself, after this weary pilgrimage.Isa. Alas ! what shall I get for you ?Bir. Nothing but rest, my love ! To-night I would not

Be known, if possible, to your family :

I see my nurse is with you ; her welcome

Would be tedious at this time ;

To-morrow will do better.

Isa. I'll dispose of her, and order every thingAs you would have it. [Exit.]Bir. Grant me but life, good Heaven, and give the means

To make this wond'rous goodness some amends ;

And let me then forget her, if I can !

O ! she deserves of me much more than I

Can lose for her, though I again could venture

A father, and his fortune, for her love !

You wretched fathers, blind as fortune all !

Not to perceive, that such a woman's worth

Weighs down the portion you provide your sons :

What is your trash, what all your heaps of gold,

Compared to this, my heart-felt happiness !

What has she, in my absence, undergone !

I must not think of that ; it drives me back

Upon myself, the fatal cause of all.

Enter ISABELLA.Isa. I have obey'd your pleasure ;

Every thing is ready for you.

Bir. I can want nothing here ; possessing thee,
All my desires are carried to their aim

Of happiness: there's no room for a wish,
But to continue still this blessing to me:
I know the way, my love, I shall sleep sound.
Isa. Shall I attend you?

Bir. By no means:
I've been so long a slave to others' pride,
To learn, at least, to wait upon myself;
You'll make haste after—

Isa. I'll but say my prayers, and follow you—
[Exit BIRON.]

My prayers! no, I must never pray again,
Prayers have their blessings, to reward our hopes,
But I have nothing left to hope for more.
What Heav'n could give I have enjoy'd; but now
The baneful planet rises on my fate,
And what's to come is a long life of woe;
Yet I may shorten it—
I promised him to follow—him!
Is he without a name? Biron, my husband—
My husband! ha! What then is Villeroi?
Oh, Biron, hadst thou come but one day sooner!

[Weeping.]
—What's to be done?—for something must be done.

Two husbands! married to both,
And yet a wife to neither! Hold, my brain—
Ha! a lucky thought
Works the right way to rid me of them all;
All the reproaches, infamies and scorn,
That every tongue and finger will find for me.
Let the just horror of my apprehensions
But keep me warm—no matter what can come.
'Tis but a blow—yet I will see him first—
Have a last look, to heighten my despair,
And then to rest for ever.—

[Going.]

BIRON meets her.

Bir. Despair and rest for ever! Isabella!
These words are far from thy condition;
And be they ever so. I heard thy voice,
And could not bear thy absence; come, my love!
You have stay'd long, there's nothing, nothing sure
Now to despair of in succeeding fate.

Isa. I am contented to be miserable,
But not this way; I've been too long abused,
Let me sleep on, to be deceived no more.

Bir. Look up, my love, I never did deceive thee,
Nor ever can; believe thyself, thy eyes
That first inflamed, and lit me to my love,
Those stars, that still must guide me to my joys.

Isa. And me to my undoing: I look round,
And find no path, but leading to the grave.

Bir. I cannot understand thee.

Isa. If marriages
Are made in heaven, they should be happier:
Why was I made this wretch?

Bir. Has marriage made thee wretched?

Isa. Miserable, beyond the reach of comfort.

Bir. Do I live to hear thee say so?

Isa. Why, what did I say?

Bir. That I have made thee miserable.

Isa. No: you are my only earthly happiness:
And my false tongue belied my honest heart,
If it said otherwise.

Bir. And yet you said,
Your marriage made you miserable.

Isa. I know not what I said,
I've said too much, unless I could speak all.

Bir. Thy words are wild; my eyes, my ears, my heart,
Were all so full of thee, so much employed

In wonder of thy charms, I could not find it;

Now I perceive it plain—

Isa. You'll tell nobody—

Bir. Thou art not well.

Isa. Indeed I am not; I knew that before;

But where's the remedy?

Bir. Rest will relieve thy cares; come, come,
no more;

I'll banish sorrow from thee.

Isa. Banish first the cause.

Bir. Heaven knows how willingly!

Isa. You are the only cause.

Bir. Am I the cause? the cause of thy misfortunes?

Isa. The fatal innocent cause of all my woes.

Bir. Is this my welcome home? This the reward

Of all my miseries, long labours, pains,

And pining wants of wretched slavery,

Which I've outlived, only in hopes of thee;

Am I thus paid at last for deathless love;

And call'd the cause of thy misfortunes now?

Isa. Inquire no more; 'twill be explain'd too soon. [Going.]

Bir. What! canst thou leave me too?

Isa. Pray, let me go;

For both our sakes, permit me—

Bir. Rack me not with imaginations

Of things impossible—Thou canst not mean

What thou hast said—Yet something she must mean.

—'Twas madness all—Compose thyself, my love!
The fit is past; all may be well again:

Let us to bed.

Isa. To bed! You've raised the storm

Will sever us for ever.

Bir. Nothing shall ever part us.

Isa. Oh! there's a fatal story to be told;

Be deaf to that, as Heaven has been to me!

When thou shalt hear how much thou hast been wrong'd,

How wilt thou curse thy fond believing heart,

Tear me from the warm bosom of thy love,

And throw me like a poisonous weed away!

All things have their end.

When I am dead, forgive and pity me. [Exit.]

Bir. Stay, my Isabella!

What can she mean? These doubtings will distract me:

Some hidden mischief soon will burst to light;

I cannot bear it—I must be satisfied—

'Tis she, my wife, must clear this darkness to me.

She shall—if the sad tale at last must come,

She is my fate, and best can speak my doom. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter BIRON and Nurse.

Bir. I know enough: th' important question
Of life or death, fearful to be resolved,
Is clear'd to me: I see where it must end:
And need inquire no more—Pray, let me have Pen, ink, and paper: I must write a while.

And then I'll try to rest—to rest for ever!

[Exit Nurse.]

Poor Isabella! now I know the cause,
The cause of thy distress, and cannot wonder
That it has turn'd thy brain. If I look back
Upon thy loss, it will distract me too.
Oh, any curse but this might be removed!
But 'twas the rancorous malignity
Of all ill stars combined, of Heaven and fate—
Hold, hold my impious tongue—Alas! I rave:
Why do I tax the stars, or Heav'n, or fate?
My father and my brother are my fates,
That drive me to my ruin. They knew well
I was alive. Too well they knew how dear
My Isabella—Oh! my wife no more!
How dear her love was to me—Yet they stood,
With a malicious silent joy, stood by,
And saw her give up all my happiness,
The treasure of her beauty to another;
Stood by, and saw her married to another;
Oh, cruel father, and unnatural brother!
I have but to accuse you of my wrongs,
And then to fall forgotten—Sleep or death
Sits heavy on me, and benumbs my pains:
Either is welcome; but the hand of death
Works always sure, and best can close my eyes.

[Exit BIRON.]

Enter Nurse and SAMPSON.

Nurse. Here's strange things towards, Sampson;
what will be the end of 'em, do you think?

Samp. Nay, marry, Nurse, I can't see so far:
but the law, I believe, is on Biron, the first husband's side.

Nurse. Yes; no question, he has the law on his side.

Samp. For I have heard, the law says, a woman must be a widow, all out seven years, before she can marry again, according to law.

Nurse. Ay, so it does; and our lady has not been a widow altogether seven years.

Samp. Why then, Nurse, mark my words, and say I told you so,—the man must have his wife again, and all will do well.

Nurse. But if our master, Villeroy, comes back again—

Samp. Why, if he does, he is not the first man that has had his wife taken from him.

Nurse. For fear of the worst, will you go to the old Count, and desire him to come as soon as he can; there may be mischief, and he is able to prevent it.

Samp. Now you say something: now I take you, Nurse; that will do well, indeed; mischief should be prevented, a little thing will make a quarrel, when there's a woman in the way. I'll about it instantly.

SCENE II.—A Chamber.—BIRON asleep on a couch.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. Asleep so soon! Oh, happy, happy thou.
Who thus can sleep! I never shall sleep more—
If then to sleep be to be happy, he,
Who sleeps the longest, is the happiest;
Death is the longest sleep—Oh, have a care?
Mischief will thrive apace. Never wake more.

[To BIRON.]

If thou didst ever love thy Isabella,
To-morrow must be doomsday to thy peace.

—The sight of him disarms ev'n death itself,
And pleasure grows again

With looking on him—Let me look my last—
But is a look enough for parting love?

Sure I may take a kiss—Where am I going?
Help, help me, Villeroy! Mountains and seas
Divide your love, never to meet my shame.
Hark!

What noise was that? A knocking at the gate!
It may be Villeroy—No matter who.

Bir. Come, Isabella, come.

Isa. Hark! I'm call'd!

Bir. You stay too long from me.

Isa. A man's voice! in my bed! How came he there?

Nothing but villainy in this bad world.
Here's physic for your fever.

[Draws a dagger, and goes backward to the couch.
If husbands go to heaven,

Where do they go that send them!—This to try—

[Going to stab him, he rises, she shrieks. Both come forward,]

What do I see?

Bir. Isabella, arm'd!

Isa. Against my husband's life!

Bir. Thou didst not think it?

Isa. Madness has brought me to the gates of hell,

And there has left me.

Bir. Why dost thou fly me so?

Isa. I cannot bear his sight; distraction, come,
Possess me all.

Shake off my chains, and hasten to my aid;—

Thou art my only cure— [Running out.]

Bir. Poor Isabella, she's not in a condition

To give me any comfort, if she could;

Lost to herself—as quickly I shall be

To all the world—Horrors come fast around me;

My mind is overcast—the gathering clouds

Darken the prospect—I approach the brink,

And soon must leap the precipice! Oh! Heav'n!

[Kneels.]

While yet my senses are my own, thus kneeling,

Let me implore thy mercies on my wife;

Release her from her pangs; and if my reason,

O'erwhelm'd with miseries, sink before the tempest,

Pardon those crimes despair may bring upon me.

[Rises.]

Enter Nurse.

Nurse. Sir, there's somebody at the door must needs speak with you; he won't tell his name.

Bir. I come to him [Exit Nurse.]

'Tis Belford, I suppose; he little knows

Of what has happen'd here; I wanted him,

Must employ his friendship, and then— [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Scene.

Enter CARLOS, PEDRO, and three RUFFIANS.
Ruffians conceal themselves.

Car. A younger brother! I was one too long
Not to prevent my being so again.

We must be sudden. Younger brothers are
But lawful bastards of another name,
Thrust out of their nobility of birth

And family, and tainted into trades.

Shall I be one of them—Bow, and retire,

To make more room for the unwieldy heir

To play the fool in? No—

But how shall I prevent it?—Biron comes
To take possession of my father's love—
Would that were all! there's a birthright too
That he will seize. Besides, if Biron lives,
He will unfold some practices, which I
Cannot well answer—therefore he shall die;
This night must be disposed of: I have means
That will not fail my purpose. Here he comes.

Bir. Ha! am I beset? I live but to revenge me.

[They rush forward and stab him. VILLEROY enters, with two Servants; they rescue him; CARLOS and his party fly.]

Vil. How are you, sir? Mortally hurt, I fear.
Take care and lead him in.

Bir. I thank you for this goodness, sir: though 'tis

Bestow'd upon a very wretch; and death,
Though from a villain's hand, had been to me
An act of kindness, and the height of mercy—
But I thank you, sir.

Vil. Take care and lead him in. [He is led off.]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. Murder my husband! Oh! I must not dare
To think of living on; my desperate hand,
In a mad rage, may offer it again;
Stab me any where but there. Here's room enough
In my own breast to act the fury in,
The proper scene of mischief.

[Going to stab herself, VILLEROY runs in and prevents her by taking the dagger from her.]

Vil. Angels defend and save thee!

Attempt thy precious life!

Lay violent hands upon thy innocent self!

Isa. Swear I am innocent, and I'll believe you.

What would you have with me? Pray let me go.

—Are you there, sir? You are the very man

Have done all this. You would have made

Me believe you married me; but the fool

Was wiser.

Vil. Dost thou not know me, love?

'Tis Villeroy, thy husband.

Isa. I have none; no husband—

Never had but one, and he died at Candy.

Speak, did he not die there?

Vil. He did, my life.

Isa. But swear it, quickly swear.

Enter BIRON, bloody, leaning upon his sword.

Before that streaming evidence appears,

In bloody proof against me—

[She seeing BIRON, swoons; VILLEROY helps her to a couch.]

Vil. Help there!

[Sees BIRON.]

Biron alive!

Bir. The only wretch on earth, that must not live.

Vil. Biron or Villeroy must not, that's decreed.

Bir. You've saved me from the hands of murderers:

Would you had not, for life's my greatest plague—

And then, of all the world, you are the man

I would not be obliged to—Isabella!

I came to fall before thee: I had died

Happy, not to have found your Villeroy here:

A long farewell, and a last parting kiss.

[Kisses her.]

Vil. A kiss! confusion! it must be your last.

Bir. I know it must—Here I give up that death

You but delay'd: since what is past has been

The work of fate, thus we must finish it.

Thrust home, be sure.

[Falls.]

Vil. Alas! he faints! some help there.

Bir. 'Tis all in vain, my sorrows soon will end—

Oh, Villeroy! let a dying wretch entreat you

To take this letter to my father. My Isabella!

Couldst thou but hear me, my last words should bless thee,

I cannot, though in death, bequeath her to thee.

[To VILLEROY.]

But could I hope my boy, my little one,

Might find a father in thee—Oh, I faint—

I can no more—Hear me, Hear'n! Oh! support

My wife, my Isabella?—Bless my child!

And take a poor unhappy—

Vil. He's gone—

[Dies.]

My care of her is lost in wild amaze.

Who waits there?

[Exit.]

Isa. [Recovering.] Where have I been?—Methinks, I stand upon

The brink of life, ready to shoot the gulf

That lies between me and the realms of rest,

But still detain'd, I cannot pass the strait;

Deny'd to live, and yet I must not die; [Rises.]

Doom'd to come back, like a complaining ghost,

To my unbury'd body—Here it lies—

[Comes forward and throws herself by BIRON's body.]

My body, soul, and life. A little dust

To cover our cold limbs in the dark grave—

There, there we shall sleep safe and sound together.

Enter VILLEROY, with Servants.

Vil. Poor wretch; upon the ground! She's not herself:

Remove her from the body.

[Servants going to raise her.]

Isa. Never, never—

[Clings to the body.]

You have divorced us once, but shall no more—

Help, help me, Biron—Ha!—bloody and dead:

Oh, murder! murder! you have done this deed

Vengeance and murder!—bury us together—

Do any thing but part us.

Vil. Gently, gently raise her.

She must be forced away.

[They carry her off.]

Isa. Oh! they tear me! Cut off my hands—

Let me leave something with him—

They'll clasp him fast—

Oh, cruel, cruel men!

This you must answer one day.

[Nurse follows her.]

Vil. Send for all helps: all, all that I am worth,
Shall cheaply buy her peace of mind again.

[To a Servant.]

Enter Count BALDWIN, CARLOS, BELFORD, MAURICE, EGMONT, with Servants.

C. Bald. O, do I live to this unhappy day!

Where is my wretched son?

Car. Where is my brother?

[They see him, and gather about the body.]

Vil. I hope, in heav'n.

Car. Canst thou pity him?

Wish him in heav'n, when thou hast done a deed,

That must for ever cut thee from the hopes

Of ever coming there?

Vil. I do not blame you—

You have a brother's right to be concern'd

For his untimely death.

Car. Untimely death, indeed!

Vil. But yet you must not say I was the cause.

Car. Not you the cause! Why, who should murder him?

We do not ask you to accuse yourself;
But I must say, that you have murder'd him;
And will say nothing else, till justice draws
Upon our side, at the loud call of blood,
To execute so foul a murderer.

Bel. Poor Biron! is this thy welcome home!

Maur. Rise, sir; there is a comfort in revenge,
Which is left you. [To Count BALDWIN.]

Car. Take the body hence.

C. Bald. What could provoke you?

Vil. Nothing could provoke me

To a base murder, which, I find, you think
Me guilty of—I know my innocence;
My servants too can witness that I drew
My sword in his defence, to rescue him.

Bel. Let the servants be call'd.

Egm. Let's hear what they can say.

Car. What they can say! Why, what should servants say?

They are his accomplices, his instruments,
And will not charge themselves. If they could do
A murder for his service, they can lie.

Lie nimbly, and swear hard to bring him off.

You say you drew your sword in his defence:

Who were his enemies? Did he need defence?

Had he wrong'd any one? Could he have cause

To apprehend a danger, but from you?

And yet you rescued him!—

No, no, he came

Unseasonably (that was all his crime),

Unluckily, to interrupt your sport:

You were new marry'd—marry'd to his wife;

And therefore you, and she, and all of you

(For all of you I must believe concern'd),

Combined to murder him out of the way.

Bel. If it be so—

Car. It can be only so.

C. Bald. The law will do me justice; send for the magistrate.

Car. I'll go myself for him. [Exit.]

Vil. These strong presumptions, I must own indeed,

Are violent against me; but I have

A witness, and on this side heav'n too.

—Open that door.

[Door opened, and PEDRO is brought forward
by VILLEROY'S Servants.]

Here's one can tell you all.

Ped. All, all; save me but from the rack, I'll confess all.

Vil. You and your accomplices designed To murder Biron?—Speak.

Ped. We did.

Vil. Did you engage upon your private wrongs,
Or were employ'd?

Ped. He never did us wrong.

Vil. You were set on then?

Ped. We were set on.

Vil. What do you know of me?

Ped. Nothing, nothing;

You saved his life, and have discover'd me.

Vil. He has acquitted me.

If you would be resolved of anything,
He stands upon his answer.

Bel. Who set you on to act this horrid deed?

C. Bald. I'll know the villain; give me quick his name,

Or I will tear it from thy bleeding heart.

Ped. I will confess.

C. Bald. Do then.

Ped. It was my master, Carlos, your own son.

C. Bald. Oh, monstrous! monstrous! most unnatural!

Bel. Did he employ you to murder his own brother?

Ped. He did; and he was with us when 'twas done.

C. Bald. If this be true, this horrid, horrid tale,
It is but just upon me; Biron's wrongs
Must be revenged! and I the cause of all!

Maur. What will you do with him?

C. Bald. Take him apart—

I know too much. [Exit PEDRO, guarded.]

Vil. I had forgot—Your wretched, dying son,
Gave me this letter for you.

[Gives it to Count BALDWIN.]

I dare deliver it. It speaks of me.

I pray to have it read.

C. Bald. You know the hand?

Bel. I know 'tis Biron's hand.

C. Bald. Pray read it. [BELFORD reads the letter.]

“Sir,—I find I am come only to lay my death at your door. I am now going out of the world, but cannot forgive you, nor my brother Carlos, for not hindering my poor wife, Isabella, from marrying with Villeroy; when you both knew, from so many letters, that I was alive. BIRON.”

Vil. How! Did you know it then?

C. Bald. Amazement all!

Enter CARLOS, with Officers.

Oh, Carlos! are you come? Your brother here,

Here in a wretched letter, lays his death

To you and me—Have you done anything

To hasten his sad end?

Car. Bless me, sir, I do anything! who, I?

C. Bald. He talks of letters that were sent to us.

I never heard of any—Did you know

He was alive?

Car. Alive! Heaven knows, not I.

C. Bald. Had you no news of him, from a report,
Or letter, never?

Car. Never, never, I.

Bel. That's strange, indeed: I know he often writ

To lay before you the condition [To C. BALDWIN.]

Of his hard slavery; and more I know,

That he had several answers to his letters.

He said they came from you; you are his brother?

Car. Never from me.

Bel. That will appear.

The letters, I believe, are still about him;

For some of them I saw but yesterday.

C. Bald. What did those answers say?

Bel. I cannot speak to the particulars;

But I remember well, the sum of them

Was much the same, and all agreed,

That there was nothing to be hoped from you;

That 'twas your barbarous resolution

To let him perish there.—

C. Bald. Oh, Carlos! Carlos! hadst thou been a brother—

Car. This is a plot upon me. I never knew

He was in slavery, or was alive,

Or heard of him, before this fatal hour.

Bel. There, sir, I must confront you:

He sent you a letter, to my knowledge, last night,

And you sent him word you would come to him—

I fear you came too soon.

C. Bald. 'Tis all too plain.—

Bring out that wretch before him.

[PEDRO produc d.]

Car. Ha! Pedro there!—Then I am caught, indeed.

Bel. You start at sight of him;
He has confess'd the bloody deed.

Car. Well then, he has confessed,
And I must answer it.

Bel. Is there no more?

Car. Why!—what would you have more? I know the worst,
And I expect it.

C. Bald. Why hast thou done all this?

Car. Why, that which damns most men has ruined me;

The making of my fortune. Biron stood
Between me and your favour; while he lived,
I had not that; hardly was thought a son,
And not at all akin to your estate.

I could not bear a younger brother's lot,
To live depending upon courtesy—
Had you provided for me like a father,
I had been still a brother.

C. Bald. 'Tis too true;
I never loved thee as I should have done:

It was my sin, and I am punish'd for't.

Oh! never may distinction rise again
In families: let parents be the same.

To all their children; common in their care,
And in their love of them.—I am unhappy,

For loving one too well.

Vil. You knew your brother lived; why did you take Such pains to marry me to Isabella?

Car. I had my reasons for't.—

Vil. More than I thought you had.

Car. But one was this—

I knew my brother loved his wife so well,
That if he ever should come home again,
He could not long outlive the loss of her.

Bel. If you rely'd on that, why did you kill him?

Car. To make all sure. Now you are answer'd all.

Where must I go? I am tired of your questions.

C. Bald. I leave the judge to tell thee what thou art;

A father cannot find a name for thee.

Take him away.— [CARLOS led off.

Grant me, sweet Heav'n! the patience to go through

The torment of my cure—Here, here begins
The operation. Alas! she's mad.

Enter ISABELLA, distracted, and her Child running from her.

Vil. My Isabella, poor unhappy wretch!
What can I say to her?

Isa. Nothing, nothing; 'tis a babbling world—
I'll hear no more on't. When does the court sit?
I have a cause to try.

Will you not hear it? Then I must appeal
To the bright throne—Call down the heav'nly powers

To witness how you use me.

C. Bald. Pray, give her way. She'll hurt no body.

Isa. What have you done with him? He was here but now;

I saw him here. Oh, Biron, Biron! where,
Where have they hid thee from me? He is gone—

But here's a little flaming cherubim—

Will nothing do? I did not hope to find

Justice on earth; 'tis not in heav'n neither.

Biron has watch'd his opportunity—

Softly; he steals it from the sleeping gods,

And sends it thus—Ha! ha! ha!— [Stabs herself.

Now, now I laugh at you, I defy you all,
You tyrant murderers.

C. Bald. Oh, thou most injured innocence! Yet live,

Live but to witness for me to the world,

How much I do repent me of the wrongs,

The unnatural wrongs, which I have heap'd on thee

And have pull'd down this judgment on us all.

Vil. Oh, speak, speak but a word of comfort to me!

C. Bald. If the most tender father's care and love
Of thee, and thy poor child, can make amends—

Oh, yet look up and live!—

Isa. Where is that little wretch? [They raise her.

I die in peace, to leave him to your care.

I have a wretched mother's legacy,

A dying kiss—pray let me give it him,

My blessing; that, that's all I have to leave thee.

Oh, may thy father's virtues live in thee,

And all his wrongs be buried in my grave! [Dies.

END OF ISABELLA.

OROONOKO,

A TRAGEDY.

BY THOMAS SOUTHERN.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

OROONOKO.
ABOAN.
Governor.
BLANDFORD.
STANMORE.
Captain DRIVER.
HOTMAN.

IMOINDA.
Widow.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—View of the Sea.

Enter several Planters.

First P. Well, neighbours, Captain Driver has brought us a fresh supply—more slaves.

Second P. Ay, and I'm sure we had never more need of 'em.

"Third P. That's true, indeed, and I'm afraid we shall never have less.

"Fourth P. Yes, yes; we shall have enough of 'em, I warrant you, when they come to breed."

Third P. Plague on 'em, a parcel of lazy, obstinate, untractable pagans;—half of 'em are so sulky, when they first come, that they won't eat their victuals when it's set before 'em, and a Christian may beat 'em till he drops down, before he can make 'em eat, if they ha'n't a mind to it.

Second P. Beat! ay, faith, he may beat those that will eat, long enough before they will work; and, what with their starving themselves, and what with the discipline they require before they will put out their strength, they die as fast as rotten sheep, plague on 'em! The poor industrious planter loses the money they cost him, and his ground runs to ruin for want of their labour.

First P. Ay, in truth, a Christian colony has a hard time of it, that is forced to deal in this cursed heathen commodity: here, every time a ship comes in, my money goes for a great raw-boned negro fellow, that has the impudence to think he is my fellow-creature, with as much right to liberty as I have, and so grows sullen, and refuses to work; or for a young wench, who will howl night and day after a brat or a lover, forsooth.

Fourth P. Nay, as far as I see yet, the women are worse than the men; but Squire Blandford has got one that, they say, is not of their complexion.

Third P. So they say; but she's of the breed, I'll warrant her—she's one of the sulky ones.—The lieutenant-governor has taken a fancy to her; and yet, would you believe it, she gives herself airs, and will scarce speak to him.

Second P. I've heard of her, they call her Cle-mene.

Fourth P. 'Tis a wonder, however, that his honour don't buy her.

Third P. She was in a lot that Mr. Blandford drew for the lord governor himself, who, you know, is expected by the next ship from England, and she cannot be sold without his consent.

Fourth P. In a lot drawn for the lord governor?—I don't yet perfectly understand this method of drawing lots.

First P. No! why nothing is so easy: the colony agrees with the buccaneer to bring a certain number of slaves, at so much a-head; and when they come in, we draw for them, to prevent disputes; for, as they're all of a price, every one, you know, would be for picking out the best.—Come along with us to the market, and you'll see how it is, presently; the slaves are now coming on shore.

SCENE II.—An Open Place.

Enter Lieutenant-Governor, BLANDFORD, and STANMORE.

Gov. There's no resisting your fortune, Blandford; you draw all the prizes.

Blad. I draw for our lord governor, you know; his fortune favours me.

Gov. I grudge him nothing this time; but if fortune had favoured me in the last sale, the fair slave had been mine; Clemene had been mine.

Bla. Are you still in love with her?

Gov. Every day more in love with her.

Enter Captain DRIVER, teased and pulled about by several Planters, Men and Women.

"Wom. Here have I six slaves in my lot, and not a man among them; all women and children; what can I do with 'em, captain? Pray consider I am a woman myself.

"First P. I have all men in mine: pray, captain, let the men and women be mingled together, for the good of the plantation.

"Second P. Ay, ay, a man and a woman, captain, for the good of the plantation.

"Capt. D. Let them mingle together, and be damn'd, what care I? Would you have me pimp for the good of the plantation?

"First P. I am a constant customer, captain.

"Wom. I am always ready money to you, captain.

"First P. For that matter, mistress, my money is as ready as yours.

"Wom. Pray hear me, captain.

"Capt. D. Look you,—I have done my part by you; I have brought the number of slaves you bargained for; if your lots have not pleased you, you must draw again among yourselves.

"Third P. I am contented with my lot.

"Fourth P. I am very well satisfied.

"Third P. We'll have no drawing again.

"Capt. D. Do you hear, mistress? You may hold your tongue: for my part, I expect my money.

"Wom. Captain, nobody questions or scruples the payment: but I won't hold my tongue; 'tis too much to pray and pay, too: one may speak for one's own, I hope.

"Capt. D. Well, what would you say?

"Wom. I say no more than I can make out.

"Capt. D. Out with it, then.

"Wom. I say, things have not so fair carried as they might have been. How do I know but you have juggled together in my absence? You drew the lots before I came, I'm sure.

"Capt. D. That's your own fault, mistress; you might have come sooner.

"Wom. Then here's a prince, as they say, among the slaves, and you set him down to go as a common man.

"Capt. D. Why, what should make him worth more than a common man? He'll not do the more work for being a prince, will he?"

Gov. Where are the slaves, captain? They are long coming.

"Bla. And who is this prince that's fallen to my lot for the Lord Governor?—Let me know something of him, that I may treat him accordingly; who is he?

"Capt. D. He's a devil of a fellow, I can tell you; a prince, every inch of him: you have paid dear enough for him, for all the good he'll do you: I was forced to clap him in irons, and did not think the ship safe, neither. You are in hostility with the Indians; they say they threaten you daily: you had best have an eye upon him.

"Bla. But who is he?

Gov. And how do you know him to be a prince?

"Capt. D. He is son and heir to the great king of Angola, a mischievous monarch in those parts, who, by his good will, would never let any of his neighbours be in quiet. This son was his general; a plaguy fighting fellow. I have formerly had dealing with him for slaves, which he took prisoners, and have got pretty roundly by him. But the wars being at an end, and nothing more to be got by the trade of that country, I made bold to bring the prince along with me.

Gov. How could you do that?

"Bla. What! steal a prince out of his own country?—Impossible.

"Capt. D. 'Twas hard, indeed; but I did it. You must know, this Oroonoko—

"Bla. Is that his name?

"Capt. D. Ay, Oroonoko.

Gov. Oroonoko!

"Capt. D. Is naturally inquisitive about the men and manners of the white nations. Because I could give him some account of the other parts of the world, I grew very much into his favour: in return of so great an honour, you know I could do no less, upon my coming away, than invite him on board me; never having been in a ship, he appointed his time, and I prepared my entertainment; he came the next evening as private as he could, with about some twenty along with him. The punch went round; and, as many of his attendants as would be dangerous, I sent dead drunk on shore; the rest we secured; and so you have the Prince Oroonoko.

"First P. Gad-a-mercy, Captain! there you were with him, i'faith!

"Second P. Such men as you are fit to be employed in public affairs: the plantation will thrive by you.

"Third P. Industry ought to be encouraged.

"Capt. D. There's nothing done without it, boys. I have made my fortune this way:

"Bla. Unheard-of villany!

"Sta. Barbarous treachery!

"Bla. They applaud him for't.

Gov. But, Captain, methinks you have taken a great deal of pains for this Prince Oroonoko; why did you part with him at the common rate of slaves?

"Capt. D. Why, Lieutenant-Governor, I'll tell you: I did design to carry him to England, to have showed him there; but I found him troublesome upon my hands, and I'm glad I'm rid of him. [Drum without.] Oh, oh, hark, they come!

Enter black Slaves in chains, Men, Women, and Children, Aboas, and others of Oroonoko's Attendants—Oroonoko last of all, in chains.

"Capt. D. Now, Governor, pray observe him.

Oro. So, sir, you have kept your word with me.

"Capt. D. I am a better Christian, I thank you, than to keep it with a heathen.

Oro. You are a Christian, be a Christian still:

If you have any god that teaches you
To break your word, I need not curse you more:
Let him cheat you, as you are false to me.
You faithful followers of my better fortune,
We have been fellow soldiers in the field:

[Goes up, and embraces his friends.

Now we are fellow slaves. This last farewell.

Be sure of one thing that will comfort us,—

Whatever world we are next thrown upon

Cannot be worse than this.

[Exeunt all the Slaves but Oroonoko.

"Capt. D. You see what a bloody Pagan he is, Governor; but I took care that none of his followers should be in the same lot with him, for fear they should undertake some desperate action, to the danger of the colony.

Oro. Live still in fear; it is the villain's curse, And will revenge my chains: fear even me, Who have no power to hurt thee. Nature abhors And drives thee out from the society And commerce of mankind, for breach of faith. Men live and prosper but in mutual trust, A confidence of one another's truth. That thou hast violated. I have done; I know my fortune, and submit to it.

Gov. Sir, I am sorry for your fortune, and would help it if I could.

Bla. [Crossing to him.] Take off his chains. [Two Planters advance, and take off his chains.] You know your condition; but you are fallen into honourable hands. You are the Lord Governor's slave, who will use you nobly. In his absence it shall be my care to serve you.

[BLANDFORD applying to him.]

Oro. I hear you, but can believe no more.

Gov. Captain, I'm afraid the world won't speak so honourably of this action of yours as you would have 'em.

Capt. D. I have the money,—let the world speak, and be damn'd: I care not.

Oro. I would forget myself. Be satisfied.

[To BLANDFORD.]

I am above the rank of common slaves.

Let that content you. The Christian there, that knows me,

For his own sake, will not discover more.

Capt. D. I have other matters to mind. You have him, and much good may you do with your prize. [Exit.]

[The Planters pulling and staring at OROONOKO.]

Bla. What would you have here?—You stare as if you never saw a man before. Stand farther off.

[Crosses, and turns them away.]

Oro. Let them stare on; [Planters retire.]

I am unfortunate, but not ashamed

Of being so: no, let the guilty blush;

The white man that betray'd me; honest black

Disdains to change its colour. I am ready;

Where must I go?—Dispose me as you please,—

I am not well acquainted with my fortune,

But must learn to know it better: so, I know, you say;

Degrees make all things easy.

Bla. All things shall be easy.

Oro. Tear off this pomp, and let me know myself: The slavish habit best becomes me now.

Hard fare and whips and chains may overpower

The frailer flesh, and bow my body down;

But there's another, nobler part of me,

Out of your reach, which you can never tame.

Bla. You shall find nothing of this wretchedness

You apprehend. We are not monsters all.

You seem unwilling to disclose yourself;

Therefore, for fear the mentioning your name

Should give you new disquiets, I presume

To call you Cæsar.

Oro. I am myself; but call me what you please.

Gov. A very good name, Cæsar,

And very fit for his character.

Oro. Was Cæsar, then, a slave?

Gov. I think he was; to pirates, too; he was a great conqueror, but unfortunate in his friends.

Oro. His friends were Christians?

Bla. No.

Oro. No! that's strange.

Gov. And murder'd by them.

Oro. I would be Cæsar, then. Yet I will live.

Bla. Live to be happier.

Oro. Do what you will with me.

Bla. I will wait upon you, attend, and serve you.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Grove—a Plantation seen at a little distance.

Enter ABOAN.

Abo. At length I am alone—but why alone?

My thoughts are worse society to me

Than the poor slaves, with whom I'm doom'd to labour.

I cannot bear it—if I turn my view

Backward or forward, round me or within,

'Tis all regret, oppression, and despair.

Yet why despair?—Something may yet be done;

May yet be done—hold—let me most distrust

The flatterer, Hope—if she one moment lures me

To patient suffrance, from that fatal moment

Insidious slumbers steal upon my virtue—

I shall—distraction! must grow tame by habit—

I must—what else has quench'd in those around me

That indignation which now chokes my utterance?

All hell is in the thought—my struggle must be now.

The instant, now—precipitation's wisdom—

Slaves. [Without.] Ho! ho! Aboan, Aboan!

Abo. Hark! here they come!—It must, it shall be so:

Hackney'd they are in mis'ries new to me,—

Like secret fire that smokeless embers hide.

Yet still the love of liberty must live.

Enter three Slaves.

First S. Here, where are you?—Come, to work, to work.

Second S. You are a stranger, ignorant of your duty,

Or else this idleness had been chastised With many a smarting blow.

Third S. Ay, good Aboan,

Come, come with us, for if the overseer

E'en now surprise us—

Second S. Hush! I hear his voice—

First S. No, no, 'tis not he—

Abo. Would he scourge us, then?

Third S. Would he! Experience soon will tell you that.

Abo. Has, then, experience ever told it you?

Third S. Has it?—Don't ask me—would I could say no!

Abo. You have been beaten, then, to patient drudgery.

Second S. 'Tis shameful to confess it, yet 'tis true.

Abo. What to confess is shameful, is it not More shameful still to suffer?

Third S. What if it be?

Abo. Then suffer it no longer.

First S. No longer—no, if we knew how to help it.

Abo. Know how?—Suppose a friend should tell you how. [They gather eagerly about him.]

Second S. What say you?

First S. Are there ways?

Third S. Can you tell us?

Abo. I see by this impatience you're not quell'd Into a torpid tame insensibility;

I'll tell you, then, such news, as shall revive
Each drooping virtue, string each nerve anew.

All. What is it?—What is it?

Abo. There is among you, now, a mighty prince,
Before the lightning of whose dreaded sword
These pale, cold, half-form'd tyrants that insult ye
Would vanish, like thin mists before the sun.

First S. What, did he come with you.

Abo. He came with me.

I am distinguish'd by his friendship,
And oft with him have led the front of battle.

Second S. But how, where—

Third S. Is there only you and he?

Abo. There are six more of high command about
him,

All tried, all firm, all fit for great achievements.

First S. Where are they?

Abo. The prince, my lord, not long since parted
from me;

The rest, not now far off, will soon be found.

When we were parted, he embraced us all:

"My friends," says he, "one thing will comfort
us,—

Whatever world we are thrown next upon
Cannot be worse than this."

These were my royal master's words at parting,
And sure you cannot doubt but they are true.
Shall we, then, having nothing worse to fear,
Bear with dull sluggish patience what we suffer?
If nothing's worse, the chance is all for gain:

There can be danger, then, in no attempt;
And if there was, 'twere better still, for danger
Has always its equivalent in glory.

[The Slaves look eagerly on each other, as if silently asking each other what they think.]

Second S. [After a pause.] And will this prince, and you, and these your friends,

Assist us to be free?

Abo. Will you with them

Join hands in the attempt?

[A cry heard without, at some distance:—the Slaves start, and seem terrified.]

What cry was that?

Second S. 'Tis the complaint of wretched slaves, extorted

By bloody whips laid on without remorse,
And without cause—ere night, perhaps from us
And you, such cry may by such stripes be forced—

Abo. Ye gods! and shall we not resist it then?

All. We will.

Abo. Your hands—at night we meet again.

Come on—now lead to my task. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter OROONOKO and BLANDFORD.

Oro. And you say you are
A friend to my misfortunes: that's a name
Will teach you what you owe yourself and me.

Bla. I'll study to deserve to be your friend.

When once our noble governor arrives,
With him you will not need my interest:
He is too generous not to feel your wrongs.

But be assured I will employ my pow'r,
And find the means to send you home again.

Oro. I thank you, sir. My honest wretched friends! [Sighing.]

Their chains are heavy: they have hardly found
So kind a master. May I ask you, sir,
What is become of them?—Perhaps I should not.
You will forgive a stranger.

Bla. I'll inquire,
And use my best endeavours, where they are,
To have them gently used.

Oro. Once more I thank you.
You offer every cordial that can keep
My hopes alive, to wait a better day.
What friendly care can do, you have applied.
But oh, I have a grief admits no cure!

Bla. You do not know, sir—

Oro. Can you raise the dead?
Pursue and overtake the wings of time?
And bring about again the hours, the days,
The years, that made me happy?

Bla. That is not to be done.

Oro. No, there is nothing to be done for me.

[Kneeling, and kissing the earth.]

Thou god adored! thou ever glorious sun!

If she be yet on earth, send me a beam

Of thy all-seeing pow'r to light me to her!

Or if thy sister goddess has preferr'd

Her beauty to the skies, to be a star,

O tell me where she shines, that I may stand

Whole nights, and gaze upon her.

Bla. I am rude, and interrupt you.

Oro. I am troublesome:

But pray give me your pardon. My swoll'n heart

Bursts out its passage, and I must complain.

O! can you think of nothing dearer to me?

Dearer than liberty, my country, friends,

Much dearer than my life?—That I have lost—

The tend'rest, best beloved, and loving wife.

Bla. Alas! I pity you.

Oro. Do pity me:

Pity's akin to love; and every thought

Of that soft kind is welcome to my soul.

I would be pitied here.

Bla. I dare not ask

More than you please to tell me: but, if you

Think it convenient to let me know

Your story, I dare promise you to bear

A part in your distress, if not assist you.

Oro. Thou honest-hearted man! I wanted such,

Just such a friend as thou art, that would sit

Still as the night, and let me talk whole days

Of my Imoinda. O! I'll tell thee all

From first to last; and pray observe me well.

Bla. I will most heedfully.

Oro. There was a stranger in my father's court,

Valued and honour'd much: he was a white,

The first I ever saw of your complexion:

Of many virtues, and so famed in arms,

He still commanded all my father's wars.

I was bred under him. One fatal day,

The armies joining, he before me stepp'd,

Receiving in his breast a poison'd dart

Levell'd at me;—he died within my arms.

I've tired you already.

Bla. Pray go on.

Oro. He left an only daughter, whom he brought

An infant to Angola. When I came Back to the court, a happy conqueror,

Humanity oblig'd me to condole

With this sad virgin for a father's loss,

Lost for my safety. I presented her

With all the slaves of battle, to atone
 Her father's ghost. But when I saw her face
 And heard her speak, I offer'd up myself
 To be the sacrifice. She bow'd and blush'd;
 I wonder'd and ador'd. The sacred pow'r,
 That had subdued me, then inspir'd my tongue,
 Inclind her heart, and all our talk was love.

Bla. Then you were happy.

Oro. O! I was too happy.

I married her: and, though my country's custom
 Indulged the privilege of many wives,
 I swore myself never to know but her.
 She grew with child, and I grew happier still.
 O, my Imoinda! but it could not last.
 Her fatal beauty reach'd my father's ears:
 He sent for her to court, where, cursed court!
 No woman comes but for his am'rous use.
 He raging to possess her, she was forced
 To own herself my wife. The furious king
 Started at incest; but, grown desperate,
 Not daring to enjoy what he desired,
 In mad revenge, which I could never learn,
 He poison'd her, or sent her far, far off,
 Far from my hopes ever to see her more.

Bla. Most barbarous of fathers! the sad tale
 Has struck me dumb with wonder.

Oro. I have done.

I'll trouble you no farther: now and then
 A sigh will have its way: that shall be all.

Enter STANMORE.

Sta. Blandford, the Lieutenant-Governor is gone to your plantation. He desires you will bring the royal slave with you. The sight of his fair mistress, he says, is an entertainment for a prince; he would have his opinion of her.

Oro. Is he a lover?

Bla. So he says himself: he flatters a beautiful slave that I have, and calls her mistress.

Oro. Must he, then, flatter her, to call her mistress?

I pity the proud man who thinks himself
 Above being in love: what though she be a slave,
 She may deserve him.

Bla. You shall judge of that, when you see her,
 sir.

Oro. I go with you.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Plantation.

Enter IMOINDA, followed by Lieutenant-Governor.

Gov. I have disturb'd you. I confess my fault,
 My fair Clemene; but begin again,
 And I will listen to your mournful song.
 Sweet as the soft complaining nightingale's,
 While every note calls out my trembling soul,
 And leaves me silent, as the midnight groves,
 Only to shelter you:—sing, sing again,
 And let me wonder at the many ways
 You have to ravish me.

Imo. O, I can weep
 Enough for you and me, if that will please you.

Gov. You must not weep; I come to dry your tears,

And raise you from your sorrow.

Imo. Can that be,
 When all your actions and your looks convince me
 That you would keep me here, still far from those,
 For whom the tears I shed must flow for ever?

Gov. They must not, sure; be all the past forgotten:

Look forwards, now, where better prospects rise,
 New pleasures court you, and new friends invite.

Imo. Alas! can I!—I know not what to say—
 Nature has formed you of a diff'rent kind,
 Or thus you could not talk; and, should I reason
 From what I feel, you would not understand me.

Gov. Oh, yes: my heart has all the soft sensations,—

Has all that friendship and that love inspires.

Imo. Let your heart answer for me, then:—

Could you,
 Forced to some distant land, unknown, forlorn,
 A slave, dependant on another's will,
 Cut off from all that habit has endear'd,
 Cut off from friendship, from domestic joy—
 Could you forget all these?—Alas, they're past!

[Bursts into tears.]

Gov. Oh, fair Clemene! there is yet a passion
 Which can obliterate all the joys and pains
 That others have impress'd; make room for that
 And all I wish is done. Look upon me,—
 Look with the eyes of kind, indulging love,
 That I may have full cause for what I say:—
 I come to offer you your liberty,
 And be myself the slave. You turn away.

[Following her.]

But everything becomes you. I may take
 This pretty hand: I know your modesty
 Would draw it back; but you will take it ill,
 If I should let it go,—I know you would.
 You shall be gently forced to please yourself;
 That you will thank me for.

[She struggles and gets her hand from him—then he offers to kiss her.]

Nay, if you struggle with me, I must take—

Imo. You may my life,—that I can part with freely.

[Exit.]

Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and OROONOKO.

Bla. So, Governor, we don't disturb you, I hope?

Your mistress has left you. You were making love;
 She is thankful for the honour, I suppose?

Gov. Quite insensible to all I say and do:

When I speak to her, she sighs or weeps,
 But never answers me as I would have her.

Sta. There's something nearer than her slavery, that touches her.

Bla. What do her fellow slaves say of her: can't they find the cause?

Gov. Some of them, who pretend to be wiser than the rest, and hate her, I suppose, for being used better than they are, will needs have it that she is with child.

Bla. Poor wretch! if it be so, I pity her:
 She has lost a husband, who, perhaps, was dear
 To her, and then you cannot blame her.

Oro. If it be so, indeed, you cannot blame her.

[Sighing.]

Gov. No, no, it is not so. If it be so,
 I must still love her; and, desiring still,
 I must enjoy her.

Bla. Try what you can do with fair means, and welcome.

Gov. I'll give you ten slaves for her.

Bla. You know she is our Lord Governor's:
 but, if I could dispose of her, I would not now, especially to you.

Gov. Why not to me?

Bla. I mean, against her will. You are in love with her;
 And we all know what your desires would have:

Love stops at nothing but possession.
Were she within your power, you do not know.
How soon you would be tempted to forget
The nature of the deed, and, may be, act
A violence you after would repent.

Oro. 'Tis godlike in you to protect the weak.

Gov. Fy, fy! I would not force her. Though she be a slave, her mind is free, and should consent.

Oro. Such honour will engage her to consent. Shall we not see the wonder!

Gov. Have a care;

You have a heart, and she has conquering eyes.

Oro. I have a heart; but, if it could be false To my first vows, ever to love again, These honest hands should tear it from my breast, And throw the traitor from me. Oh, Imoinda! Living or dead, I can be only thine.

Bla. Imoinda was his wife: she is, either dead, Or living, dead to him; forced from his arms By an inhuman father—Another time I'll tell you all. [To the Governor.—Music without.

Sta. The slaves have done their work; And now begins their evening merriment.

Bla. The men are all in love with fair Clemene As much as you, and try their little tricks To entertain her, and divert her sadness. Maybe, she is among them: shall we see. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Slaves, Men, Women, and Children, discovered upon the ground.—Some rise and dance.

Enter the Lieutenant-Governor, BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and OROONOKO, as spectators; Captain DRIVER and several Planters, with their swords drawn.—A bell rings.

Capt. D. Where are you, Governor? Make what haste you can

To save yourself and the whole colony.

I bade 'em ring the bell.

Gov. What's the matter?

First P. The Indians are come down upon us. They have plundered some of the plantations already, and are marching this way as fast as they can.

Gov. What can we do against them?

Bla. We shall be able to make a stand, till more planters come in to us.

Second P. There are a great many more without, if you would show yourself, and put us in order.

Gov. There's no danger of the white slaves; they'll not stir. Blandford, come you along with me; some of you stay here to look after the black slaves.

[Exeunt all but the Captain and six Planters, who, all at once, seize OROONOKO.

First P. Ay, ay, let us alone.

Capt. D. In the first place, we secure you, sir, As an enemy to the government.

Oro. Are you there, sir? You are my constant friend.

First P. You will be able to do a great deal of mischief.

Capt. D. But we shall prevent you; bring the irons hither.

Enter four Sailors, bringing chains, and putting them on OROONOKO.

Capt. D. He has the malice of a slave in him, and would be glad to be cutting his masters' throats. I know him. Chain his hands and feet, that he may not run over to them. If they have him, they shall carry him on their backs, that I can tell them.

Enter BLANDFORD, and runs to them.

Bla. What are you doing, there?

Capt. D. Securing the main chance. This is a bosom enemy.

Bla. Away, you brutes! I'll answer with my life for his behaviour; so tell the Governor.

Capt. D.

& } Well, sir, so we will.

Planters.

[Exeunt Captain, Planters, and Sailors, with chains.

Oro. Give me a sword, and I'll deserve your trust.

Enter the Lieutenant-Governor and Planters.

Bla. They drive away our slaves before our faces. Governor, can you stand tamely by, and suffer this? Clemene, sir, your mistress, is among them.

Gov. We throw ourselves away in the attempt to rescue them.

Oro. A lover cannot fall more glorious Than in the cause of love. He that deserves His mistress' favour, will not stay behind. I'll lead you on,—be bold, and follow me. [Exeunt.

Enter IMOINDA.

Imo. I'm toss'd about by my tempestuous fate, And nowhere must have rest; Indians or English, Whoever has me, I am still a slave. No matter whose I am, since I'm no more My royal master's; since I'm his no more. Oh, I was happy!—Nay, I will be happy, In the dear thought that I am still his wife. Though far divided from him. [Retires.

After a shout, enter the Lieutenant-Governor, OROONOKO, BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and the Planters.

Gov. Thou glorious man! thou something greater, sure,

Than Cæsar ever was! that single arm Has saved us all: accept our general thanks.

[All bow to OROONOKO.

And what we can do more to recompense Such noble services, you shall command. Clemene, too, shall thank you—she is safe!

Look up, and bless your brave deliverer.

[Brings CLEMENE forward, looking down on the ground.

Oro. Bless me, indeed!

Bla. You start!

Oro. Oh, all you gods

Who govern this great world, and bring about Things strange and unexpected, can it be?

Gov. What is't you stare at so?

Oro. Answer me, some of you! you, who have power,

And have your senses free. Or are you all Struck through with wonder, too?

[Looking still fixedly on her

Bla. What would you know?

Oro. My soul steals from my body through my eyes!

All that is left of life I'll gaze away, And die upon the pleasure.

Gov. This is strange!

Oro. If you but mock me with her image, here,— If she be not Imoinda—

[She looks upon him, and faints—he runs to her.

Ha, she faints!—
 Nay, then, it must be she,—it is Imoinda;
 My heart confesses her, and leaps for joy,
 To welcome her to her own empire here.
 “I feel her all, in every part of me.”
 Oh, let me press her in my eager arms,
 Wake her to life, and, with this kindling kiss,
 Give back that soul she only lent to me.

[Kisses her.]

Imoinda! Oh, thy Oroonoko calls.

[IMOINDA recovering.]

Imo. My Oroonoko! Oh, I can't believe
 What any man can say!—But, if I am
 To be deceived, there's something in that name,
 That voice, that face—
 Oh, if I know myself, I cannot be mistaken.

[Embraces OROONOKO.]

Oro. Never here;
 You cannot be mistaken; I am yours,
 Your Oroonoko, all that you would have
 Your tender loving husband.

Imo. All indeed
 That I would have! my husband! then I am
 Alive, and waking to the joys I feel:
 They were so great, I could not think them true;
 But I believe all that you say to me,
 For truth itself and everlasting love
 Grow in this breast, and pleasure in these arms.

Oro. Take, take me all; inquire into my heart
 (You know the way to every secret there),
 My heart, the sacred treasury of love;
 And if, in absence, I have misemployed
 A mite from the rich store—if I have spent
 A wish, a sigh, but what I sent to you,
 May I be cursed to wish and sigh in vain,
 And you not pity me.

Imo. O! I believe,
 And know you by myself. If these sad eyes,
 Since last we parted, have beheld the face
 Of any comfort, or once wish'd to see
 The light of any other heaven but you,
 May I be struck this moment blind, and lose
 Your blessed sight, never to find you more.

Oro. Imoinda! O, this separation
 Has made you dearer, if it can be so,
 Than you were ever to me. You appear
 Like a kind star to my benighted steps,
 To guide me on my way to happiness;
 I cannot miss it now.—Governor,—friend,
 You think me mad; but let me bless you all,
 Who any way have been the instruments
 Of finding her again. Imoinda's found!
 And every thing that I would have in her.

[Embracing her.]

Sta. Where's your mistress now, Governor?

Gov. Why, where most men's mistresses are forced to be sometimes,—

With her husband, it seems! [Aside.] But I won't lose her so!

Sta. He has fought lustily for her, and deserves
 her,—

I'll say that for him.

Bla. [To OROONOKO,] Sir, we congratulate your happiness; I do most heartily.

Gov. And all of us; but how comes it to pass—

Oro. That will require

More precious time than I can spare you now.
 I have a thousand things to ask of her,
 And she has as many more to know of me.
 But you have made me happier, I confess,
 Acknowledge it, much happier than I
 Have words or power to tell you. “Captain, you,

Even you, who most have wrong'd me, I forgive.
 I will not say you have betray'd me now;
 I'll think you but the minister of fate,
 To bring me to my loved Imoinda, here.”

Imo. How, how shall I receive you? how be worthy

Of such endearments; all this tenderness?

These are the transports of prosperity.

When fortune smiles upon us.

Oro. Let the fools,

Who follow Fortune, live upon her smiles.

All our prosperity is placed in love—

We have enough of that to make us happy.

This little spot of earth, you stand upon,

Is more to me than the extended plains

Of my great father's kingdom. Here I reign

In full delights, in joys to pow'r unknown;

Your love my empire, and your heart my throne.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Plantation.

Enter ABOAN, the three Slaves, and HOTMAN.

Hot. What! to be slaves to cowards! slaves to rogues, who can't defend themselves!

Abo. Who is this man? He talks as if he were acquainted with our design: is he one of us?

[Aside to his own gang.]

First S. Not yet; but he will be glad to make one, I believe.

Abo. I think so, too, and may be worth the having.

Hot. Go, sneak in corners; whisper out your griefs,

For fear your masters hear you; cringe and crouch
 Under the bloody whip, like beaten curs,
 That lick their wounds, and know no other cure.
 All, wretches all! you feel their cruelty,
 As much as I can feel, but dare not groan.
 For my part, while I have a life and tongue,
 I'll curse the authors of my slavery.

Abo. Have you been long a slave?

Hot. Yes, many years.

Abo. And do you only curse?

Hot. Curse! only curse! I cannot conjure,
 To raise the spirits up of other men.

I am but one. O! for a soul of fire

To warm and animate our common cause,

And make a body of us, then I would

Do something more than curse.

Abo. That body set on foot, would you be one,
 A limb, to lend it motion?

Hot. I would be

The heart of it; the head, the hand, and heart:
 Would I could see the day!

Abo. [Aside.] This spirit pleases me, and I will trust him.

The time may come to you; be ready for it—

Enter BLANDFORD.

Abo. We're interrupted now—we'll meet anon.

Bla. If there be any one among you here
 That did belong to Oroonoko, speak:
 I come to him.

Abo. I did belong to him. Aboan my name.

Bla. You are the man I want; pray come with me. [Exeunt all but HOTMAN.]

Hot. Yes, 'tis as I suspected—this Aboan Has form'd some secret project to revolt; My well-feign'd zeal has snared him, and he'll trust me:

Then welcome liberty!—not that I mean To trust his cunning, or the chance of arms; I have a nearer, surer way to freedom: I'll learn the plot, and watch it step by step, Till on the verge of execution—then, Just then, betray it; 'twill enhance the merit, And make reward more ample and more sure.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room.

Enter OROONOKO and IMOINDA.

Oro. I do not blame my father for his love; 'Twas Nature's fault that made you like the sun, The reasonable worship of mankind: He could not help his adoration. But when I think on his barbarity, That could expose you to so many wrongs, Driving you out to wretched slavery, Only for being mine; then I confess I wish I could forget the name of son, That I might curse the tyrant.

Imo. I will bless him, For I have found you here: Heav'n only knows What is reserved for us; but, if we guess The future by the past, our fortune must Be wonderful, above the common size Of good or ill; it must be in extremes—Extremely happy, or extremely wretched.

Oro. 'Tis in our power to make it happy now.

Imo. But not to keep it so.

Enter BLANDFORD and ABOAN.

Bla. My royal lord!

I have a present for you.

Oro. Aboan!

Abo. Your lowest slave.

Oro. My tried and valued friend.

This worthy man always prevents my wants: I only wish'd, and he has brought thee to me. Thou art surprised; carry thy duty there:

[ABOAN goes to IMOINDA, and falls at her feet.]

While I acknowledge mine, how shall I thank you!

Bla. Believe me honest to your interest, And I am more than paid. I have secured That all your followers shall be gently used. This gentleman, your chief favourite, sir, Shall wait upon your person, while you stay Among us.

Oro. I owe everything to you.

Bla. You must not think you are in slavery.

Oro. I do not find I am.

Bla. Kind Heav'n has miraculously sent Those comforts, that may teach you to expect Its farther care, in your deliverance.

Oro. I sometimes think myself, Heaven is concerned

For my deliverance.

Bla. It will be soon;

You may expect it. Pray, in the mean time, Appear as cheerful as you can among us. You have some enemies, that represent You dangerous, and would be glad to find A reason, in your discontent, to fear;

They watch your looks. But there are honest men,

Who are your friends; you are secured in them.

Oro. I thank you for your caution.

Bla. I will leave you:

And be assured, I wish your liberty.

[Exit BLANDFORD.]

Abo. He speaks you very fair.

Oro. He means me fair.

Oro. If he should not, my lord?

Oro. If he should not?

I'll not suspect his truth; but if I did,

What shall I get by doubting?

Abo. You secure

Yourself from disappointment; but, besides, There's this advantage in suspecting him, When you put off the hopes of other men, You will rely upon your godlike self, And then you may be sure of liberty.

Oro. Be sure of liberty! what dost thou mean Advising to rely upon myself?

I think we may be sure on't; we must wait; 'Tis worth a little patience.

Abo. O, my lord!

Oro. What dost thou drive at?

Abo. Sir, another time

You would have found it sooner: but I see Love has your heart, and takes up all your thoughts.

Oro. And canst thou blame me?

Abo. Sir, I must not blame you.

But, as our fortune stands, there is a passion (Your pardon, royal mistress, I must speak) That would become you better than your love;—A brave resentment; which, inspired by you, Might kindle and diffuse a gen'rous rage Among the slaves, to rouse and shake our chains, And struggle to be free.

Oro. How can we help ourselves?

Abo. I knew you, when you would have found a way.

How help ourselves! the very Indians teach us: We need but to attempt our liberty, And we carry it. We have hands sufficient, Double the number of our masters' force, Ready to be employ'd. What hinders us To set them, then, at work? We want but you, To head our enterprise, and bid us strike.

Oro. What would you do?

Abo. Cut our oppressors' throats.

Oro. And you would have me join in your design of murder?

Abo. It deserves a better name: But, be it what it will, 'tis justified By self-defence and natural liberty.

Oro. I'll hear no more on't.

Abo. I'm sorry for't.

Oro. Nor shall you think of it.

Abo. Not think of it!

Oro. No: I command you not.

Abo. Remember, sir,

You are a slave yourself, and to command Is now another's right. Not think of it! Since the first moment they put on my chains, I've thought of nothing but the weight of them, And how to throw them off. Can your's sit easy?

Oro. I have a sense of my condition, As painful, and as quick, as yours can be. I feel for my Imoinda and myself; Imoinda, much the tenderest part of me. But, though I languish for my liberty, I would not buy it at the Christian price Of black ingratitude; they shall not say,

That we deserved our fortune by our crimes.

Murder the innocent!

Abo. The innocent!

Oro. These men are so, whom you would rise against.

If we are slaves, they did not make us slaves,
But bought us in the common way of trade.
They paid our price for us, and we are now
Their property, a part of their estate,
To manage as they please. Mistake me not—
I do not tamely say, that we should bear
All they could lay upon us: but we find
The load so light, so little to be felt (Considering they have us in their power,
And may inflict what grievances they please),
We ought not to complain.

Abo. My royal lord,

You do not know the heavy grievances,
The toils, the labours, weary drudgeries,
Which they impose; burdens more fit for beasts,
For senseless beasts to bear, than thinking men.
Then if you saw the bloody cruelties
They execute on every slight offence;
Nay, sometimes in their proud, insulting sport,
How worse than dogs they lash their fellow-creatures,

Your heart would bleed for them. Oh! could you know

How many wretches lift their hands and eyes
To you for their relief!

Oro. I pity them,

And wish I could with honesty do more.

Abo. You must do more, and may, with honesty.

O, royal sir, remember who you are—
A prince, born for the good of other men;
Whose godlike office is to draw the sword
Against oppression, and set free mankind:
And this, I'm sure, you think oppression now.
What though you have not felt those miseries,
Never believe you are obliged to them:
They have their selfish reasons, maybe, now,
For using you so well. But there will come
A time, when you must have your share of them.
Oro. You see how little cause I have to think so.
"Favour'd in my own person, in my friends;
Indulged in all that can concern my care,
In my Imoinda's soft society." [Embracing her.

Abo. And therefore would you lie contented down

In the forgetfulness and arms of love,
To get young princes for them?

Oro. Say'st thou? ha!

Abo. Princes, the heirs of empire, and the last
Of your illustrious lineage, to be born
To pamper up their pride, and be their slaves!

Oro. Imoinda, save me; save me from that thought!

"Imo. There is no safety from it: I have long
Suffer'd it with a mother's labouring pains,
And can no longer. Kill me, kill me now,
While I am bless'd, and happy in your love;
Rather than let me live to see you hate me:
As you must hate me—me, the only cause,
The fountain of these flowing miseries."

Oro. Shall the dear babe, the eldest of my hopes,
Whom I begot a prince, be born a slave?
The treasure of this temple was design'd
To enrich a kingdom's fortune: shall it here
Be seized upon by vile unhallow'd hands,
To be employ'd in uses most profane?

Abo. In most unworthy uses—think of that;
And, while you may, prevent it. O, my lord,

Rely on nothing that they say to you.

They speak you fair, I know, and bid you wait.

But think what 'tis to wait on promises,

And promises of men who know no tie

Upon their words, against their interest:

And where's their interest in freeing you?

Imo. O! where, indeed, to lose so many slaves?

"Abo. Nay, grant this man; you think so much your friend,

Be honest, and intends all that he says,

He is but one; and in a government,

Where, he confesses, you have enemies,

That watch your looks. What looks can you put on,

To please these men, who are before resolved
To read them their own way? Alas, my lord!

If they incline to think you dangerous,

They have their knavish arts to make you so:

And then who knows how far their cruelty
May carry their revenge?

"Imo. To everything

That does belong to you, your friends, and me.

I shall be torn from you, forced away,

Helpless and miserable. Shall I live

To see that day again?

"Oro. That day shall never come."

Abo. I know you are persuaded to believe
The Governor's arrival will prevent

These mischiefs, and bestow you liberty:

But who is sure of that? I rather fear
More mischiefs from his coming. He is young,
Luxurious, passionate, and amorous:

Such a complexion, and made bold by power,

To countenance all he is prone to do,

Will know no bounds, no law against his lusts.

If, in a fit of his intemperance,

With a strong hand he shall resolve to seize,

And force my royal mistress from your arms,

How can you help yourself?

Oro. Ha! thou hast roused

The lion in his den—he stalks abroad,

And the wide forest trembles at his roar.

I find the danger now: my spirits start

At the alarm, and from all quarters come,

To man my heart, the citadel of love.

Is there a power on earth to force you from me?

And shall I not resist it?

Now I am fashion'd to thy purpose: speak;

What combination, what conspiracy,

Would'st thou engage me in? I'll undertake

All thou wouldst have me; now, for liberty,—

For the great cause of love and liberty.

Abo. Now, my great master, you appear yourself.

And, since we have you join'd in our design,

It cannot fail us. I have muster'd up

The choicest slaves, men who are sensible

Of their condition, and seem most resolved:

They have their several parties.

"Oro. Summon them,"

Assemble them. I will come forth and show

Myself among them; if they are resolved,

I'll lead their foremost resolutions.

"Abo. I have provided those will follow you:

"Oro. With this reserve in our proceedings still,

The means that lead us to our liberty

Must not be bloody.

"Abo. In self-defence, my lord—"

"Oro. I know, I feel,

All thou canst say, and more. Is there no way—

[Pauses.]

Ye gods! 'tis inspiration! What a thought!
The very ship that brought, that made us slaves,
Swims in the river still—we'll seize on that,
And not a life shall fall.

"Abo. And shall we, then,
Desert our honest, brave, unhappy friends?
Blast all their hopes?

"Oro. O, no! we'll go together;
Not one associate shall be left behind.

"Abo. Why, farewell, then; revenge. It shall be so."

We shall expect you, sir.

Oro. You shall not long.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—A Plantation.

Enter several Slaves, conspirators.

First S. 'Tis about the time now; he'll be here soon.

Second S. Well; but what are we to do?

First S. To do! why, we are to be free.

Second S. Ay! 'Twas lucky this Aboan came among us. When I look at him, and hear him talk, I think I'm free already.

Third S. Why, ay, to be sure; such men as he may do much.

Second S. Why, we were all such men, till slavery broke us. But what is the project?

Third S. Why, we shall hear, we shall hear.

First S. Ay, let Aboan alone; I'll warrant he'll put us in a way.

Second S. There's Hotman, too. Did you hear how he fired, when our tyrants ran away, and left us to the Indians?

First S. Did I? Ay. Hotman, in my opinion, has as much spirit as Aboan. Here they are, coming together. Let us draw back a little. See how earnestly they talk—don't let us interrupt them.

[They retire to the back of the stage.

Enter HOTMAN and ABOAN.

Abo. This is his scheme; I left him but this moment.

Hot. I like it not. A glorious feat, indeed, For souls of fire, provoked by burning wrongs, To seize a ship by night, and steal away. Our useless weapons slumbering in the sheath. Confusion! and our suff'rings unrevenged!

Abo. Indeed, I thought of more. But is not freedom,

Without the chance of contest, worth acceptance?

Hot. I know not—to those frigid clods, perhaps; To our pale lords, who only dare to strike Whom others bind, it might—but not to me.

By all my wrongs, I thirst for more than freedom.

Abo. Thy noble ardour might e'en warm the dead!

We'll try once more its power on Oroonoko.

But soft—here are our friends, and, as I think, At distance comes the prince—it must be he.

Welcome, my friends, the prince is of your party,

[Turning to the Slaves.

And has engaged to make your cause his own. See where he comes.

Enter OROONOKO.

Here are our friends, my lord, Who ask but your concurrence to be free.

Oro. If to all these I am the means of freedom, 'Tis well I was a slave—'tis well that here I've learn'd the wrongs you suffer.

ACT, DRAMA.—NO. XXVIII.

Hot. 'Tis better not to be, than thus to suffer.

Abo. To die at once, than leave our wretched offspring

Heirs of the chains and scourges that—

Oro. No more.

My friend here tells me, you have well resolved

[To the Slaves.

To make one glorious effort to be free—

To risk your lives, and all the threefold woes

That would attend our unsuccessful contest.

[The Slaves look on each other, and answer nothing.

Hot. [Clamorously.] All, all we risk for freedom—and revenge!

[OROONOKO turns quick, and looks earnestly at HOTMAN.

Oro. [After a pause.] 'Tis well—'tis great!

[Turning to the rest.] But I have found the means

To gain our purpose by a safer way.

Hot. [Interrupting.] A safer! Let him talk of safer ways,

Who holds his life more dear than great revenge.

[OROONOKO turns hastily again, and looks at HOTMAN, fixing his eyes some time upon him, without speaking; HOTMAN at length shows some signs of confusion—OROONOKO then turns and speaks to ABOAN.

Oro. Is this the man whose zeal you praised so much?

Abo. It is.

Hot. [More confused.] They whisper—yes, I am suspected—

I must talk louder still. [Aside.

Oro. [Still eyeing HOTMAN.] And is he trusted with the whole design?

Abo. He is, my lord.

Oro. The marks of guilt are on him.

Abo. Not so, my lord.

Oro. Whence his confusion, then, to meet my eye?

Abo. Whence his confusion, now, suppose him false?

Oro. Whence! From the consciousness of falsehood here,

That which makes villains start at their own shadow, That made him fear my eye, though it could reach No farther than the covering of his heart.

E'en now he trembles, and a sickly hue Steals on his cheeks.

Abo. It does—yet try him farther.

Oro. To try him, now he's trusted, boots us nothing.

Abo. Do it, if only to restore our hope, Or end the torments of suspense.

Oro. I will.

Your zeal, my friend, I honour; but you know— [To HOTMAN.

Hot. That nobler hopes have set my soul on fire, Than just to steal a ship, and run away— If I consent to this, ye gods!

[He affects to speak this loudly, but his voice falters through his fear.

Oro. If you do not consent, you will not sure—

Hot. I will not what?—Who is there that suspects me?

[In a great confusion.—OROONOKO looks at ABOAN, then turns again to HOTMAN.

Oro. Suspects, my friend!—Of what should we suspect you?

Abo. [Hastily.] By heav'n? if I suspected any present

Of a perfidious view to blast our hopes,
This dagger here at once should make him faithful.

[HOTMAN, staring, attempts to speak, but is overcome by his confusion and terror.]

Oro. [To ABOAN.] What think you now?

Abo. By all my fears, a coward and a traitor.

Oro. He'll certainly betray us.

Abo. That he shall not;

For what I swore, I'll do.

Oro. What wilt thou do?

Abo. I'll stab his mouth before you; stab him here,

And then let him inform.

[Going to stab HOTMAN, OROONOKO holds him—HOTMAN, who keeps his eye upon them, perceives it with extreme confusion, and, after some irresolute gestures, steals off unperceived.]

Oro. Thou art not mad—

Abo. I would secure ourselves.

Oro. It shall not be this way,—it cannot be;
To murder him, is to alarm the rest.

[Turns about, and misses HOTMAN.]

What, is he gone?

Abo. [To the Slaves.] Is Hotman gone?

First S. Hotman, my lord, is gone: but doubt him not.

[To OROONOKO.]

The stern inquiring look of majesty
(We feel its pow'r) will strike the mind with awe;
He dared to differ, sir; but, when opposed,
He felt confused; the difference of his state—

Oro. Why, be it so.

My fellow-sufferers and worthy friends,

To-morrow, early as the breaking day,

We rendezvous behind the citron-grove;

Till then, farewell. [Exeunt Slaves.]

Aboan!

Abo. My lord.

Oro. 'Twas better not to trust them with our fears,

Yet let them meet at a more early time;

Within this hour—and then, though Hotman's false,

We may succeed before we are betray'd.

Abo. We may—I'll after them and do it.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Governor's House.

Enter HOTMAN and the Lieutenant-Governor.

Gov. To seize the ship, say you?

Hot. E'en so, my lord.

Gov. At what hour?

Hot. The hour I cannot tell.

Gov. Were you not trusted, then?

Hot. I was, my lord; but he they call the prince—

Gov. What, Oronoko?

Hot. The same, my lord; a bloody-minded fellow;—

He and another took it in their heads
To think I was not quite the rogue I seem'd,
And, if I had not left them, would have stabb'd me.

Gov. Indeed!—Well, we must be beforehand with them.

Your honest service to the government
Shall be rewarded with your liberty. [Pauses.]
Let's see—

Hot. [Aside.] Could I have work'd them up to farther mischief,

My wages had been more.

[Retiring.]

Gov. Here, Hotman—hark ye,

Let Captain Driver come to me this moment.

[Exit HOTMAN.]

Why, this is just the thing I would have wish'd.

The laws now take this Oronoko off,

And leave Imoinda mine—the ship secur'd,

His party will desert him, and with ease

I then may seize my prey.

Enter Captain DRIVER.

Captain, what hands have you on board to-night?

Capt. D. Not many, but enough to do the business. I learn'd it from the slave I met below.

Gov. I sent him, sir.

Capt. D. I know it, Governor, and have sent him with orders that the ship should weigh, and stand from shore: 'tis doing, sir, ere now.

Gov. Your crew, then, captain, are not all on board?

Capt. D. No, no; I'll send them orders to be ready; They'll do for your Prince Oronoko, yet.

Gov. Well, Captain, I'll expect you; I shall order

All the militia under arms directly,

Here on the platform.

Capt. D. You need not fear me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Citron Grove—Moonlight.

Enter OROONOKO, ABOAN, IMOINDA, Slaves, Women, and Children, following.

Oro. Come on, my friends! see, where the rising moon

Now shines upon our purpose! Let our march
At once be swift and silent, like her course;
The ship surprised, we triumph without conflict,
Nor mark our way to liberty with blood.

Enter First Slave, as OROONOKO is leading the others out.

First S. [Prostrating himself before OROONOKO.]

My lord, my prince—

Oro. What wouldst thou say?—Be brief.

First S. The villain Hotman—

Abo. Ah!

Oro. Well, what of him?—Take courage—what of him?

First S. My lord, I fear he has betray'd us.

Oro. Why?

First S. From our last rendezvous, my lord, o'en now

I watch'd him to the Governor's; but there
He stay'd not long; I saw, as he came out,
He spoke to Captain Driver, and from him
I watch'd him still; he hastened to the ship,
Which, now unmoor'd, lies farther from the shore;
The Captain and his crew are up in arms,
All the militia out, the place alarm'd:
They'll soon be here.

Oro. Why, we must meet them, then; the iron hand

Of stern necessity is now upon us;

And from the rack she drives us to our swords.

[Draws.]

The women and the children fall behind,

Unfit for dangers, such as now approach us.
What will become of them!

[“ABOAN, who, during this scene, expresses the utmost anguish of mind, by his gestures and deportment, at length comes forward, and, prostrating himself before OROONOKO, takes his foot, and sets it upon his head.”

“Oro. Forbear—we’re born to error; let me raise thee,—

I know thee faithful, therefore blame thee not.”

Abo. O, my dear lord! my heart drops blood to think

My hasty, eager, fond credulity
Should let that slave’s false seeming thus undo us.

Oro. Name it no more.

Abo. ‘Tis lost—‘tis ruin’d—and by me! but this—

[He suddenly draws a dagger, and offers to stab himself—OROONOKO lays hold of his hand.

Oro. Hold! now you wrong my design: thus far
Thou’st only err’d; but to desert me now

[Wresting the dagger from him.

Would be a crime indeed—I need thy help.

[Turning to IMOINDA.

Imoinda, you must not expose yourself:

Retire, my love; I almost fear for you.

Imo. I fear no danger: life, or death, I will Enjoy with you.

First S. [Alarmed.] They come! they come! I see them; they’re upon us.

Oro. [Putting himself before IMOINDA.] My person is your guard.

Enter the Lieutenant-Governor, with HOTMAN and his Rabble.—Captain STANMORE and his Men.

Abo. There is the villain that betray’d our cause,
His life is due to me. [Advancing.

Oro. Hold you; and you who come against us, hold!

I charge you in the general good to all,
“And wish I could command you, to prevent
The bloody havoc of the murd’ring sword!”
I would not urge destruction uncompell’d;
But, if you follow fate, you find it here.
Who first advances—

Enter Captain DRIVER, with his Crew.

Capt. D. Here, here, here they are, Governor:—
What, seize upon my ship!

Come, boys, fall on. [Advancing first.

Oro. [Stabbing him.] Thou art fall’n, indeed.

[Captain DRIVER falls in the arms of two Sailors.
Thy own blood be upon thee!

Oro. Rest it there.

He did deserve his death. Take him away.

[They remove the body.

You see, sir, and those mistaken men
Must be our witnesses, we do not come
As enemies, and thirsting for your blood.

If we desir’d your ruin, the revenge
Of our companion’s death had push’d it on.
But that we overlook, in a regard
To common safety and the public good.

Oro. Regard that public good: draw off your men

And leave us to our fortune: we’re resolv’d.

Gov. Resolv’d on what?—Your resolutions

Are broken, overturn’d, prevented, lost:

What fortune now can you raise out of them?

Nay, grant we should draw off, what can you do?

Where can you move?—What more can you resolve

Unless it be to throw yourselves away?

Famine must eat you up, if you go on.

You see, our numbers could with ease compel

What we request:—and what do we request?

Only to save yourselves.

[The Women, with their Children, gathering about the Men.

Oro. I’ll hear no more!

Gov. To those poor wretches who have been seduced

And led away, to all and ev’ry one,

We offer a full pardon.

Oro. Then, fall on! [Preparing to engage.

Gov. Lay hold upon’t, before it be too late;

Pardon and mercy.

[The Men leave OROONOKO, and fall upon their faces, crying out for pardon.

Slaves. Pardon! Mercy! Pardon!

Oro. Let them go, all. Now, Governor, I see,

I own, the folly of my enterprise,

The rashness of this action; and must blush,

Quite through this veil of night, a whitely shame,

To think I could design to make those free,

Who were by nature slaves; wretches, design’d

To be their masters’ dogs, and lick their feet.

We were too few before for victory.

[Exeunt all Slaves.

We’re still enow to die. [To IMOINDA and ABOAN,

Enter BLANDFORD.

Gov. Live, royal sir,—

Live, and be happy long, on your own terms;

Only consent to yield, and you shall have

What terms you can propose, for you and yours,

Oro. Consent to yield! Shall I betray myself?

Bla. I’m glad you have proceeded by fair means.

[To the Governor.

I came to be a mediator.

Gov. Try what you can work upon him.

Oro. Are you come against me, too?

Bla. Is this to come against you?

[Crossing to OROONOKO, and offering him his sword.

Unarm’d to put myself into your hands?

I come, I hope, to serve you.

Oro. You have serv’d me;

I thank you for’t; and I am pleas’d to think

You were my friend, while I had need of one:

But now ’tis past:—this farewell, and begone.

[Embraces him.

Bla. It is not pass’d, and I must serve you still,

I would make up these breaches, which the sword

Will widen more, and close us all in love.

Oro. I know what I have done, and I should be

A child, to think they ever can forgive.—

Forgive! Were there but that, I would not live

To be forgiven:—Is there a power on earth

That I can ever need forgiveness from?

Bla. You shall not need it.

Oro. No, I will not need it.

Bla. You see, he offers you your own conditions,

For you and yours.

Oro. Must I capitulate?

Precariously compound, on stinted terms,

To save my life?

Bla. Sir, he imposes none.

“You make them for your own security.

If your great heart cannot descend to treat,

In adverse fortune, with an enemy,

Yet, sure, your honour’s safe, you may accept

Offers of peace and safety from a friend!

"Gov. He will rely on what you say to him :

[To BLANDFORD.

Offer him what you can, I will confirm

And make all good. Be you my pledge of trust.

"Bla. I'll answer, with my life, for all he says.

Gov. Ay, do, and pay the forfeit, if you please.

[Aside."

Bla. Consider, sir, can you consent to throw

That blessing from you, you so hardly found,

[Points to IMOINDA.

And so much valued once?

Oro. Imoinda, oh!

"'Tis she that holds me on this argument

Of tedious life : I could resolve it soon,

Were this cursed being only in debate.

But my Imoinda struggles in my soul,—

She makes a coward of me, I confess.

I am afraid to part with her in death ;

And more afraid of life, to lose her here.

Bla. "This way, you must lose her;" think upon

The weakness of her sex, made yet more weak

With her condition, requiring rest

And soft indulging ease, to nurse your hopes

And make you a glad father.

Oro. There, I feel

A father's fondness and a husband's love.

They seize upon my heart, strain all its strings

To pull me to them from my stern resolve.

Husband and father! all the melting art

Of eloquence lives in those soft'ning names.

"Methinks I see the babe, with infant hands,

Pleading for life, and begging to be born.

Shall I forbid his birth? deny him life?

The heavenly comforts of all-cheering light?

These are the calls of Nature, that call loud,

They will be heard, and conquer in their cause."

He must not be a man who can resist them.

No, my Imoinda! I will venture all

To save thee, and that little innocent :

The world may be a better friend to him

Than I have found it. Now I yield myself :

[Gives up his sword.

The conflict's pass'd, and we are in your hands.

[The Sailors gather about OROOKO and ABOAN, and seize them.

Gov. So you shall find you are.—Dispose of them

As I commanded you.

Bla. Good Heav'n forbid! You cannot mean—

Gov. This is not your concern.

[To BLANDFORD, who goes hastily to STANMORE.

Bla. For Heaven's sake, use your interest with him, Stanmore!

Gov. I must take care of you. [To IMOINDA.

Imo. I'm at the end

Of all my care : here will I die with him!

[Holding OROOKO.

Oro. You shall not force her from me.

[He holds her.

Gov. Then I must [They force her from him.

Try other means, and conquer force by force :

Break—cut off his hold! Bring her away!

Sta. Dear Governor, consider what you do!

Imo. I do not ask to live—kill me but here!

Gov. Away!

Oro. Oh, bloody dogs! Inhuman murderers!

[IMOINDA is forced out by the Governor.—Exit OROOKO and ABOAN, guarded.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Governor's House.

Enter the Lieutenant-Governor, with BLANDFORD and STANMORE.

Bla. Have you no reverence of future fame?
No awe upon your actions, from the tongues,
The censoring tongues of men, that will be free?
If you confess humanity, believe
There is a God, to punish or reward
Our doings here, do not provoke your fate.

Gov. Tell me no more of fame and breach of faith,—

The public good requires that he should die.

Sta. The public good must totter when the base
Is fraud, and craft, and prostituted honour.

Bla. When guilt is sanctified by bold pretences

That wrong is in its consequences right,

The bond that holds society together

Is broken, rule and order at an end,

And anarchy must desolate the world.

Gov. The planters hold not these opinions, sir;

They think it well that bloodshed was prevented

By any means, and now are clamorous

To have this slave cut off.

Bla. We are not, sure, so wretched, to have these.

The rabble, judge for us; the changing crowd,

The arbitrary guard of fortune's power

Who wait to catch the sentence of her frowns,

And hurry all to ruin she condemns.

Sta. So far from farther wrongs, that 'tis a shame

He should be where he is. Good Governor,

Order his liberty; he yielded up

Himself, his all.

Bla. He yielded on your word;

And I am made the cautionary pledge,

The gage and hostage of your keeping it.

Remember, sir, he yielded on your word;

Your word!—Which honest men will think should be.

The last resort of truth, and trust on earth,

You cannot sure persist in such an act,

And be sedately cruel and perfidious.

Sta. Besides, the wretch has now no longer power

Of doing harm, were he disposed to use it.

Bla. But he is not disposed.

Sta. We'll be his sureties, sir.

Bla. Yes, we will answer for him now, my friend;

The Governor, I know, will thank us.

Gov. Well, you will have it so; do what you please—just what you will with him; I give you leave.

[Exit.

Bla. We thank you, sir; this way, pray come with me.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—OROOKO discovered upon his back, his legs and arms stretched out, and chained to the ground.

Enter BLANDFORD and STANMORE.

Bla. O miserable sight! help,
Assist me to free him from his chains.

[They help him up, and bring him forward, looking down.

Most injured prince! how shall we clear ourselves?

Sta. We are not guilty of your injuries,

No way consenting to them ; but abhor,
Abominate, and loathe this cruelty.

Oro. If you would have me think you are not all Confederates, all accessory to
The base injustice of your Governor ;
If you would have me live, as you appear
Concern'd for me ; if you would have me live
To thank and bless you, there is yet a way
To tie me ever to your honest love ;
Bring my Imoinda to me ; give me her,
To charm my sorrows, and, if possible,
I'll sit down with my wrongs, never to rise
Against my fate, or think of vengeance more.

Bla. Be satisfied—you may depend upon us ;
We'll bring her safe to you, and suddenly.
In the meantime

Endeavour to forget, sir, and forgive ;
And hope a better fortune.

[Exeunt BLANDFORD and STANMORE.]

Oro. Forget ! forgive ! I must indeed forget,
When I forgive ; but, while I am a man,
In flesh, that bears the living marks of shame,
The print of his dishonourable chains,
I never can forgive this Governor,
This villain.

What shall I do ? If I declare myself,
I know him, he will creep behind his guard
Of followers, and brave me in his fears ;
“ Else, lion-like, with my devouring rage,
I would rush on him, fasten on his throat,
Tear a wide passage to his treacherous heart,
And that way lay him open to the world.”

[Pausing.]

If I should turn his Christian arts on him,
Promise him, speak him fair, flatter, and creep
With fawning steps to get within his faith,
I could betray him then, as he has me.
But, am I sure by that to right myself ?
Lying's a certain mark of cowardice ;
And, when the tongue forgets its honesty,
The heart and hand may drop their functions too,
And nothing worthy be resolved or done.
Honour should be concerned in honour's cause.
Let me but find out
An honest remedy, I have the hand,
A ministering hand, that will apply it home. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Governor's House.

Enter the Lieutenant-Governor, BLANDFORD, and STANMORE.

Gov. [Impatiently.] Well, what's the matter now ?

Bla. I'm sorry we intrude, sir ; but our business
Will quickly be dispatch'd ; we come to seek Clemene, sir ; we've promised Oroonoko
To bring her to him.

Gov. You do very well ; 'tis kindly done of you ;
Even carry her to him with all my heart.

Sta. You must tell us where she is.

Gov. I tell you ! why, don't you know ?

Bla. Your servant says she's in the house.

Gov. No, no ; I brought her home at first, indeed ; but I thought it would not look well to keep her here ; I removed her in the hurry, only to take care of her. What ! she belongs to you, I have nothing to do with her !

Sta. But where is she now, sir ?

Gov. Why, faith ! I can't say certainly ; you'll hear of her at Parham-house, I suppose ; there or thereabouts : I think I sent her there.

Bla. [Aside.] I'll have an eye on him.

[Exeunt BLANDFORD and STANMORE.]

Gov. I have lied myself into a little time,
And must employ it ; they'll be here again ;
But I must be before them.

[Going out, he meets IMOINDA, and seizes her.]
Are you come ?

I'll court no longer for a happiness
That is in my own keeping : you may still Refuse to grant, so I have power to take,—
The man that asks, deserves to be denied.

Enter BLANDFORD, behind him.

Imo. He does, indeed, that asks unworthily.

Bla. You hear her, sir ; that asks unworthily.

Gov. You are no judge.

Bla. I am, of my own slave.

Gov. Begone, and leave us.

Bla. When you let her go.

Gov. To fasten upon you.

Imo. Help ! murder ! help !

[Exit.]

Gov. She shall not 'scape me so. I've gone too far,

Not to go farther. Curse on my delay !

But yet she is, and shall be, in my pow'r. [Exit.]

Bla. Nay, then it is the war of honesty ;
I know you, and will save you from yourself.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.

Enter OROONOKO.

Oro. To honour bound ! and yet a slave to love !
I am distracted by their rival powers,
And both will be obey'd. O, great revenge !
Thou raiser and restorer of fallen fame !
Let me not be unworthy of thy aid,
For stopping in thy course : I still am thine,
But can't forget I am Imoinda's, too.
She calls me from my wrongs, to rescue her.
No man condemn me, who has never felt
A woman's power, or tried the force of love :
Love, love will be
My first ambition, and my fame the next.

Enter ABOAN, bloody.

Aboan !

My ever faithful friend !

Abo. I have no name

That can distinguish me from the vile earth
To which I'm going : a poor abject worm,
That crawl'd a while upon the bustling world,
And now am trampled to my dust again.

Oro. I see thee gash'd and mangled.

Abo. Spare my shame,

To tell how they have used me : but believe
The hangman's hand would have been merciful.
Do not you scorn me, sir, to think I can
Intend to live under this infamy.

I do not come for pity, but for pardon.

Oro. For pardon ! wound me not with keener anguish

Than yet I feel, by thinking thou canst need it :
Thou'st spent an honourable life with me ;
The earliest servant of my rising fame.

Abo. And would attend it with my latest care :
My life was yours, and so shall be my death.
You must not live ; alas ! you must not live :
Bending and sinking, I have dragg'd my steps
Thus far, to tell you that you cannot live ;
To warn you of those ignominious wrongs,
Whips, rods, and all the instruments of death,

Which I have felt, and are prepar'd for you.
This was the duty that I had to pay.

'Tis done, and now I beg to be discharg'd.

Oro. What shall I do for thee?

Abo. My body tires,

And will not bear me off to liberty :

I shall again be taken, made a slave.

A sword, a dagger, yet would rescue me.

I have not strength to go to find out death ;

You must direct him to me.

Oro. Here he is.

[Gives him a dagger.]

The only present I can make thee now :

And, next the honourable means of life,

I would bestow the honest means of death.

Abo. I cannot stay to thank you. Only this,

The villain, Hotman, as I stagger'd hither,
Arm'd with a sword, I met. I wrench'd it from him,

Collecting all my strength ; and in his heart,
Stain'd to the hilt, I left it.

O, my dear honour'd master, if there is

A being after this, I shall be yours

In the next world : your faithful slave again.

This is to try.

[Stabs himself.]

I will not say farewell ;

For you must follow me.

[Dies.]

Oro. In life and death,

The guardian of my honour ! Follow thee !

" I should have gone before thee : then, perhaps,
Thy fate had been prevented.

Why, why, you gods ! why am I so accus'd,
That it must be a reason of your wrath "

A guilt, a crime sufficient to the fate

Of any one, but to belong to me ?

My friend has found it, and my wife will soon :

My wife ! the very fear's too much for life, —
I can't support it. Where ? — Imoinda ! Oh !

[Going out, she meets him, running into his arms.]

" Thou bosom softness ! down of all my cares !
Thou art disorder'd, pale, and out of breath ! "

If fate pursues thee, find a shelter here.

What is it thou wouldst tell me ?

Imo. 'Tis in vain to call him villain.

Oro. Call him governor ; is it not so ?

Imo. There's not another, sure, so great.

" Oro. Villain's the common name of mankind
here,

But his most properly." What ! what of him ?

" I fear to be resolv'd, and must inquire."

He had thee in his power ?

Imo. I blush to think it.

Oro. Blush ! to think what ?

Imo. That I was in his power.

Oro. He could not use it ?

Imo. What can't such men do ?

Oro. But did he, durst he ?

Imo. What he could he dared.

Oro. His own gods damn him, then ! for ours have none,

No punishment for such unheard-of crime.

Imo. This monster, cunning in his flatteries,

When he had wearied all his useless arts,

Leap'd out, fierce as a beast of prey, to seize me.

I trembled, feared.

Oro. I fear and tremble now.

What could preserve thee ? — What deliver thee ?

Imo. That worthy man, you used to call your friend.

Oro. Blandford ?

Imo. Came in, and saved me from his rage.

Oro. He was a friend, indeed, to rescue thee !

And, for his sake, I'll think it possible

A Christian may be yet an honest man.

Imo. O, did you know what I have struggled through,

To save me yours, sure you would promise me
Never to see me forced from you again.

Oro. To promise thee ! O ! do I need to promise !
But there is now no farther use of words.

Death is security for all our fears.

[Shows ABOAN'S body on the floor.]

Imo. Aboan !

Oro. Mangled and torn, resolv'd to give me time
To fit myself for what I must expect,

Groan'd out a warning to me, and expir'd.

Imo. For what you must expect ?

Oro. Would that were all !

Imo. What ! to be butcher'd thus —

Oro. Just as thou seest.

Imo. By barb'rous hands, to fall at last their prey.

Oro. I have run the race with honour, shall I now
Lag, and be overtaken at the goal ?

Imo. No.

Oro. I must look back to thee.

[Tenderly.]

Imo. You shall not need.

I'm always present to your purpose ; say,

Which way you would dispose me ?

Oro. Have a care.

Thou'rt on a precipice, and dost not see

Whether that question leads thee.

I cannot as I would dispose thee ;

And, as I ought, I dare not. Oh, Imoinda !

Imo. Alas, that sigh ! Why do you tremble so ?

Nay, then, 'tis bad, indeed, if you can weep.

Oro. My heart runs over ; if my gushing eyes

Betray a weakness which they never knew,

Believe, thou, only thou, couldst cause these tears.

" The gods themselves conspire with faithless men
To our destruction.

" Imo. Heaven and earth our foes !

If Heaven could be appeased, these cruel men

Are not to be entreated or believed ;

Oh, think on that, and be no more deceived.

" Oro. But we were born to suffer.

" Imo. Suffer, both ? —

Both die, and so prevent them.

" Oro. By thy death !

Oh, let me hunt my travelled thoughts again, —

Range the wild waste of desolate despair !

Start any hope ! Alas, I lose myself !

'Tis pathless, dark, and barren, all to me !

Thou art my only guide — my light of life,

And thou art leaving me. Send out thy beams

Upon the wing ; let them fly all around, —

Discover every way ; is there a dawn,

A glimmering of comfort ? The great God,

That rises on the world must shine on us.

" Imo. And see us set before him.

" Oro. Thou bespeak'st,

And goest before me.

" Imo. So I would in love, —

In the dear, unsuspected part of life, —

In death, for love. Alas ! what hope's for me ?

I was preserved but to acquit myself —

I beg to die with you.

" Oro. Which is the way ?

" Imo. The god of love is blind, and cannot find
it ;

But, quick, make haste ! our enemies have eyes

To find us out, and show us the worst way

Of parting : think on them !

" Oro. Why dost thou wake me ?

" Imo. Oh, no more of love !

For, if I listen to you, I shall quite Forget my dangers, and desire to live.

I can't live yours.

Oro. "There all the stings of death
Are shot into my heart." [Takes up the dagger.]

What shall I do?

Imo. This dagger will instruct you. [Gives it him.]

Oro. Ha! this dagger,
Like Fate, appoints me to the horrid deed.

Imo. Strike, strike it home, and bravely save us both!

There is no other safety.

Oro. It must be!

But, first, a dying kiss—

This last embrace—

And now —

Imo. I'm ready.

Oro. Oh, where shall I strike?

Is there the smallest grain of that lov'd body,
That is not dearer to me than mine eyes,
My bosom'd heart, and all the life-blood there?
Bid me cut off these limbs, hew off these hands,
Dig out these eyes, though I would keep them last
To gaze upon thee: but, to murder thee,—
The joy and charm of ev'ry ravish'd sense,—
My wife! Forbid it, Nature!

Imo. 'Tis your wife

Who, on her knees, conjures you. Oh, in time,
Prevent those mischiefs that are falling on us.

You may be hurried to a shameful death,

And I, too, dragged to the vile Governor;

Then I may cry in vain. When you are gone,

Where shall I find a friend again to save me?

Oro. "It will be so. 'Thou unexampled virtue!
Thy resolution has recovered mine;"

And now prepare thee.

Imo. Thus, with open arms,

I welcome you, and death.

[He drops his dagger as he looks on her, and throws himself on the ground.]

Oro. I cannot bear it!

Oh, let me dash against the rock of fate,

"Dig up this earth—tear, tear her bowels out,

To make a grave, deep as the centre down,

To swallow wide, and bury us together!

It will not be. O; then some pitying god

(If there be one a friend to innocence)

Find yet a way to lay her beauties down

Gently in death, and save me from her blood,

"Imo. O, rise; 'tis more than death to see you
thus.

I'll ease your love, and do the deed myself.

"[She takes up the dagger—he rises in haste to take it from her.]

"Oro. Oh, hold! I charge thee, hold!

"Imo. Though, I must own,

It would be nobler for us both, from you."

Oro. Oh, for a whirlwind's wing to hurry us

To yonder cliff, which frowns upon the flood;

That, in embraces lock'd, we might plunge in,

And perish thus in one another's arms!

[Distant noise without.]

Imo. Alas! what is that I hear?

Oro. I see them coming.

They shall not overtake us. This last—
And now, farewell!

"Imo. Farewell! Farewell, for ever!

"Oro. I'll turn my face away, and do it so."

Now, are you ready?

Imo. Now. "But do not grudge me

The pleasure, in my death, of a last look;"

Pray, look upon me!—Now I'm satisfied.

Oro. So Fate must be, by this.

[Going to stab her, he stops short—she lays her hand on his, in order to give the blow.]

Imo. "Nay, then, I must assist you."

Thus, thus 'tis finish'd, and I bless my fate,

That, where I liv'd, I die, in these lov'd arms. [Stabs herself.]

[Dies.]

Oro. She's gone. And now all's at end with me.

Soft, lay her down; oh, we will part no more!

[Throws himself by her.]

"But let me pay tribute of my grief

A few sad tears to thy loved memory,

And then I follow— [Weeps over her.]

But I stay too long." [A noise again.]

The noise comes nearer. Hold; before I go,

There's something would be done. It shall be so,

And then, Imoinda, I'll come all to thee. [Rises.]

Enter BLANDFORD and his Party, before the Governor and his Party; swords drawn on both sides.

Gov. You strive in vain to save him; he shall die.

Bla. Not while we can defend him with our lives.

Gov. Where is he?

Oro. Here's the wretch whom you would have.

"Put up your swords, and let not civil broils

Engage you in the cursed cause of one

Who cannot live, and now entreats to die.

This object will convince you.

Bla. 'Tis his wife! [They gather about the body.]

Alas! there was no other remedy.

Gov. Who did the bloody deed?

Oro. The deed was mine;

Bloody I know it is, and I expect

Your laws should tell me so. Thus, self-condemn'd,

I do resign myself into your hands,

The hands of justice—but I hold the sword—

For you—and for myself.

[Stabs the Governor and himself, then throws himself by IMOINDA'S body.]

Oro. 'Tis as it should be now; I have sent his ghost

To be a witness of that happiness

In the next world which he denied us here. [Dies.]

"Bla. I hope there is a place of happiness

In the next world for such exalted virtue.

Pagan or unbeliever, yet he lived

To all he knew; and, if he went astray,

There's mercy still above to set him right,

But Christians, guided by the heavenly ray,

Have no excuse if they mistake their way."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall in the Palace.

Enter PORCIUS and MARCUS.

Por. The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day.
The great, the important day, big with the fate
Of Cato and of Rome. Our father's death
Would fill up all the guilt of civil war,
And close the scene of blood. Already Cæsar
Has ravag'd more than half the globe, and sees
Mankind grown thin by his destructive sword:
Should he go further, numbers would be wanting
To form new battles, and support his crimes.
Ye gods, what havoc does ambition make
Among your works!

Mar. Thy steady temper, Porcius,
Can look on guilt, rebellion, fraud, and Cæsar,
In the calm lights of mild philosophy:
I'm tortur'd, even to madness; when I think
On the proud victor: every time he's named,
Pharsalia rises to my view; I see
The insulting tyrant prancing o'er the field
Strow'd with Rome's citizens, and drench'd in slaughter.
O, Porcius, is there not some chosen curse,

Some hidden thunder in the stores of heaven,
Red with uncommon wrath, to blast the man
Who owes his greatness to his country's ruin!

Por. Believe me, Marcus, 'tis an impious greatness,

And mix'd with too much horror to be envied.
How does the lustre of our father's actions,
Through the dark cloud of ills that cover him,
Break out, and burn with more triumphant brightness!

His suff'rings shine, and spread a glory round him:
Greatly unfortunate, he fights the cause
Of honour, virtue, liberty, and Rome.

Mar. Who knows not this? But what can Cato do
Against a world, a base, degenerate world,
That courts the yoke, and bows the neck to Cæsar?
Pent up in Utica, he vainly forms
A poor epitome of Roman greatness,
And, cover'd with Numidian guards, directs
A feeble army, and an empty senate,
Remnants of mighty battles fought in vain.
By heavens, such virtues, join'd with such success,
Distract my very soul: our father's fortune
Would almost tempt us to renounce his precepts.

Por. Remember what our father oft has told us:
The ways of Heaven are dark and intricate:
Our understanding traces them in vain;
Lost and bewild'ring in the fruitless search,
Nor sees with how much art the windings run,
Nor where the regular confusion ends.

Mar. These are suggestions of a mind at ease:
O, Porcius, didst thou taste but half the griefs
That wring my soul, thou could'st not talk thus calmly.

Passion unquiet, and successful love,
Plant daggers in my heart, and aggravate
My other griefs: Were but my Lucia kind—

Por. Thou seest not that thy brother is thy rival:
But I must hide it; for I know thy temper. [Aside.]
Now, Marcus, now thy virtue's on the proof:
Put forth thy utmost strength, work every nerve,
And call up all thy father in thy soul:
To quell the tyrant love, and guard thy heart.
On this weak side, where most our nature fails,
Would be a conquest worthy Cato's son.

Mar. Alas, the counsel which I cannot take,
Instead of healing, but upbraids my weakness.

Love is not to be reason'd down, or lost
In high ambition, and a thirst of greatness;
'Tis second life, that grows into the soul,
Warms every vein, and beats in every pulse:
I feel it here: my resolution melts—

Par. Behold young Juba, the Numidian Prince:
He loves our sister Marcia, greatly loves her;
But still the smother'd fondness burns within him:
The sense of honour and desire of fame
Drive the big passion back into his heart.—
What! shall an African, shall Juba's heir,
Reproach great Cato's son, and show the world
A virtue wanting in a Roman soul?

Mar. No more, no more! your words leave stings behind 'em.

When'er did Juba, or did Porcius, show
A virtue that has cast me at a distance,
And thrown me out in the pursuits of honour?

Por. O, Marcus, did I know the way to ease
Thy troubled heart, and mitigate thy pains,
Believe me, I could freely die to do it.

Mar. Thou best of brothers, and thou best of friends!

Pardon a weak distemper'd soul, that swells
With sudden gusts, and sinks as soon in calms,
The sport of passions.—But, Sempronius comes:
He must not find this softness hanging on me.

[Exit.—PORTIUS retires back.]

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

Sem. Conspiracies no sooner should be form'd
Than executed.—[Aside.—What means Porcius
here?

I like not that cold youth. I must dissemble,
And speak a language foreign to my heart.—
Good morrow, Porcius! [Porcius comes forward.]

Let us once embrace,

Once more embrace, whilst yet we both are free:
To-morrow, should we thus express our friendship,
Each might receive a slave into his arms:
This sun, perhaps, this morning's sun's the last
That e'er shall rise on Roman liberty.

Por. My father has this morning call'd together
His little Roman senate—

The leavings of Pharsalia—to consult
If yet he can oppose the mighty torrent
That bears down Rome and all her gods before it—
Or must, at length, give up the world to Cæsar.

Sem. Not all the pomp and majesty of Rome
Can raise her senate more than Cato's presence;
His virtues render her assembly awful,
They strike with something like religious fear,
And make even Cæsar tremble at the head
Of armies flush'd with conquest. O, my Porcius,
Could I but call that wondrous man my father,
Would but thy sister Marcia be propitious
To thy friend's vows, I might be bless'd indeed.

Por. Alas! Sempronius, would'st thou talk of love

To Marcia, whilst her father's life's in danger?
Thou might'st as well court the pale trembling
vestal,

When she beholds the holy flame expiring.

Sem. The more I see the wonders of thy race,
The more I'm charm'd;—Thou must take heed, my Porcius;

The world has all its eyes on Cato's son:
Thy father's merit sets thee up to view,
And shows thee in the fairest point of light,
To make thy virtues or thy faults conspicuous.

Por. Well dost thou seem to check my lingering
here

On this important hour.—I'll straight away,
To animate the soldier's drooping courage
With love of freedom, and contempt of life,
And try to rouse up all that's Roman in 'em.
'Tis not in mortals to command success;
But we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it.

[Exit.

Sem. Curse on the stripling! How he apes his sire,

Ambitiously sententious!—But I wonder,
Old Syphax comes not. His Numidian genius
Is well dispos'd to mischief—

Cato has us'd me ill: he has refus'd
His daughter Marcia to my ardent vows:
Besides, his baffled arms and ruin'd cause
Are bars to my ambition. Cæsar's favour,
That showers down greatness on his friends, will raise me

To Rome's first honours. If I give up Cato,
I claim in my reward his captive daughter.—
Syphax comes.

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Sempronius, all is ready;
I've sounded my Numidians, man by man,
And find them ripe for a revolt: they all
Complain aloud of Cato's discipline,
And wait but the command to change their master.

Sem. Believe me, Syphax, there's no time to waste;

Even whilst we speak our conqueror comes on,
And gathers ground upon us every moment.
But tell me, hast thou yet drawn o'er young Juba?
That still would recommend thee more to Cæsar,
And challenge better terms.

Syph. Alas, he's lost,
He's lost, Sempronius! all his thoughts are full
Of Cato's virtues!—But I'll try once more,
For every instant I expect him here,
If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles
Of faith, of honour, and I know not what,
That have corrupted his Numidian temper,
And struck the infection into all his soul.

Sem. Be sure to press upon him every motive:
Juba's surrender, since his father's death,
Would give up Africa into Cæsar's hands,
And make him lord of half the burning zone.

Syph. But is it true, Sempronius, that your senate

Is call'd together? Gods! thou must be cautious:
Cato has piercing eyes, and will discern
Our frauds, unless they're cover'd thick with art.

Sem. Let me alone, good Syphax: I'll conceal
My thoughts in passion: 'tis the surest way:
I'll bellow out for Rome and for my country,
And mouth at Cæsar, till I shake the senate:
Your cold hypocrisy's a stale device,
A worn-out trick: would'st thou be thought in earnest,

Clothe thy feign'd zeal in rage, in fire, in fury.

Syph. In troth, thou'rt able to instruct grey hairs,
And teach the wily African deceit.

Sem. Once more, be sure to try thy skill on Juba.
Meanwhile I'll hasten to my Roman soldiers,
Inflame the mutiny, and, underhand,
Blow up their discontents, till they break out
Unlook'd for, and discharge themselves on Cato.
Remember, Syphax, we must work in haste;
O think, what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods;
It is a dreadful interval of time,
Fill'd up with horror all, and big with death;

Destruction hangs on every word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design. [Exit.]

Syph. I'll try if yet I can reduce to reason
This headstrong youth, and make him spurn at Cato.
The time is short; Caesar comes rushing on us;—
But hold—Young Juba sees me and approaches.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Syphax, I joy to meet thee thus alone.
I have observ'd of late thy looks are fallen,
O'ercast with gloomy cares and discontent:
Then tell me, Syphax, I conjure thee tell me,
What are the thoughts that knit thy brow in frowns,
And turn thine eye thus coldly on thy prince?

Syph. 'Tis not my talent to conceal my thoughts,
Nor carry smiles and sunshine in my face,
When discontent sits heavy at my heart;
I have not yet so much the Roman in me.

Juba. Why dost thou cast out such ungenerous terms

Against these wonderous sovereigns of the world?
Dost thou not see mankind fall down before 'em,
And own the force of their superior virtue?

Syph. Gods! where's the worth that sets this people up

Above your own Numidia's tawny sons?
Do they with tougher sinews bend the bow?
Or flies the javelin swifter to its mark,
Launch'd from the vigour of a Roman arm?
Who, like our active African, instructs
The fiery steed, and trains him to his hand?
Or guides in troops the embattled elephant,
Loaden with war? These, these are arts, my prince,
In which your Zama does not stoop to Rome.

Juba. These all are virtues of a meaner rank,
Perfections that are plac'd in bones and nerves:
A Roman soul is bent on higher views.

To make man mild, and sociable to man;
To cultivate the wild licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline, and liberal arts—
The embellishments of life; virtues like these
Make human nature shine, reform the soul,
And break our fierce barbarians into men.

Syph. Patience, kind heavens!—Excuse an old man's warmth;

What are these wonderous civilizing arts,
This Roman polish, and his smooth behaviour,
That render man thus tractable and tame?

Are they not only to disguise our passions,
To set our looks at variance with our thoughts?
In short, to change us into other creatures
Than what our nature and the gods design'd us?

Juba. To strike thee dumb, turn up thy eyes to Cato;

There may'st thou see to what a godlike height
The Roman virtues lift up mortal man:
Renouncing sleep, and rest, and food, and ease,
He strives with thirst and hunger, toil and heat;
And, when his fortune sets before him all
The pomps and pleasures that our soul can wish,
His rigid virtue will accept of none.

Syph. Believe me, prince, there's not an African
That traverses our vast Numidian deserts
In quest of prey, and lives upon his bow,
But better practises these boasted virtues;
Coarse are his meals, the fortune of the chase;
Amidst the running stream he slakes his thirst,
Toils all the day, and, at the approach of night,
On the first friendly bank he throws him down,
Or rests his head upon a rock till morn;

Then rises fresh, pursues his wonted game,
And if, the following day, he chance to find
A new repast, or an untasted spring,
Blesses his stars, and thinks it luxury.

Juba. Thy prejudices, Syphax, won't discern
What virtues grow from ignorance and choice;
Nor how the hero differs from the brute.
But, grant that others could, with equal glory,
Look down on pleasures and the baits of sense,
Where shall we find the man that bears affliction,
Great and majestic in his griefs, like Cato?
How does he rise against a load of woes,
And thank the gods that throw the weight upon him!

Syph. 'Tis pride, rank pride, and haughtiness of
soul;

I think the Romans call it Stoicism.
Had not your royal father thought so highly
Of Roman virtue, and of Cato's cause,
He had not fallen, by a slave's hand, inglorious;
Nor would his slaughter'd army now have lain
On Africk's sands, disfigur'd with their wounds,
To gorge the wolves and vultures of Numidia.

Juba. Why dost thou call my sorrows up afresh?
My father's name brings tears into my eyes.

Syph. Oh, that you'd profit by your father's ills!

Juba. What would'st thou have me do?

Syph. Abandon Cato.

Juba. Never:—I should be more than twice an orphan

By such a loss.

Syph. Ay, there's the tie that binds you,
You long to call him father; Marcia's charms
Work in your heart unseen, and plead for Cato;
No wonder you are deaf to all I say.

Juba. No more;—your zeal becomes importunate.
I've hitherto permitted it to rave,
And talk at large: but learn to keep it in,
Lest it should take more freedom than I'll give it.

Syph. Yet hear me, prince, tho' hard to conquer
love,

'Tis easy to divert and break its force:
Absence might cure it, or a second mistress
Light up another flame, and put out this.
The glowing dames of Zama's royal court
Have faces flush'd with more exalted charms;
The sun, that rolls his chariot o'er their heads,
Works up more fire and colour in their cheeks:
Were you with these, my prince, you'd soon forget
The pale, unripen'd beauties of the north.

Juba. 'Tis not a set of features, nor complexion,
The tincture of a skin, that I admire:
Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,
Fades in his eye, and palls upon the sense.
The virtuous Marcia towers above her sex:
True, she is fair—O how divinely fair!—
But still the lovely maid improves her charms
With inward greatness, unaffected wisdom,
And sanctity of manners. Cato's soul
Shines out in every thing she acts or speaks,
While winning mildness and attractive smiles
Dwell in her looks, and with becoming grace
Softens the rigour of her father's virtues.

Syph. How does your tongue grow wanton in her praise!

But, on my knees, I beg you would consider—

Juba. Ha! isn't not she?—It is:—she moves this way:

And with her Lucia, Lucius's fair daughter.
My heart beats thick. I pr'ythee, Syphax, leave me.

Syph. Ten thousand curses fasten on them both!
Now will this woman, with a single glance,
Undo what I've been labouring all this while.

[Exit.]

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Juba. Hail, charming maid! How does thy beauty smooth

The face of war, and make even horror smile!
At sight of thee my heart shakes off its sorrows;
I feel a dawn of joy break in upon me,
And for a while forget the approach of Cæsar.

Mar. I should be griev'd, young prince, to think my presence

Unbent your thoughts, and slacken'd them to arms,
While, warm with slaughter, our victorious foe
Threatens aloud, and calls you to the field.

Juba. O, Marcia, let me hope thy kind concerns
And gentle wishes follow me to battle:

The thought will give new vigour to my arm,
Add strength and weight to my descending sword,
And drive it in a tempest on the foe.

Mar. My prayers and wishes always shall attend
The friends of Rome, the glorious cause of virtue,
And men approv'd of by the gods and Cato.

Juba. That Juba may deserve thy pious cares,
I'll gaze for ever on thy godlike father,
Transplanting, one by one, into my life
His bright perfections, till I shine like him.

Mar. My father never at a time like this
Would lay out his great soul in words, and waste
Such precious moments.

Juba. Thy reproofs are just,
Thou virtuous maid. I'll hasten to my troops,
And fire their languid souls with Cato's virtue.
If e'er I lead them to the field, when all
The war shall stand rang'd in its just array,
And dreadful pomp, then will I think on thee—
O, lovely maid!—then will I think on thee;
And, in the shock of charging hosts, remember,
What glorious deeds should grace the man, who hopes

For Marcia's love

[Exit.]

Luc. Marcia, you're too severe:

How could you chide, and drive so sternly from you,
A prince that loves and dotes on you to death?

Mar. How, Lucia! would'st thou have me sink away

In pleasing dreams, and lose myself in love,
When every moment Cato's life's at stake?

Luc. Why have not I this constancy of mind,
Who have so many griefs to try its force?
Pity and love, by turns, oppress my heart.

Mar. Lucia, disburthen all thy cares on me,
And let me share thy most retir'd distress:
Tell me, who raises up this conflict in thee?

Luc. I need not blush to name them, when I say,
They're Marcia's brothers, and the sons of Cato.

Mar. But tell me, whose address thou favour'st most:

I long to know, and yet I dread to hear it.

Luc. Suppose 'twere Porcius—could you blame my choice?

O, Porcius, thou hast stolen away my soul!
Marcius is furious, wild, in his complaints;
I fear him with a secret kind of dread,
And tremble at his vehemence of temper.

Mar. Alas, poor youth!—And canst thou throw him from thee?

How will thy coldness raise
Tempests and storms in his afflicted bosom!
I dread the consequence.

Luc. You seem to plead
Against your brother Porcius

Mar. Lucia, no:

Had Porcius been the unsuccessful lover,
The same compassion would have fallen on him.

Luc. Porcius himself oft falls in tears before me,
As if he mourn'd his rival's ill success;
Then bids me hide the motions of my heart,
Nor shew which way it turns: so much he fears
The sad effects that it would have on Marcus.

Mar. Let us not, Lucia, aggravate our sorrows;
But to the gods submit the event of things.
Our lives, discolour'd with our present woes,
May still grow bright, and smile with happier hours:
So the pure limpid stream, when foul with stains
Of rushing torrents, and descending rains,
Works itself clear, and, as it runs, refines,
Till, by degrees, the floating mirror shines,
Reflects each flower that on the border grows,
And a new heaven in its fair bosom shows.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Senate House.—A Flourish of Trumpets

SEMPRONIUS, LUCIUS, and Senators discovered.

Sem. Rome still survives in this assembled senate.
Let us remember we are Cato's friends,
And act like men who claim that glorious title.

Luci. Cato will soon be here, and open to us
The occasion of our meeting.—

[A sound of Trumpets.]

Hark, he comes.—

May all the guardian-gods of Rome direct him!

[Trumpets.]

Enter CATO, PORCIUS, and MARCUS.

Cato. [Sits between PORCIUS and MARCUS.]
Fathers, we once again are met in council:
Cæsar's approach has summon'd us together,
And Rome attends her fate from our resolves.
How shall we treat this bold aspiring man?
Success still follows him, and backs his crimes:
Pharsalia gave him Rome; Egypt has since
Receiv'd his yoke, and the whole Nile is Cæsar's.
Why should I mention Juba's overthrow,
And Scipio's death? Numidia's burning sands
Still smoke with blood.—'Tis time, we should decree
What course to take. Our foe advances on us,
And envies us even Libya's sultry deserts.
Fathers, pronounce your thoughts:—are they still fix'd

To hold it out, and fight it to the last?
Or are your hearts subdu'd at length, and wrought
By time and ill success to a submission?
Sempronius, speak.

Sem. [Rises.] My voice is still for war.
Gods! can a Roman senate long debate
Which of the two to choose—slavery or death?
No; let us rise at once, gird on our swords,
And, at the head of our remaining troops,
Attack the foe, break through the thick array
Of his throng'd legions, and charge home upon him.
Perhaps some arm, more lucky than the rest,
May reach his heart, and free the world from bondage.

Rise, fathers, rise! 'tis Rome demands your help;

Rise, and revenge her slaughter'd citizens ;
Rouse up for shame ! our brothers of Pharsalia
Point at their wounds, and cry aloud—to battle :
Great Pompey's shade complains that we are slow,
And Scipio's ghost walks unreveng'd amongst us.

[Sits.]

Cato. Let not a torrent of impetuous zeal
Transport thee thus beyond the bounds of reason.
True fortitude is seen in great exploits
That justice warrants, and that wisdom guides :
All else is towering frenzy and distraction.
Are not the lives of those who draw the sword
In Rome's defence intrusted to our care ?
Should we thus lead them to a field of slaughter,
Might not the impartial world too justly say,
We lavish'd at our death the blood of thousands,
To grace our fall, and make our ruin glorious ?
Lucius, we next would know what's your opinion.

Luci. [Rises.] My thoughts, I must confess, are turn'd on peace.

We took up arms, not to revenge ourselves,
But free the commonwealth : when this end fails,
Arms have no further use : our country's cause,
That drew our swords, now wrests them from our hands,

And bids us not delight in Roman blood
Unprofitably shed.—What men could do
Is done already : heaven and earth will witness,
If Rome must fall, that we are innocent.

[Sits.]

Cato. Let us appear nor rash, nor diffident :
Immoderate valour swells into a fault ;
And fear, admitted into public counsels,
Betrays like treason : let us shun them both.
Fathers, I cannot see that our affairs
Are grown thus desperate : we have bulwarks round
us ;

Within our walls are troops inur'd to toil
In Africk's heats, and season'd to the sun ;
Numidia's spacious kingdom lies behind us,
Ready to rise at its young prince's call.
While there is hope, do not distrust the gods :
But wait, at least, till Cæsar's near approach
Force us to yield. 'Twill never be too late
To sue for chains, and own a conqueror.
Why should Rome fall a moment ere her time ?
No, let us draw her term of freedom out
In its full length, and spin it to the last ;
So shall we gain still one day's liberty :
And let me perish, but, in Cato's judgment,
A day, an hour, of virtuous liberty
Is worth a whole eternity in bondage.

Enter JUNIUS.

Jun. Fathers, even now, a herald is arriv'd
From Cæsar's camp ; and with him comes old Decius,
The Roman knight : he carries in his looks
Impatience, and demands to speak with Cato.

Cato. By your permission, father.—Bid him enter.

[Exit JUNIUS.]

Decius was once my friend ; but other prospects
Have loos'd those ties, and bound him fast to Cæsar.
His message may determine our resolves.

Enter DECIVS, JUNIUS, and TITUS.

Dec. Cæsar sends health to Cato—

Cato. Could he send it

To Cato's slaughter'd friends, it would be welcome.
Are not your orders to address the senate ?

Dec. My business is with Cato. Cæsar sees

The straits to which you're driven ; and as he knows
Cato's high worth is anxious for your life.

Cato. My life is grafted on the fate of Rome.
Would he save Cato ? Bid him spare his country.
Tell your dictator this : and tell him, Cato
Disdains a life which he has power to offer.

Dec. Rome and her senators submit to Cæsar :
Her generals and her consuls are no more,
Who check'd his conquests, and denied his triumphs.
Why will not Cato be this Cæsar's friend ?

Cato. Those very reasons thou hast urg'd, forbid it.

Dec. Cæsar is well acquainted with your virtues,
And therefore sets this value on your life :
Let him but know the price of Cato's friendship,
And name your terms.

Cato. Bid him disband his legions ;
Restore the commonwealth to liberty ;
Submit his actions to the public censure,
And stand the judgment of a Roman senate :—
Bid him do this, and Cato is his friend.

Dec. Cato, the world talks loudly of your wisdom—

Cato. Nay, more—though Cato's voice was ne'er employ'd

To clear the guilty, and to varnish crimes—
Myself will mount the rostrum in his favour,
And strive to gain his pardon from the people.

Dec. A style like this becomes a conqueror.

Cato. Decius, a style like this becomes a Roman.

Dec. What is a Roman, that is Cæsar's foe ?

Cato. Greater than Cæsar ; he's a friend to virtue.

Dec. Consider, Cato, you're in Utica,
And at the head of your own little senate ;
You don't now thunder in the capitol,
With all the mouths of Rome to second you.

Cato. Let him consider that who drives us hither :

'Tis Cæsar's sword has made Rome's senate little,
And thin'd its ranks. Alas, thy dazzled eye
Beholds this man in a false glaring light,
Which conquest and success have thrown upon him !
Didst thou but view him right, thou'dst see him black
With murder, treason, sacrilege, and crimes
That strike my soul with horror but to name 'em.
I know thou look'st on me, as on a wretch
Beset with ills, and cover'd with misfortunes ;
But, by the gods I swear, millions of worlds
Should never buy me to be like that Cæsar.

Dec. Does Cato send this answer back to Cæsar,
For all his generous cares, and proffer'd friendship ?

Cato. His cares for me are insolent and vain :
Presumptuous man ! the gods take care of Cato.—
Would Cæsar show the greatness of his soul,
Bid him employ his care for these my friends,
And make good use of his ill-gotten power,
By sheltering men much better than himself.

Dec. Your high unconquer'd heart makes you forget

You are a man. You rush on your destruction.
But I have done. When I relate hereafter
The tale of this unhappy embassy,
All Rome will be in tears.

[Exit with JUNIUS, and TITUS.]

Sem. [Rises.] Cato, we thank thee :
Cæsar will shrink to hear the words thou utter'st,
And shudder in the midst of all his conquests.

[Sits.]

Luci. [Rises.] The senate owns its gratitude to Cato ;

Who with so great a soul consults its safety,
And guards our lives, while he neglects his own.

[Sits.]

Sem. [Rises.] Sempronius gives no thanks on this account.

Lucius seems fond of life: but what is life?
'Tis not to draw fresh air from time to time;
'Tis to be free. When liberty is gone,
Life grows insipid, and has lost its relish.
Oh! could my dying hand but lodge a sword
In Cæsar's bosom, and revenge my country,
By heavens, I could enjoy the pangs of death,
And smile in agony!

[Sits.

Luci. Others, perhaps,
May serve their country with as warm a zeal,
Though 'tis not kindled into such a rage.

Sem. This sober conduct is a mighty virtue
In luke-warm patriots.

Cato. Come! no more, Sempronius.
All here are friends to Rome, and to each other:
Let us not weaken still the weaker side
By our divisions.

Sem. Cato, my resentments
Are sacrific'd to Rome. I stand reprov'd.

Cato. Fathers, 'tis time you come to a resolve.

Luci. Cato, we all go in to your opinion:
Cæsar's behaviour has convinc'd the senate
We ought to hold it out, till terms arrive.

Sem. We ought to hold it out till death. But,
Cato,
My private voice is drown'd amid the senate's.

Cato. Then let us rise, my friends, and strive to fill
This little interval, this pause of life,
While yet our liberty and fates are doubtful,
With resolution, friendship, Roman bravery,
And all the virtues we can crowd into it;
That heaven may say, it ought to be prolong'd.
Fathers, farewell.—The young Numidian prince
Comes forward, and expects to know our counsels.

[EXECUTUS PORCIUS, MARCUS, LUCIUS, SEMPRONIUS, and the other Senators.]

Enter JUBA.

Cato. Juba, the Roman senate has resolv'd,
Till time give better prospects, still to keep
The sword unsheath'd, and turn its edge on Cæsar.

Juba. The resolution fits a Roman senate.
But, Cato, lend me for a while thy patience,
And condescend to hear a young man speak.
My father, when some days before his death
He order'd me to march for Utica;—
Alas, I thought not then his death so near!
Wept o'er me, press'd me in his aged arms,
And, as his griefs gave way, My son, he said,
How fortune may dispose of me,
Be Cato's friend; he'll train thee up to great
And virtuous deeds: do but observe him well,
Thou'lt shun misfortunes, or thou'lt learn to bear 'em.

Cato. Thy sire, good Juba, was a worthy prince,
And merited, alas! a better fate:—
But heaven thought otherwise.

Juba. His cruel fate,
In spite of all the fortitude that shines
Before my face in Cato's great example,
Subdues my soul, and fills my eyes with tears.

Cato. It is an honest sorrow, and becomes thee.

Juba. His virtues drew respect from foreign climes:
The kings of Africk sought him for their friend,
Kings far remote, that rule, as fame reports,
Behind the hidden sources of the Nile;
Oft have their black ambassadors appear'd,
Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Zama.

Cato. I am no stranger to thy father's greatness.

Juba. I do not mean to boast his power and greatness,
But point out new alliances to Cato.

Had we not better leave this Utica,
To arm Numidia in our cause, and court
The assistance of my father's numerous friends?
Did they know Cato, our remotest kings
Would pour embattled multitudes about him;
Their swathy hosts would darken all our plains,
Doubling the native horror of the war,
And making death more grim.

Cato. And canst thou think,
Cato will fly before the sword of Cæsar,
Reduc'd, like Hannibal, to seek relief
From court to court, and wander up and down
A vagabond in Africk?

Juba. Cato, perhaps,
I'm too officious; but my forward cares
Would fain preserve a life of so much value.
My heart is wounded, when I see such virtue
Afflicted by the weight of such misfortunes.

Cato. Thy nobleness of soul obliges me.
But know, young prince, that valour soars above
What the world calls misfortune and affliction.
These are not ills; else would they never fall
On heaven's first favourites, and the best of men:
The gods, in bounty, work up storms about us,
That give mankind occasion to exert
Their hidden strength, and throw out into practice
Virtues, which lie conceal'd

In the smooth seasons and the calms of life.

Juba. I'm charm'd whene'er thou talk'st: I pant for virtue,
And all my soul endeavours at perfection.

Cato. Dost thou love watchings, abstinence, and toil?—

Laborious virtues all!—Learn them from Cato:
Success and fortune must thou learn from Cæsar.

Juba. The best good fortune that can fall on Juba,

The whole success at which my heart aspires,
Depends on Cato.

Cato. What does Juba say?

Tell me thy wishes, prince.

Juba. O, they're extravagant!
Still let me hide them.

Cato. Speak: what can'st thou ask
That Cato will refuse?

Juba. I fear to name it:

Marcia—inherits all her father's virtues.

Cato. Adieu, young prince, I would not hear a word

Might lessen thee in my esteem. Remember,
The hand of fate is over us, and heaven
Exact severity from all our thoughts:
It is not now a time to talk of aught
But chains or conquest, liberty or death. [Exit

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. How's this, my prince? What! cover'd with confusion?

You look, as if you stern philosopher
Had just now chid you.

Juba. Syphax, I'm undone

Syph. I know it well.

Juba. Cato thinks meanly of me.

Syph. And so will all mankind.

Juba. I've open'd to him

The weakness of my soul, my love for Marcia

Syph. Cato's a proper person to intrust
A love-tale with!

Juba. O, I could pierce my heart,
My foolish heart! Was ever wretch like Juba!

Syph. Alas, my prince, how are you chang'd of late!

I've known young Juba rise before the sun,
To beat the thicket where the tiger slept,
Or seek the lion in his dreadful haunts:
How did the colour mount into your cheeks,
When first you rous'd him to the chase! I've seen
you,

Even in the Libyan dog-days, hunt him down;
Then charge him close, provoke him to the rage
Of fangs and claws, and, stooping from your horse,
Rivet the panting savage to the ground.

Juba. Pr'ythee, no more.

Syph. How would the old king smile
To see you weigh the paws, when tip'd with gold,
And throw the shaggy spoils about your shoulders!

Juba. Syphax, this old man's talk, though honey flow'd

In every word, would now lose all its sweetness.
Cato's displeas'd, and Marcia's lost for ever!

Syph. Young prince, I yet could give you good advice:

Marcia might still be yours.

Juba. What say'st thou, Syphax?

By heavens, thou turn'st me all into attention.

Syph. Marcia might still be yours.

Juba. As how, dear Syphax?

Syph. Juba commands Numidia's hardy troops,
Mounted on steeds unus'd to the restraint
Of curbs and bits, and fleetlier than the wind:
Give but the word, we'll snatch this damsel up,
And bear her off.

Juba. Can such dishonest thoughts
Rise up in man? Would'st thou seduce my youth
To do an act that would destroy my honour?

Syph. Gods, I could tear my beard to hear you talk!

Honour's a fine imaginary notion,
That draws in raw and unexperienc'd men
To real mischiefs, while they hunt a shadow.

Juba. Would'st thou degrade thy prince into a ruffian?

Syph. The boasted ancestors of these great men
Whose virtues you admire, were all such ruffians:
This dread of nations, this almighty Rome,
That comprehends in her wide empire's bounds
All under heaven, was founded on a rape:
Your Scipios, Cæsars, Pompeys, and your Catos,—
These gods on earth,—are all the spurious brood
Of violated maids, of ravish'd Sabines.

Juba. Syphax, I fear, that hoary head of thine
Abounds too much in our Numidian wiles.

Syph. My prince, you want to know the world:
You have not read mankind: your youth admires
The throes and swellings of a Roman soul,
Cato's bold flights, the extravagance of virtue.

Juba. If knowledge of the world makes man per-fidious,

May Juba ever live in ignorance!

Syph. Go, go, you're young.

Juba. Gods! must I tamely bear

This arrogance unanswer'd—Thou'rt a traitor,
A false old traitor.

Syph. [Aside.] I have gone too far.

Juba. Cato shall know the baseness of thy soul.

Syph. [Aside.] I must appease this storm, or perish in it.—

Young prince, behold these locks that are grown white

Beneath a helmet in your father's battles.

Juba. Those locks shall ne'er protect thy insolence.

Syph. Must one rash word, the infirmity of age,
Throw down the merit of my better years?
This the reward of a whole life of service?

[Aside.] Curse on the boy! how steadily he hears me!
Juba. Is it, because the throne of my forefathers'
Still stands unfill'd, and that Numidia's crown
Hangs doubtful yet whose head it shall inclose,
Thou thus presum'st to treat thy prince with scorn?

Syph. Why will you rive my heart with such expressions?

Does not old Syphax follow you to war?
What are his aims? What is it he aspires to?
Is it not this? To shed the slow remains,
His last poor ebb of blood in your defence?

Juba. Syphax, no more: I would not hear you talk.

Syph. Nor hear me talk? What, when my faith to Juba,

My royal master's son, is call'd in question?
My prince may strike me dead, and I'll be dumb:
But, whilst I live, I must not hold my tongue,
And languish out old age in his displeasure.

Juba. Thou know'st the way too well into my heart:

I do believe thee loyal to thy prince.

Syph. What greater instance can I give? I've offer'd

To do an action which my soul abhors,
And gain you whom you love, at any price:
And 'tis for this my prince has call'd me traitor.

Juba. Sure thou mistak'st: I did not call thee so.

Syph. You did indeed, my prince, you call'd me traitor:

Nay, further, threaten'd you'd complain to Cato.
Of what, my prince, would you complain to Cato?
That Syphax loves you, and would sacrifice
His life,—nay, more, his honour,—in your service?

Juba. Syphax, I know thou lov'st me: but thy zeal

To serve thy master, carried thee too far.
Honour's a sacred tie, the law of kings,
The noble mind's distinguishing perfection,
That aids and strengthens virtue where it meets her,
And imitates her actions, where she is not:
It ought not to be sported with.

Syph. Believe me, prince, you make old Syphax
weep,

To hear you talk,—but 'tis with tears of joy.
If e'er your father's crown adorn your brows,
Numidia will be blest by Cato's lectures.

Juba. Give me thy hand: we'll mutually forget
The warmth of youth, and frowardness of age.
Thy prince esteems thy worth, and loves thy person:

[Embraces SYPHAX.]

If e'er the sceptre comes into my hand,
Syphax shall stand the second in my kingdom.

Syph. Why will you overwhelm my age with kindness?

My joy grows burdensome: I sha'n't support it.

Juba. My friend, farewell. I'll hence, and try to find

Some best occasion that may set me right
In Cato's thoughts. I'd rather have that man
Approve my deeds, than worlds for my admirers.

[Exit.]

Syph. Young men soon give, and soon forget affronts;

Old age is slow in both.—A false old traitor!
Those words, rash boy, may chance to cost thee dear.
My heart had still some foolish fondness for thee:—
But hence! 'tis gone: I give it to the winds:—
Cæsar, I'm wholly thine.

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

All hail, Sempronius!

Well, Cato's senate is resolv'd to wait
The fury of a siege, before it yields.

Sem. Syphax, we both were on the verge of fate:
Lucius declar'd for peace, and terms were offer'd
To Cato by a messenger from Cæsar.

Syph. Who is this messenger?

Sem. I've practis'd with him;
And found means to let the victor know
That Syphax and Sempronius are his friends.—
Is Juba fix'd?

Syph. Yes,—but it is to Cato.
I've tried the force of every reason on him,
Laid safety, life, and interest in his sight;
But all are vain; he scorns them all for Cato.

Sem. Well, 'tis no matter; we shall do without him.

My friend, I now may hope thou hast forsook
Thy Juba's cause, and wishest Marcia mine.

Syph. May she be thine as fast as thou would'st have her!

But are thy troops prepar'd for a revolt?
Does the sedition catch from man to man,
And run among their ranks?

Sem. All, all is ready;
The factious leaders are our friends, and spread
Murmurs and discontents among the soldiers:
Within an hour, they'll storm the senate-house.

Syph. Meanwhile, I'll draw up my Numidian troops

Within the square, to exercise their arms,
And, as I see occasion, favour thee.
I laugh to think how your unshaken Cato
Will look agast, while unforeseen destruction
Pours in upon him thus from every side.
So where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden th'impetuous hurricanes descend,
Wheel through the air, in circling eddies play,
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.
The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And smother'd in the dusty whirlwind, dies.

[Ereunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Portico of the Palace.

Enter MARCUS and PORCIUS.

Mar. Thanks to my stars, I have not rang'd about

The wilds of life, ere I could find a friend:
Nature first pointed out my Porcius to me,
And early taught me, by her secret force,
To love thy person, ere I knew thy merit;
Till what was instinct, grew up into friendship.

Por. The friendships of the world are oft, my brother,

Confed'racies in vice, or leagues of pleasure;
Ours has severest virtue for its basis,
And such a friendship ends not but with life.

Mar. Porcius, thou know'st my soul in all its weakness:

Then, pry'thee, spare me on its tender side;
Indulge me but in love, my other passions
Shall rise and fall by virtue's nicest rules.

Por. When love's well-tim'd, 'tis not a fault to love:

The strong, the brave, the virtuous, and the wise
Sink in the soft captivity together,
I would not urge thee to dismiss thy passion,—
I know 'twere vain; but to suppress its force,
Till better times may make it look more graceful.

Mar. Alas! thou talk'st like one who never felt
The impatient throbs and longings of a soul
That pants and reaches after distant good.
A lover does not live by vulgar time:
In every moment of my Lucia's absence
Life hangs upon me, and becomes a burthen;
And yet, when I behold the charming maid,
I'm ten times more undone; while hope, and fear,
And grief, and rage, and love, rise up at once,
And with variety of pain distract me.

Por. What can I say, or do, to give thee help?

Mar. Porcius, thou oft enjoy'st the fair one's presence:

Then undertake my cause, and plead it to her
With all the strength and heat of eloquence
Fraternal love and friendship can inspire.
Tell her, thy brother languishes to death,
And fades away, and withers in his bloom;
That he forgets his sleep, and loathes his food,
That youth, and health, and war, are joyless to him:
Describe his anxious days, and restless nights,
And all the torments that thou see'st me suffer.

Por. I do intreat thee, give me not an office
That suits with me so ill:—thou know'st my temper.

Mar. Can'st thou behold me sinking in my woes
And wilt thou not reach out a friendly arm,
To raise me from amidst this plunge of sorrows?
O, Porcius, Porcius, from my soul I wish
Thou didst but know thyself what 'tis to love:
Then would'st thou pity and assist thy brother.

Por. [Aside.] What should I do? If I disclose
my passion,

Our friendship's at an end: if I conceal it,
The world will call me false to a friend and brother.

Mar. But see where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon-day breeze! Behold her! Porcius,
That face, that shape, those eyes, that heaven of beauty!—

Observe her well, and blame me if thou canst.

Por. She sees us, and advances.

Mar. I'll withdraw,
And leave you for a while. Remember, Porcius,
Thy brother's life depends upon thy tongue.

[Exit.

Enter LUCIA.

Luc. Did I not see your brother Marcus here?
Why did he fly the place, and shun my presence?

Por. O, Lucia, language is too faint to show
His rage of love; it preys upon his life;
He pines, he sickens, he despairs, he dies.
My heart bleeds for him:

Even now, while thus I stand blest in thy presence,
A secret damp of grief comes o'er my thoughts,
And I'm unhappy, though thou smil'st upon me.

Luc. How wilt thou guard thy honour in the shock
Of love and friendship? Think betimes, my Porcius, Think how the nuptial tie, that might ensure

Our mutual bliss, would raise to such a height
Thy brother's griefs, as might, perhaps, destroy him.

Por. Alas, poor youth! What dost thou think, my Lucia?

His generous, open, undesigning heart
Has begg'd his rival to solicit for him;
Then do not strike him dead with a denial;
But hold him up in life, and cheer his soul
With the faint glimmering of a doubtful hope:
Perhaps, when we have pass'd these gloomy hours,
And weather'd out the storm that beats upon us—

Luc. No, Porcius, no: I see thy sister's tears,
Thy father's anguish, and thy brother's death;
In the pursuit of our ill-fated loves:
And, Porcius, here I swear—[Kneels.—to heaven I
swear,

To heaven, and all the powers that judge mankind,
Never to join my plighted hand with thine,
While such a cloud of mischief hangs about us—
But to forget our loves, and drive thee out
From all my thoughts, as far—as I am able.

Por. [Raises her.] What hast thou said? Recall those hasty words,

Or I am lost for ever.

Luc. Think, Porcius, think thou see'st thy dying
brother

Stabb'd at his heart, and all besmear'd with blood,
Storming at heaven and thee. Thy awful sire
Sternly demands the cause, the accursed cause
That robs him of his son.—Farewell, my Porcius!
Farewell, though death is in the word, for ever!

Por. Thou must not go; my soul still hovers o'er
thee,

And can't get loose.

Luc. If the firm Porcius shake
To hear of parting, think what Lucia suffers.
But see, thy brother Marcus bends this way;
I sicken at the sight. Once more, farewell!
Farewell!—and know, thou wrong'st me, if thou think'st

Ever was love, or ever grief, like mine. [Exit.

Enter MARCUS.

Mar. Porcius, what hopes? How stands she?
Am I doom'd

To life or death?

Por. What would'st thou have me say?

Mar. Thy downcast looks, and thy disorder'd thoughts,

Tell me my fate: I ask not the success
My cause has found.

Por. I'm griev'd I undertook it.

Mar. What! does the barbarous maid insult my heart,

And triumph in my pains?

Por. Away! you're too suspicious in your griefs:
Lucia, though sworn never to think of love,
Compassionates your pains, and pities you.

Mar. Compassionates my pains, and pities me!
What is compassion, when 'tis void of love?—
Fool that I was, to choose so cold a friend
To urge my cause!—Compassionates my pains!
To one that asks the warm returns of love,
Compassion's cruelty—'tis scorn—'tis death.

Por. Marcus, no more! Have I deserv'd this treatment?

Mar. What have I said?—O, Porcius! O, forgive me!—

A soul exasperated in ills, falls out
With every thing, its friends, itself.—

[Trumpets &c.

But hah!—

What means that sound, big with the threat of war?
What new alarm? [Trumpets again.

Por. A second, louder yet,

Swells in the wind, and comes more full upon us.

Mar. Oh, for some glorious cause to fall in battle!
Lucia, thou hast undone me: thy disdain
Has broke my heart: 'tis death must give me ease.

Por. Quick, let us hence: who knows if Cato's
life

Stands sure? O, Marcus, I am on fire; my heart
Leaps at the trumpet's voice, and burns for glory.

[Exeunt.—Trumpets, &c. till SEMPRONIUS enters.

SCENE II.—A Square before the Palace.

Enter SEMPRONIUS, JUNIUS, TITUS, and other Mutineers.

Sem. At length the winds are rais'd, the storm blows high!

Be it your care, my friends, to keep it up
In its full fury, and direct it right,
Till it has spent itself on Cato's head.

Meanwhile, I'll herd among his friends, and seem
One of the number; that, whate'er arrive,
My friends and fellow soldiers may be safe. [Exit.

Jun. We are all safe; Sempronius is our friend.
[Trumpets.

Enter CATO, PORCIUS, MARCUS, LUCIUS, SEMPRO-
NIUS, and Senators, &c.

Cato. Where are these bold intrepid sons of war,
That greatly turn their backs upon the foe,
And to their general send a brave defiance?

Sem. [Aside.] Curse on their dastard souls, they stand astonish'd!

Cato. Perfidious men!—and will you thus dishonour

Your past exploits, and sully all your wars?
Do you confess, 'twas not a zeal for Rome,
Nor love of Liberty,

Drew you thus far, but hopes to share the spoil
Of conquer'd towns, and plunder'd provinces?

Fir'd with such motives, you do well to join
With Cato's foes, and follow Caesar's banners.

Behold—ungrateful men!—
Behold my bosom naked to your swords,

And let the man that's injured strike the blow.—
Which of you all suspects that he is wrong'd

Or thinks he suffers greater ills than Cato?
Am I distinguish'd from you but by toils,

Superior toils, and heavier weight of cares?
Painful pre-eminence!

Sem. [Aside.] By heavens, they droop:—
Confusion to the villains!—all is lost.

Cato. Hence, worthless men!—hence, and complain to Caesar,

You could not undergo the toils of war,
Nor bear the hardships that your general bore.

Luci. See, Cato, see—the unhappy men!—they weep:

Fear and remorse, and sorrow for their crime
Appear in every look, and plead for mercy.

Cato. Learn to be honest men; give up your leaders,

And pardon shall descend on all the rest.

Sem. Cato, commit these wretches to my care:
First let them each be broken on the rack—

Then, with what life remains, impal'd, and left

To writhe at leisure round the bloody stake;—
There let them hang, and taint the southern wind;
The partners of their crime will learn obedience,
When they look up, and see their fellow-traitors
Stuck on a fork, and blackening in the sun.

Cato. Fearbear, Sempronius:—see, they suffer death;

But, in their deaths, remember they are men.—
Lucius, the base degenerate age requires
Severity and justice in its rigour;
This curbs an impious, bold, offending world,
Commands obedience, and gives force to laws.
When by just vengeance guilty mortals perish,
The gods behold their punishment with pleasure,
And lay the uplifted thunderbolt aside.

Sem. Cato, I gladly execute thy will.

Cato. Meanwhile, we'll sacrifice to liberty.
Remember, O my friends, the laws, the rights,
The generous plan of power deliver'd down,
From age to age, by your renown'd forefathers,
So dearly bought, the price of so much blood:—
O let it never perish in your hands,
But piously transmit it to your children!
Do thou, great Liberty, inspire our souls,
And make our lives in thy possession happy,
Or our deaths glorious in thy just defence!

[Flourish.—Exeunt CATO, PORCIUS, MARCUS,
LUCIUS, Senators, Ensign, Lictors, and Guards.

Jun. Sempronius, you have acted like yourself;
One would have thought, you had been half in earnest.

Sem. Villain, stand off!—Base, groveling, worthless wretches!

Mongrels in faction! poor faint-hearted traitors!

Tit. Nay, now you carry it too far, Sempronius:
Throw off the mask; there are none here but friends.

Sem. Know, villains, when such paltry slaves presume

To mix in treason, if the plot succeeds,
They're thrown neglected by; but, if it fails,
They're sure to die like dogs, as you shall do.—
Guards—

Enter Guards.

Here, take these factious monsters, drag them forth
To sudden death.

Jun. Nay; since it comes to this—

Sem. Dispatch them quick;—but first, pluck out their tongues;

Lest with their dying breath they sow sedition.

[Exeunt Guards, with the Mutineers.

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Our first design, my friend, has prov'd abortive;

Still there remains an after-game to play:

My troops are mounted: their Numidian steeds

Snuff up the wind, and long to scour the desert:

Let but Sempronius head us in our fight,

We'll force the gate where Marcus keeps his guard,
And hew down all that would oppose our passage.

A day will bring us into Caesar's camp.

Sem. Confusion! I have fail'd of half my purpose:
Marcia, the charming Marcia's left behind!

Syph. How? will Sempronius turn a woman's slave?

Sem. Think not that I can ever feel the soft
Unmanly warmth and tenderness of love.

Syphax, I long to clasp that haughty maid,

And bend her stubborn virtue to my passion:

When I have gone thus far, I'd cast her off.

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXX.

Syph. What hinders then, but that thou find her out,

And hurry her away by manly force?

Sem. But how to gain admision? for access
Is given to none but Juba and her brothers.

Syph. Thou shalt have Juba's dress and Juba's
guards:

The doors will open when Numidia's prince
Seems to appear before the slaves that watch them.

Sem. I thank thy friendly zeal:—Marcia's my own!

How will my bosom swell with anxious joy,

When I behold her struggling in my arms,

With glowing beauty and disorder'd charms;

While fear and anger, with alternate gages,

Pant in their breast, and vary in her face!

So Pluto, seiz'd of Proserpine, convey'd

To hell's tremendous gloom the affrighted maid;

There grimly smil'd, pleas'd with the beauteous prize,
Nor envied Jove his sunshine and his skies.

[Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Portico of the Palace.

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Luc. Now tell me, Marcia, tell me from thy soul,
If thou believ'st 'tis possible for woman
To suffer greater ills than Lucia suffers?

Mar. O, Lucia, Lucia, might my big-swollen heart
Vent all its griefs, and give a loose to sorrow,
Marcia could answer thee in sighs, keep pace
With all thy woes, and count out tear for tear.

Luc. I know, thou'rt doom'd alike to be belov'd
By Juba, and thy father's friend Sempronius:
But which of these has power to charm like Porcius?

Mar. Still must I beg thee not to name Sempronius?

Lucia, I like not that loud boisterous man:

Juba to all the bravery of a hero

Adds softest love and sweetness: he, I own,

Might make indeed the proudest woman happy.

Luc. But, should your father give you to Sempronius?

Mar. I dare not think he will: but, if he should—

I hear the sound of feet:—they march this way.

Let us retire, and try if we can drown

Each softer thought in sense of present danger.

When love once pleads admission to our hearts,

In spite of all the virtue we can boast,

The woman that deliberates is lost.

[Exeunt.

Enter SEMPRONIUS, dressed like JUBA, with Numidian Guards.

Sem. The deer is lodg'd; I've track'd her to her covert:

Be sure you mind the word; and, when I give it,
Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey:

Let not her cries or tears have force to move you.

How will the young Numidian rave, to see

His mistress lost! If aught could glad my soul

Beyond the enjoyment of so bright a prize,

'Twould be to torture that young gay barbarian.

But hark, what noise? Death to my hopes! 'tis he,
'Tis Juba's self. There is but one way left:
He must be murder'd, and a passage cut Through those his guards. Hah, dastards, do you tremble?
Or act like men; or, by yon azure heaven—

Enter JUBA, with Guards.

Juba. What do I see? Who's this, that dare usurp

The guards and habit of Numidia's prince?

Sem. One that was born to scourge thy arrogance,
Presumptuous youth.

Juba. What can this mean? Sempronius!

Sem. My sword shall answer thee:—have at thy heart.

Juba. Nay, then beware thy own, proud barbarous man.

[They fight.—SEMPRONIUS falls.—His Guards surrender to JUBA's.—Their swords are taken from them.]

Sem. Curse on my stars! Am I then doom'd to fall

By a boy's hand, and for a worthless woman?
This my close of life!

Oh, for a peal of thunder, that would make
Earth, sea, and air, and heaven, and Cato tremble!

[Dies.]

Juba. With what a spring his furious soul broke loose,

And left the limbs still quivering on the ground!

Hence let us carry off those slaves to Cato,

That we may there at length unravel all

This dark design, this mystery of fate.

[Exit with Guards and Prisoners.]

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Luc. Sure, 'twas the clash of swords: my troubled
heart

Is so cast down and sunk amidst its sorrows,
It throbs with fear, and aches at every sound.

O, Marcia, should thy brothers, for my sake—
I die away with horror at the thought.

Mar. See, Lucia, see! here's blood!

What! a Numidian! Heavens preserve the prince!

The face lies muffled up within the garment—

But hah!—death to my sight!—a diadem?—

O gods! 'tis he! Juba lies dead before us.

Luc. Now, Marcia, now call up to thy assistance
Thy wonted strength and constancy of mind.

Mar. Lucia, look there, and wonder at my patience:

Have I not cause to rave, and beat my breast,

To rend my heart with grief, and run distracted?

Luc. What can I think or say to give thee comfort?

Enter JUBA, with Guards.

Mar. Talk not of comfort, 'tis for lighter ills.

Behold a sight that strikes all comfort dead.

I will indulge my sorrows;

That man, that best of men, deserv'd it from me.

Juba. What do I hear? and was the false Sem-
pronius

That best of men? O, had I fall'n like him,
And could have thus been mourn'd, I had been happy.

Mar. O Juba! Juba! Juba! [Kneels by SEM.
He's dead, and never knew how much I lov'd him.

Lucia, who knows but his poor bleeding heart,

Amidst its agonies, remember'd Marcia,

And the last words he utter'd call'd me cruel?

Alas, he knew not—hapless youth!—he knew not
Marcia's whole soul was full of love and Juba.

Juba. Do I live—or am indeed

What Marcia thinks? All is Elysium round me.

[Aside.]

Mar. Ye dear remains of the most lov'd of men,

Nor modesty nor virtue here forbids

A last embrace, while thus—

Juba. [Comes forward.] See, Marcia, see,
The happy Juba lives: [She rises.] he lives, to catch

That dear embrace, and to return it too

With mutual warmth and eagerness of love.

[They embrace.]

Mar. With pleasure and amaze I stand transported.

If thou art Juba, who lies there?

Juba. A wretch,

Disguis'd like Juba on a curs'd design.

The tale is long, nor have I heard it out;

Thy father knows it all. I could not bear

To leave thee in the neighbourhood of death,

But flew, in all the haste of love, to find thee:

I found thee weeping; and confess, this once,

Am rapt with joy, to see my Marcia's tears.

Mar. I've been surpris'd in an unguarded hour,

But must not now go back; the love that lay

Half smother'd in my breast, has broke through all

Its weak restraints, and burns in its full lustre:

I cannot, if I would, conceal it from thee.

Juba. My joy! my best lov'd! my only wish!

How shall I speak the transport of my soul!

Mar. Lucia, thy arm; O let me rest upon it!

The vital blood that had forsook my heart,

Returns again in such tumultuous tides,

It quite o'ercomes me. Lead to my apartment.

O prince! I blush, to think what I have said;

But fate has wrested the confession from me.

Go on, and prosper in the paths of honour:

Thy virtue will excuse my passion for thee,

And make the gods propitious to our love.

[Exit with LUCIA.]

Juba. I am so bless'd, I fear 'tis all a dream.

Fortune, thou now hast made amends for all

Thy past unkindness: I absolve my stars—

What, though Numidia add her conquer'd towns

And provinces, to swell the victor's triumph?

Juba will never at his fate repine:

Let Cæsar have the world, if Marcia's mine. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Square before the Palace.
Trumpets.

Enter LUCIUS, CATO, and Freedmen.

Luci. I stand astonish'd. What! the bold Sem-
pronius,

That still broke foremost thro' the crowd of patriots,
As with a hurricane of zeal transported!

And, virtuous even to madness—

Cato. Trust me, my friend,

Our civil discords have produced such crimes,

Such monstrous crimes, I am surpris'd at nothing.

O Lucius, I am sick of this bad world:

The daylight and the sun grow painful to me.

Enter PORCIUS.

But see where Porcius comes.—What means this haste?

Por. My heart is griev'd;

I bring such news as will afflict my father.

Cato. Has Cæsar shed more Roman blood?

Por. Not so:—

The traitor Syphax, as within the square
He exercised his troops, the signal given,
Flew off at once with his Numidian horse
To the south gate, where Marcus holds the watch:
I saw, and call'd to stop him; but in vain;
He toss'd his arm aloft, and proudly told me,
He would not stay and perish like Sempronius.

Cato. Perfidious men!—But haste, my son, and see

Thy brother Marcus acts a Roman's part.

[Exit PORCIUS, and the Freedmen, with drawn swords.]

Lucius, the torrent bears too hard upon me:
Justice gives way to force; the conquer'd world
Is Cæsar's: Cato has no business in it.

Luci. While pride, oppression, and injustice reign,
The world will still demand her Cato's presence,
In pity to mankind, submit to Cæsar,
And reconcile thy mighty soul to life.

Cato. Would Lucius have me live, to swell the number

Of Cæsar's slaves?—or, by a base submission,
Give up the cause of Rome, and own a tyrant?

Luci. The victor never will impose on Cato
Ungenerous terms:—his enemies confess,
The virtues of humanity are Cæsar's.

Cato. Curse on his virtues! they've undone his country:

Such popular humanity is treason.

But Juba comes.—The ingenuous prince appears
Full of the guilt of his perfidious subjects.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. I blush, and am confounded, to appear Before thy presence, Cato.

Cato. What's thy crime?

Juba. I'm a Numidian.

Cato. And a brave one too:
Thou hast a Roman soul.

Juba. Hast thou not heard

Of my false countrymen?

Cato. Alas, good youth,

Falsehood and fraud shoot up in every soil,
The product of all climes;—Rome has its Cæsars.

Juba. 'Tis generous, thus to comfort the distress'd

Cato. 'Tis just, to give applause where 'tis deserv'd.

Thy virtue, prince, has stood the test of fortune,
Like purest gold, that, tortur'd in the furnace,
Comes out more bright, and brings forth all its weight.

Enter PORCIUS.

Por. Misfortune on misfortune! grief on grief!
My brother Marcus—

Cato. Hah! what has he done?

Has he forsook his post? Has he given way?

Did he look tamely on, and let them pass?

Por. Scarce had I left my father, but I met him,
Borne on the shields of his surviving soldiers,
Breathless and pale, and cover'd o'er with wounds.
Long, at the head of his few faithful friends,
He stood the shock of a whole host of foes,
Till, obstinately brave, and bent on death,
Oppress'd with multitudes, he greatly fell.

Cato. I'm satisfied.

Por. Nor did he fall, before
His sword had pierc'd thro' the false heart of Syphax.
I saw the hoary traitor
Grin in the pangs of death, and bite the ground.

Cato. Thanks to the gods! my boy has done his duty.

Porcius, when I am dead, be sure you place
His urn near mine.

Por. Long may they keep asunder!

Luci. O, Cato, arm thy soul with all its patience!
See where the corpse of thy dead son approaches;
The citizens and senators alarm'd
Have gather'd round it, and attend it weeping.

[A dead march.]

Enter Lictors, Senators.—Soldiers, bearing the body of MARCUS on a bier.—Freedmen, bearing his helmet, shield, sword, and spear.—Eagle and other ensigns S.P.Q.R. and Guards with their arms reversed.—Enter six Lictors with fasces.—CATO stands in front of the bier.

Cato. Welcome, my son!—Here set him down, my friends,

Full in my sight; that I may view at leisure
The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds.
How beautiful is death, when earn'd by virtue!
Who would not be that youth? What pity is it
That we can die but once, to serve our country!

Why sits this sadness on your brows, my friends?
I should have blush'd, if Cato's house had stood
Secure, and flourish'd in a civil war.

Porcius, behold thy brother; and remember,
Thy life is not thy own, when Rome demands it.
When Rome demands? [Advances to the front.] But

Rome is now no more:

The Roman empire's fall'n—O, curs'd ambition!—
Fall'n into Cæsar's hands:—our great forefathers
Had left him nought to conquer, but his country.

Juba. Behold that generous man! Rome fills his eyes

With tears, that flow'd not o'er his own dead son.

Por. While Cato lives, Cæsar will blush to see Mankind enslav'd, and be asham'd of empire.

Cato. Cæsar asham'd! Has he not seen Pharsalia?

Luci. Cato, 'tis time, thou save thyself and us.

Cato. Lese not a thought on me; I'm out of danger;

Cæsar shall never say, "I've conquer'd Cato."

But, O my friends, your safety fills my heart
With anxious thoughts.—How shall I save my friends?

'Tis now, O Cæsar, I begin to fear thee.

Luci. Cæsar has mercy, if we ask it of him.

Cato. Then ask it, I conjure you: let him know,

Whate'er was done against him, Cato did it:

Add, if you please, that I request it of him,
The virtue of my friends may pass unpunish'd.

Juba, my heart is troubled for thy sake:

Should I advise thee to regain Numidia,

Or seek the conqueror?

Juba. If I forsake thee

Whilst I have life, may Heaven abandon Juba!

Cato. [Lays his hand on JUBA.] Thy virtues, prince, if I foresee aright,

Will one day make thee great. At Rome, hereafter,
'Twill be no crime to have been Cato's friend.

Porcius, come hither to me. [Turning to POR.] Ah,
my son,

Despairing of success,

Let me advise thee to withdraw betimes

To our paternal seat, the Sabine field,

Where the great Censor toil'd with his own hands,

And all our frugal ancestors were bless'd

In humble virtues, and a rural life:

There live retir'd:

Content thyself to be obscurely good:

When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,

The post of honour is a private station.

Por. I hope, my father does not recommend
A life to Porcius, that he scorns himself.

Cato. Farewell, my friends! [LUCIUS and Senators join the other Senators.] If there be any of you

Who dare not trust the victor's clemency,
Know, there are ships prepar'd by my command,
Their sails already opening to the winds,
That shall convey you to the wish'd-for port.
Is there aught else, my friends, I can do for you?
The conqueror draws near. Once more, farewell!
If e'er we meet hereafter, we shall meet
In happier climes, and on a safer shore,
Where Cæsar never shall approach us more.

[Pointing to the bier.]

There the brave youth, with love of virtue fir'd
Who greatly in his country's cause expir'd,
Shall know he conquer'd. The firm patriot there,
Who made the welfare of mankind his care,
Though still by faction, vice, and fortune cross'd,
Shall find the generous labour was not lost.

[The four Soldiers take up the Bier.—A dead March—Exeunt LUCIUS and Senators, two by two—CATO—Bier, attended as before—PORCIUS and JUBA—Eagle—Fasces, two by two—Ensigns S.P.Q.R.—Ensigns, Patentes—Guards, &c.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in the Palace.—CATO discovered, sitting as in deep meditation, holding in his hand Plato's book on the Immortality of the Soul:—a drawn sword lying by him on the table.

Cato. It must be so;—Plato, thou reasonest well;—
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?
Or whence this secret dread and inward horror
Of falling into nought? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself and startles at destruction?
'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis Heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.

Eternity!—[Rises and comes forward.]—Thou pleasing, dreadful, thought!—

Through what variety of untried being,
Through what new scenes and changes must we pass!
The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before me,
But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.—
Here will I hold: If there's a Power above us—
(And that there is, all nature cries aloud
Through all her works)—he must delight in virtue;
And that which he delights in must be happy.
But when? or where?—This world was made for Cæsar.—

I'm weary of conjectures: This must end 'em.

[Goes back to the table, laying his hand on his sword.]

Thus am I doubly arm'd: my death and life,
My bane and antidote, are both before me:
This in a moment brings me to an end;
But this informs me, I shall never die.

[Comes forward with a roll of paper and a sword.]

The soul, secur'd in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.—
The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years;
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.—
What means this heaviness that hangs upon me?
Nature oppress'd, and harass'd out with care,
Sinks down to rest. This once I'll favour her,
That my awaken'd soul may take her flight,
Renew'd in all her strength, and fresh with life,
An offering fit for heaven. Let guilt or fear
Disturb man's rest: Cato knows neither of 'em,
Indifferent in his choice to sleep or die.—

[Returns and sits.]

Enter PORCIUS.

But ah! how's this?—My son! Why this intrusion?
Were not my orders that I would be private?
Why am I disobey'd?

Por. Alas, my father!

What means this sword? this instrument of death?
Let me convey it hence. [Takes it up.]

Cato. Rash youth, forbear!

Por. O let the prayers, the entreaties of your friends,

Their tears, their common danger, wrest it from you.

Cato. Would'st thou betray me? would'st thou give me up,

A slave, a captive, into Cæsar's hands?
Retire: and learn obedience to a father;
Or know, young man—

Por. Look not thus sternly on me:
You know I'd rather die than disobey you.

[Lays it down.]
Cato. 'Tis well: again I'm master of myself.

[CATO takes the sword.]

Now, Cæsar, let thy troops beset our gates,
And bar each avenue; thy gathering fleets
O'erspread the sea, and stop up every port;
Cato shall open to himself a passage,
And mock thy hopes. [Comes forward.]

Por. [Kneels] O sir, forgive my son,
Whose grief hangs heavy on him! O, my father—
How am I sure it is not the last time
I e'er shall call you so:—be not pleas'd,
O, be not angry with me, whilst I weep,
And, in the anguish of my heart, beseech you
To quit the dreadful purpose of your soul.

Cato. Thou hast been ever good and dutiful.

[Lays his hand on his head.]

Weep not, my son; all will be well again:
The righteous gods, whom I have sought to please,
Will succour Cato, and protect his children.

Por. Your words give comfort to my drooping heart [Rises.]

Cato. Porcius, thou mayst rely upon my conduct:
Cato will never act what misbecomes him.—

But go, my son; take care that nought be wanting
Among thy father's friends; see them embark'd;
And tell me if the winds and seas befriend 'em.—
My soul is quite weigh'd down with care, and asks
The soft refreshments of a moment's sleep.

[CATO goes up the Stage.—PORCIUS follows him and kneels at his feet.—CATO looks kindly upon him, and then exits.]

Por. My thoughts are more at ease; my heart revives.—

Enter MARCIA.

O, Marcia, O, my sister, still there's hope;

Our father will not cast away a life
So needful to us all, and to his country.
He is retir'd to rest, and seems to cherish
Thoughts full of peace. He has despatch'd me hence
With orders that bespeak a mind compos'd,
And studious for the safety of his friends.
Marcia, take care that none disturb his slumbers.

[Erit PORCIUS.]

Mar. O, ye immortal powers, that guard the just,
Watch round his couch, and soften his repose!
Banish his sorrows, and becalm his soul
With easy dreams! Remember all his virtues,
And shew mankind that goodness is your care!

Enter LUCIA.

Luc. Where is your father, Marcia? Where is Cato?

Mar. Lucia, speak low:—he is retir'd to rest.
My friend, I feel a gentle dawning hope
Rise in my soul: we may be happy still.

Luc. Alas, I tremble when I think on Cato;
In every view, in every thought, I tremble.
Cato is stern, and awful as a god:

He knows not how to wink at human frailty,
Or pardon weakness that he never felt.

Mar. Though stern and awful to the foes of Rome,
He is all goodness, Lucia, always mild,
Compassionate and gentle, to his friends:
Fill'd with domestic tenderness—the best,
The kindest father!—I have ever found him
Easy, and good, and bounteous to my wishes.

Luc. 'Tis his consent alone can make us happy.
But who knows Cato's thoughts?
Who knows how yet he may dispose of Porcius?
Or how he has determin'd of thyself?

Mar. Let him but live, commit the rest to heaven.

Enter LUCIUS.

Luci. Sweet are the slumbers of the virtuous man.—
O Marcia, I have seen thy god-like father:
Some power invisible supports his soul,
And bears it up in all its wonted greatness.
A kind refreshing sleep has fallen upon him:
I saw him stretch'd at ease, his fancy lost
In pleasing dreams: as I drew near his couch,
He smil'd, and cried, Cæsar, thou canst not hurt me.

Mar. His mind still labours with some dreadful thought.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Lucius, the horsemen are return'd from viewing

The number, strength, and posture of our foes,
Who now encamp within a short hour's march.
On the high point of yon bright western tower
We ken them from afar; the setting sun
Plays on their shining arms and burnish'd helmets,
And covers all the field with gleams of fire.

Luci. Marcia, 'tis time we should awake thy father,
Cæsar is still dispos'd to give us terms;
And waits at distance, till he hears from Cato.

Enter PORCIUS.

Porcius, thy looks speak somewhat of importance.
What tidings dost thou bring? Methinks, I see
Unusual gladness sparkling in thy eyes.

Por. As I was hasting to the port, where now

My father's friends, impatient for a passage,
Accuse the lingering winds, a sail arriv'd
From Pompey's son, who through the realms of Spain
Calls out for vengeance on his father's death,
And rouses the whole nation up to arms.
Were Cato at their head, once more might Rome
Assert her rights and claim her liberty.

[Groans are heard.]

But hark! what means that groan?—O give me way,
And let me fly into my father's presence.

[Erit PORCIUS.]

Luci. Cato amidst his slumbers, thinks on Rome,
And in the wild disorder of his soul
Mourns o'er his country.—

[Groans again.]

Hah! a second groan!—Heaven guard us all!

Mar. Alas! 'tis not the voice
Of one who sleeps: 'tis agonizing pain,
'Tis death is in that sound.

Enter PORCIUS, advances between MARCIA and JUBA.

Por. O sight of woe!

O Marcia, what we fear'd is come to pass!—
Cato has fallen upon his sword—

Luci. O Porcius,
Hide all the horrors of thy mournful tale,
And let us guess the rest.

Por. I've rais'd him up,
And plac'd him in his chair; where, pale and faint,
He gasps for breath, and, as his life flows from him,
Demands to see his friends. His servants weeping,
Obsequious to his orders, bear him hither.

Mar. O Heaven, assist me in this dreadful hour
To pay the last sad duties to my father!

*Enter two Freedmen leading CATO, supported by his two Freedmen.—Two first Freedmen remove the table, and remain by it.—
MARCIA runs to assist CATO. Takes his right arm and helps to bring him to his chair.*

Juba. These are thy triumphs, thy exploits, O,
Cæsar!

Luci. Now is Rome fallen indeed!

Cato. Here set me down.—

Porcius, come near me;—are my friends embark'd?
Can any thing be thought of for their service?

Whilst yet I live, let me not live in vain.—

O Lucius, art thou here?—Thou art too good!—

Let this our friendship live between our children;

Make Porcius happy in thy daughter Lucia.—

Alas, poor man, he weeps!—Marcia, my daughter—
O bend me forward!—Juba loves thee, Marcia.

A senator of Rome, while Rome surviv'd,
Would not have match'd his daughter with a king;
But Cæsar's arms have thrown down all distinction:
Who'er is brave and virtuous, is a Roman.—

I'm sick to death.—O, when shall I get loose
From this vain world, the abode of guilt and sorrow!—

And yet, methinks, a beam of light breaks in
On my departing soul.—Alas! I fear,
I've been too hasty.—O ye powers, that search
The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts,
If I have done amiss, impute it not!—

The best may err—but you are good, and—oh!

[Dies.]

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER.

A COMEDY IN FIVE ACTS,

BY OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

SIR CHARLES MARLOW.
HARDCASTLE.
YOUNG MARLOW.
HASTINGS.
TONY LUMPKIN.
SERVANTS, &c.
MRS. HARDCASTLE.
MISS HARDCASTLE.
MISS NEVILLE.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in an old-fashioned house.

Enter HARDCASTLE and MRS. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. I vow, Mr. Hardcastle, you're very particular. Is there a creature in the whole country, but ourselves, that does not take a trip to town now and then, to rub off the rust a little? There's the two Miss Hoggs, and our neighbour, Mrs. Grigsby, go to take a month's polish every winter.

Hard. Ay, and bring back vanity and affectation to last them the whole year. I wonder why London cannot keep its own folks at home. In my time, the follies of the town crept slowly among us; but now they travel faster than a stage-coach. Its fopperies come down, not only as inside passengers, but in the very basket.

Mrs. H. Ay; your times were fine times, indeed; you have been telling us of them for many a long year. Here we live in an old, rumbling mansion, that looks for all the world like an inn, but that we never see company. Our best visitors are old Mrs. Oddfish, the curate's wife, and little Cripplelegate, the lame dancing-master; and all our entertainment, your old stories of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough. I hate such old-fashioned trumpery.

Hard. And I love it. I love every thing that's old: old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine; and I believe, Dorothy, (taking her hand) you'll own I have been pretty fond of an old wife.

Mrs. H. Lud! Mr. Hardcastle, you're for ever at your Dorothy's, and your old wives. You may be a Darby, but I'll be no Joan, I promise you. I'm not so old as you'd make me by more than one good year. Add twenty to twenty, and make many of that.

Hard. Let me see: twenty added to twenty make just fifty and seven.

Mrs. H. It's false, Mr. Hardcastle! I was but twenty when I was brought to-bed of Tony; that I had by Mr Lumpkin, my first husband; and he's not come to years of discretion yet.

Hard. Nor ever will, I dare answer for him. Ay, you have taught him finely.

Mrs. H. No matter: Tony Lumpkin has a good fortune. My son is not to live by his learning. I don't think a boy wants much learning to spend fifteen hundred a-year.

Hard. Learning, quotha! a mere composition of tricks and mischief.

Mrs. H. Humour, my dear; nothing but humour. Come, Mr. Hardcastle, you must allow the boy a little humour.

Hard. I'd sooner allow him a horse-pond. If burning the footman's shoes, frightening the maids, worrying the kittens, be humour, he has it. It was but yesterday he fastened my wig to the back of my chair; and when I went to make a bow, I pop'd my bald head into Mrs. Frizzle's face.

Mrs. H. And am I to blame? The poor boy was always too sickly to do any good. A school would be his death. When he comes to be a little stronger, who knows what a year or two's latin may do for him?

Hard. Latin for him! A cat and fiddle. No, no; the alehouse and the stable are the only schools he'll ever go to.

Mrs. H. Well, we must not snub the poor boy; for I believe we sha'n't have him long among us. Any body that looks in his face may see he's consumptive.

Hard. Ay, if growing fat be one of the symptoms.

Mrs. H. He coughs sometimes.

Hard. Yes, when his liquor goes the wrong way.

Mrs. H. I'm actually afraid of his lungs.

Hard. And truly so am I; for he sometimes whoops like a speaking-trumpet. (Tony hallooing behind the scenes,) Oh! there he goes. A very consumptive figure truly!

Enter TONY, crossing the stage.

Mrs. H. Where are you going, my charmer? Won't you give papa and I a little of your company, lovee?

Tony. I'm in haste, mother; I can't stay.

Mrs. H. You sha'n't venture out this raw evening, my dear. You look most shockingly.

Tony. I can't stay, I tell you. The Three Pigeons expect me down every moment. There's some fun going forward.

Hard. Ay, the alehouse; the old place: I thought so.

Mrs. H. A low, paltry set of fellows.

Tony. Not so low, neither. There's Dick Muggins, the exciseman; Jack Slang, the horse-doctor; little Aminadab, that grinds the music-box; and Tom Twist, that spins the pewter-platter.

Mrs. H. Pray, my dear, disappoint them for one night, at least.

Tony. As for disappointing them, I should not so much mind; but I can't abide to disappoint myself.

Mrs. H. (Detaining him.) You sha'n't go.

Tony. I will, I tell you.

Mrs. H. I say, you sha'n't.

Tony. We'll see which is the strongest, you or I.

[Exit, hauling her out.]

Hard. Ay, there goes a pair that only spoil each other. But is not the whole age in a combination to drive sense and discretion out of doors? There's my pretty darling Kate; the fashions of the times have almost infected her, too. By living a year or two in town, she is as fond of gauze and French frippery as the best of them.

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE.

Blessings on my pretty innocence! Dressed out as usual, my Kate. Goodness! what a quantity of superfluous silk hast thou got about thee, girl! I could never teach the fools of this age, that the indigent world could be clothed out of the trimmings of the vain.

Miss H. You know our agreement, sir. You allow me the morning to receive and pay visits, and to dress in my own manner; and, in the evening, I put on my housewife's dress to please you.

Hard. Well, remember, I insist on the terms of our agreement; and, by the bye, I believe I shall have occasion to try your obedience this very evening.

Miss H. I protest, sir, I don't comprehend your meaning.

Hard. Then, to be plain with you, Kate, I expect the young gentleman I have chosen to be your husband from town this very day. I have his father's letter, in which he informs me his son is set out, and that he intends to follow him shortly after.

Miss H. Indeed! I wish I had known something of this before. Bless me! how shall I behave? It's a thousand to one I sha'n't like him. Our meeting will be so formal, and so like a thing of business, that I shall find no room for friendship or esteem.

Hard. Depend upon it, child, I'll never control your choice; but Mr. Marlow, whom I have pitched upon, is the son of my old friend, Sir Charles Marlow, of whom you have heard me talk so often. The young gentleman has been bred a scholar, and is designed for an employment in the service of his country. I am told he's a man of an excellent understanding.

Miss H. Is he?

Hard. Very generous.

Miss H. I believe I shall like him.

Hard. Young and brave.

Miss H. I'm sure I shall like him.

Hard. And very handsome.

Miss H. My dear papa, say no more. (Kissing his hand.) He's mine; I'll have him.

Hard. And, to crown all, Kate, he's one of the most bashful, reserved young fellows in the world.

Miss H. Eh! you have frozen me to death again. That word "reserved" has undone all the rest of his accomplishments. A reserved lover, it is said, always makes a suspicious husband.

Hard. On the contrary, modesty seldom resides in a breast that is not enriched with nobler virtues. It was the very feature in his character that first struck me.

Miss H. He must have more striking features to catch me, I promise you. However, if he be so young, so handsome, and so every thing, as you mention, I believe he'll do still. I think I'll have him.

Hard. Ay, Kate; but there is still an obstacle.—It's more than an even wager he may not have you.

Miss H. My dear papa, why will you mortify one so? Well, if he refuse, instead of breaking my heart at his indifference, I'll only break my glass for its flattery; set my cap to some newer fashion, and look out for some less difficult admirer.

Hard. Bravely resolved! In the meantime, I'll go preparé the servants for his reception. As we seldom see company, they want as much training as a company of recruits the first day's muster. [Exit.]

Miss H. Lud! this news of papa's puts me all in a flutter. Young, handsome: these he puts last, but I put them foremost. Sensible, good-natured; I like all that. But, then, reserved and sheepish;—that's much against him. Yet can't he be cured of his timidity, by being taught to be proud of his wife? Yes; and can't I!—But I vow I am disposing of the husband before I have secured the lover.

Enter MISS NEVILLE.

I'm glad you're come, Neville, my dear. Tell me, Constance, how do I look this evening? Is there any thing whimsical about me? Is it one of my well-looking days, child? Am I in face to-day?

Miss N. Perfectly, my dear. Yet, now I look again—bless me! sure no accident has happened among the canary-birds or the gold-fishes. Has your brother or the cat been meddling? Or has the last novel been too moving?

Miss H. No; nothing of all this. I have been threatened—I can scarce get it out—I have been threatened with a lover.

Miss N. And his name—

Miss H. Is Marlow.

Miss N. Indeed!

Miss H. The son of Sir Charles Marlow.

Miss N. As I live, the most intimate friend of Mr. Hastings, my admirer. They are never asunder. I believe you must have seen him when we lived in town.

Miss H. Never.

Miss N. He's a very singular character, I assure you. Among women of reputation and virtue, he is the modestest man alive; but his acquaintance give him a very different character among women of another stamp. You understand me?

Miss H. An odd character, indeed. I shall never be able to manage him. What shall I do? Psha! think no more of him; but trust to occurrences for success. But how goes on your own affair, my dear? Has my mother been courting you for my brother Tony, as usual?

Miss N. I have just come from one of our agreeable tête-à-têtes. She has been saying a hundred tender things, and setting off her pretty monster as the very pink of perfection.

Miss H. And her partiality is such, that she actually thinks him so. A fortune like your's is no small temptation. Besides, as she has the sole management of it, I'm not surprised to see her unwilling to let it go out of the family.

Miss N. A fortune like mine, which chiefly consists in jewels, is no such mighty temptation.—But, at any rate, if my dear Hastings be but constant, I make no doubt to be too hard for her at last. However, I let her suppose that I am in love with her son; and she never once dreams that my affections are fixed upon another.

Miss H. My good brother holds 'out stoutly. I could almost love him for hating you so.

Miss N. It is a good-natured creature at bottom; and I'm sure would wish to see me married to any body but himself. But my aunt's bell rings for our afternoon's walk round the improvements. Allons! Courage is necessary, as our affairs are critical.

Miss H. Would it were bed-time, and all were well. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Ale-house room.

Several shabby fellows, with punch and tobacco. TONY at the head of the table, a little higher than the rest: a mallet in his hand.

All. Hurra! hurra! hurra! bravo!

1st Fel. Now, gentlemen, silence for a song. The 'squire is going to knock himself down for a song.

All. Ay; a song, a song.

Tony. Then I'll sing you, gentlemen, a song I made upon this alehouse, the Three Pigeons.

SONG—TONY.

Let schoolmasters puzzle their brain,
With grammar, and nonsense, and learning;
Good liquor, I stoutly maintain,
Gives genius a better discerning.

Let them brag of their Heathenish gods,
Their Lethe, their Styx, and Stygians;
Their quips, and their quoes, and their quods,
They're all but a parcel of pigeons.

Toroddle, toroddle, toroll.

When methodist preachers come down
A-preaching that drinking is sinful,
I'll wager the rascals a crown
They always preach best with a skinful.
But when you come down with your pence,
For a slice of their scurvy religion,
I'll leave it to all men of sense,

But you, my good friend, are the pigeon.

Toroddle, toroddle, toroll.

Then, come, put the jorum about,
And let us be merry and clever;
Our hearts and our liquors are stout—
Here's the Three Jolly Pigeons for ever.
Let some cry up woodcock or hare,
Your bustards, your ducks, and your widgeons;
But of all the birds in the air,

Here's a health to the Three Jolly Pigeons.

Toroddle, toroddle, toroll.

All. Bravo, bravo!

1st Fel. The squire has got spunk in him.

2d Fel. I loves to hear him sing, bekase he never gives us nothing that's low.

3d Fel. Oh! d—n any thing that's low; I can't bear it.

4th Fel. The genteel thing is the genteel thing at any time, if so be that a gentleman bees in a concatenation accordingly.

3d Fel. I like the maxim of it, Master Muggins. What! though I am obligated to dance a bear, a man may be a gentleman for all that. May this be my poison, if my bear ever dances but to the very genteelst of tunes—"Water parted," or the minuet in Ariadne.

2d Fel. What a pity it is the 'squire is not come to his own. It would be well for all the publicans within ten miles round him.

Tony. Ecod! and so it would, Master Slang. I'd then shew what it was to keep choice company.

2d Fel. Oh! he takes after his own father for that. To be sure, old 'Squire Lumpkin was the finest gentleman I ever set my eyes on. For winding the strait-horn, or beating a thicket for a hare, or a wench, he never had his fellow. It was a saying in the place, that he kept the best horses, dogs, and girls in the whole county.

Tony. Ecod! and when I'm of age I'll be no bastard, I promise you. I have been thinking of Bet Bouncer, and the miller's grey mare, to begin with. But come, my boys, drink about and be merry, for you pay no reckoning. Well, Stingo, what's the matter?

Enter LANDLORD.

Land. There be two gentlemen, in a post-chaise at the door. They've lost their way upon the forest, and they are talking something about Mr. Hardcastle.

Tony. As sure as can be, one of them must be the gentleman that's coming down to court my sister. Do they seem to be Londoners?

Land. I believe they may. They look woundily like Frenchmen.

Tony. Then desire them to step this way, and I'll set them right in a twinkling.

[Exit Landlord.]

Gentlemen, as they mayn't be good enough company for you, step down for a moment, and I'll be with you in the squeezing of a lemon. [Exeunt Mob.] Father-in-law has been calling me a whelp and hound, this half-year. Now, if I pleased, I could be so revenged upon the old grumbletonian. But then I am afraid—afraid of what? I shall soon be worth fifteen hundred a-year, and let him frighten me out of that, if he can.

Enter Landlord, conducting MARLOW and HASTINGS.

Mar. What a tedious, uncomfortable day have we had of it! We were told it was but forty miles across the country, and we have come about three-score.

Hast. And all, Marlow, from that unaccountable reserve of your's, that would not let us inquire more frequently on the way.

Mar. I own, Hastings, I am unwilling to lay myself under an obligation to every one I meet; and often stand the chance of an unmannerly answer.

Hast. At present, however, we are not likely to receive any answer.

Tony. No offence, gentlemen; but I'm told you have been inquiring for one Mr. Hardcastle, in these parts. Do you know what part of the country you are in?

Hast. Not in the least, sir; but should thank you for information.

Tony. Nor in the way you came?

Hast. No, sir; but if you can inform us—

Tony. Why, gentlemen, if you know neither the road you are going, nor where you are, nor the road you came, the first thing I have to inform you^{is}, that—you have lost your way.

Mar. We wanted no ghost to tell us that.

Tony. Pray, gentlemen, may I be so bold as to ask the place from whence you came?

Mar. That's not necessary towards directing us where we are to go.

Tony. No offence; but question for question is all fair, you know. Pray, gentlemen, is not this same Hardcastle, a cross-grain'd, old-fashion'd, whimsical fellow, with an ugly face, a daughter, and a pretty son?

Hast. We have not seen the gentleman; but he has the family you mention.

Tony. The daughter, a tall, trapesing, trolloping, talkative, maypole; the son, a pretty, well-bred, agreeable youth, that everybody is fond of.

Mar. Our information differs in this: the daughter is said to be well-bred and beautiful; the son, an awkward booby, reared up and spoiled at his mother's apron-string.

Tony. He-he-hem. Then, gentlemen, all I have to tell you is, that you won't reach Mr. Hardcastle's house this night, I believe.

Hast. Unfortunate!

Tony. It's a d—d long, dark, boggy, dangerous way. Stingo, tell the gentlemen the way to Mr. Hardcastle's (winking at the Landlord)—Mr. Hardcastle's, of Quagmire-marsh. You understand me.

Land. Master Hardcastle's? Lack-a-daisy! my masters, you're come a deadly deal wrong. When you came to the bottom of the hill, you should have cross'd down Squash-lane.

Mar. Cross down Squash-lane?

Land. Then you were to keep straight forward till you came to the four roads.

Mar. Come to where four roads meet?

Tony. Ay; but you must be sure to take only one.

Mar. Oh, sir! you're facetious.

Tony. Then, keeping to the right, you are to go sideways till you come upon Crack-skull common; there you must look sharp for the track of the wheel, and go forward till you come to farmer Murrain's barn. Coming to the farmer's barn, you are to turn to the right, and then to the left, and then to the right about again, till you find out the old mill—

Mar. Zounds! man, we could as soon find out the longitude!

Hast. What's to be done, Marlow?

Mar. This house promises but a poor reception; though, perhaps, the landlord can accommodate us.

Land. Alack, master! we have but one spare bed in the whole house.

Tony. And, to my knowledge, that's taken up by three lodgers already. [After a pause, in which the rest seem disconcerted.] I have hit it: don't you think, Stingo, our landlady would accommodate the gentlemen by the fireside, with three chairs and a bolster?

Hast. I hate sleeping by the fireside.

Mar. And I detest your three chairs and a bolster.

Tony. You do, do you? Then let me see—what if you go on a mile further, to the Buck's Head, the old Buck's Head, on the hill, one of the best inns in the whole country—

Hast. O ho! so, we have escaped an adventure for this night, however.

Land. [Apart to TONY.] Sure you bean't sending them to your father's as an inn, be you?

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXXI

Tony. Mum! you fool, you; let them find that out. [To them.] You have only to keep on straight forward till you come to a large house on the road side: you'll see a pair of large horns over the door; that's the sign. Drive up the yard, and call stoutly about you.

Hast. Sir, we are obliged to you. The servants can't miss the way.

Tony. No, no: but I'll tell you though, the landlord is rich, and going to leave off business: so he wants to be thought a gentleman, saving your presence, he, he, he! He'll be for giving you his company; and, ecod! if you mind him, he'll persuade you that his mother was an alderman, and his aunt a justice of peace.

Land. A troublesome old blade, to be sure; but a keeps as good wines and beds as any in the whole county.

Mar. Well, if he supplies us with these, we shall want no further connexion. We are to turn to the right, did you say?

Tony. No, no, straight forward. I'll just step, myself, and shew you a piece of the way. [To the Landlord.] Mum!

Land. Ah, bless your heart, for a sweet, pleasant—d—d mischievous son of a w—! [Aside.] [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An old-fashioned House.

Enter HARDCASTLE, followed by three or four awkward servants.

Hard. Well, I hope you are perfect in the table exercise I have been teaching you these three days. You all know your posts and your places; and can shew that you have been used to good company, without stirring from home.

All. Ay, ay.

Hard. When company comes you are not to pop out and stare, and then run in again, like frightened rabbits in a warren.

All. No, no.

Hard. You, Diggory, whom I have taken from the barn, are to make a shew at the side-table; and you, Roger, whom I have advanced from the plough, are to place yourself behind my chair. But you're not to stand so, with your hands in your pockets. Take your hands from your pockets, Roger; and from your head, you blockhead you. See how Diggory carries his hands: they're a little too stiff, indeed, but that's no great matter.

Dig. Ay, mind how I hold them; I learned to hold my hands this way when I was upon drill for the militia; and so being upon drill—

Hard. You must not be so talkative, Diggory; you must be all attention to the guests: you must hear us talk, and not think of talking; you must see us drink, and not think of drinking; you must see us eat, and not think of eating.

Dig. By the laws, your worship, that's perfectly impossible. Whenever Diggory sees eating going forwards, ecod! he's always wishing for a mouthful himself.

Hard. Blockhead! is not a bellyful in the kitchen as good as a bellyful in the parlour? Stay your stomach with that reflection.

Dig. Ecod! I thank your worship, I'll make a shift to stay my stomach with a slice of cold beef in the pantry.

Hard. Diggory, you're too talkative. Then if I happen to say a good thing, or tell a good story at table, you must not all burst out a-laughing, as if you made part of the company.

Dig. Then, ecod! your worship must not tell the story of Ould Grouse in the gun-room: I can't help laughing at that, he, he, he! for the soul of me. We have laughed at that these twenty years; ha, ha, ha!

Hard. Ha, ha, ha! The story is a good one. Well, honest Diggory, you may laugh at that; but still remember to be attentive. Suppose one of the company should call for a glass of wine, how will you behave? A glass of wine, sir, if you please. [To Diggory.] Eh, why don't you move?

Dig. Ecod! your worship, I never have courage till I see the eatables and drinkables brought upon table, and then I'm as bauld as a lion.

Hard. A glass of wine, if you please. What, will nobody move?

1st Serv. I'm not to leave this place.

2nd Serv. I'm sure it's no place of mine.

3rd Serv. Nor mine, for sartin.

Dig. Wauns! and I'm sure it canna be mine.

Hard. You numskulls! and so, while, like your betters, you are quarrelling for places, the guests must be starved. Oh! you dunces! I find I must begin all over again. But don't I hear a coach drive into the yard? To your posts, you blockheads. I'll go in the meantime, and give my old friend's son a hearty welcome at the gate. [Exit.]

Dig. By the heavens! my place is quite gone out of my head.

Roger. I know that my place is to be everywhere.

1st Serv. Where the devil is mine?

2nd Serv. My place is no where at all; and so I've got about my business. [Exeunt Servants.]

Enter MARLOW and HASTINGS.

Hast. After the disappointments of the day, welcome once more, Charles, to the comforts of a clean room and a good fire. Upon my word, a very well looking house; antique, but creditable.

Mar. The usual fate of a large mansion. Having first ruined the master by good house-keeping, it has at last come to levy contributions as an inn.

Hast. As you say, we passengers are to be taxed to pay all these fineries. I have often seen a good sideboard, or a marble chimney-piece, though not actually put in the bill, inflame the bill confoundedly.

Mar. Travellers must pay in all places; the only difference is, that in good inns, you pay dearly for luxuries; in bad inns you are fleeced and starved.

Hast. You have lived pretty much among them. In truth, I have been often surprised that you, who have seen so much of the world, with your natural good sense, and your many opportunities, could never yet acquire a requisite share of assurance.

Mar. The Englishman's malady: but tell me, George, where could I have learned that assurance you talk of? My life has been chiefly spent in a college or an inn, in seclusion from that lovely part of the creation that chiefly teach men confidence. I don't know that I was ever familiarly acquainted with a single modest woman, except my mother; but among females of another class, you know—

Hast. Ay, among them you are impudent enough of all conscience.

Mar. They are of us, you know.

Hast. But in the company of women of reputation I never saw such an idiot, such a trembler; you look for all the world as if you wanted an opportunity of stealing out of the room.

Mar. Why, man, that's because I do want to steal out of the room. Faith! I have often formed a resolution to break the ice, and rattle away at any rate. But I don't know how, a single glance from a pair of fine eyes has totally overset my resolution. An impudent fellow may counterfeit modesty, but I'll be hanged if a modest man can ever counterfeit impudence.

Hast. If you could say but half the fine things to them that I have heard you lavish upon the barmaid of an inn, or even a college bed-maker—

Mar. Why, George, I can't say fine things to them; they freeze, they petrify me. They may talk of a comet, or a burning mountain, or some such bagatelle; but to me, a modest woman, drest out in all her finery, is the most tremendous object of the whole creation.

Hast. Ha, ha, ha! As this rate, man, how can you ever expect to marry?

Mar. Never; unless, as among kings and princes, my bride were to be courted by proxy. If, indeed, like an eastern bridegroom, one were to be introduced to a wife he never saw before, it might be endured. But to go through all the terrors of a formal courtship, together with the episode of aunts, grandmothers, cousins, and at last to blurt out the broad start-question, of "Madam, will you marry me?" No, no, that's a strain much above me, I assure you.

Hast. I pity you; but how do you intend behaving to the lady you are come down to visit at the request of your father?

Mar. As I behave to all other ladies. Bow very low;—answer yes, or no, to all her demands; but for the rest, I don't think I shall venture to look in her face till I see my father's again.

Hast. I'm surprised, that one who is so warm a friend can be so cool a lover.

Mar. To be explicit, my dear Hastings, my chief inducement to come down was to be instrumental in forwarding your happiness, not my own. Miss Neville loves you; the family don't know you; as my friend, you are sure of a reception, and let honour do the rest.

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. Gentlemen, once more you are heartily welcome. Which is Mr Marlow? [Mar. advances.] Sir, you're heartily welcome. It's not my way, you see, to receive my friends with my back to the fire! I like to give them a hearty reception, in the old style, at my gate; I like to see their horses and trunks taken care of.

Mar. [Aside.] He has got our names from the servants already. [To HARD.] We approve your caution and hospitality, sir. [To HAST.] I have been thinking, George, of changing our travelling dresses in the morning; I am grown confoundedly ashamed of mine.

Hast. I beg, Mr. Marlow, you'll use no ceremony in this house.

Hast. I fancy, you're right: the first blow is half the battle. We must, however, open the campaign.

Hard. Mr. Marlow—Mr. Hastings—gentlemen—pray be under no restraint in this house. This is Liberty-hall, gentlemen; you may do just as you please here.

Mar. Yet, George, if we open the campaign too fiercely at first, we may want ammunition before it is over. We must shew our generalship by securing, if necessary, a retreat.

Hard. Your talking of a retreat, Mr. Marlow, puts me in mind of the Duke of Marlborough, when he went to besiege Denain. He first summoned the garrison—

Mar. Ay, and we'll summon your garrison, old boy.

Hard. He first summoned the garrison, which might consist of about five thousand men—

Hast. Marlow, what's o'clock?

Hard. I say, gentlemen, as I was telling you, he summoned the garrison, which might consist of about five thousand men—

Mar. Five minutes to seven.

Hard. Which might consist of about five thousand men, well appointed with stores, ammunition, and other implements of war. Now, says the Duke of Marlborough to George Brooks, that stood next to him—You must have heard of George Brooks—I'll pawn my dukedom, says he, but I take that garrison without spilling a drop of blood. So—

Mar. What? My good friend, if you give us a glass of punch in the meantime, it would help us to carry on the siege with vigour.

Hard. Punch, sir!—This is the most unaccountable kind of modesty I ever met with. [Aside.]

Mar. Yes, sir, punch. A glass of warm punch after our journey will be comfortable.

Enter Servant with a tankard.

This is Liberty-hall, you know.

Hard. Here's a cup, sir.

Mar. So this fellow, in his Liberty-hall, will only let us have just what he pleases. [Aside to HAST.]

Hard. [Taking the cup.] I hope you'll find it to your mind. I have prepared it with my own hands, and I believe you'll own the ingredients are tolerable. Will you be so good as to pledge me, sir? Here, Mr. Marlow, here is to our better acquaintance. [Drinks, and gives the cup to Marlow.]

Mar. A very impudent fellow this; but he's a character, and I'll humour him a little [Aside.] Sir, my service to you.

Hast. I see this fellow wants to give us his company, and forgets that he's an innkeeper, before he has learned to be a gentleman. [Aside.]

Mar. From the excellence of your cup, my old friend, I suppose you have a good deal of business in this part of the country. Warm work, now and then, at elections, I suppose. [Gives the tankard to HARDCASTLE.]

Hard. No, sir, I have long given that work over. Since our betters have hit upon the expedient of electing each other, there's no business for us that sell ale. [Gives the tankard to HASTINGS.]

Hast. So, you have no turn for politics, I find.

Hard. Not in the least. There was a time, indeed, I fretted myself about the mistakes of government, like other people; but finding myself every day grow more angry, and the government growing no better, I left it to mend itself. Since that, I no more trouble my head about who's in or who's out, than I do about John Nokes or Tom Stiles. So my service to you.

Hast. So that, with eating above stairs and drinking below, with receiving your friends within, and amusing them without, you lead a good, pleasant, bustling life of it.

Hard. I do stir about a good deal, that's certain. Half the differences of the parish are adjusted in this very parlour.

Mar. [After drinking.] And you have an argument in your cup, old gentleman, better than any in Westminster-hall.

Hard. Ay, young gentleman, that, and a little philosophy.

Mar. Well, this is the first time I ever heard of an innkeeper's philosophy. [Aside.]

Hast. So, then, like an experienced general, you attack them on every quarter. If you find their reason manageable, you attack them with your philosophy; if you find that they have no reason, you attack them with this. Here's your health, my philosopher. [Drinks.]

Hard. Good, very good; thank you, ha! ha! Your generalship puts me in mind of Prince Eugene, when he fought the Turks at the battle of Belgrade. You shall hear.

Mar. Instead of the battle of Belgrade, I think it's almost time to talk about supper. What has your philosophy got in the house for supper?

Hard. For supper, sir? Was ever such a request to a man in his own house? [Aside.]

Mar. Yes, sir, supper sir; I begin to feel an appetite. I shall make devilish work to-night in the larder, I promise you.

Hard. Such a brazen dog sure never my eyes beheld. [Aside.] Why, really, sir, as for supper, I can't well tell. My Dorothy and the cookmaid settle these things between them I leave these kind of things entirely to them,

Mar. You do, do you?

Hard. Entirely. By-the-by, I believe they are in actual consultation upon what's for supper this moment in the kitchen.

Mar. Then I beg they'll admit me as one of their privy council. It's a way I've got. When I travel, I always choose to regulate my own supper. Let the cook be called. No offence, I hope, sir.

Hard. Oh! no, sir, none in the least; yet, I don't know how, our Bridget, the cookmaid, is not very communicative upon these occasions. Should we send for her, she might scold us all out of the house.

Hast. Let's see the list of the larder then. I always match my appetite to my bill of fare.

Mar. To HARDCASTLE, who looks at them with surprise.] Sir, he's very right, and it's my way, too.

Hard. Sir, you have a right to command here. Here, Roger, bring us the bill of fare for to-night's supper: I believe it's drawn out. Your manner, Mr. Hastings, puts me in mind of my uncle, Colonel Wallop. It was a saying of his, that no man was sure of his supper till he had eaten it. [Servant brings in the bill of fare, and exit.]

Hast. All upon the high ropes! His uncle a colonel. We shall soon hear of his mother being a justice of peace. [Aside.] But let's hear the bill of fare.

Mar. [Perusing.] What's here? For the first course; for the second course; for the dessert.—The devil, sir! Do you think we have brought down the whole Joiners's Company, or the Corporation of Bedford, to eat up such a supper? Two or three little things, clean and comfortable, will do.

Hast. But let's hear it.

Mar. [Reading.] For the first course; at the top, a pig and prune sauce.

Hast. D— your pig, say I.

Mar. And d— your prune sauce, say I.

Hard. And yet, gentlemen, to men that are hungry, pig with prune sauce, is very good eating. Their impudence confounds me. [Aside.] Gentlemen, you are my guests, make what alterations you please. Is there anything else you wish to retrench or alter, gentlemen?

Mar. Item: a pork pie, a boiled rabbit and sausages, a florentine, a shaking pudding, and a dish of tiff—taff—taffey cream.

Hast. Confound your made dishes! I shall be as much at a loss in this house, as at a green and yellow dinner at the French ambassador's table. I'm for plain eating.

Hard. I'm sorry, gentlemen, that I have nothing you like; but if there be anything you have a particular fancy to—

Mar. Why, really, sir, your bill of fare is so exquisite, that any one part of it is full as good as another. Send us what you please. So much for supper; and now to see that our beds are aired, and properly taken care of.

Hard. I intreat you'll leave all that to me. You shall not stir a step.

Mar. Leave that to you! I protest, sir, you must excuse me, I always look to these things myself.

Hard. I must insist, sir, you'll make yourself easy on that head.

Mar. You see I'm resolved on it. A very troublesome fellow, as ever I met with. [Aside.]

Hard. Well, sir, I'm resolved, at least, to attend you. This may be modern modesty, but I never saw anything look so like old-fashioned impudence.

[Aside, and exit with MAR.]

Hast. So, I find this fellow's civilities begin to grow troublesome. But who can be angry with those assiduities which are meant to please him? Ah! what do I see? Miss Neville, by all that's happy.

Enter Miss NEVILLE.

Miss N. My dear Hastings! To what unexpected good fortune, to what accident, am I to ascribe this happy meeting?

Hast. Rather, let me ask the same question, as I could never have hoped to meet my dearest Constance at an inn.

Miss N. An inn! you mistake: my aunt, my guardian, lives here. What could induce you to think this house an inn?

Hast. My friend, Mr. Marlow, with whom I came down, and I, have been sent here as to an inn, I assure you. A young fellow, whom we accidentally met at a house hard by, directed us hither.

Miss N. Certainly it must be one of my hopeful cousin's tricks, of whom you have heard me talk so often. Ha, ha, ha!

Hast. He whom your aunt intends for you? He of whom I have such just apprehensions?

Miss N. You have nothing to fear from him, I assure you. You'd adore him, if you knew how heartily he despises me. My aunt knows it too, and has undertaken to court me for him, and actually begins to think she has made a conquest.

Hast. Thou dear dissembler! You must know, my Constance, I have just seized this happy opportunity of my friend's visit here, to get admittance into the family. The horses that carried us down are now fatigued with the journey, but they'll soon be refreshed; and then, if my dearest girl will trust in her faithful Hastings, we shall soon be landed in France, where, even among slaves, the laws of marriage are respected.

Miss N. I have often told you, that though ready to obey you, I yet should leave my little fortune behind with reluctance. The greatest part of it was left me by my uncle, the India Director, and chiefly consists in jewels. I have been for some time persuading my aunt to let me wear them. I fancy I'm very near succeeding. The instant they are put in thy possession, you shall find me ready to make them and myself yours.

Hast. Perish the baubles! Your person is all I desire. In the meantime, my friend Marlow must not be let into his mistake. I know the strange reserve of his temper is such, that if abruptly informed of it, he would instantly quit the house, before our plan was ripe for execution.

Miss N. But how shall we keep him in the deception? Miss Hardcastle is just returned from walking; what if we persuade him she is come to this house as to an inn? Come this way. [They confer.]

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. The assiduities of these good people tease me beyond bearing. My host seems to think it ill manners to leave me alone, and so he claps, not only himself, but his old-fashioned wife upon my back. They talk of coming to sup with us, too; and then, I suppose, we are to run the gauntlet through all the rest of the family. What have we got here?

Hast. My dear Charles, let me congratulate you. The most fortunate accident! Who do you think has just alighted?

Mar. Cannot guess.

Hast. Our mistresses, boy! Miss Hardcastle and Miss Neville. Give me leave to introduce Miss Constance Neville to your acquaintance. Happening to dine in the neighbourhood, they called on their return to take fresh horses here. Miss Hardcastle has just stepped into the next room, and will be back in an instant. Wasn't it lucky? eh!

Mar. I have just been mortified enough of all conscience, and here comes something to complete my embarrassment. [Aside.]

Hast. Well, but wasn't it the most fortunate thing in the world?

Mar. Oh! yes;—very fortunate;—a most joyful encounter. But our dresses, George, you know, are in disorder. What if we postpone the happiness till to-morrow? To-morrow, at her own house: it will be every bit as convenient, and rather more respectful. To-morrow let it be. [Offering to go.]

Miss N. By no means, sir. Your ceremony will displease her. The disorder of your dress will shew the ardour of your impatience. Besides, she knows you are in the house, and will permit you to see her.

Mar. Oh! the devil! How shall I support it? Hem, hem! Hastings, you must not go. You are to assist me, you know. I shall be confoundedly ridiculous. Yet, hang it! I'll take courage. Hem! [Aside to HAST.]

Hast. Psha, man! 'tis put the first plunge, and all's over. She's but a woman, you know. [Aside to MAR.]

Mar. And of all women, she that I dread most to encounter!

Enter Miss HARDCASTLE, as returned from walking.

Hast. [Introducing them.] Miss Hardcastle, Mr. Marlow. I'm proud of bringing two persons together, who only want to know, to esteem each other.

Miss H. [Aside.] Now, for meeting my modest gentleman with a demure face, and quite in his own manner. [After a pause, in which he appears very uneasy and disconcerted.] I'm glad of your safe arrival, sir. I'm told you had some accidents by the way.

Mar. Only a few, madam. Yes, we had some. Yes, madam, a good many accidents, but should be sorry, madam—or, rather, glad of any accidents—that are so agreeably concluded. Hem!

Hast. [Aside to MAR.] You never spoke better in your whole life. Keep it up, and I'll insure you the victory.

Miss H. I'm afraid you flatter sir. You that have seen so much of the finest company, can find little entertainment in an obscure corner of the country.

Mar. [Gathering courage.] I have lived, indeed, in the world, madam; but I have kept very little company. I have been but an observer upon life, madam, while others were enjoying it.

Miss H. An observer, like you, upon life, was, I fear, disagreeably employed, since you must have had much more to censure than to approve.

Mar. Pardon me, madam: I was always willing to be amused. The folly of most people is rather an object of my mirth than uneasiness.

Hast. [Aside to MAR.] Bravo, bravo! Never spoke so well in your whole life. Well, Miss Hardcastle, I see that you and Mr. Marlow are going to be very good company. I believe our being here will but embarrass the interview.

Mar. Not in the least, Mr. Hastings. We like your company of all things. [Aside to HAST.] Zounds! George, sure you won't go. How can you leave us?

Hast. Our presence will but spoil conversation, so we'll retire to the next room. [Aside to MAR.] You don't consider, man, that we are to manage a little tête-à-tête of our own. [Exit with Miss N.]

Miss H. [After a pause.] But you have not been wholly an observer, I presume, sir. The ladies, I hope, have employed some part of your addresses.

Mar. [Relapsing into timidity.] Pardon me, madam, I—I—I—as yet have studied—only—to—deserve them.

Miss H. And that, some say, is the very worst way to obtain them.

Mar. Perhaps so, madam: but I love to converse only with the more grave and sensible part of the sex. But I'm afraid I grow tiresome.

Miss H. Not at all, sir; there is nothing I like so much as grave conversation myself: I could hear it for ever. Indeed, I have often been surprised how a man of sentiment could ever admire those light, airy pleasures, where nothing reaches the heart.

Mar. It's—a disease of the mind, madam. In variety of tastes, there must be some who wanting a relish for—um—a—um.

Miss H. I understand you, sir. There must be some who, wanting a relish for refined pleasures, pretend to despise what they are incapable of tasting.

Mar. My meaning, madam; but infinitely better expressed. And I can't help observing, that in this age of hypocrisy—a—

Miss H. Who could ever suppose this fellow impudent on some occasions? [Aside.] You were going to observe, sir—

Mar. I was observing, madam—I protest, madam, I forget what I was going to observe.

Miss H. I vow, and so do I. [Aside.] You were observing, sir, that in this age of hypocrisy,—something about hypocrisy, sir.

Mar. Yes, madam; in this age of hypocrisy, there are few who, upon strict inquiry, do not—a—a—

Miss H. I understand you perfectly, sir.

Mar. [Aside.] Egad! and that's more than I do myself.

Miss H. You mean that, in this hypocritical age, there are few that do not condemn in public, what they practise in private, and think they pay every debt to virtue when they praise it.

Mar. True, madam; those who have most virtue in their mouths, have least of it in their bosoms. But I see Miss Neville expecting us in the next room. I would not intrude for the world.

Miss H. I protest, sir, I never was more agreeably entertained in all my life. Pray, go on.

Mar. Yes, madam. I was—but she beckons us to join her. Madam, shall I do myself the honour to attend you.

Miss H. Well, then, I'll follow.

Mar. [Aside.] This pretty smooth dialogue has done for me. [Exit.]

Miss H. Ha, ha, ha! Was there ever such a sober, sentimental interview? I'm certain he scarce looked me in my face the whole time. Yet the fellow, but for his unaccountable bashfulness, is pretty well too. He has good sense, but then so buried in his fears, that it fatigues one more than ignorance. If I could teach him a little confidence, it would be doing somebody that I know of, a piece of service. But who is that somebody?—that, faith, is a question I can scarcely answer. [Exit.]

Enter TONY and MISS NEVILLE, followed by Mrs. HARDCASTLE and HASTINGS.

Tony. What do you follow me for, cousin Con? I wonder you're not ashamed to be so very engaging.

Miss N. I hope, cousin, one may speak to one's own relations, and not be to blame.

Tony. Ay, but I know what sort of a relation you want to make me, though; but it won't do. I tell you, cousin Con, it won't do; so I beg you'll keep your distance; I want no nearer relationship. [She follows, coquetting him to the back scene.]

Mrs. H. Well, I vow, Mr. Hastings, you are very entertaining. There's nothing in the world I love to talk of so much as London, and the fashions, though I was never there myself.

Hast. Never there! you amaze me! from your air and manner, I concluded you had been bred all your life either at Ranelagh, St. James's, or Tower-wharf.

Mrs. H. Oh! sir, you're only pleased to say so. We country persons can have no manner at all. I'm in love with the town, and that serves to raise me above some of our neighbouring rustics; but who can have a manner that has never seen the Pantheon, the Grotto Gardens, the Borough, and such places where the nobility chiefly resort; all I can do, is to enjoy London at second-hand. I take care to know every tête-à-tête from the Scandalous Magazine, and have all the fashions as they come out, in a letter from the two Miss Ricketts, of Crooked-lane. Pray, how do you like this head?

Hast. Extremely elegant and degagée, upon my word. Your friseur is a Frenchman, I suppose.

Mrs. H. I protest I dressed it myself from a print in the Ladies' Memorandum-book for the last year.

Hast. Indeed! such a head in a side-box at the play-house, would draw as many gazers as my lady mayoress at a city-ball.

Mrs. H. One must dress a little particular, or one may escape in the crowd.

Hast. But that can never be your case, madam, in any dress. [Bowing.]

Mrs. H. Yet, what signifies my dressing, when I have such a piece of antiquity by my side as Mr. Hardcastle? All I can say will not argue down a single button from his clothes. I have often wanted him to throw off his great flaxen wig, and where he was bald, to plaster it over, like my Lord Pately, with powder.

Hast. You are right, madam; for, as among the ladies there are none ugly, so among the men there are none old.

Mrs. H. But what do you think his answer was? Why, with his usual gothic vivacity, he said, I only wanted him to throw off his wig, to convert it into a tête for my own wearing.

Hast. Intolerable!—at your age you may wear what you please, and it must become you.

Mrs. H. Pray, Mr. Hastings, what do you take to be the most fashionable age about town?

Hast. Some time ago, forty was all the mode; but I'm told, the ladies intend to bring up fifty for the ensuing winter.

Mrs. H. Seriously? Then I shall be too young for the fashion.

Hast. No lady begins now to put on jewels till she's past forty. For instance, miss there, in a polite circle, would be considered as a child, a mere maker of samplers.

Mrs. H. And yet, Mrs. Niece thinks herself as much a woman, and is as fond of jewels, as the oldest of us all.

Hast. Your niece, is she? And that young gentleman, a brother of your's, I should presume?

Mrs. H. My son, sir. They are contracted to each other. Observe their little sports. They fall in and out ten times a day, as if they were man and wife already. [To them.] Well, Tony, child, what soft things are you saying to your cousin Constance, this evening?

Tony. I have been saying no soft things; but, that it's very hard to be followed about so. Ecod! I've not a place in the house that's left to myself but the stable.

Mrs. H. Never mind him, Con., my dear. He's in another story behind your back.

Miss N. There's something generous in my cousin's manner. He falls out before faces, to be forgiven in private.

Tony. That's a d—d confounded—crack.

Mrs. H. Ah! he's a sly one. Don't you think they're like each other about the mouth, Mr. Hastings? The Blenkinsop mouth to a T. They're of a size, too. Back to back, my pretties, that Mr. Hastings may see you.

Tony. You had as good not make me, I tell you.

Miss N. Oh, lud! he has almost cracked my head.

Mrs. H. Oh! the monster! for shame, Tony! You a man, and behave so!

Tony. If I'm a man, let me have my fortin. Ecod! I'll not be made a fool of any longer.

Mrs. H. Is this, ungrateful boy! all that I'm to get for the pains I have taken in your education? I, that have rocked you in your cradle, and fed that pretty mouth with a spoon! Did not I work that waistcoat to make you look genteel?

Tony. But, ecod! I tell you I'll not be made a fool of no longer.

Mrs. H. Wasn't it all for your good, viper? Wasn't it all for your good?

Tony. I wish you'd let me and my good alone, then. Snubbing this way, when I'm in spirits. If I'm to have any good, let it come of itself; not to keep dinging it, dinging it into one so.

Mrs. H. That's false; I never see you when you're in spirits. No, Tony, you then go to the alehouse or kennel, I'm never to be delighted with your agreeable wild notes, unfeeling monster!

Tony. Ecod? mamma, your own notes are the wildest of the two.

Mrs. H. Was ever the like? But I see he wants to break my heart, I see he does.

Hast. Dear madam, permit me to lecture the young gentleman a little. I'm certain I can persuade him to his duty.

Mrs. H. Well, I must retire. Come, Constance;

my love. You see, Mr. Hastings, the wretchedness of my situation: was ever poor woman so plagued with a dear, sweet, pretty, provoking, undutiful boy! [Exit with Miss N.]

Tony. [Singing.]

"There was a young man riding by,
And fain would have his will.

Rang do dillo dee."

Don't mind her. Let her cry. It's the comfort of her heart. I have seen her and sister cry over a book for an hour together, and they said they liked the book the better, the more it made them cry.

Hast. Then you're no friend to the ladies, I find, my pretty young gentleman?

Tony. That's as I find 'em.

Hast. Not to her of your mother's choosing, I dare answer. And yet, she appears to me a pretty, well-tempered girl.

Tony. That's because you don't know her as well as I. Ecod! I know every inch about her; and there's not a more bitter, cantankerous toad in all Christendoom.

Hast. Pretty encouragement for a lover! [Aside.]

Tony. I have seen her since the height of that. She has as many tricks as a hare in a thicket, or a colt the first day's breaking.

Hast. To me she appears sensible and silent.

Tony. Ay, before company. But when she's with her playmates, she's as loud as a hog in a gate.

Hast. But there is a meek modesty about her that charms me.

Tony. Yes, but curb her never so little, she kicks up, and you're flung in the ditch.

Hast. Well, but you must allow her a little beauty—yes, you must allow her some beauty.

Tony. Bandbox! she's all a made-up thing, mum. Ah! could you but see Bet Bouncer of these parts, you might then talk of beauty. Ecod! she has two eyes as black as sloes, and cheeks as broad and red as a pulpit cushion. She'd make two of she.

Hast. Well, what say you to a friend that would take this bitter bargain off your hands?

Tony. Anan?

Hast. Would you thank him that would take Miss Neville, and leave you to happiness and your dear Betsy?

Tony. Ay; but where is there such a friend? for who would take her?

Hast. I am he. If you but assist me, I'll engage to whip her off to France, and you shall never hear more of her.

Tony. Assist you! Ecod! I will to the last drop of my blood. I'll clap a pair of horses to your chaise, that shall trundle you off in a twinkling; and, may be, get you a part of her fortin beside, in jewels, that you little dream of.

Hast. My dear squire, this looks like a lad of spirit.

Tony. Come along, then, and you shall see more of my spirit before you have done with me. [Singing.] "We are the boys that fear no noise," &c. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. What could my old friend, Sir Charles, mean, by recommending his son as the modestest young man in town. To me he appears the most impudent piece of brass that ever spoke with a tongue. He has taken possession of the easy chair by the fireside already. He took off his boots in the parlour, and desired me to see them taken care of. I'm desirous to know how his impudence affects my daughter: she will certainly be shocked at it,

Enter Miss HARDCASTLE, plainly dressed.

Well, Kate, I see you have changed your dress as I bid you; and yet, I think, there was no great occasion.

Miss H. I find such a pleasure, sir, in obeying your commands, that I take care to observe them, without ever debating their propriety,

Hard. And yet, Kate, I sometimes give you some cause, particularly when I recommended my modest gentleman to you as a lover to-day.

Miss H. You taught me to expect something extraordinary, and I find the original exceeds the description.

Hard. I was never so surprised in my life. He has quite confounded all my faculties.

Miss H. I never saw anything like it; and a man of the world, too!

Hard. Ay, he learned it all abroad.

Miss H. It seems all natural to him.

Hard. A good deal assisted by bad company, and a French dancing-master.

Miss H. Sure, you mistake, papa! A French dancing-master could never have taught him that timid look, that awkward address, that bashful manner—

Hard. Whose look? whose manner, child?

Miss H. Mr. Marlow's. His mauvaise honte, his timidity, struck me at first sight.

Hard. Then your first sight deceived you; for I think him one of the most brazen first sights that ever astonished my senses.

Miss H. Sure, sir, you rally! I never saw any one so modest.

Hard. And can you be serious? I never saw such a bouncing, swaggering puppy since I was born. Bully Dawson was but a fool to him.

Miss H. Surprising! He met me with a respectful bow, a stammering voice, and a look fixed on the ground.

Hard. He met me with a loud voice, a lordly air, and a familiarity that made my blood freeze again.

Miss H. He treated me with diffidence and respect; censured the manners of the age; admired the prudence of girls that never laughed; tired me with apologies for being tiresome; and then left the room with a bow, and, "Madam, I would not for the world detain you."

Hard. He spoke to me as if he knew me all his life before;—asked twenty questions, and never waited for an answer;—interrupted my best remarks with some silly pun; and when I was in my best story of the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, he asked if I was not a good hand at making punch. Yes, Kate, he asked your father if he was a maker of punch!

Miss H. One of us must certainly be mistaken.

Hard. If he be what he has shewn himself, I'm determined he shall never have my consent.

Miss H. And if he be the sullen thing I take him, he shall never have mine.

Hard. In one thing, then, we are agreed—to reject him.

Miss H. Yes, but upon conditions; for if you should find him less impudent, and I more presuming; if you find him more respectful, and I more importunate—I don't know—the fellow is well enough for a man. Certainly, we don't meet many such at a horse-race in the country.

Hard. If we should find him so—but that's impossible. The first appearance has done my business. I'm seldom deceived in that.

Miss H. And yet, there may be many good qualities under that first appearance. But as one of us must be mistaken, what if we go to make further discoveries?

Hard. Agreed. But depend on't, I'm in the right.

Miss H. And depend on't, I'm not much in the wrong. [Exeunt.]

Enter TONY, running in with a casket.

Tony. Ecod, I have got them. Here they are. My cousin Con's necklaces, bobs and all. My mother sha'n't cheat the poor souls out of their fortin, neither. O! my genius, is that you?

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. My dear friend, how have you managed with your mother! I hope you have amused her with pretending love for your cousin, and that you are willing to be reconciled at last. Our horses will be refreshed in a short time, and we shall soon be ready to set off.

Tony. And here's something to bear your charges by the way. [Giving the casket.] Your sweetheart's jewels. Keep them, and hang those, I say, that would rob you of one of them.

Hast. But how have you procured them from your mother?

Tony. Ask me no questions, and I'll tell you no fibs. I procured them by the rule of thumb. If I had not a key to every drawer in mother's bureau, how could I go to the alehouse so often as I do? An honest man may rob himself of his own at any time.

Hast. Thousands do it every day. But, to be plain with you, Miss Neville is endeavouring to procure them from her aunt this very instant. If she succeeds, it will be the most delicate way, at least, of obtaining them.

Tony. Well, keep them till you know how it will be. But I know how it will be well enough; she'd as soon part with the only sound tooth in her head.

Hast. But I dread the effects of her resentment, when she finds she has lost them.

Tony. Never you mind her resentment; leave me to manage that. I don't value her resentment the bounce of a cracker. Zounds! here they are. Morrice;—prance. [Exit HASTINGS.]

Enter Mrs. HARDCASTLE and Miss NEVILLE.

Mrs. H. Indeed, Constance, you amaze me. Such a girl as you want jewels! It will be time enough for jewels, my dear, twenty years hence, when your beauty begins to want repairs.

Miss N. But what will repair beauty at forty, will certainly improve it at twenty, madam.

Mrs. H. Your's, my dear, can admit of none. That natural blush is beyond a thousand ornaments. Besides, child, jewels are quite out at present. Don't you see half the ladies of our acquaintance, my Lady Kill-day-light, and Mrs. Crump, and the rest of them, carry their jewels to town, and bring nothing but paste and marcasites back?

Miss N. But who knows, madam, but somebody that shall be nameless, would like me best with all my finery about me?

Mrs. H. Consult your glass, my dear, and then see if, with such a pair of eyes, you want any better sparklers. What do you think, Tony, my dear, do you set off her beauty?

Tony. That's as hereafter may be.

Miss N. My dear aunt, if you knew how it would oblige me.

Mrs. H. A parcel of old-fashioned rose and table-cut things. They would make you look like the court of King Solomon at a puppet-show. Besides, I believe I can't readily come at them. They may be missing, for aught I know to the contrary.

Tony. [Apart to Mrs. H.] Then why don't you tell her so at once, as she's so longing for them? Tell her they're lost. It's the only way to quiet her. Say they're lost, and call me to bear witness.

Mrs. H. [Apart to Tony.] You know, my dear, I'm only keeping them for you. So, if I say they're gone, you'll bear me witness, will you? He! he! he!

Tony. Never fear me. Ecod! I'll say I saw them taken out with my own eyes. [Aside to Mrs. H.]

Miss N. I desire them but for one day, madam. Just to be permitted to shew them as relics, and then they may be locked up again.

Mrs. H. To be plain with you, my dear Constance, if I could find them, you should have them. They're missing, I assure you. Lost, for aught I know; but we must have patience wherever they are.

Miss N. I'll not believe it; it is but a shallow pretence to deny me. I know they're too valuable to be so slightly kept. As you are to answer for the loss—

Mrs. H. Don't be alarm'd, Constance. If they be lost, I must restore an equivalent. But my son knows they are missing and not to be found.

Tony. That I can bear witness to. They are missing and not to be found, I'll take my oath on't.

Mrs. H. You must learn resignation, my dear; for though we lose our fortune, yet we should not lose our patience. See me, how calm I am.

Miss N. Ay, people are generally calm at the misfortunes of others.

Mrs. H. Now I wonder a girl of your good sense should waste a thought upon such trumpery. We shall soon find them; and, in the meantime, you shall make use of my garnets till your jewels be found.

Miss N. I detest garnets!

Mrs. H. The most becoming things in the world, to set off a clear complexion. You have often seen how well they look upon me. You shall have them.

[Exit.]

Miss N. Was ever anything so provoking, to mislay my own jewels, and force me to wear trumpery.

Tony. Don't be a fool. If she gives you the garnets, take what you can get. The jewels are your own already. I have stolen them out of her bureau, and she does not know it. Fly to your spark, he'll tell you more of the matter. Leave me to manage her.

Miss N. My dear cousin!

[Exit.]

Tony. Vanish! She's here; and has missed them already. Zounds! how she fidgets and spits about like a Catherine wheel!

Enter Mrs. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. Confusion! thieves! robbers! We are cheated, plundered, broke open, undone.

Tony. What's the matter, what's the matter, mamma? I hope nothing has happened to any of the good family.

Mrs. H. We are robbed. My bureau has been broken open, the jewels taken out, and I'm undone.

Tony. O! is that all? ha! ha! ha! By the laws, I never saw it better acted in my life. Ecod! I thought you was ruined in earnest, ha! ha! ha!

Mrs. H. Why, boy, I am ruined in earnest. My bureau has been broken open, and all taken away.

Tony. Stick to that. Ha! ha! ha! stick to that; call me to bear witness.

Mrs. H. I tell you, Tony, by all that's precious the jewels are gone, and I shall be ruined for ever.

Tony. Sure I know they're gone, and I am to say so.

Mrs. H. My dearest Tony, but hear me. They're gone, I say.

Tony. By the laws, mamma, you make me for to laugh, ha! ha! ha! I know who took them well enough, ha! ha! ha!

Mrs. H. Was there ever such a blockhead, that can't tell the difference between jest and earnest. I tell you I'm not in jest booby.

Tony. That's right, that's right: you must be in a bitter passion, and then nobody will suspect either of us. I'll bear witness that they are gone.

Mrs. H. Can you bear witness that you're no better than a fool? Was ever poor woman so beset with fools on one hand, and thieves on the other?

Tony. I can bear witness to that.

Mrs. H. Bear witness again, you blockhead you, and I'll turn you out of the room directly. My poor niece, what will become of her? Do you laugh, you unfeeling brute, as if you enjoy'd my distress?

Tony. I can bear witness to that.

Mrs. H. Do you insult me, monster? I'll teach you to vex your mother, I will.

Tony. I can bear witness to that.

[Exeunt.]

Enter Miss HARDCASTLE and Maid.

Miss H. What an unaccountable creature is that brother of mine, to send them to the house as an inn: ha! ha! ha! I don't wonder at his impudence.

Maid. But what is more, madam, the young gentleman, as you pass'd by in your present dress, ask'd me if you were the bar-maid. He mistook you for the bar-maid, madam.

Miss H. Did he? Then, as I live, I'm resolv'd to keep up the delusion. Tell me, how do you like my present dress? Don't you think I look something like Cherry, in the Beaux' Stratagem?

Maid. It's the dress, madam, that every lady wears in the country, but when she visits or receives company.

Miss H. And are you sure he don't remember my face or person?

Maid. Certain of it.

Miss H. I vow I thought so; for though we spoke for some time together, yet his fears were such, that he never once looked up during the interview. Indeed, if he had, my bonnet would have kept him from seeing me.

Maid. But what do you hope from keeping him in his mistake.

Miss H. In the first place, I shall be seen; and that is no small advantage to a girl who brings her face to market. Then I shall perhaps make an acquaintance; and that is no small victory gained over one who never addresses any but the vilest of her sex. But my chief aim is to take my gentleman off his guard; and like an invisible champion of romance, examine the giant's force before I offer to combat.

Maid. But are you sure you can act your part, and disguise your voice, so that he may mistake that, as he has already mistaken your person?

Miss H. Never fear me; I think I have got the true bar cant. Did your honour call? Attend the Lion there: pipes and tobacco for the Angel: the Lamb has been outrageous this half hour.

Maid. It will do, madam; but he's here. [Exit]

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. What a bawling in every part of the house!

I have scarce a moment's repose. If I go to the best room, there I find my host and his story. If I fly to the gallery, there we have my hostess with her curtsy down to the ground. I have at last got a moment to myself, and now for recollection.

Miss H. Did you call, sir? Did your honour call?

Mar. [Musing.] As for Miss Hardcastle, she's too grave and sentimental for me.

Miss H. Did your honour call?

Mar. No, child. [Musing.] Besides, from the glimpse I had of her, I think she squints.

Miss H. I'm sure, sir, I heard the bell ring.

Mar. No, no. [Musing.] I have pleased my father, however, by coming down, and I'll to-morrow please myself by returning. [Taking out his tablets and perusing]

Miss H. Perhaps the other gentleman, called, sir.

Mar. I tell you no.

Miss H. I should be glad to know, sir. We have such a parcel of servants.

Mar. No, no, I tell you. [Looks full in her face.]

Yes, child, I think I did call. I wanted—I wanted—I vow, child, you are vastly handsome.

Miss H. O la, sir, you'll make one ashamed.

Mar. Never saw a more sprightly, malicious eye. Yes, yes, my dear, I did call. Have you got any of your—a—what d'ye call it, in the house?

Miss H. No, sir, we have been out of that these ten days.

Mar. One may call in this house, I find, to very little purpose. Suppose I should call for a taste, just by the way of trial, of the nectar of your lips, perhaps I might be disappointed in that too.

Miss H. Nectar! nectar! that's a liquor there's no call for in these parts. French, I suppose. We keep no French wines her, sir.

Mar. Of true English growth, I assure you.

Miss H. Then it's odd I should not know it. We brew all sorts of wines in this house, and I have lived here these eighteen years.

Mar. Eighteen years! Why, one would think, child, you kept the bar before you were born. How old are you?

Miss H. O! sir! I must not tell my age. They say women and music should never be dated.

Mar. To guess at this distance, you can't be much above forty. [Approaching.] Yet nearer I don't think so much. [Approaching.] By coming close to some women they look younger still: but when we come very close indeed—[Attempting to kiss her.]

Miss H. Pray, sir, keep your distance. One would think you wanted to know one's age, as they do horses, by mark of mouth.

Mar. I protest, child, you use me extremely ill. If you keep me at this distance, how is it possible you and I can ever be acquainted?

Miss H. And who wants to be acquainted with you? I want no such acquaintance, not I. I'm sure you did not treat Miss Hardcastle that was here awhile ago in this obstrepulous manner. I'll warrant me, before her you look dash'd, and kept bowing to the ground, and talk'd, for all the world, as if you was before a justice of the peace.

Mar. Egad! she has hit it sure enough. [Aside.] In awe of her, child? ha, ha, ha! A mere awkward, squinting thing. No, no; I find you don't know me. I laughed and rallied her a little; but I was unwilling to be too severe. No, I could not be too severe, curse me!

Miss H. O! then, sir, you are a favourite, I find, among the ladies?

ACT. DRAMA. No. 32.

Mar. Yes, my dear, a great favourite. And yet hang me, I don't see what they see in me to follow. At the ladies' club in town, I'm called their agreeable Rattle. Rattle, child, is not my real name, but one I'm known by. My name is Solomons. Mr. Solomons, my dear, at your service. [Offering to salute her.]

Miss H. Hold, sir! you were introducing me to your club, not to yourself. And you're so great a favourite there, you say?

Mar. Yes, my dear. There's Mrs. Mantrap, Lady Betty Blackleg, the Countess of Sligo, Mrs. Longhorns, old Miss Biddy Buckskin, and your humble servant, keep up the spirit of the place.

Miss H. Then it's a very merry place, I suppose?

Mar. Yes; as merry as cards, supper, wine, and old women can make us.

Miss H. And their agreeable Rattle! ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Egad! I don't quite like this chit. She looks knowing, methinks. [Aside.] You laugh, child.

Miss H. I can't but laugh to think what time they all have for minding their work or their family.

Mar. All's well; she don't laugh at me. [Aside.] Do you ever work, child?

Miss H. Ay, sure. There's not a screen or a quilt in the whole house but can bear witness to that.

Mar. Odso! then you must shew me your embroidery. I embroider and draw patterns myself a little. If you want a judge of your work, you must apply to me. [Seizing her hand.]

Miss H. Ay, but the colours don't look well by candle-light. You shall see all in the morning.

Mar. And why not now, my angel? Such beauty fires beyond the power of resistance.—Psha! the father here! My old luck! I never kicked seven, that I did not throw aces the aces three times following. [Erit.]

Enter HARDCASTLE, who stands in surprise.

Hard. So, madam! so, I find this is your modest lover; this is your humble admirer, that keeps his eyes fixed on the ground, and only adored at humble distance.—Kate, Kate, art thou not ashamed to deceive your father so?

Miss H. Never trust me, my dear papa, but he's still the modest man I first took him for; you'll be convinced of it as well as I.

Hard. By the hand of my body, I believe his impudence is infectious! Didn't I see him seize your hand? Didn't I see him haul you about like a milk maid? and now you talk of his respect and his modesty, forsooth!

Miss H. But if I shortly convince you of his modesty, that he has only the faults that will pass off with time, and the virtues that will improve with age, I hope you'll forgive him.

Hard. The girl would actually make one run mad I tell you I'll not be convinced. I am convinced! He has scarcely been three hours in the house, and he has already encroached on all my prerogatives. You may like his impudence, and call it modesty; but my son-in-law, madam, must have very different qualifications.

Miss H. Sir, I ask but this night to convince you.

Hard. You shall not have half the time; for I have thoughts of turning him out this very hour.

Miss H. Give me that hour, then, and I hope to satisfy you.

Hard. Well, an hour let it be then. But I'll have no trifling with your father: all fair and open, do you mind me? [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An old-fashioned House,

Enter MARLOW, followed by a Servant.

Mar. I wonder what Hastings could mean by sending me so valuable a thing as a casket to keep for him, when he knows the only place I have is the seat of a post-coach at an inn-door. Have you deposited the casket with the landlady, as I ordered you? Have you put it into her own hands?

Serv. Yes, your honour.

Mar. She said she'd keep it safe, did she?

Serv. Yes, she said she'd keep it safe enough; she ask'd me how I came by it; and she said she had a great mind to make me give an account of myself. [Exit.]

Mar. Ha! ha! ha! they're safe, however. What an unaccountable set of beings have we got amongst. This little bar-maid, though, runs in my head most strangely, and drives out the absurdities of all the rest of the family. She's mine; she must be mine, or I'm greatly mistaken.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. Bless me! I quite forgot to tell her that I intended to repair to the bottom of the garden. Marlow here, and in spirits too!

Mar. Give me joy, George! Crown me, shadow me with laurels! Well, George, after all, we modest fellows don't want for success among the women.

Hast. Some women, you mean. But what success has your honour's modesty been crown'd with now, that it grows so insolent upon us?

Mar. Didn't you see the tempting, brisk, lovely, little thing that runs about the house with a bunch of keys to her girdle?

Hast. Well, and what then?

Mar. She's mine, you rogue, you. Such fire, such motion, such eyes, such lips—but, egad! she would not let me kiss them though.

Hast. But are you sure, so very sure of her?

Mar. Why, man, she talk'd of shewing me her work above stairs, and I'm to improve the pattern.

Hast. But how can you, Charles, go about to rob a woman of her honour?

Mar. Psha! psha! we all know the honour of the bar-maid of an inn. I don't intend to rob her, take my word for it; there's nothing in this house I sha'n't honestly pay for.

Hast. I believe the girl has virtue.

Mar. And if she has, I should be the last man in the world that would attempt to corrupt it.

Hast. You have taken care, I hope, of the casket I sent you to lock up? 'Tis in safety?

Mar. Yes, yes, it's safe enough; I have taken care of it. But how could you think the seat of a post-coach at an inn-door a place of safety? Ah, numskull! I have taken better precautions for you than you did for yourself—I have—

Hast. What?

Mar. I have sent it to the landlady to keep for you.

Hast. To the landlady!

Mar. The landlady.

Hast. You did?

Mar. I did. She's to be answerable for its forthcoming, you know.

Hast. Yes; she'll bring it forth with a witness.

Mar. Wasn't I right? I believe you'll allow that I acted prudently upon this occasion.

Hast. He must not see my uneasiness. [Aside.]
Mar. You seem a little disconcerted, though, methinks. Sure, nothing has happened?

Hast. No, nothing. Never was in better spirits in all my life. And so you left it with the landlady? who, no doubt, very readily undertook the charge.

Mar. Rather too readily; for she not only kept the casket, but through her great precaution, was going to keep the messenger too. Ha, ha, ha!

Hast. He, he, he! They are safe, however.

Mar. As a guinea in a miser's purse.

Hast. So, now all hopes of fortune are at an end, and we must set off without it. [Aside.] Well, Charles, I'll leave you to your meditations on the pretty bar-maid; and, he, he, he! may you be as successful for yourself as you have been for me. [Exit.]

Mar. Thank ye, George; I ask no more. Ha, ha, ha!

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. I no longer know my own house. It's turned all topsy-turvy. His servants have got drunk already. I'll bear it no longer; and yet for my respect for his father, I'll be calm. [Aside.] Mr. Marlow, your servant. I'm your very humble servant. [Bowing low.]

Mar. Sir, your humble servant.—What's to be the wonder now? [Aside.]

Hard. I believe, sir, you must be sensible, sir, that no man alive ought to be more welcome than your father's son, sir. I hope you think so.

Mar. I do, from my soul, sir; I don't want much entreaty. I generally make my father's son welcome wherever he goes.

Hard. I believe you do, from my soul, sir. But though I say nothing to your own conduct, that of your servants is insufferable; their manner of drinking is setting a very bad example in this house, I assure you.

Mar. I protest, my very good sir, that's no fault of mine. If they don't drink as they ought, they are to blame. I ordered them not to spare the cellar; I did, I assure you. Here, let one of my servants come up. My positive directions were, that as I did not drink myself, they should make up for my deficiencies below.

Hard. Then they had your orders for what they do?

Mar. They had, I assure you; you shall hear from one of themselves. [Enter Servant, drunk.] You, Jeremy! come forward, sirrah? What were my orders? Were you not told to drink freely, and call for what you thought fit, for the good of the house?

Hard. I begin to lose my patience. [Aside.]

Jer. Please your honour, liberty and Fleet-street for ever! Though I'm but a servant, I'm as good as another man; I'll drink for no man before supper, sir, d—e! Good liquor will sit upon a good supper, but a good supper will not sit upon—hiccup—upon my conscience, sir. [Exit.]

Mar. You see, my old friend, the fellow's as drunk as he possibly can be. I don't know what you'd have more, unless you'd have the poor devil soused in a beer-barrel.

Hard. Zounds! he'll drive me distracted if I contain myself any longer. [Aside.] Mr. Marlow, sir, I have submitted to your insolence for more than four hours, and I see no likelihood of its coming to an end. I'm now resolv'd to be master here, sir; and I desire that you and your drunken pack may leave my house directly.

Mar. Leave your house!—sure you jest, my good friend. What, when I'm doing what I can to please you?

Hard. I tell you, sir, you don't please me; so I desire you'll leave my house.

Mar. Sure you cannot be serious. At this time o'night, and such a night? You only mean to banter me.

Hard. I tell you, sir, I'm serious; and, now that my passions are roused, I say this house is mine, sir; this house is mine, and I command you to leave it directly.

Mar. Ha, ha, ha! A puddle in a storm. I shan't stir a step, I assure you. [In a serious tone.] This your house, fellow; It's my house; this is my house; mine, while I choose to stay! What right have you to bid me leave this house, sir? I never heard of such impudence, curse me, never in my whole life before.

Hard. Nor I, confound me if ever I did. To come to my house, to call for what he likes, to turn me out of my own chair, to insult the family, to order his servants to get drunk, and then to tell me, this house is mine, sir. By all that's impudent, it makes me laugh. Ha! ha! ha! Pray, sir, [bantering] as you take the house, what think you of taking the rest of the furniture? There's a pair of silver candlesticks, and there's a fire-screen, and a pair of bellows, perhaps you may take a fancy to them?

Mar. Bring me your bill, sir, bring me your bill, and let's make no more words about it.

Mar. There's a set of prints too. What think you of the Rake's Progress for your own apartment?

Mar. Bring me your bill, I say; and I'll leave you and your infernal house directly.

Hard. Then there's a bright, brazen warming-pan, that you may see your own brazen face in.

Mar. My bill, sir.

Hard. I had forgot the great chair, for your own particular slumbers, after a hearty meal.

Mar. Zounds! bring me my bill, I say, and let's hear no more on't.

Hard. Young man, young man, from your father's letter to me. I was taught to expect a well-bred, modest man, as a visitor here; but now I find him no better than a coxcomb and a bully; but he will be down here presently, and shall hear more of it.

[Exit.]

Mar. How's this? Sure I have not mistaken the house! Everything looks like an inn: the servants cry coming! the attendance is awkward; the bar-maid too to attend us. But she's here, and will further inform me. Whither so fast, child? a word with you.

Enter Miss HARDCASTLE.

Miss H. Let it be short, then; I'm in a hurry. I believe he begins to find out his mistake, but it's too soon quite to un-leave him. [Aside.]

Mar. Pray, child, answer me one question. What are you, and what may your business in this house be?

Miss H. A relation of the family, sir.

Mar. What, a poor relation?

Miss H. Yes, sir; a poor relation, appointed to keep the keys, and to see that the guests want nothing in my power to give them.

Mar. That is, you act as the bar-maid of this inn.

Miss H. Inn! O la!—what brought that into your head? One of the best families in the county keep an inn! Ha! ha! ha! old Mr. Harcastle's house an inn!

Mar. Mr. Harcastle's house! Is this house Mr. Harcastle's house, child?

Miss H. Ay, sir, whose else should it be?

Mar. So then, all's out, and I have been d—v imposed on. Oh, confound my stupid head! I shall be laughed at over the whole town. I shall be stuck up in caricatura, in all the print-shops. The Dullissimo Macaroni. To mistake this house, of all others, for an inn, and my father's old friend for an inn-keeper. What a swaggering puppy must he take me for! what a silly puppy do I find myself! There again, may I be hanged, my dear, but I mistook you for the bar-maid.

Miss H. Dear me! dear me! I'm sure there's nothing in my behaviour to put me upon a level with one of that stamp.

Mar. Nothing, my dear, nothing; but I was in for a list of blunders, and could not help making you a subscriber. My stupidity saw every thing the wrong way: I mistook your assiduity for assurance, and your simplicity for allurements. But it's all over—this house I no more show my face in.

Miss H. I hope, sir, I have done nothing to disoblige you. I'm sure I should be sorry to affront any gentleman who has been so polite, and said so many civil things to me; I'm sure I should be sorry —(pretending to cry)—if he left the family upon my account. I'm sure I should be sorry people said any thing amiss, since I have no fortune but my character.

Mar. By heaven, she weeps! This is the first mark of tenderness I ever had from a modest woman, and it touches me. [Aside.]

Miss H. I'm sure my family is as good as Miss Harcastle's; and, though I'm poor, that's no great misfortune to a contented mind; and, until this moment, I never thought that it was bad to want fortune.

Mar. And why now, my pretty simplicity?

Miss H. Because it puts me at a distance from one that if I had a thousand pounds I would give it all to.

Mar. This simplicity bewitches me, so that if I stay I am undone, I must make one bold effort, and leave her. [Aside.] Excuse me, my lovely girl, you are the only part of the family I leave with reluctance. But, to be plain with you, the difference of our birth, fortune, and education, makes an honourable connexion impossible; and I can never harbour a thought of seducing simplicity that trusted in my honour; or of bringing ruin upon one, whose only fault was being too lovely. [Exit.]

Miss H. I never knew half his merit till now. He shall not go, if I have power or art to detain him. I'll still preserve the character in which I stooped to conquer, but I will undeceive my papa, who perhaps may laugh him out of his resolution. [Exit.]

Enter TONY and Miss NEVILLE.

Tony. Ay, you may steal for yourselves the next time; I have done my duty. She has got the jewels again, that's a sure thing; but, she believes it was all a mistake of the servants.

Miss N. But, my dear cousin, sure you won't forsake us in this distress. If she in the least suspects that I am going off, I shall certainly be locked up, or sent to my aunt Pedigree's, which is ten times worse.

Tony. To be sure, aunts of all kinds are d—d bad things. But what can I do? I have got you a pair of horses that will fly like Whistlejacket, and I'm sure you can't say but I have courted you nicely before her face. Here she comes; we must court a bit or two more, for fear she should suspect us.

[They retire, and seem to fondle.]

Enter Mrs. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. Well, I was greatly fluttered, to be sure; but my son tells me it was all a mistake of the servants. I sha'n't be easy, however, till they are fairly married, and then let her keep her own fortune. But what do I see? Fondling together, as I am alive. I never saw Tony so sprightly before. Ha! have I caught you, my pretty doves! What, billing, exchanging stolen glances, and broken murmurs? Ha!

Tony. As for murmurs, mother, we grumble a little now and then, to be sure; but there's no love lost between us.

Mrs. H. A mere sprinkling, Tony, upon the flame, only to make it burn brighter.

Miss N. Cousin Tony promises to give us more of his company at home; indeed, he sha'n't leave us any more. It won't leave us, cousin Tony, will it?

Tony. Oh! it's a pretty creature. No, I'd sooner leave my horse in a pond, than leave you when you smile upon one so. Your laugh makes you so becoming.

Miss N. Agreeable cousin! who can help admiring that natural humour, that pleasant, broad, red, thoughtless—[Patting his cheek.]—Ha! it's a bold face.

Mrs. H. Pretty innocence!

Tony. I'm sure I always lov'd cousin Con's hazel eyes, and her pretty long fingers, that she twists this way and that over the harpsicholls, like a parcel of bobbins.

Mrs. H. Ah! he would charm the bird from the tree. I never was so happy before. My boy takes after his father, poor Mr. Lumpkin, exactly. The jewels, my dear Con, shall be your's incontinently. You shall have them. Isn't he a sweet boy, my dear? You shall be married to-morrow, and we'll put off the rest of his education, like Dr. Drowsy's sermons, to a fitter opportunity.

Enter DIGGORY.

Dig. Where's the 'squire? I have got a letter for your worship.

Tony. Give it to my mamma. She reads all my letters first.

Dig. I had orders to deliver it into your own hands.

Tony. Who does it come from?

Dig. Your worship mun ask that o'the letter itself.

Tony. I could wish to know, though. [Turning the letter, and gazing on it.]

Miss N. [Aside.] Undone, undone! A letter to him from Hastings. I know the hand. If my aunt sees it, we are ruined for ever. I'll keep her employed a little, if I can.—[To Mrs. HARDCASTLE.]—But I have not told you, madam, of my cousin's smart answer just now to Mr. Marlow. We so laugh'd. You must know, madam—this way a little, for he must not hear us. [They confer.]

Tony. [Still gazing.] A d—d cramp piece of penmanship as ever I saw in my life. I can read your print-hand very well; but here they're such handles, and shanks, and dashes, that one can scarce tell the head from the tail. "To Anthony Lumpkin, Esq."—It's very odd, I can read the outside of my letters, where my own name is, well enough; but when I come to open it, it is all—buzz. That's hard, very hard; for the inside of the letter is always the cream of the correspondence.

Mrs. H. Ha, ha, ha! Very well, very well. And so my son was too hard for the philosopher?

Miss N. Yes, madam; but you must hear the rest, madam. A little more this way, or he may hear us. You'll hear how he puzzled him again.

Mrs. H. He seems strangely puzzled now himself, methinks.

Tony. [Still gazing.] A d—d up and down hand, as if disguised in liquor.—[Reading.] "Dear sir," Ay, that's that. Then there's an M, and a T, and an S; but whether the next be an izzard or an R, confound me! I cannot tell.

Mrs. H. What's that, my dear? Can I give you any assistance?

Miss N. Pray, aunt, let me read it. Nobody reads a cramp hand better than I. [Twisting the letter from her.] Do you know who it is from?

Tony. Can't tell, except from Dick Ginger, the feeder.

Miss N. Ay, so it is. [Pretending to read.] "Dear 'squire, hoping that you're in health, as I am at present. The gentlemen of the Shake-bag club has cut the gentlemen of the Goose-green quite out of feather. The odds—um—odd battle—um—long fighting—um"—here, here; it's all about cocks, and fighting; it's of no consequence; here, put it up, put it up. [Thrusting the crumpled letter upon him.]

Tony. But I tell you, miss, it's of all the consequence in the world; I would not lose the rest of it for a guinea. Here, mother, do you make it out. Of no consequence! [Giving Mrs. H. the letter.]

Mrs. H. How's this? [Reads.] "Dear 'squire,—I am now waiting for Miss Neville, with a post-chaise and pair, at the bottom of the garden; but I find my horses yet unable to perform the journey. I expect you'll assist us with a pair of fresh horses, as you promised. Despatch is necessary, as the hag, (ay, the hag), your mother, will otherwise suspect us.—Yours, Hastings."—Grant me patience! I shall run distracted! My rage chokes me.

Miss N. I hope you'll suspend your resentment for a few moments, and not impute to me any impertinence, or sinister design that belongs to another.

Mrs. H. [Curtseying very low.] Fine spoken madam, you are most miraculously polite and engaging, and quite the very pink of courtesy and circumspection, madam. [Changing her tone.] And you, your great ill-fashioned oaf, with scarce sense enough to keep your mouth shut, were you, too, joined against me? But I'll defeat all your plots in a moment. As for you, madam, since you have got a pair of fresh horses ready, it would be cruel to disappoint them. So, if you please, instead of running away with your spark, prepare, this very moment, to run off with me. Your old aunt Pedigree, will keep you secure, I'll warrant me. You too, sir, may mount your horse, and guard us upon the way. Here, Thomas, Roger, Diggory! I'll show you, that I wish you better than you do yourselves. [Exit.]

Miss N. So, now I'm completely ruined.

Tony. Ay, that's a sure thing.

Miss N. What better could be expected from being connected with such a stupid fool, and after all the nods and signs I made him?

Tony. By the laws! miss, it was your own cleverness, and not my stupidity, that did your business. You were so nice and so busy with your Shakebags and Goose-greens, that I thought you could never be making believe.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. So, sir, I find, by my servant, that you have shewn my letter, and betrayed us. Was this well done, young gentleman?

Tony. Here's another! Ask miss there who betrayed you. Ecod! it was her own doing, not mine.

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. So, I have been finely used here among you.

Rendered contemptible, driven into ill-manners, despised, insulted, laughed at.

Tony. Here's another! We shall have old Bedlam broke loose presently.

Miss N. And there, sir, is the gentleman to whom we all owe every obligation.

Mar. What can I say to him, a mere boy, an idiot, whose ignorance and youth are a protection?

Hast. A poor contemptible booby, that would but disgrace correction.

Miss N. Yet, with cunning and malice enough to make himself merry with all our embarrassments.

Hast. An insensible cub!

Mar. Replete with tricks and mischief.

Tony. Baw! [Starts up.] D—e! but I'll fight you both, one after the other—with baskets.

Mar. As for him, he's below resentment. But your conduct, Mr. Hastings, requires an explanation. You knew of my mistakes, yet would not undeceive me.

Hast. Tortured as I am with my own disappointments, is this a time for explanations? It is not friendly, Mr. Marlow.

Mar. But, sir—

Miss N. Mr. Marlow, we never kept on your mistake till it was too late to undeceive you. Be pacified.

Enter DIGGORY.

Dig. My mistress desires you'll get ready immediately, madam. The horses are putting to; your hat and things are in the next room. We are to go thirty miles before morning. [Exit.]

Miss N. I come. Oh! Mr. Marlow, if you knew what a scene of constraint and ill-nature lies before me, I'm sure it would convert your resentment into pity.

Mrs. H. [Within.] Miss Neville! Constance! why, Constance, I say!

Miss N. I'm coming. Well, constancy; remember, constancy is the word. [Exit.]

Hast. My heart, how can I support this? To be so near happiness, and such happiness!

Mar. [To TONY.] You see now, young gentleman, the effects of your folly. What might be amusement to you, is here disappointment, and even distress.

Tony. [From a reverie.] Ecod! I have hit it; it's here. Your hands; your's, and your's, my poor Sulky. Meet me, two hours hence, at the bottom of the garden; and if you don't find Tony Lumpkin, a more good-natured fellow than you thought for, I'll give you leave to take my best horse, and Bet Bouncer into the bargain. Come along. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An old-fashioned House.

Enter Sir CHARLES MARLOW and HARDCASTLE.

Hard. Ha, ha, ha! The peremptory tone in which he sent forth his sublime commands.

Sir C. And the reserve with which, I suppose, he treated all your advances.

Hard. And yet, he might have seen something in me above a common innkeeper, too.

Sir C. Yes, Dick, but he mistook you for an uncommon innkeeper. Ha, ha, ha!

Hard. Well, I'm in too good spirits to think of anything but joy. Yes, my dear friend, this union of our families will make our personal friendships hereditary; and though my daughter's fortune is but small—

Sir C. Why, Dick, will you talk of fortune to me? My son is possessed of more than a competence already, and can want nothing but a good and virtuous girl to share his happiness, and increase it. If they like each other, as you say they do—

Hard. If, man! I tell you they do like each other; my daughter as good as told me so.

Sir C. But girls are apt to flatter themselves, you know.

Hard. I saw him grasp her hand in the warmest manner myself; and here he comes to put you out of your ifs, I warrant him.

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. I come, sir, once more to ask pardon for my strange conduct. I can scarce reflect on my insolence without confusion.

Harn. Tut! boy, a trifle; you take it too gravely. An hour or two's laughing with my daughter will set all to rights again. She'll never like you the worse for it.

Mar. Sir, I shall be always proud of her approbation.

Hard. Approbation is but a cold word, Mr. Marlow; if I am not deceived, you have something more than approbation thereabouts. You take me?

Mar. Really, sir, I have not that happiness.

Hard. Come, boy, I'm am an old fellow and know what's what, as well as you that are younger. I know what has passed between you; but, mum!

Mar. Sure, sir, nothing has passed between us but the most profound respect on my side, and the most distant reserve on her's. You don't think, sir, that my impudence has been passed upon all the rest of the family.

Hard. Impudence! No, I don't say that—not quite impudence. Girls like to be played with, and rumbled too, sometimes. But she has told no tales, I assure you.

Mar. May I die, sir, if I ever—

Hard. I tell you, she don't dislike you; and as I'm sure you like her—

Mar. Dear sir, I protest, sir—

Hard. I see no reason why you should not be joined as fast as the parson can tie you.

Mar. But why won't you hear me? By all that's just and true, I never gave Miss Hardcastle the slightest mark of my attachment, or even the most distant hint to suspect me of affection. We had but one interview, and that was formal, modest, and uninteresting.

Hard. This fellow's formal, modest impudence is beyond bearing. [Aside.]

Sir C. And you never grasped her hand, or made any protestations?

Mar. As heaven is my witness, I came down in obedience to your commands. I saw the lady without emotion, and parted without reluctance. I hope you'll exact no further proofs of my duty, nor prevent me from leaving a house in which I suffer so many mortifications. [Exit.]

Sir C. I'm astonished at the air of sincerity with which he parted.

Hard. And I'm astonished at the deliberate intrepidity of his assurance.

Sir C. I dare pledge my life and honour upon his truth.

Hard. Here comes my daughter, and I would stake my happiness upon her veracity.

Enter Miss HARDCASTLE.

Kate, come hither, child. Answer us sincerely, and without reserve. Has Mr. Marlow made you any professions of love and affection?

Miss H. The question is very abrupt, sir; but since you require unreserved sincerity, I think he has.

Hard. [To Sir C.] You see.

Sir C. And pray, madam, have you and my son had more than one interview?

Miss H. Yes, sir; several.

Hard. [To Sir C.] You see.

Sir C. But did he profess any attachment?

Miss H. A lasting one,

Sir C. Did he talk of love?

Miss H. Much, sir.

Sir C. Amazing! and all this formally?

Miss H. Formally.

Hard. Now, my friend, I hope you are satisfied.

Sir C. And how did he behave, madam?

Miss H. As most professed admirers do. Said some civil things of my face, talked much of his want of merit, and the greatness of mine; mentioned his heart, gave a short tragedy speech, and ended with pretended rapture.

Sir C. Now I'm perfectly convinced; indeed, I know his conversation among women to be modest and submissive. This forward, conting, ranting manner, by no means describes him, and I'm confident he never sat for the picture.

Miss H. Then, what, sir, if I should convince you to your face of my sincerity? If you and my papa, in about half an hour, will place yourselves behind that screen, you shall hear him declare his passion to me in person.

Sir C. Agreed; and if I find him what you describe, all my happiness in him must have an end.

[Exit with HARD.]

Miss H. And if you don't find him what I describe, I fear my happiness must never have a beginning.

SCENE II.—The Back of the Garden.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. What an idiot am I, to wait here for a fellow, who probably takes a delight in mortifying me. He never intended to be punctual, and I'll wait no longer. What do I see? It is he, and perhaps, with news of my Constance.

Enter TONY, booted, &c.

My honest 'squire! I now find you a man of your word. This looks like friendship.

Tony. Ay, I'm your friend, and the best friend you have in the world, if you knew but all. This riding by night, by-the-by, is curiously tiresome. It has shook me worse than the basket of a stage coach.

Hast. But how? where did you leave your fellow-travellers? Are they in safety? Are they housed?

Tony. Five-and-twenty miles in two hours and a half is no such bad driving. The poor beasts have smoked for it. Rabbit me! but I'd rather ride forty miles after a fox, than ten with such varment.

Hast. Well, but where have you left the ladies? I die with impatience.

Tony. Left them! why, where should I leave them, but where I found them?

Hast. This is a riddle.

Tony. Riddle me this, then. What's that goes round the house, and round the house, and never touches the house?

Hast. I'm still astray.

Tony. Why, that's it, mun, I have led them astray. By jingo! there's not a pond or slough within five miles of the place, but they can tell the taste of.

Hast. Ha, ha, ha! I understand; you took them in a round, while they thought themselves going forward. And so you have at last brought them home again.

Tony. You shall hear. I first took them down Feather-bed-lane, where we stuck fast in the mud. I then rattled them crack over the stones, up-and-down hill. I then introduced them to the gibbet on Heavy-tree-heath; and from that, with a circum-bendibus, I fairly lodged them in the horse-pond at the bottom of the garden.

Hast. But no accident, I hope?

Tony. No, no; only mother is confoundedly frightened. She thinks herself forty miles off. She's sick of the journey, and the cattle can scarce crawl. So if your own horses be ready, you may whip off with cousin, and I'll be bound that no soul here can budge a foot to follow you.

Hast. My dear friend, how can I be grateful?

Tony. Ay, now it's a dear friend, noble 'squire. Just now it was all idiot, cub, and run me through the guts. D—n your way of fighting, I say! After we take a knock, in this part of the country, we shake hands and be friends. But if you had run me through the guts, then I should be dead, and you might go shake hands with the hangman.

Hast. The rebuke is just. But I must hasten to relieve Miss Neville; if you keep the old lady employed, I promise to take care of the young one.

[Exit.]

Tony. Never fear me. Here she comes. Vanish! She's got into the pond, and is dragged up to the waist like a mermaid.

Enter Mrs. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. Oh! Tony, I'm kill'd! shook! battered to death! I shall never survive it. That last jolt against the quick-set hedge has done my business.

Tony. Alack! mamma, it was all your own fault. You would be for running away by night, without knowing one inch of the way.

Mrs. H. I wish we were at home again. I never met so many accidents in so short a journey. Drench'd in the mud, overturned in a ditch, stuck fast in a slough, jolted to a jelly, and at last to lose our way! Whereabouts do you think we are, Tony?

Tony. By my guess, we should be upon Crack-skull common, about forty miles from home.

Mrs. H. Oh, lud! oh, lud! the most notorious spot in all the country. We only want a robbery to make a complete night on't.

Tony. Don't be afraid, mamma, don't be afraid. Two of the five that kept here are hanged, and the other three may not find us. Don't be afraid. Is that a man galloping behind us? No; it's only a tree. Don't be afraid.

Mrs. H. The fright will certainly kill me.

Tony. Do you see any thing like a black hat moving behind the thicket?

Mrs. H. Oh, death!

Tony. No, it's only a cow. Don't be afraid, mamma; don't be afraid.

Mrs. H. As I'm alive, Tony, I see a man coming towards us. Ah! I'm sure on't. If he perceives us, we are undone.

Tony. Father-in-law, by all that's unlucky! come to take one of his night-walks. (Aside.) Ah! it's a highwayman with pistols as long as my arm. A d—d ill-looking fellow!

Miss H. Good heaven defend us! he approaches.

Tony. Do you hide yourself in that thicket, and leave me to manage him. If there be any danger I'll cough and cry hem. When I cough be sure to keep close. (Miss H. hides behind a tree in the back scene.)

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. I'm mistaken, or I heard voices of people in want of help. Oh! Tony, is that you? I did not expect you so soon back. Are your mother and her charge in safety?

Tony. Very safe, sir, at my aunt Pedigree's. Hem!

Miss H. (From behind.) Ah, death! I find there's danger.

Hard. Forty miles in three hours! sure, that's too much, my youngster.

Tony. Stout horses and willing minds make short journeys as they say. Hem!

Miss H. (From behind.) Sure, he'll do the dear boy no harm.

Hard. But I heard a voice here; I should be glad to know from whence it came.

Tony. It was I, sir, talking to myself, sir. I was saying, that forty miles in three hours was very good going. Hem! As to be sure it was. Hem! I have got a sort of cold by being out in the air. We'll go in, if you please. Hem!

Hard. But if you talked to yourself, you did not answer yourself. I am certain I heard two voices, and am resolved (raising his voice.) to find the other out.

Miss H. [Rushing forward.] Oh, lud; he'll murder my poor boy—my darling. Hete, good gentleman, whe your rage upon me. Take my money—my life, but spare that young gentleman; spare my child, if you have any mercy.

Harn. My wife, as I'm a Christian! From whence can she come? or what does she mean?

Miss H. [Kneeling.] Take compassion on us, good Mr. Highwayman. Take our money, our watches—all we have, but spare our lives. We will never bring you to justice; indeed, we won't good Mr. Highwayman.

Hard. I believe the woman's out of her senses. What, Dorothy, don't you know me?

Miss H. Mr. Hardcastle, as I'm alive! My fears blinded me. But who, my dear, could have expected to meet you here, in this frightful place, so far from home? What has brought you to follow us?

Hard. Sure, Dorothy, you have not lost your wits. So far from home, when you are within forty yards of your own door. [To Tony.] This is one of your old tricks, you graceless rogue, you! [To Miss H.] Don't you know the gate, and the mulberry-tree? and don't you remember the horse-pond, my dear?

Miss H. Yes, I shall remember the horse-pond as long as I live; I have caught my death in it. [To Tony.] And is it to you, you graceless varlet, I owe all this? I'll teach you to abuse your mother, I will.

Tony. Ecod! mother, all the parish say you have spoiled me, and so you may take the fruits on't.

Miss H. I'll spoil you, I will. (Beats him off.)

Hard. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Parlour.

Enter SIR CHARLES MARLOW, and MISS HARDCASTLE.

Sir C. What a situation am I in! If what you say appears, I shall then find a guilty son. If what he says be true, I shall then lose one that, of all others, I most wished for a daughter.

Miss H. I am proud of your approbation, and to shew I merit it, if you place yourselves as I directed, you shall hear his explicit declaration. But he comes.

Sir C. I'll to your father, and keep him to the appointment [Exit.]

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. Though prepared for setting out, I come once more to take leave; nor did I, till this moment, know the pain I feel in the separation.

Miss H. (In her own natural manner.) I believe these sufferings cannot be very great, sir, which you can so easily remove. A day or two longer, perhaps, might lessen your uneasiness, by shewing the little value of what you now think proper to regret.

Mar. This girl every moment improves upon me. (Aside.) It must not be, madam. I have already trifled too long with my heart, and nothing can restore me to myself, but this painful effort of resolution.

Miss H. Then go, sir; I'll urge nothing more to detain you. Though my family be as good as her's you came down to visit, and my education, I hope, not inferior, what are these advantages without equal affluence? I must remain contented with the slight approbation of imputed merit; I must have only the mockery of your addresses, while all your serious aims are fixed on fortune.

Enter HARDCASTLE and SIR CHARLES MARLOW from behind.

Mar. By heaven, madam, fortune was ever my smallest consideration. You beauty first caught my eye; for who could see that without emotion? But every moment that I converse with you, steals in some new grace, heightens the picture, and gives it stronger expression. What, at first, seemed rustic plainness, now appears refined simplicity. What seemed forward assurance, now strikes me as the result of courageous innocence, and conscious virtue. I'm now determined to stay, madam, and I have too good an opinion of my father's discernment, when he sees you, to deny his approbation.

Miss H. Sir, I must entreat you'll desist. As our acquaintance began, so let it end, in indifference. I might have given an hour or two to levity, but, seriously, Mr. Marlow, do you think I could ever submit to a connexion where I must appear mercenary, and you imprudent? Do you think I could ever catch at the confident address of a secure admirer?

Mar. (Kneeling.) Does this look like security? Does this look like confidence? No, madam; every moment that shews me your merit, only serves to increase my diffidence and confusion. Here let me continue—

Sir C. I can hold it no longer. (Coming forward.) Charles, Charles, how hast thou deceived me! Is this your indifference—your uninteresting conversation?

Hard. Your cold contempt—your formal interview? What have you to say now?

Mar. That I'm all amazement! What can it mean?

Hard. It means that you can say and unsay things at pleasure; that you can address a lady in private, and deny it in public; that you have one story for us, and another for my daughter

Mar. Daughter? this lady your daughter!

Hard. Yes, sir; my only daughter—my Kate. Whose else should she be?

Mar. Oh! the devil!

Miss H. Yes, sir; that very identical tall, squinting lady you were pleased to take me for. (Curt-sewing.) She that you addressed as the mild, modest, sentimental man of gravity; and the bold, forward, agreeable Rattle of the ladies' club. Ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Zounds! there's no bearing this.

Miss H. In which of your characters, sir, will you give us leave to address you? As the faltering gentleman, with looks on the ground, that speaks just to be heard, and hates hypocrisy; or the loud, confident creature, that keeps it up with Mrs Mantrap, and old Miss Biddy Buckskin, till three in the morning. Ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Oh! curse on my noisy head; I never attempted to be impudent yet, that I was not taken down. I must be gone.

Hard. By the hand of my body, but you shall not. I see it was all a mistake, and I am rejoiced to find it. You shall not, sir, I tell you. I know she'll forgive you. Won't you forgive him, Kate? We'll all forgive you. Take courage, man. (They retire, she tormenting him, to the back scene.)

Enter MRS. HARDCASTLE and TONY.

Mrs. H. So, so, they're gone off. Let them go, I care not.

Hard. Who's gone?

Mrs. H. My dutiful niece and her gentleman, Mr. Hastings, from town; he who came down with our modest visitor here.

Sir C. Who, my honest George Hastings; As worthy a fellow as lives, and the girl could not have made a more prudent choice.

Hard. Then, by the hand of my body, I'm proud of the connexion.

Enter HASTINGS and MISS NEVILLE.

Mrs. H. What, returned so soon! I begin not to like it. (Aside.)

Hast. (To Hardcastle.) For my late attempt to fly off with your niece, let my present confusion be my punishment. We are now come back, to appeal from your justice to your humanity. By her father's consent I first paid her my addresses, and our passions were first founded in duty.

Miss N. Since his death, I have been obliged to stoop to dissimulation to avoid oppression. In an hour of levity, I was ready to give up my fortune to secure my choice. But I'm now recovered from the delusion, and hope from your tenderness what is denied me from a nearer connexion.

Hard. Be it what it will, I'm glad they are come back to reclaim their due. Come hither, Tony, boy. Do you refuse this lady's hand which I now offer you?

Tony. What signifies my refusing? You know I can't refuse her till I'm of age, father.

Hard. While I thought concealing your age, boy, was likely to conduce to your improvement, I concurred with your mother's desire to keep it secret. But since I find she turns it to a wrong use, I must now declare you have been of age these three months.

Tony. Of age! Am I of age father?

Hard. Above three months.

Tony. Then you'll see the first use I'll make of my liberty. (Taking Miss Nevill's hand.) Witness all men by these presents, that I, Anthony Lumpkin, esquire, of Blank-place, refuse you, Constantia Neville, spinster, of no place at all, for my true and lawful wife. So Constantia Neville may marry whom she pleases, and Tony Lumpkin is his own man again.

Sir C. Oh! brave 'squire!

Hast. My worthy friend!

Mrs. H. My undutiful offspring! (Beats Tony off.)

Mar. Joy, my dear George; I give you joy sincerely; and, could I prevail upon my little tyrant here to be less arbitrary, I should be the happiest man alive, if you would return me the favour.

Hast. (To Miss Hardcastle.) Come, madam, you are now driven to the very last scene of all your contrivances. I know you like him, I'm sure he loves you, and you must and shall have him.

Hard. (Joining their hands.) And I say so, too. And, Mr. Marlow, if she makes as good a wife as she has a daughter, I don't believe you'll ever repent your bargain. So now to supper. To-morrow we shall gather all the poor of the parish about us, and the mistakes of the night shall be crowned with a merry morning; so, boy, take her; and, as you have been mistaken in the mistress, my wish is, that you may never be mistaken in the wife. [Exeunt.]

THE END.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Tower.

Enter the DUKE of GLO'STER, SIR RICHARD RATCLIFFE, and CATESBY.

Glos. Thus far success attends upon our councils,
And each event has answered to my wish;
The queen and all her upstart race are quell'd;
Dorset is banish'd, and her brother Rivers,
Ere this, lies shorter by the head at Pomfret.
The nobles have, with joint concurrence, nam'd me
Protector of the realm: my brother's children,
Young Edward and the little York, are lodg'd
Here safe within the Tower. How say you, sirs,
Does not this business wear a lucky face?
The sceptre and the golden wreath of royalty
Seen hung within my reach.

Sir R. Then take 'em to you,
And wear them long and worthily: you are
The last remaining male of princely York;
(For Edward's boys, the state esteems not of 'em,)
And therefore on your sov'reignty and rule
The commonweal does her dependance make,
And leans upon your highness' able hand.

Cates. And yet to-morrow does the council meet
To fix a day for Edward's coronation.
Who can expound this riddle?

Glos. That can I.
Those lords are each one my approv'd good friends,
Of special trust and nearness to my bosom:
And howsoever busy they may seem,
And diligent to bustle in the state,
Their zeal goes on no further than we lead,
And at our bidding stays.

Cates. Yet there is one,
And he amongst the foremost in his power

Of whom I wish your highness were assur'd.
For me, perhaps it is my nature's fault,
I own I doubt of his inclining much.

Glos. I guess the man at whom your words would point:

Hastings—

Cates. The same.

Glos. He bears me great good will.

Cates. 'Tis true, to you, as to the lord protector,
And Glo'ster's duke, he bows with lowly service:
But were he bid to cry, God save king Richard,
Then tell me in what terms he would reply.
Believe me, I have prov'd the man, and found him:
I know he bears a most religious reverence
To his dead master Edward's royal memory.
And whither that may lead him, is most plain.
Yet more—One of that stubborn sort he is,
Who, if they once grow fond of an opinion,
They call it honour, honesty, and faith,
And sooner part with life than let it go.

Glos. And yet this tough, impracticable heart;
Is govern'd by a dainty-finger'd girl;
Such flaws are found in the most worthy natures;
A laughing, toying, wheedling, whimpering she Shall make him amble on a gossip's message,
And take the distaff with a hand as patient
As e'er did Hercules.

Sir R. The fair Alicia,

Of noble birth and exquisite of feature,
Has held him long a vassal to her beauty.

Cates. I fear he fails in his allegiance there;
Or my intelligence is false, or else
The dame has been too lavish of her feast,
And fed him till he loathes.

Glos. No more, he comes.

[Sir Richard and Catesby retire back and confer

Enter Lord HASTINGS.

Has. Health, and the happiness of many days,
Attend upon your grace.

Glos. My good Lord Chamberlain,
We're much beholden to your gentle friendship.

Has. My lord, I come an humble suitor to you.

Glos. In right good time. Speak out your pleasure freely.

Has. I am to move your highness in behalf
Of Shore's unhappy wife.

Glos. Say you, of Shore?

[high :

Has. Once a bright star, that held her place on
The first and fairest of our English dames,
While Royal Edward held the sov'reign rule.
Now sunk in grief and pining with despair,
Her waning form no longer shall incite
Envy in woman, or desire in man.

She never sees the sun, but through her tears,
And wakes to sigh the live-long night away.

Glos. Marry! the times are badly chang'd with her,
From Edward's days to these Then all was jollity,
Feasting and mirth, light wantonness and laughter,
Piping and playing, minstrelsy and masking;
'Till life fled from us like an idle dream,
A show of mummery without a meaning.
My brother, rest and pardon to his soul,
Is gone to his account; for this his minion,
The revel-rout is done—But you were speaking
Concerning her—I have been told, that you
Are frequent in your visitation to her.

Has. No further, my good lord, than friendly pity,
And tender-hearted charity allow.

Glos. Go to: I did not mean to chide you for it;
For, sooth to say, I hold it noble in you
To cherish the distress'd—On with your tale.

Has. Thus it is, gracious sir, that certain officers,
Using the warrant of your mighty name,
With insolence unjust, and lawless power,
Have seiz'd upon the lands, which late she held
By grant, from her great master Edward's bounty.

Glos. Somewhat of this, but slightly, have I heard;
And though some counsellors of forward zeal,
Some of most ceremonious sanctity,
And bearded wisdom, often have provok'd
The hand of justice to fall heavy on her;
Yet still, in kind compassion of her weakness,
And tender memory of Edward's love,
I have withheld the merciless stern law
From doing outrage on her helpless beauty. [mercy,

Has. Good heav'n, who renders mercy back for
With open-handed bounty shall repay you:
This gentle deed shall fairly be set foremost,
To screen the wild escapes of lawless passion
And the long train of frailties flesh is heir to.

Glos. Thus far, the voice of pity pleaded only:
Our further and more full extent of grace
Is given to your request. Let her attend,
And to ourself deliver up her griefs.
She shall be heard with patience, and each wrong
At full redress'd. But I have other news,
Which much import us both; for still my fortunes
Go hand in hand with yours: our common foes,
The queen's relations, our new-fangled gentry,
Have fall'n their haughty crests—that for your privacy. [Exeunt Glo'ster and Hastings.

SCENE II.—An Apartment in Jane Shore's House.

Enter BELMOUR and DUMONT

Bel. How she has lived you have heard my tale already;

The rest your own attendance in her family,
Where I have found the means this day to place you,
And nearer observation, best will tell you.
See with what sad and sober cheer she comes.

Enter JANE SHORE, DUMONT retires up.

Sure, or I read her visage much amiss,
Or grief besets her hard. Save you, fair lady,
The blessings of the cheerful morn be on you,
And greet your beauty with its opening sweets.

Jane S. My gentle neighbour! your good wishes still

Pursue my hapless fortunes; ah! good Belmour!
How few, like thee, inquire the wretched out,
And court the offices of soft humanity,
Like thee reserve their raiment for the naked,
Reach out their bread to feed the crying orphan,
Or mix their pitying tears with those that weep.
Thy praise deserves a better tongue than mine,

To speak and bless thy name. Is this the gentleman
Whose friendly service you commended to me?

Bel. Madam, it is!

Jane S. [Aside.] A venerable aspect!
Age sits with decent grace upon his visage,
And worthily becomes his silver locks;
He wears the marks of many years well spent,
Of virtue, truth well tried, and wise experience;
A friend like this would suit my sorrows well.

[Crosses to Dumont.

Fortune, I fear me, sir, has meant you ill,
Who pays your merit with that scanty pittance,
Which my poor hand and humble roof can give.

But to supply those golden vantages,
Which elsewhere you might find, expect to meet
A just regard and value for your worth,
The welcome of a friend, and the free partnership
Of all that little good the world allows me.

Dum. You over-rate me much; and all my answer
Must be my future truth; let that speak for me,
And make up my deserving.

Jane S. Are you of England?

Dum. No, gracious lady, Flanders claims my birth:
At Antwerp has my constant biding been,
Where sometimes I have known more plenteous days
Than these which now my failing age affords.

Jane S. Alas! at Antwerp! O forgive my tears!
[Weeping.

They fall for my offences—and must fall
Long, long ere they shall wash my stains away.
You knew perhaps—O grief! O shame!—my husband. [anguish.

Dum. I knew him well—but stay this flood of
The senseless grave feels not your pious sorrows;
Three years and more are past, since I was bid,
With many of our common friends, to wait him
To his last peaceful mansion. I attended,
Sprinkled his clay-cold corse with holy drops,
According to our church's rev'rend rite,
And saw him laid in hallow'd ground, to rest.

Jane S. Oh, that my soul had known no joy but
him!

That I had liv'd within his guiltless arms,
And dying slept in innocence beside him!
But now his honest dust abhors the fellowship,
And scorns to mix with mine.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. The lady Alicia
Attends your leisure.

Jane S. Say I wish to see her. [Exit Servant.
Please, gentle sir, one moment to retire,
I'll wait you on the instant, and inform you
Of each unhappy circumstance, in which
Your friendly aid and counsel much may steady me.

[Reeunt BELMOUR and DUMONT.

Enter ALICIA.

Alic. Still, my fair friend, still shall I find you
thus?

Still shall these sighs heave after one another,
These trickling drops chase one another still,
As if the posting messengers of grief
Could overtake the hours fled far away,
And make old time come back?

Jane S. No, my Alicia,
Heaven and his saints be witness to my thoughts,
There is no hour of all my life o'er past
That I could wish should take its turn again.

Alic. And yet some of those days my friend has known;

Some of those years, might pass for golden ones,
At least if womankind can judge of happiness.
What could we wish, we who delight in empire,

Whose beauty is our sov'reign good, and gives us,
Our reasons to rebel, and pow'r to reign,
What could we more than to behold a monarch,
Lovely, renown'd, a conqueror, and young,
Bound in our chains, and sighing at our feet!

Jane S. 'Tis true, the royal Edward was a wonder,
The goodly pride of all our English youth;
He was the very joy of all that saw him,
Form'd to delight, to love, and to persuade.
But what had I to do with kings and courts?
My humble lot had cast me far beneath him;
And that he was the first of all mankind,
The bravest, and most lovely, was my curse.

Alic. Sure something more than fortune join'd your loves:

Nor could his greatness, and his gracious form,
Be elsewhere match'd so well, as to the sweetness
And beauty of my friend.

Jane S. Name him no more:

He was the bane and ruin of my peace.
This anguish, and these tears, these are the legacies
His fatal love has left me. Thou wilt see me,
Believe me, my Alicia, thou wilt see me,
Ere yet a few short days pass o'er my head,
Abandon'd to the very utmost wretchedness.
The hand of pow'r has seiz'd almost the whole
Of what was left for needy life's support;
Shortly thou wilt behold me poor, and kneeling
Before thy charitable door for bread.

Alic. [Takes her hand.] Joy of my life, my dearest
Shore, forbear

To wound my heart with thy foreboding sorrows:
Raise thy sad soul to better hopes than these,
Lift up thy eyes, and let them shine once more,
Bright as the morning sun above the mist.
Exert thy charms, seek out the stern Protector,
And sooth his savage temper with thy beauty;
Spite of his deadly, unrelenting nature,
He shall be mov'd to pity, and redress thee.

Jane S. My form, alas! has long forgot to please!
The scene of beauty and delight is chang'd;
No roses bloom upon my fading cheek,
Nor laughing graces wanton in my eyes;
But haggard grief, lean-looking, sallow care,
And pining discontent, a rueful train,
Dwell on my brow, all hideous and forlorn;
One only shadow of a hope is left me;
The noble minded Hastings, of his goodness,
Has kindly underta'en to be my advocate,
And move my humble suit to angry Glo'ster.

Alic. Does Hastings undertake to plead your cause?
But wherefore should he not? Hastings has eyes;
The gentle lord has a right tender heart,
Melting and easy, yielding to impression,
And catching the soft flame from each new beauty;
But yours shall charm him long.

Jane S. [Turning.] Away, you flatterer!
Nor charge his gen'rous meaning with a weakness,
Which his great soul and virtue must disdain.
Too much of love thy hapless friend has prov'd,
Too many giddy, foolish hours are gone,
And in fantastic measures dang'd away:
May the remaining few know only friendship,
So thou, my dearest, truest, best Alicia,
Vouchsafe to lodge me in thy gentle heart,
A partner there; I will give up mankind,
Forget the transports of increasing passion,
And all the pangs we feel for its decay.

Alic. Live! live and reign for ever in my bosom:

[Embracing.

Safe and unrivall'd there possess thy own;
And you, the brightest of the stars above, [Kneels.

Ye saints that once were women here below,
Be witness of the truth, the holy friendship,
Which here to this my other self I vow.
If I do not hold her nearer to my soul,
Than every other joy the world can give,
Let poverty, deformity, and shame,
Distraction, and despair seize me on earth,
Let not my faithless ghost have peace hereafter,
Nor taste the bliss of your celestial fellowship.

[Rises.

Jane S. Yes, thou art true, and only thou art true;
Therefore these jewels, once the lavish bounty
Of royal Edward's love, I trust to thee;

[Gives a casket.

Receive this, all that I can call my own.
And let it rest unknown, and safe with thee:
That if the state's injustice should oppress me,
Strip me of all, and turn me out a wanderer,
My wretchedness may find relief from thee,
And shelter from the storm.

Alic. My all is thine;
One common hazard shall attend us both,
And both be fortunate, or both be wretched.
But let thy fearful doubting heart be still;
The saints and angels have thee in their charge,
And all things shall be well. Think not, the good,
The gentle deeds of mercy thou hast done,
Shall die forgotten all; the poor, the pris'ner,
The fatherless, the friendless, and the widow,
Who daily own the bounty of thy hand,
Shall cry to heaven, and pull a blessing on thee.

Ev'n man, the merciless insulter man,
Man, who rejoices in our sex's weakness,
Shall pity thee, and with unwonted goodness,
Forget thy failings, and record thy praise. [me,

Jane S. Why should I think that man will do for What yet he never did for wretches like me?
Mark by what partial justice we are judg'd;
Such is the fate unhappy women find,
And such the curse entail'd upon our kind,
That man, the lawless libertine, may rove,
Free and unquestion'd, through the wilds of love;
While woman, sense and nature's easy fool,
If poor, weak woman swerve from virtue's rule—
If strongly charm'd, she leave the thorny way,
And in the softer paths of pleasures stray;
Ruin ensues, reproach and endless shame,
And one false step entirely damns her fame;
In vain with tears the loss she may deplore,
In vain look back on what she was before:
She sets, like stars that fall, to rise no more. [Exeunt

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Jane Shore's House.

Enter ALICIA

Alic. The drowsy night grows on the world, and now

The busy craftsman and the o'er-labour'd hind
Forget the travail of the day in sleep:
Care only wakes, and moping pensiveness;
With meagre discontented looks they sit,
And watch the wasting of the midnight taper.
Such vigils must I keep, so wakes my soul,
Restless and self-tormented! O, false Hastings!
Thou hast destroy'd my peace. [Knocking without.
What noise is that?
What visitor is this, who with bold freedom,

Breaks in upon the peaceful night and rest,
With such a rude approach?

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. One from the court.

Lord Hastings (as I think), demands my lady.

[Crosses, and exit.]

Alic. Hastings! Be still, my heart, and try to meet him,

With his own arts! with falsehood—But he comes.

[Hastings, heard without speaking to a Servant.]

Enter LORD HASTINGS.

Has. Dismiss my train, and wait alone without.

Alicia here! Unfortunate encounter.

But be it as it may.

Alic. When humbly, thus,
The great descend to visit the afflicted,
When thus unmindful of their rest, they come
To sooth the sorrows of the midnight mourner,
Comfort comes with them; like the golden sun,
Dispels the sullen shades with her sweet influence,
And cheers the melancholy house of care.

Has. 'Tis true I would not over-rate a courtesy,
Nor let the coldness of delay hang on it,
To nip and blast its favour like a frost;
But rather chose, at this late hour, to come,
That your fair friend may know I have prevail'd;
The lord protector has receiv'd her suit,
And means to show her grace.

Alice. My friend! my lord.

Has. Yes, lady, yours; none has a right more ample
To task my pow'r than you.

Alic. I want the words,
To pay you back a compliment so courtly;
But my heart guesses at the friendly meaning,
And wou'dn't die your debtor.

Has. 'Tis well, madam.

But I would see your friend.

Alic. O, thou false lord!
I would be mistress of my heaving heart,
Stifle this rising rage, and learn from thee
To dress my face in easy, dull indiff'rence;
But 'twou'dn't be; my wrongs will tear their way,
And rush at once upon thee.

Has. Are you wise?

Have you the use of reason? Do you wake?
What means this raving, this transporting passion?

Alic. O, thou cool traitor! thou insulting tyrant!
Dost thou behold my poor distracted heart,
Thus rent with agonizing love and rage,
And ask me what it means? Art thou not false?
Am I not scorn'd, forsaken, and abandon'd;
Left, like a common wretch, to shame and infamy;
Giv'n up to be the sport of villains' tongues,
Of laughing parasites, and lewd buffoons?
And all because my soul has doated on thee
With love, with truth, and tenderness unutterable?

Has. Are these the proofs of tenderness and love?
These endless quarrels, discontents, and jealousies,
These never-ceasing wailings and complainings,
These furious starts, these whirlwinds of the soul,
Which every other moment rise to madness?

Alic. What proof, alas! have I not giv'n of love?
What have I not abandon'd to thy arms?
Have I not set at nought my noble birth,
A spotless fame, and an unblemish'd race,
The peace of innocence, and pride of virtue?
My prodigality has given thee all;
And now I've nothing left me to bestow,
You hate the wretched bankrupt you have made.

Has. Why am I thus pursu'd from place to place,

Kept in the view, and cross'd at every turn?

In vain I fly, and, like a hunted deer,
Scud o'er the lawns, and hasten to the covert:
E'er I can reach my safety, you o'ertake me
With the swift malice of some keen reproach,
And drive the winged shaft deep in my heart.

Alic. Hither you fly, and here you seek repose;
Spite of the poor deceit, your arts are known,
Your pious, charitable, midnight visits. [Crosses.]

Has. If you are wise, and prize your peace of mind,
Yet take the friendly counsel of my love;
Believe me true, nor listen to your jealousy.
Let not that devil, which undoes your sex,
That cursed curiosity, seduce you
To hunt for needless secrets, which, neglected,
Shall never hurt your quiet; but once known,
Shall sit upon your heart, pinch it with pain,
And banish the sweet sleep for ever from you.
Go to—be yet advis'd—

Alic. Dost thou in scorn
Preach patience to my rage, and bid me tamely
Sit like a poor, contented idiot down, [thee,
Nor dare to think thou'st wrong'd me? Ruin seize
And swift perdition overtake thy treachery.
Have I the least remaining cause to doubt?
Hast thou endeavour'd once to hide thy falsehood?
To hide it might have spoke some little tenderness,
And shown thee half unwilling to undo me:
But thou disdain'st the weakness of humanity.
Thy words, and all thy actions, have confess'd it;
Ev'n now thy eyes avow it, now they speak,
And insolently own the glorious villainy. [chains.]

Has. Well then, I own my heart has broke your Patient I bore the painful bondage long,
At length my gen'rous love disdains your tyranny;
The bitterness and stings of taunting jealousy,
Vexatious days, and jarring, joyless nights,
Have driv'n him forth to seek some safer shelter,
Where he may rest his weary wings in peace.

Alic. You triumph! do! and with gigantic pride
Defy impending vengeance. Heav'n shall wink;
No more his arm shall roll the dreadful thunder,
Nor send his lightnings forth: no more his justice
Shall visit the presuming sons of men,
But perjury, like thine, shall dwell in safety.

Has. What'er my fate decrees for me hereafter,
Be present to me now, my better angel!
Preserve me from the storm that threatens now,
And if I have beyond atonement sinn'd,
Let any other kind of plague o'ertake me,
So I escape the fury of that tongue.

Alic. Thy pray'r is heard—I go—[Crosses.—but know, proud lord,

Howe'er thou scorn'st the weakness of my sex,
This feeble hand may find the means to reach thee,
Howe'er sublime in pow'r and greatness plac'd,
With royal favour guarded round and graced;
On eagle's wings my rage shall urge her flight,
And hurl thee headlong from thy topmast height;
Then, like thy fate, superior will I sit,
And view thee fall'n and grov'ling at my feet;
See thy last breath with indignation go,
And tread thee sinking to the shades below. [Exit.]

Has. How fierce a fiend is passion! With what wildness,
With tyranny untam'd it reigns in woman!
Unhappy sex! whose easy, yielding temper
Gives way to ev'ry appetite alike:
And love in their weak bosom is a rage
As terrible as hate, and as destructive.
But soft ye now—for here comes one, disclaims
Strife and her wrangling train; of equal elements,

Without one jarring atom was she form'd,
And gentleness and joy make up her being.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Forgive me, fair one, if officious friendship
Intrudes on your repose, and comes thus late
To greet you with the tidings of success.
The princely Glo'ster has vouchsaf'd you hearing,
To-morrow he expects you at the court;
There plead your cause, with never-failing beauty,
Speak all your griefs and find a full redress.

Jane S. Thus humbly let your lowly servant bend. [Kneels.]

Thus let me bow my grateful knee to earth,
And bless your noble nature for this goodness.

Has. Rise, gentle dame, you wrong my meaning much, [Raises her.]

Think me not guilty of a thought so vain,
To sell my courtesy for thanks like these. [ing;]

Jane S. 'Tis true, your bounty is beyond my speak-
But though my mouth be dumb, my heart shall thank you:

And when it melts before the throne of mercy,
Mourning and bleeding for my past offences,
My fervent soul shall breathe one pray'r for you,
That heav'n will pay you back, when most you need,
The grace and goodness you have shown to me.

Has. If there be aught of merit in my service,
Impute it there, where most 'tis due—to love;
Be kind, my gentle mistress, to my wishes,
And satisfy my panting heart with beauty.

Jane S. Alas! my lord—

Has. Why bend thy eyes to earth?

Wherefore these looks of heaviness and sorrow?

Why breathes that sigh, my love! And wherefore falls

This trickling show'r of tears, to stain thy sweetness?

Jane S. If pity dwells within your noble breast
(As sure it does), oh, speak not to me thus.

Has. Can I behold thee, and not speak of love?

Ev'n now, thus sadly as thou stand'st before me,
Thus desolate, dejected, and forlorn,
Thy softness steals upon my yielding senses,
Till my soul faints, and sickens with desire;
How canst thou give this motion to my heart,
And bid my tongue be still?

Jane S. Cast round your eyes

Upon the high-born beauties of the court;
Behold, like opening roses, where they bloom,
Sweet to the sense, unsully'd all, and spotless;
There choose some worthy partner of your heart,
To fill your arms and bless your virtuous bed;
Nor turn your eyes this way.

Has. What means this peevish, this fantastic change?

Where is thy wonted pleasantness of face,
Thy wonted graces, and thy dimpled smiles?
Where hast thou lost thy wit and sportive mirth?
That cheerful heart, which us'd to dance for ever,
And cast a day of gladness all around thee?

Jane S. Yes, I will own I merit the reproach;
And for those foolish days of wanton pride,
My soul is justly humbled to the dust:
All tongues like yours are licens'd to upbraid me,
Still to repeat my guilt, to urge my infamy,
And treat me like that abject thing I have been.

Has. No more of this dull stuff. 'Tis time enough
To whine and mortify thyself with penance;
The present moment claims more gen'rous use;
Thy beauty, night and solitude, reproach me,
For having talk'd thus long:—come, let me press thee. [Lays hold of her.]

Jane S. Forbear, my lord!—here let me rather die, [Kneels]

And end my sorrows and my shame for ever.

Has. Away with this perverseness:—'tis too much.

Nay, if you strive—'tis monstrous affectation!

Jane S. [Striving.] Retire! I beg you leave me—

Has. Thus to coy it!—

With one who knows you too.—

Jane S. For mercy's sake—

Has. Ungrateful woman! Is it thus you pay

My services?—

Jane S. Abandon me to ruin—

Rather than urge me—

Has. [Pulling her.] This way to your chamber;

There if you struggle—

Jane S. Help, O gracious heaven!

Help! Save me! Help! [Shrieks and rushes out.]

Enter DUMONT.

Dum. My lord! for honour's sake—

Has. Hah! What art thou?—Be gone!

Dum. My duty calls me

To my attendance on my mistress, here.

Has. Avaunt! base groom:—

At distance wait and know thy office better.

Dum. No, my lord—

The common ties of manhood call me now,

And bid me thus stand up in the defence

Of an oppress'd, unhappy, helpless woman.

Has. And dost thou know me, slave?

Dum. Yes, thou proud lord!

I know thee well; know thee with each advantage,

Which wealth, or pow'r, or noble birth can give thee.

I know thee too for one who stains those honours,

And blots a long illustrious line of ancestry,

By poorly daring thus to wrong a woman. [dame,]

Has. 'Tis wondrous well; I see, my saint-like

You stand provided of your braves and ruffians,

To man your cause, and bluster in your brothel.

Dum. Take back the foul reproach, unmanner'd railer!

Nor urge my rage too far, lest thou shouldst find

I have as daring spirit in my blood

As thou or any of thy race e'er boasted;

And though no gaudy titles grac'd my birth,

Yet heav'n that made me honest, made me more

Than ever king did, when he made a lord.

Has. Insolent villain! henceforth let this teach thee [Draws and strikes him]

The distance 'twixt a peasant and a prince.

Dum. Nay then, my lord, [Draws] learn you by this, how well

An arm resolv'd can guard his master's life.

[They fight—Dumont disarms him.]

Has. Confusion! baffled by a base-born hind!

Dum. Now, haughty sir, where is our difference
now?

Your life is in my hand, and did not honour,

The gentleness of blood, and inborn virtue

(Howe'er unworthy I may seem to you),

Plead in my bosom, I should take the forfeit.

But wear your sword again; and know, a lord,

Oppos'd against a man, is but a man.

Has. Curse on my failing hand! your better
fortune

Has giv'n you vantage o'er me; but perhaps

Your triumph may be bought with dear repentance.
[Exit.]

Re-enter JANE SHORE.

Jane S. Alas! what have you done? Know ye the pow'r,

The nightiness that waits upon this lord?

Dum. Fear not, my worthiest mistress ; 'tis a cause
In which heaven's guards shall wait you. O, pursue,
Pursue the sacred counsels of your soul,
Which urge you on to virtue ;
Assisting angels shall conduct your steps,
Bring you to bliss, and crown your days with peace.

Jane S. O that my head were laid, my sad eyes clos'd,

And my cold corse wound in my shroud to rest !

My painful heart will never cease to beat,
Will never know a moment's peace till then.

Dum. Would you be happy, leave this fatal place ;
Fly from the court's pernicious neighbourhood ;
Where innocence is sham'd, and blushing modesty
Is made the scorner's jest ; where hate, deceit,
And deadly ruin, wear the masks of beauty,
And draw deluded fools with shows of pleasure.

Jane S. Where should I fly, thus helpless and forlorn,

Of friends and all the means of life bereft ?

Dum. Belmour, whose friendly care still wakes to serve you,

Has found you out a little peaceful refuge,
Far from the court and the tumultuous city.
Within an ancient forest's ample verge,
There stands a lonely but a healthful dwelling,
Built for convenience and the use of life :
Around it fallows, meads, and pastures fair,
A little garden, and a limpid brook,
By nature's own contrivance seem'd dispos'd ;
No neighbours, but a few poor simple clowns,
Honest and true, with a well meaning priest ;
No faction, or domestic fury's rage,
Did'er disturb the quiet of that place,
When the contending nobles shook the land
With York and Lancaster's disputed sway.
Your virtue there may find a safe retreat
From the insulting pow'rs of wicked greatness.

Jane S. Can there be so much happiness in store ?

A cell like that is all my hopes aspire to.
Haste then, and thither let us take our flight,
Ere the clouds gather, and the wintry sky
Descends in storms to intercept our passage.

Dum. Will you then go ? You glad my very soul.

Banish your fears, cast all your cares on me ;
Plenty and ease, and peace of mind shall wait you,
And make your latter days of life most happy.
O lady ! but I must not, cannot tell you,
How anxious I have been for all your dangers,
And how my heart rejoices at your safety.
So when the spring renews the flow'ry field,
And warns the pregnant nightingale to build,
She seeks the safest shelter of the wood,
Where she may trust her little tuneful brood ;
Where no rude swains her shady cell may know,
No serpents climb, nor blasting winds may blow ;
Fond of the chosen place, she views it o'er,
Sits there, and wanders through the grove no more :
Warbling she charms it each returning night,
And loves it with a mother's dear delight. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Court.

Enter ALICIA, with a Paper.

Alic. This paper to the great protector's hand
With care and secrecy must be conveyed :

His bold ambition now avows its aim,
To pluck the crown from Edward's infant brow,
And fix it on his own. I know he holds
My faithless Hastings adverse to his hopes,
And much devoted to the orphan king :
On that I build ; this paper meets his doubts,
And marks my hated rival as the cause
Of Hastings' zeal for his dead master's sons.
Oh, jealousy ! thou bane of pleasing friendship,
How does thy rancour poison all our softness,
And turn our gentle natures into bitterness !
See, where she comes ! once my heart's dearest blessing,

Now my chang'd eyes are blasted with her beauty,
Loath that known face, and sicken to behold her.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Jane S. O, my Alicia !

Alic. What new grief is this ?

What unforeseen misfortune has surprised thee,
That racks thy tender heart thus ?

Jane S. O, Dumont !

Alic. Say, what of him !

Jane S. That friendly, honest man,
Whom Belmour brought of late to my assistance,
On whose kind care, whose diligence and faith,
My surest trust was built, this very morn
Was seiz'd on by the cruel hand of power,
Forc'd from my house, and borne away to prison.

Alic. To prison, said you ? Can you guess the cause ?

Jane S. Too well, I fear. His bold defence of me
Has drawn the vengeance of Lord Hastings on him.

Alic. Lord Hastings ! ha !

Jane S. Some fitter time must tell thee
The tale of my hard hap. Upon the present
Hang all my poor, my last remaining hopes.
Within this paper is my suit contained ;
Here as the princely Gloster passes forth,
I wait to give it on my humble knees,
And move him for redress.

[Gives the paper to ALICIA, who opens and reads it :

JANE SHORE retires up the Stage.

Alic. Now for a while,

To sting my thoughtless rival to the heart ;
To blast her fatal beauties, and divide her
For ever from my perjur'd Hastings' eyes :
Their fashions are the same, it cannot fail.

[Aside.—Pulling out the Paper.—Flourish.

Jane S. [Advancing.] But see the great protector comes this way.

Give me the paper, friend.

Alic. For love and vengeance !

[Aside — Gives her the other Paper.

*Enter the DUKE of GLO'STER, SIR RICHARD
RATCLIFFE, CATESBY, Courtiers, and other Attendants.*

Jane S. [Kneeling.] O, noble Glo'ster, turn thy gracious eye,
Incline thy pitying ear to my complaint ;
A poor, undone, forsaken, helpless woman,
Entreats a little bread for charity,
To feed her wants, and save her life from perishing.

Glos. Arise, fair dame, and dry your wat'ry eyes.

[Receives the Paper, and raises her.

Beshrew me, but 'twere pity of his' heart
That could refuse a boon to such a suitor:
You've got a noble friend to be your advocate :
A worthy and right gentle lord he is,
And to his trust most true. This present now
Some matters of the state detain our leisure ;

Those once dispatch'd, we'll call for you anon,
And give your griefs redress. Go to:—be comforted,
[this pity.]

Jane S. Good heavens repay your highness for
And show'r down blessings on your princely head!
Come, my Alicia, reach thy friendly arm,
And help me to support this feeble frame,
That nodding totters with oppressive woe,
And sinks beneath its load.

[Exeunt JANE SHORE and ALICIA.]

Glos. Now by my holy-dame!
Heavy at heart she seems, and sore afflicted.
But thus it is when rude calamity
Lays its strong gripe upon these mincing minions;
Their dainty gew-gaw forms dissolve at once,
And shiver at the shock. What says this paper?

[Seeming to read.]

Ha! What is this? Come nearer, Ratcliffe! Catesby!

[They advance.]

Mark the contents, and then divine the meaning.
[Reads.] "Wonder not, Princely Glo'ster, at the news

This paper brings you from a friend unknown;
Lord Hastings is inclined to call you master,
And kneel to Richard as to England's king;
But Shore's bewitching wife misleads his heart,
And draws his service to king Edward's sons:
Drive her away, you break the charm that holds him,
And he, and all his powers, attend on you."

Sir R. 'Tis wonderful!

Cates. The means by which it came
Yet stranger too!

Glos. You saw it giv'n, but now.

Sir R. She could not know the purport.

Glos. No, 'tis plain

She knows it not, it levels at her life;
Should she presume to prate of such high matters,
The meddling harlot, dear she should abide it.

Cates. What hand soe'er it comes from, be assur'd,
It means your highness well—

Glos. Upon the instant,

Lord Hastings will be here; this morn I mean
To probe him to the quick; then if he finch,
No more but this—away with him at once,
He must be mine or nothing.—But he comes!
Draw nearer this way, and observe me well.

[They retire and confer.]

Enter Lord HASTINGS.

Has. This foolish woman hangs about my heart,
Lingers and wanders in my fancy still;
This coyness is put on, 'tis art and cunning,
And worn to urge desire;—I must possess her.
The groom, who lift his saucy hand against me,
Ere this, is humbled, and repents his daring.
Perhaps, ev'n she may profit by th' example,
And teach her beauty not to scorn my pow'r.

Glos. This do, and wait me ere the council sits.

[Exeunt RATCLIFFE and CATESBY.]

My lord, you're well encounter'd; here has been
A fair petitioner this morning with us;
Believe me, she has won me much to pity her:
Alas! her gentle nature was not made
To buffet with adversity. I told her
How worthily her cause you had befriended;
How much for your good sake we meant to do,
That you had spoke, and all things should be well.

Has. Your highness binds me ever to your service.

Glos. You know your friendship is most potent with us,
And shares our power. But of this enough,
For we have other matters for your ear;

The state is out of tune; distracting fears,
And jealous doubts, jar in our public councils:
Amidst the wealthy city, murmurs rise,
Lewd railings, and reproach on those that rule,
With open scorn of government; hence credit,
And public trust 'twixt man and man, are broke.
The golden streams of commerce are withheld,
Which fed the wants of needy hinds and arizans
Who therefore curse the great, and threat rebellion.

Has. The resty knaves are over-run with ease,
As plenty ever is the nurse of faction;
If in good days, like these, the headstrong herd
Grow madly wanton and repine, it is Because the reins of power are held too slack,
And reverend authority of late
Has won a face of mercy more than justice.

Glos. Beshrew my heart! but you have well divin'd

The source of these disorders. Who can wonder
If riot and misrule o'erturn the realm,
When the crown sits upon a baby brow!
Plainly to speak, hence comes the gen'ral cry,
And sum of all complaint: 'twill ne'er be well
With England (thus they talk) while children govern.

Has. 'Tis true, the king is young: but what of
that?

We feel no want of Edward's riper years,
While Glo'ster's valour and most princely wisdom
So well support our infant sov'reign's place,
His youth's support, and guardian to his throne.

Glos. The council (much I'm bound to thank 'em for't),

Have plac'd a pageant sceptre in my hand,
Barren of pow'r, and subject to control;
Scorn'd by my foes, and useless to my friends.
Oh, worthy lord! were mine the rule indeed,
I think I should not suffer rank offence

At large to lord it in the commonweal;
Nor would the realm be rent by discord thus,
Thus fear and doubt, betwixt disputed titles.

Has. Of this I am to learn; as not supposing
A doubt like this;—

Glos. Ay, marry, but there is—
And that of much concern. Have you not heard
How, on a late occasion, doctor Shaw
Has mov'd the people much about the lawfulness
Of Edward's issue! By right grave authority
Of learning and religion, plainly proving,
A bastard scion never should be grafted
Upon a royal stock; from thence at full
Discoursing on my brother's former contract
To lady Elizabeth Lucy, long before
His jolly match with that same buxom widow,
The queen he left behind him—

Has. Ill befall

Such meddling priests, who kindle up confusion,
And vex the quiet world with their vain scruples!
By heav'n 'tis done in perfect spite to peace.

Did not the king

Our royal master, Edward, in concurrence
With his estates assembled, well determine What course the sov'reign rule should take henceforward?

When shall the deadly hate of faction cease?
When shall our long-divided land have rest,
If every peevish, moody malcontent,
Shall set the senseless rabble in an uproar,
Fright them with dangers, and perplex their brains,
Each day with some fantastic giddy change?

Glos. What if some patriot, for the public good,
Should vary from your scheme, new-mould the state?

Has. Curse on the innovating hand attempts it !
Remember him, the villain, righteous heaven,
In thy great day of vengeance ! blast the traitor
And his pernicious counsels ; who, for wealth,
For pow'r, the pride of greatness, or revenge,
Would plunge his native land in civil wars !

Glos. You go too far, my lord.

Has. Your highness' pardon.—

Have we so soon forgot those days of ruin,
When York and Lancaster drew forth their battles ;
When, like a matron butcher'd by her sons,
Our groaning country bled at every vein :
When murders, rapes, and massacres prevail'd ;
When churches, palaces, and cities blaz'd :
When insolence and barbarism triumph'd,
And swept away distinction : peasants trod
Upon the necks of nobles : low were laid
The reverend crosier and the holy mitre,
And desolation covered all the land ;
Who can remember this, and not, like me,
Here vow to sheath a dagger in his heart,
Whose damn'd ambition would renew those horrors,
And set once more that scene of blood before us !

Glos. How now ! so hot !

Has. So brave and so resolv'd.

Glos. Is then our friendship of so little moment,
That you could arm your hand against my life ?

Has. I hope your highness does not think I mean it ;

No, heav'n forbid that e'er your princely person
Should come within the scope of my resentment.

Glos. O, noble Hastings ! nay, I must embrace you ; [Embrace.]

By holy Paul, you're a right honest man !
The time is full of danger and distrust,
And warns us to be wary. Hold me not Too apt for jealousy and light surmise,
If when I meant to lodge you next my heart,
I put your truth to trial. Keep your loyalty,
And live your king and country's best support :
For me, I ask no more than honour gives,
To think me yours, and rank me with your friends.

[Exit.]

Has. I am not read,
Nor skill'd and practis'd in the arts of greatness,
To kindle thus, and give a scope to passion.
The duke is surely noble ; but he touch'd me
Ev'n on the tend'rest point ; the master-string
That makes most harmony or discord to me.
I own the glorious subject fires my breast,
And my soul's darling passion stands confess'd ;
Beyond or love's or friendship's sacred band,
Beyond myself, I prize my native land :
On this foundation would I build my fame,
And emulate the Greek and Roman name ;
Think England's peace bought cheaply with my blood,

And die with pleasure for my country's good. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Duke of GLO'STER advances from a state chair.
RATCLIFFE and CATESBY.

Glos. This was the sum of all : that he would brook
No alteration in the present state.

Marry, at last, the testy gentleman

Was almost mov'd to bid us bold defiance :
But there I dropp'd the argument, and changing
The first design and purport of my speech,
I prais'd his good affection to young Edward,
And left him to believe my thoughts like his.
Proceed we then in this fore-mentioned matter,
As nothing bound or trusting to his friendship

Sir R. Ill does it thus befall. I could have wish'd
This lord had stood with us.

His name had been of vantage to your highness,
And stood our present purpose much in stead.

Glos. This wayward and perverse declining from us,
Has warrant at full the friendly notice,
Which we this morn receiv'd. I hold it certain,
This puling, whining harlot rules his reason,
And prompts his zeal for Edward's bastard brood.

Cates. If she have such dominion o'er his heart,
And turn it at her will, you rule her fate ;
And should, by inference and apt deduction,
Be arbiter of his. Is not her bread,

The very means immediate to her being,
The bounty of your hand ? Why does she live,
If not to yield obedience to your pleasure,
To speak, to act, to think as you command ?

Sir R. Let her instruct her tongue to bear your message !

Teach every grace to smile in your behalf,
And her deluded eyes to gloat for you ;
His ductile reason will be wound about,
Be led and turn'd again, say and unsay,
Receive the yoke, and yield exact obedience.

Glos. Your counsel likes me well, it shall be follow'd,

She waits without, attending on her suit,
Go, call her in, and leave us here alone.

[Exit RATCLIFFE and CATESBY.]

How poor a thing is he, how worthy scorn,
Who leaves the guidance of imperial manhood
To such a paltry piece of stuff as this is !
A moppet made of prettiness and pride ;
That oftener does her giddy fancies change,
Than glittering dew-drops in the sun do colours.—
Now, shame upon it ! was our reason given
For such a use. To be thus puff'd about.
Sure there is something more than witchcraft in
them,

That masters ev'n the wisest of us all.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Oh ! you are come most fitly. We have ponder'd
On this your grievance : and though some there are,
Nay, and those great ones too, who would enforce
The rigour of our power to afflict you,
And bear a heavy hand ; yet fear not you :
We've ta'en you to our favour ; our protection
Shall stand between, and shield you from mishap

Jane S. The blessings of a heart with anguish broken

And rescu'd from despair, attend your highness.

Alas ! my gracious lord, what have I done
To kindle such relentless wrath against me ?

Glos. Marry, there are, though I believe them not,
Who say you meddle in affairs of state :

That you presume to prattle like a busy-body,
Give your advice, and teach the lords o' the council
What fits the order of the commonweal.

Jane S. O, that the busy world, at least in this,
Would take example from a wretch like me !

None then would waste their hours in foreign thoughts,

Forget themselves, and what concerns their peace,

To search, with prying eyes, for faults abroad,
If all, like me, consider'd their own hearts,
And wept their sorrows which they found at home.

Glos. Go to; I know your pow'r; and though I trust not

To ev'ry breath of fame, I'm not to learn
That Hastings is profess'd your loving vassal.
But fair befall your beauty: use it wisely,
And it may stand your fortunes much in stead,
Give back your forfeit land with large increase,
And place you high in safety and in honour.
Nay, I could point a way, the which pursuing,
You shall not only bring yourself advantage,
But give the realm much worthy cause to thank you.

Jane S. Oh! where or how—can my unworthy hand

Become an instrument of good to any?
Instruct your lowly slave, and let me fly
To yield obedience to your dread command.

Glos. Why, that's well said;—Thus then—ob-serve me well.

The state, for many high and potent reasons,
Deeming my brother Edward's sons unfit
For the imperial weight of England's crown—

Jane S. Alas! for pity.

Glos. Therefore have resolv'd

To set aside their unavailing infancy,
And vest the sov'reign rule in abler hands.
This, though of great importance to the public,
Hastings, for very peevishness and spleen,
Does stubbornly oppose.

Jane S. Does he? Does Hastings?

Glos. Ay, Hastings.

Jane S. [Kneels and clasps her hands.] Reward him for the noble deed, just heav'ns!

For this one action guard him and distinguish him
With signal mercies, and with great deliverance,
Save him from wrong, adversity, and shame,
Let never-fading honours flourish round him,
And consecrate his name, ev'n to time's end.

Glos. How now!

[ones!]

Jane S. [Rises.] The poor, forsaken, royal little Shall they be left a prey to savage power!
Can they lift up their harmless hands in vain,
Or cry to heaven for help, and not be heard?
Impossible! O gallant, generous Hastings,
Go on, pursue, assert the sacred cause:

Stand forth thou proxy of all-ruling Providence,
And save the friendless infants from oppression.
Saints shall assist thee with prevailing prayers,
And warring angels combat on thy side. [Crosses.]

Glos. You're passing rich in this same heavenly speech,

And spend it at your pleasure. Nay, but mark me!

[Runs to her in a threatening manner.]

My favour is not bought with words like these.
Go to:—you'll teach your tongue another tale.

[Returns.]

Jane S. No, though the royal Edward has undone me,

He was my king, my gracious master still;
He lov'd me too, though 'twas a guilty flame;
And can I?—O my heart abhors the thought!—
Stand by and see his children robb'd of right?

Glos. Dare not, ev'n for thy soul, to thwart me further!

None of your arts, your feigning, and your foolery;
Your dainty squeamish coying it to me;
Go—to your lord, your paramour, be gone!
Lisp in his ear, hang wanton on his neck,
And play your monkey gambols o'er to him.
You know my purpose, look that you pursue it,

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXXIV.

And make him yield obedience to my will,
Do it—or woe upon the harlot's head. [speech,
Jane S. Oh! that my tongue had every grace of Great and commanding, as the breath of kings;
That I had art and eloquence divine,
To pay my duty to my master's ashes,
And plead, till death, the cause of injur'd innocence.

Glos. Ha! Dost thou brave me, minion? Dost thou know [theo?]

How vile, how very a wretch, my pow'r can make
That I can place thee in such abject state,
As help shall never find thee; where, repining,
Thou shalt sit down, and gnaw the earth for anguish;
Groan to the pitiless winds without return;
Howl, like the midnight wolf, amidst the desert,
And curse thy life, in bitterness and misery.

Jane S. Let me be branded for the public scorn,
Turn'd forth and driv'n to wander like a vagabond,
Be friendless and forsaken, seek my bread
Upon the barren wild and desolate waste,
Feed on my sighs, and drink my falling tears,
Ere I consent to teach my lips injustice,
Or wrong the orphan, who has none to save him.

Glos. 'Tis well:—we'll try the temper of your heart.

What, ho! Who waits without?

Enter RATCLIFFE, CATESBY, and Attendants.

Glos. Go, some of you, and turn this strumpet forth!

Spurn her into the street; there let her perish,
And rot upon a dunghill. Through the city
See it proclaim'd, that none, on pain of death,
Presume to give her comfort, food, or harbour;
Who ministers the smallest comfort, dies.
Her house, her costly furniture and wealth,
We seize on, for the profit of the state.
Away! Be gone!

[Goes back to his chair, and examines papers.]

Jane S. Oh, thou most righteous judge—

Humbly behold, I bow myself to thee, [Kneels.
And own thy justice in this hard decree;
No longer, then, my ripe offences spare,
But what I merit, let me learn to bear,
Yet, since 'tis all my wretchedness can give,
For my past crimes my forfeit life receive;

[They raise her.]

No pity for my sufferings here I crave,
And only hope forgiveness in the grave.

[Exit JANE SHORE, guarded by CATESBY.]

Glos. So much for this. Your project's at an end.
[To Sir Richard.]

This idle toy, this hilding, scorns my power,
And sets us all at nought. See that a guard
Be ready at my call—

Sir R. The council waits
Upon your highness' leisure.

Glos. I'll attend them.

[Exeunt all, except GLOSTER.]

Enter the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, EARL OF DERBY, and other Lords, who take their seats.

Der. [Rises.] In happy times we are assembled here—

T' appoint the day, and fix the solemn pomp
For placing England's crown, with all due rights,
Upon our sovereign Edward's youthful brow. [Sits.]

Has. [Rises.] Some busy, meddling knaves, 'tis said, there are

As such will still be prating, who presume
To carp and cavil at his royal right;
Therefore, I hold it fitting, with the soonest,
To appoint the order of the coronation;

So to approve our duty to the king,
And stay the babbling of such vain gainsayers. [Sits.]

Der. We all attend to know your highness' pleasure. [To Glo'ster.]

Glos. My lords, a set of worthy men you are,
Prudent and just, and careful for the state;
Therefore, to your most grave determination
I yield myself in all things; and demand
What punishment your wisdom shall think meet
T' inflict upon those damnable contrivers,
Who shall with potions, charms, and witching drugs,
Practise against our person and our life!

Has. [Rises.] So much I hold the king your highness' debtor,

So precious are you to the commonweal,
That I presume, not only for myself,
But in behalf of these, my noble brothers,
To say, whoe'er they be, they merit death.

Glos. Then judge yourselves, convince your eyes of truth:

Behold my arm, thus blasted, dry, and wither'd,
[Pulling up his sleeve.—Lords all rise and close round to inspect his arm.]

Shrunk like a foul abortion, and decay'd,
Like some untimely product of the seasons,
Robb'd of its properties of strength and office:
This is the sorcery of Edward's wife,
Who, in conjunction with that harlot Shore,
And other like confederate midnight hags,
By force of potent spells, of bloody characters,
And conjurations horrible to hear,
Call fiends and spectres from the yawning deep,
And set the ministers of hell at work
To torture and despoil me of my life.

Has. If they have done this deed—

Glos. [Rises.] If they have done it! [To Hastings.]
Talk'st thou to me of ifs, audacious traitor!
Thou art that strumpet witch's chief abettor,
The patron and plotter of her mischiefs,
And join'd in this contrivance for my death. [sirs!]
Nay, start not, lords.—What, ho! a guard there,

Enter Guards.

Lord Hastings, I arrest thee of high treason.
Seize him, and bear him instantly away
He sha'n't live an hour. By holy Paul,
I will not dine before his head be brought me.
Ratcliffe, stay you, and see that it be done;
The rest that love me, rise and follow me.

[Ereunt GLO'STER, the Lords following—LORD HASTINGS, SIR RICHARD RATCLIFFE, and Guards remain.]

Has. What! and no more but this!—How! to the scaffold!

O, gentle Ratcliffe! tell me, do I hold thee?
Or if I dream, what shall I do to wake,
To break, to struggle through this dread confusion?
For surely death itself is not so painful
As is this sudden horror and surprise.

Sir R. You heard the Duke's commands to me were absolute.

Therefore, my lord, address you to your shrift,
With all good speed you may. Summon your courage,

And be yourself; for you must die this instant.

Has. Yes, Ratcliffe, I will take thy friendly counsel,

And die as a man should; 'tis somewhat hard
To call my scatter'd spirits home at once;
But since what must be, must be—let necessity
Supply the place of time and preparation,
And arm me for the blow. 'Tis but to die;

'Tis but to venture on the common hazard,
Which many a time in battle I have run;
'Tis but to close my eyes and shut out day-light,
To view no more the wicked ways of men,
No longer to behold the tyrant Glo'ster,
And be a weeping witness of the woes,
The desolation, slaughter, and calamities,
Which he shall bring on this unhappy land.

Enter ALICIA.

Alic. Stand off, and let me pass: I will, I must Catch him once more in these despairing arms,
And hold him to my heart.—O, Hastings! Hastings!

Has. Alas! why com'st thou at this dreadful moment

To fill me with new terrors, new distractions;
To turn me wild with thy distemper'd rage,
And shock the peace of my departing soul?
Away; I pr'ythee leave me!

Alic. Stop a minute—

Till my full griefs find passage;—O, the tyrant!
Perdition fall on Glo'ster's head and mine.

Has. What means thy frantic grief?

Alic. I cannot speak—

But I have murdered thee;—Oh, I could tell thee!

Has. Speak, and give ease to thy conflicted passion!

Be quick nor keep me longer in suspense,
Time presses, and a thousand crowding thoughts
Break in at once! this way and that they snatch:
They tear my hurry'd soul: all claim attention,
And yet not one is heard. Oh! speak and leave me,
For I have business would employ an age,
And but a minute's time to get it done in. [on,]

Alic. That, that's my grief;—'tis I that urge thee
Thus hunt thee to the toil, sweep thee from earth,
And drive thee down this precipice of fate. [band.]

Has. Thy reason is grown wild. Could thy weak
Bring on this mighty ruin? If it could,
What have I done so grievous to thy soul,
So deadly, so beyond the reach of pardon,
That nothing but my life can make atonement!

Alic. Thy cruel scorn hath stung me to the heart,
And set my burning bosom all in flames;
Raving and mad I flew to my revenge,
And writ I knew not what;—told the protector,
That Shore's detested wife, by wiles, had won thee
To plot against his greatness.—He believ'd it,
(Oh, dire event of my pernicious counsel!)
And, while I meant destruction on her head,
He has turn'd it all on thine.

Has. O, thou inhuman! Turn thy eyes away,
And blast me not with their destructive beams:
Why should I curse thee with my dying breath?
Be gone! and let me die in peace. [Crosses.]

Alic. Canst thou—O, cruel Hastings, leave me
thus?

Hear me, I beg thee—I conjure thee, hear me!
While, with an agonizing heart, I swear,
By all the pangs I feel, by all the sorrows,
The terrors and despair thy loss shall give me,
My hate was on my rival bent alone.
Oh! had I once divin'd, false as thou art,
A danger to thy life, I would have died,
I would have met it for thee. [award:]

Has. Now mark! and tremble at heaven's just While thy insatiate wrath and fell revenge
Pursu'd the innocence which never wrong'd thee,
Behold, the mischief falls on thee and me:
Remorse and heaviness of heart shall wait thee,
And everlasting anguish be thy portion:
For me, the snares of death are wound about me.

And now, in one poor moment, I am gone.
Oh! if thou hast one tender thought remaining,
Fly to thy closet, fall upon thy knees,
And recommend my parting soul to mercy.

Alic. Oh! yet, before I go for ever from thee,
Turn thee in gentleness and pity to me, [Kneeling.
And in compassion of my strong affliction,
Say, is it possible you can forgive
The fatal rashness of ungovern'd love?
For, oh! 'tis certain, if I had not lov'd thee
Beyond my peace, my reason, fame, and life,
This day of horror never would have known us.

Has. Oh, rise, and let me hush thy stormy sorrows.
[Raising her.

Assuage thy tears, for I will chide no more,
No more upbraid thee, thou unhappy fair one.
I see the hand of heaven is arm'd against me;
And, in mysterious providence, decrees
To punish me by thy mistaken hand.
Most righteous doom! for, oh, while I behold thee,
Thy wrongs rise up in terrible array,
And charge thy ruin on me; thy fair fame,
Thy spotless beauty, innocence, and youth,
Dishonour'd, blasted, and betray'd by me.

Alic. And does thy heart relent for my undoing?
Oh! that inhuman Glo'ster could be mov'd,
But half so easily as I can pardon!

[CATESBY crosses, and whispers RATCLIFFE.

Has. Here, then, exchange we mutual forgiveness:

So may the guilt of all my broken vows,
My perjuries to thee, be all forgotten,
As here my soul acquits thee of my death,
As here I part without one angry thought,
As here I leave thee with the softest tenderness,
Mourning the chance of our disastrous loves,
And begging heav'n to bless and to support thee.

Sir R. My lord, dispatch; the duke has sent to chide me,

For loitering in my duty—

Has. I obey.

Alic. Insatiate, savage monster! Is a moment
So tedious to thy malice? Oh, repay him,
Thou great avenger! Give him blood for blood!
Guilt haunt him! fiends pursue him! lightnings blast him!

That he may know how terrible it is
To want that moment he denies thee now.

Has. This rage is all in vain, that tears thy bosom:
Retire, I beg thee;

To see thee thus, thou know'st not how it wounds me;
Thy agonies are added to my own,
And make the burden more than I can bear.

Farewell: good angels visit thy afflictions,
And bring thee peace and comfort from above. [Exit.

Alic. Oh! stab me to the heart, some pitying hand,

Now strike me dead—

Re-enter LORD HASTINGS.

Has. One thing I had forgot—

I charge thee, by our present common miseries?

By our past loves, if they have yet a name;

By all thy hopes of peace here and hereafter,

Let not the rancour of thy hate pursue

The innocence of thy unhappy friend;

Thou know'st who 'tis I mean; Oh! shouldst thou wrong her,

Just heav'n shall double all thy woes upon thee,

And make 'em know no end;—remember this,

As the last warning of a dying man.

Farewell, for ever!

Alic. [Embracing.] For ever! Oh, for ever!

[Guards carry him off.

Oh, who can bear to be a wretch for ever!
My rival, too! His last thoughts hung on her,
And, as he parted, left a blessing for her:
Shall she be blest, and I be curst, for ever?
No; since her fatal beauty was the cause
Of all my sufferings, let her share my pains;
Let her, like me, of ev'ry joy forlorn,
Devote the hour when such a wretch was born;
Cast ev'ry good, and ev'ry hope behind;
Detest the works of nature, loathe mankind:
Like me, with cries distracted, fill the air,
Tear her poor bosom, rend her frantic hair,
And prove the torments of the last despair. [Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter BELMOUR and DUMONT.

Dum. You saw her, then?

Bel. I met her as returning,
In solemn penance from the public cross.
Before her, certain rascal officers,
Slaves in authority, the knaves of justice,
Proclaim'd the tyrant Gloster's cruel orders.
Around her, numberless, the rabble flow'd,
Should'ring each other, crowding for a view,
Gaping and gazing, taunting and reviling;
Some pitying—but those, alas! how few!
The most, such iron hearts we are, and such
The base barbarity of human kind,
With insolence and lewd reproach pursu'd her,
Hooting and railing, and with villainous hands
Gath'ring the filth from out the common ways,
To hurl upon her head.

Dum. Inhuman dogs!

How did she bear it?

Bel. With the gentlest patience;
Submissive, sad, and lowly was her look;
A burning taper in her hand she bore,
And on her shoulders carelessly confus'd,
With loose neglect, her lovely tresses hung;
Upon her cheek a faintish blush was spread;
Feeble she seem'd, and sorely smit with pain.
While barefoot as she trod the flinty pavement,
Her footsteps all along were mark'd with blood.
Yet silent still she pass'd, and unrepining;
Her streaming eyes bent ever on the earth,
Except when in some bitter pang of sorrow,
To heav'n she seem'd in fervent zeal to raise them,
And beg that mercy man deny'd her here.

Dum. When was this piteous sight?

Bel. These last two days.

You know my care was wholly bent on you,
To find the happy means of your deliverance,
Which but for Hastings' death I had not gain'd.
During that time, although I have not seen her,
Yet divers trusty messengers I've sent,
To wait about, and watch a fit convenience
To give her some relief, but all in vain;
A churlish guard attends upon her steps,
Who menace those with death, that bring her comfort,
And drive all succour from her.

Dum. Let 'em threaten;

Let proud oppression prove its fiercest malice;

So heav'n befriend my soul, as here I vow

To give her help, and share one fortune with her.

Bel. Mean you to see her thus, in your own form?

Dum. I do.

Bel. And have you thought upon the consequence?

Dum. What is there I should fear?

Bel. Have you examin'd

Into your inmost heart, and try'd at leisure
The sev'ral secret springs that move the passions?
Has mercy fix'd her empire there so sure,
That wrath and vengeance never may return?
Can you resume a husband's name, and bid
That wakeful dragon, fierce resentment, sleep?

Dum. O, thou hast set my busy brain at work,

And now she musters up a train of images,
Which, to preserve my peace, I had cast aside,
And sunk in deep oblivion.—Oh, that form!
That angel face on which my dotage hung!
How I have gaz'd upon her, till my soul
With very eagerness went forth towards her,
And issu'd at my eyes.—Was there a gem
Which the sun ripens in the Indian mine,
Or the rich bosom of the ocean yields?
What was there art could make, or wealth could buy,
Which I have left unsought to deck her beauty?
What could her king do more?—And yet she fled.

Bel. Away with that sad fancy—

Dum. Oh, that day!

The thought of it must live for ever with me.
I met her, Belmour, when the royal spoiler
Bore her in triumph from my widow's home!
Within his chariot, by his side she sat,
And listen'd to his talk with downward looks
'Till sudden as she chanc'd aside to glance,
Her eyes encounter'd mine;—Oh! then, my friend!
Oh! who can paint my grief and her amazement!
As at the stroke of death, twice turn'd she pale;
And twice a burning crimson blush'd all o'er her;
Then with a shriek heart-wounding, loud she cry'd,
While down her cheeks two gushing torrents ran
Fast falling on her hands, which thus she wrung:
Mov'd at her grief, the tyrant ravisher,
With courteous action woo'd her off to turn;
Earnest he seem'd to plead, but all in vain;
Ev'n to the last she bent her sight towards me,
And follow'd me—till I had lost myself. [Crosses.]

Bel. Alas, for pity! Oh! those speaking tears!
Could they be false? Did she not suffer with you?
For though the king by force possess'd her person,
Her unconsenting heart dwelt still with you.
If all her former woes were not enough,
Look on her now; behold her where she wanders,
Hunted to death, distress'd on every side,
With no one hand to help; and tell me then,
If ever misery were known like hers? [frame]

Dum. And can she bear it? Can that delicate
Endure the beating of a storm so rude?

Can she, for whom the various seasons chang'd
To court her appetite and crown her board,
For whom the foreign vintages were press'd,
For whom the merchant spread his silken stores,
Can she—

Entreat for bread, and want the needful raiment
To wrap her shiv'ring bosom from the weather?
When she was mine, no care came ever nigh her;
I thought the gentlest breeze that wakes the spring,
Too rough to breathe upon her; cheerfulness
Danc'd all the day before her, and at night
Soft slumbers waited on her downy pillow:—
Now, sad and shelterless, perhaps she lies,
Where piercing winds blow sharp, and the chill rain
Drops from some pent-house on her wretched head,
Drenches her locks, and kills her with the cold.
It is too much:—hence with her past offences,
They are aton'd at full. Why stay we then?
Oh! let us haste, my friend, and find her out.

Bel. Somewhere about this quarter of the town,
I hear the poor abandoned creature lingers;
Her guard, though set with strictest watch to keep,
All food and friendship from her, yet permit her
To wander in the streets, there choose her bed,
And rest her head on what cold stone she pleases.

Dum. Here then let us divide; each in his round
To search her sorrows out; whose hap it is
First to behold her, this way let him lead
Her fainting steps, and meet we here together.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter JANE SHORE, her hair hanging loose on her shoulders.

Jane S. Yet, yet endure, nor murmur, O my soul,
For are not thy transgressions great and numberless?
Do they not cover thee like rising floods,
And press thee like a weight of waters down?
Wait then with patience, till the circling hours
Shall bring the time of thy appointed rest,
And lay thee down in death.
And, hark! methinks the roar that late pursu'd me,
Sinks like the murmurs of a falling wind,
And softens into silence. Does revenge
And malice then grow weary, and forsake me?
My guard, too, that observ'd me still so close,
Tire in the task of their inhuman office,
And loiter far behind. Alas! I faint,
My spirits fail at once. This is the door
Of my Alicia;—blessed opportunity!
I'll steal a little succour from her goodness,
Now while no eye observes me. [She knocks.]

Enter SERVANT.

Is your lady,
My gentle friend, at home? Oh! bring me to her.
[Going in.]

Serv. Hold, mistress, whither would you;

[Throwing her back.]

Jane S. Do you not know me?

Serv. I know you well, and know my orders too:
You must not enter here;—

Jane S. Tell my Alicia.

'Tis I would see her.

Serv. She is ill at ease,
And will admit no visitor.

Jane S. But tell her

'Tis I, her friend, the partner of her heart,
Wait at the door and beg—

Serv. 'Tis all in vain:—
Go hence and howl to those that will regard you.

[Shuts the door.]

Jane S. It was not always thus: the time has been,
When this unfriendly door, that bars my passage,
Flew wide, and almost leap'd from off its hinges,
To give me entrance here; when this good house
Has pour'd forth all its dwellers to receive me;
When my approaches made a little holiday,
And every face was dress'd in smiles to meet me:
But now 'tis otherwise; and those who bless'd me,
Now curse me to my face. Why should I wander,
Stray further on, for I can die ev'n here?

[She falls down at the door of ALICIA's house.]

Enter ALICIA, in disorder.

Alic. What wretch art thou, whose misery and baseness
Hangs on my door; whose hateful whine of woe
Breaks in upon my sorrows, and distracts
My jarring senses with thy beggar's cry?

Jane S. A very beggar, and a wretch, indeed;

One driv'n by strong calamity to seek
For succours here : one perishing for want,
Whose hunger has not tasted food these three days ;
And humbly asks, for charity's dear sake,
A draught of water and a little bread.

Alic. And dost thou come to me, to me for bread ?
I know thee not. Go ;—hunt for it abroad,
Where wanton hands upon the earth have scatter'd it,
Or cast it on the waters. Mark the eagle,
And hungry vulture, where they wind the prey ;
Watch where the ravens of the valley feed,
And seek thy food with them :—I know thee not.

[Crosses]
Jane S. [Rises on her knees] And yet there was a time, when my Alicia
Has thought unhappy Shore her dearest blessing,
And mourn'd the live-long day she pass'd without me ;
Inclining fondly to me she has sworn,
She lov'd me more than all the world besides Alic. Ha ! say'st thou !—Let me look upon thee well ;—

'Tis true ;—I know thee now ;—a mischief on thee !

[Pushes her down again.]
Thou art that fatal fair, that cursed she, [me ;
That set my brain a madd'ning. Thou hast robb'd
Thou hast undone me.—Murder ! O, my Hastings !
See his pale bloody head shoots glaring by me !
Avant ! and come not near me.

Jane S. To thy hand
I trusted all ! gave my whole store to thee.
Nor do I ask it back : allow me but
The smallest pittance, give me but to eat,
Lest I fall down and perish here before thee.

Alic. Nay, tell not me ! Where is thy king, thy Edward,

And all the cringing train of courtiers,
That bent the knee before thee ?

Jane S. Oh ! for mercy ! [Rises.]

Alic. Mercy ! I know it not ! for I am miserable.
I'll give thee misery, for here she dwells ;
This is her house, where the sun never dawns,—
The bird of night sits screaming o'er the roof,—
Grim spectres sweep along the horrid gloom,
And nought is heard but wailings and lamentings.
Hark ! something cracks above ! it shakes ! it tot-ters !

And see the nodding ruin falls to crush me !
'Tis fall'n, 'tis here, I felt it on my brain ! [Falls.]
Let her take my counsel.

Why shouldst thou be a wretch ? [Rises.] Stab,
tear thy heart,

And rid thyself of this detested being ;
I wo' not linger long behind thee here.
A waving flood of bluish fire swells o'er me ;
And now 'tis out, and I am drown'd in blood.
Ha ! what art thou, thou horrid headless trunk ?
It is my Hastings ; see he wafts me on !

Away ! I go ! I fly ! I follow thee ! [Rushes off.]

Jane S. [Still lying.] Alas ! she raves ; her brain
I fear is turn'd ;

In mercy look upon her, gracious heav'n,
Nor visit her for any wrong to me.
Sure I am near upon my journey's end ;
My head runs round, my eyes begin to fail,
And dancing shadows swim before my sight,
I can no more ; receive me, thou cold earth ;
Thou common parent, take me to thy bosom,
And let me rest with thee.

Enter BELMOUR.

Bel. Upon the ground !
Thy miseries can never lay thee lower.

Look up, thou poor afflicted one ! thou mourner,
Whom none has comforted. Where are thy friends,
The dear companions of thy joyful days,
Whose hearts thy warm prosperity made glad,
Whose arms were taught to grow like ivy round thee,
And bind thee to their bosoms ?—[Kneels, and takes her head ; she raises her head.]—Thus with
thee ;

Thus let us live, and let us die, they said ;

Now where are they ? [aloof,

Jane S. Ah, Belmour ! where indeed ? they stand
And view my desolation from afar ;
And yet thy goodness turns aside to pity me.
Alas ! there may be danger ; get thee gone.

Let not me pull a ruin on thy head,
Leave me to die alone, for I am fall'n
Never to rise, and all relief is vain.

Bel. Yet raise thy drooping head ; for I am come
To chase away despair. Behold, where yonder
That honest man, that faithful, brave Dumont,
Is hastening to thy aid—

Jane S. Dumont ! Ha ! where ?

[Raising herself ; and looking about.]

Then heav'n has heard my pray'r : his very name
Renews the springs of life, and cheers my soul.
Has he then 'scaped the snare ?

Bel. He has ; but see—

He comes unlike to that Dumont you knew,
For now he wears your better angel's form,
And comes to visit you with peace and pardon.

Enter SHORE.

Jane S. Speak—tell me ! Which is he ? and ho !
what would

This dreadful vision ? See, it comes upon me—

[He crosses to her.]
It is my husband—Oh ! [She faints.]

Shore. She faints—support her ! [prise.]

Bel. Her weakness could not bear the strong sur
But see, she stirs ! and the returning blood
Faintly begins to blush again, and kindle
Upon her ashy cheek.

Shore. So—gently raise her. [Raising her.]

Jane S. Ha ! what art thou ? Belmour.

Bel. How fare you, lady ?

Jane S. My heart is thrill'd with horror.

Bel. Be of courage ;—

Your husband lives ! 'tis he, my worthiest friend.

Jane S. Still art thou there ? still dost thou hover round me ?

Oh, save me, Belmour, from his angry shade !

Bel. 'Tis he himself ! he lives ! look up.

Jane S. I dare not !

Oh, that my eyes could shut him out for ever.

Shore. Am I so hateful then, so deadly to thee,
To blast thy eyes with error ? Since I'm grown
A burden to the world, myself, and thee,
Would I had ne'er survived to see thee more.

Jane S. Oh ! thou most injur'd—dost thou live, indeed ?

Fall then, ye mountains, on my guilty head :
Hide me, ye rocks, within your secret caverns ;
Cast thy black veil upon my shame, O night !
And shield me with thy sable wing for ever.

Shore. Why dost thou turn away ?—Why tremble thus ?

Why thus indulge thy fears, and in despair
Abandon thy distracted soul to horror ?
Cast every black and guilty thought behind thee,
And let 'em never vex thy quiet more ;
My arms, my heart, are open to receive thee,
To bring thee back to thy forsaken home,

With tender joy, with fond forgiving love.—
Let us haste.—

Now while occasion seems to smile up us,
Forsake this place of shame, and find a shelter.

[They raise her.]

Jane S. What shall I say to you? But I obey.

Shore. Lean on my arm.

Jane S. Alas! I'm wondrous faint: [days.]

But that's not strange. I have not eat these three Shore. Oh, merciless!

Jane S. Oh! I am sick at heart!

Shore. Thou murd'rous sorrow!

Wo't thou still drink her blood, pursue her still?

Must she then die? O my poor penitent!

Speak peace to thy sad heart: she hears me not:

Grief masters ev'ry sense—

Enter CATESBY, with a Guard.

Cates. Seize on 'em both, as traitors to the state?

Bel. What means this violence?

[Guards lay hold on SHORE and BELMOUR.]

Cates. Have we not found you.

In scorn of the protector's strict command,

Assisting this base woman, and abetting

Her infamy?

Shore. Infamy on thy head!

Thou tool of power, thou pander to authority!

I tell thee, knave, thou know'st of none so virtuous,

And shee that bore thee was an Ethiop to her.

Cates. You'll answer this at full. Away with 'em.

Shore. Is charity grown treason to your court?

What honest man would live beneath such rulers?

I am content that we should die together.

Cates. Convey the men to prison; but for her—
Leave her to hunt her fortune as she may.

Jane S. I will not part with him:—for me! for me!
Oh! must he die for me?

[Following him as she is carried off.—She falls.]

Shore. Inhuman villains!

[Breaks from the Guards, and returns to her.]

Stand off! the agonies of death are on her!

She pulls, she gripes me hard with her cold hand.

Jane S. Was this blow wanting to complete my ruin?

Oh! let me go, ye ministers of terror.

He shall offend no more, for I will die,

And yield obedience to your cruel master.

Tarry a little, but a little longer,

And take my last breath with you.

Shore. Oh, my love,

Why dost thou fix thy dying eyes upon me,

With such an earnest, such a piteous look,

As if thy heart were full of some sad meaning

Thou couldst not speak?

Jane S. Forgive me!—but forgive me!

Shore. Be witness for me, ye celestial host,

Such mercy and such pardon as my soul

Accords to thee, and begs of heav'n to show thee;

May such befall me at my latest hour,

And make my portion blest or curst for ever.

Jane S. Then all is well, and I shall sleep in peace;

'Tis very dark, and I have lost you now: [you?]

Was there not something I would have bequeath'd

But I have nothing left me to bestow,

Nothing but one sad sigh. Oh! mercy, heav'n!

[Dies.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Village.

WELLBORN discovered, with a large rough stick, in tattered apparel, knocking at the alehouse door.
TAPWELL and FROTH come from the house.

Well. No credit, nor no liquor;

Tap. Not a suck, sir:

Nor the remainder of a single can,

Left by a drunken porter. [ing's draught, sir:

Froth. Not the dropping of the tap for your morn-
'Tis verity, I assure you.

Well. Verity, you brache!

The devil turned precision? Rogue, what am I?

Tap. Troth, durst I trust you with a looking-glass,
To let you see your trim shape, you would quit me,
And take the name yourself.

Well. How? dog! [Raising his cudgel.

Tap. Advance your Plymouth cloak, [ship,
There dwells, and within call, if it please your wor-
A potent monarch, call'd the constable,
That does command a citadel, call'd the stocks;
Such as with great dexterity will hale
Your threadbare, tatter'd—

Well. Rascal! slave!

Froth. No rage, sir.

Tap. At his own peril! Do not put yourself
In too much heat, there being no water near
To quench your thirst; and other drink, I take it,
You must no more remember; not in a dream, sir.

Well. Why thou unthankful villain, dar'st thou talk thus!

Is not thy house, and all thou hast, my gift!

Tap. I find it not in chalk: and Timothy Tapwell
Does keep no other register.

Well. Am not I he

Whose riots fed and cloth'd thee? Wert thou not Born on my father's land, and proud to be
A drudge in his house?

Tap. What I was, sir, it skills not;

What you are is apparent: but, since you
Talk of father, in my hope it will torment you,
I'll briefly tell your story. Your dead father,
Old Sir John Wellborn,
My quondam master, was a man of worship;
Bore the whole sway of the shire, kept a great house,
Reliev'd the poor, and so forth; but he dying,
And his estate coming to you,
Late master Francis, but now forlorn Wellborn—

Well. Slave, stop! or I shall lose myself.

Froth. Very hardly;

You cannot out of your way. [gallant.

Tap. You were then a lord of acres, the prime
And I your under butler.

O you'd merry time off't? hawks and hounds.

With choice of running horses: mistresses,

And other such extravagances: which

Your uncle, Sir Giles Overreach, observing,

Resolving not to lose the opportunity,

On statutes, mortgages, and binding bonds,

Awhile supplied your folly, and, having got

Your land, then left you. [mongrel,

Well. Some curate hath penn'd this invective,
And you have studied it.

Tap. I've not done yet;

Your land gone, and your credit not worth a token,
You grew the common borrower; no man 'scap'd
you;

Where poor Tim Tapwell, with a little stock,
Some forty pounds or so, bought a small cottage;
Humbled myself to marriage with my Froth here—

Well. Hear me, ungrateful hell-hound! Did not I Make purses for you? Then you lick'd my boots,
And thought your holiday cloak too coarse to clean em.

'Twas I, that, when I heard thee swear if ever
Thou could'st arrive at forty pounds, thou would'st

Live like an emperor, 'twas I that gave it
In ready gold. Deny this, wretch!

Tap. I must, sir!

For, from the tavern to the taphouse, all,
On forfeiture of their licenses, stand bound
Ne'er to remember who their best guests were,
If they grew poor, like you.

Well. They're well rewarded,
That beggar themselves to make such rascals rich.
Thou viper, thankless viper!

But, since you're grown forgetful, I will help
Your memory, and beat you into remembrance:
Not leave one bone unbroken.

Tap. O! O! O!

Froth. Help, help!—

Enter ALLWORTH.

All. Hold, for my sake, hold;

[Catches WELLBORN'S arm.]

Deny me, Frank? They're not worth your anger.

Well. For once, thou hast redeem'd them from this sceptre.

[Shaking his cudgel.]

But let 'em vanish;—

Nay, if you grumble, I revoke my pardon.

[WELLBORN and ALLWORTH talk apart.]

Froth. This comes of your prating husband.

Tap. Patience, Froth;

There's law to cure our bruises.

[Exeunt TAPWELL and FROTH into the alehouse.]

Well. Sent to your mother?

All. My lady, Frank, my patroness, my all!
She's such a mourner for my father's death,
And, in her love to him, so favours me,
I cannot pay too much observance to her:
There are few such stepdames.

Well. 'Tis a noble widow,
And keeps her reputation pure and clear.
But, 'pr'ythee, tell me,
Has she no suitors?

All. E'en the best of the shire, Frank,
My lord excepted: such as sue and send,
And send and sue again: but to no purpose.
Their frequent visits have not gain'd her presence;
Yet she's so far from sullenness and pride,
That I dare undertake, you shall meet from her
A liberal entertainment.

Well. I doubt it not. Now, Allworth, listen to me,
And mark my counsel: I am bound to give it.
Thy father was my friend; and that affection
I bore to him, in right descends to thee;
I will not have the least affront stick on thee,
If I with my danger can prevent it.

All. I thank your noble care: but, pray you, in
Do I run the hazard?

[what]

Well. Art thou not in love?

Put it not off with wonder.

All. In love? [transparent,

Well. You think you walk in clouds, but are
I've heard all, and the choice that you have made;
And, with my finger, can point out the north star
By which the loadstone of your folly's guided;
And to confirm this true, what think you of Fair Margaret, the only child and heir
Of comorant Overreach? Dost blush and start
To hear her only nam'd? Blush at your want
Of wit and reason.

All. Howe'er you have discover'd my intents,
You know my aims are lawful; and, if ever
The queen of flowers, the boast of spring, the rose,
Sprang from an envious briar, I may infer
There's such disparity in their conditions,
Between the goddess of my soul, the daughter,
And the base churl, her father.

Well. Grant this true,

As I believe it, canst thou ever hope
To enjoy a quiet bed with her, whose father
Ruin'd thy state!

All. And your's too.

Well. I confess it, Allworth.

Or can'st thou think, if self-love blind thee not,
That Sir Giles Overreach, who, to make her great
In swelling titles, without touch of conscience,
Will cut his neighbour's throat, and, I hope, his own too,

Will e'er consent to make her thine? Give o'er,
And think of some course suitable to thy rank;
And prosper in it.

All. You have well advis'd me.

But, in the mean time, you, that are so studious
Of my affairs, wholly neglected your own.
Remember yourself, and in what plight you are.

Well. No matter, no matter.

All. Yes, 'tis much material: [thing]
You know my fortune, and my means; yet some-
I can spare from myself to help your wants.

[Offers him money.]

Well. How's this?

All. Nay, be not angry.

Well. Money from thee?

From a boy? one that lives

At the devotion of a stepmother,

And the uncertain favour of a lord?

I'll eat my arms first. Howso'er blind Fortune.

Hath spent the utmost of her malice on me,
Though I am rudely thrust out of an alehouse,
And thus accoutred—know not where to eat,
Or drink, or sleep, but underneath this canopy—
Although I thank thee, I disdain thy offer.

No—as I, in my madness, broke my state,
Without th' assistance of another's brain,
In my right wits, I'll piece it; at the worst,
Die thus, and be forgotten.

All. Fare thee well.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Hall in Lady Allworth's House.—
Table, and four chairs.

AMBLE, ORDER, FURNACE, and WATCHALL, discovered, in a line across the stage.

Ord. Set all things right; or, as my name is Order,
And by this staff of office, that commands you,
This chain and double ruff, symbols of power,
Whoever misses in his function,
For one whole week makes forfeiture of his breakfast,
And privilege in the wine-cellar.

Wat. You are merry,

Good master Steward.

Fur. Let him; I'll be angry.

[yet,

Amb. Why, fellow Furnace, 'tis not twelve o'clock
Nor dinner taken up; then, 'tis allowed,
Cooks, by their places, may be choleric. [Ambles,

Fur. You think you have spoken wisely, Goodman
My lady's go-before.

Ord. Nay, nay, no wrangling.

Fur. Twit me with the authority of the kitchen;
At all hours, and at all places, I'll be angry:
And, thus provok'd, when I am at my prayers,
I will be angry.

Amb. There was no hurt meant.

[Crosses to FURNACE, and shakes hands.]

Fur. I'm friends with thee; and yet I will be angry.

Wat. With whom?

Fur. No matter whom; yet, now I think on't,
I'm angry with my lady.

Amb. Heaven forbid, man!

Ord. What cause has she given thee?

Fur. Cause enough, master Steward;
I was entertain'd by her to please her palate,
And till she forswore eating, I perform'd it.
Now, since our master, noble Allworth, died,
Though I crack my brain to find out tempting sauces,
When I am three parts roasted,
And the fourth part parboil'd, to prepare her viands,
She keeps her chamber, dines with a panada,
Or water-gruel, my sweat never thought on.

Ord. But your art is seen in the dining-room.

Fur. By whom?

By such as pretend love to her; but come
To feed upon her. Yet, of all the harpies
That do devour her, I am out of charity
With none so much as the thin-gutted squire
That's stolen into commission.

Ord. Justice Greedy? [him;

Fur. The same, the same. Meat's cast away upon
It never thrives. He holds this paradox:
Who eats not well, can ne'er do justice well:
His stomach's as insatiate as the grave

[A knocking without.

Wat. One knocks. [Exit Watchall.

Ord. Our late young master.

Enter WATCHALL and ALLWORTH, saluting them.

Wat. Welcome, sir. [Allworth crosses to Furnace.

Fur. You're welcome:

If you've a stomach, a cold bake-meat's ready.

[Allworth crosses to Order.

Ord. His father's picture in little.

[Crosses to Amble.

Amb. We are all your servants.

All. At once my thanks to all.

This is yet some comfort. Is my lady stirring?

Ord. Her presence answers for us.

Enter LADY ALLWORTH, ABIGAIL, and TABITHA.

Lady A. Sort those silks well.

I'll take the air alone. [Exeunt TAB. and ABIGAIL.

And, as I gave directions, if this morning

I'm visited by one, entertain 'em

As heretofore: but say, in my excuse,

I'm indisposed.

Ord. We shall, madam.

Lady A. Do, and leave me.

[Exeunt WATCHALL, FURNACE, ORDER, and AMBLE.

Nay, stay you, Allworth.—Tell me, how is't with Your noble master?

All. Ever like himself;

No scruple lessen'd in the full weight of honour.

He did command me—pardon my presumption—

As his unworthy deputy, to kiss

Your ladyship's fair hands.

Lady A. I'm honour'd in His favour to me. Does he hold his purpose

For the low countries?

All. Constantly, good madam;

But will, in person, first present his service.

Lady A. And how approve you of his course?—
you're yet,

Like virgin parchment, capable of any

Inscription, vicious or honourable:

I will not force your will, but leave you free

To your own election.

All. Any form you please

I will put on: but—might I make my choice—

With humble emulation, I would follow

The path my lord marks to me.

Lady A. 'Tis well answer'd?

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXXV.

And I commend your spirit: your father, Allworth,
My ever-honour'd husband, some few hours
Before the will of heaven took him from me,
Did commend you, e'en by the dearest ties
Of perfect love between us, to my charge:
And, therefore, when I speak, you are bound to hear
With such respect, as if he liv'd in me.

All. I have found you,
Most honour'd madam, more than a mother to me;
And, with my utmost strength of care and service,
Will labour that you may never repent
Your bounties shower'd upon me.

Lady A. I much hope it.

These were your father's words:—If e'er my son!

Follow the war, tell him, it is a school

Where all the principles tending to honour

Are taught, if truly follow'd: but for such

As repair thither, as a place in which

They do presume they may with license practice

Their lawless riots, they shall never merit

The noble name of soldiers.

To obey their leaders, and shun mutinies:

To bear with patience the winter's cold,

And summer's scorching heat;

To dare boldly

In a fair cause; and, for their country's sake,

To run upon the cannon's mouth undaunted;

These are the essential parts make up a soldier;

Not swearing, dice, or drinking.

All. There's no syllable

You speak, but is to me an oracle.

Lady A. To conclude:

Beware ill company; for, often men

Are like to those with whom they do converse;

And from one man I warn you, and that's Wellborn:

Not 'cause he's poor, that rather claims your pity;

But that he's in his manners so deprav'd,

And hath in vicious courses lost himself.

'Tis true your father lov'd him, while he was Worthy the loving; but, if he had liv'd

To've known him as he is, he had cast him off,

As you must do. [Noise without.

Somebody comes. This way:

Follow me to my chamber: you shall have gold

To furnish you like my son, and still supplied

As I hear from you.

All. I am still bound to you. [Exeunt.

Enter ORDER, WATCHALL, SIR GILES OVERREACH,

MARRALL, GREEDY, FURNACE, and AMBLE.

Gree. Not to be seen!

Sir G. Still cloister'd up! Her reason,

I hope, assures her, though she makes herself

Close prisoner ever for her husband's loss,

'Twill not recover him.

Ord. Sir, 'tis her will;

Which we, that are her servants, ought to serve,

And not dispute: how'er, you are nobly welcome;

And, if you please to stay, that you may think so;

There came, not six days since, from Hull, a pipe

Of rich Canary, which shall spend itself

For my lady's honour.

Gree. Is it of the right race?

[SIR GILES and MARRALL converse apart.

Ord. Yes, Master Greedy.

Amb. How his mouth runs o'er!

Fur. I'll make it run and run,

Save your good worship! [how I love thee!

Gree. Honest master cook, thy hand; again:

Are the good dishes still in being? speak, boy.

Fur. If you've a mind to feed, there is a chine

Of beef well season'd.

Gree. Good.

Fur. A pheasant larded.

Gree. That I might now give thanks for't!

Fur. Besides, there came last night, from the forest of Sherwood,
The fattest stag I ever cook'd.

Gree. A stag, man?

Fur. A stag, sir; part of it prepar'd for dinner,
And bak'd in puff-paste.

Gree. Puff-paste too! Sir Giles,
A ponderous chine of beef! a pheasant larded!
And red deer, too, Sir Giles, and bak'd in puff-paste!
All business set aside, let us give thanks here.

Sir G. You know, we cannot.

Mar. Your worshippers are to sit on a commission,
And, if you fail to come, you lose the cause.

Gree. Cause me no causes; I'll prove't, for such a dinner,

We may put off a commission: you shall find it
Henrici decimo quarto.

Sir G. Fie, Master Greedy!

Will you lose me a thousand pounds for a dinner?
No more, for shame! We must forget the belly,
When we think of profit.

Gree. Well, you shall o'er-rule me.
I could e'en cry now. Do you hear, master cook?
Send but a corner of that immortal pasty,
And I, in thankfulness, will, by your boy,
Send you—a brace of three-pences.

Fur. Will you be so prodigal?

[GREEDY and FURNACE converse apart.]

Sir G. [TO ORDER.] Remember me to your lady.

Enter WELLBORN.

Whom have we here?

Well. You know me.

Sir G. I did once, but now will not;
Thou art no blood of mine. [Crosses, followed by
MARRALL.] Avaunt, thou beggar!

If ever thou presume to cross me more,
I'll have thee cag'd and whipp'd. [Exit SIR GILES.

Gree. I'll grant the warrant.
Think of pyc-corner, Furnace!

[Ereunt GREEDY and MARRALL, MARRALL eyeing WELLBORN contemptuously—who takes a chair, and sits.

Wat. Will you out, sir?

[Going towards WELLBORN.

I wonder how you durst creep in.

Ord. This is rudeness,
And saucy impudence.

Amb. Cannot you stay
To be serv'd, among your fellows, from the basket,
But you must press into the hall?

Fur. 'Pr'ythee, vanish
Into some outhouse, though it be the pigstye;
My scullion shall come to thee.

Well. This is rare:

Enter ALLWORTH.

O, here's Tom Allworth. Tom!

All. We must be strangers;

Nor would I have you seen here for a million. [Exit.
Well. Better and better:—He contemns me too!

Enter ABIGAIL and TABITHA.

Abi. [Seeing WELLBORN.] Mercy preserve my sight! What thing is this!

Tab. A wretched object, truly,
Let's hence, for heaven's sake, or I shall swoon.

Abi. I begin to faint already.

[Ereunt ABIGAIL and TABITHA.

Fur. Will you know your way, sir?

Amb. Or shall we teach it you,
By the head and shoulders?

Well. No; I will not stir: [the wretch
Do you mark? I will not. [Starts up.] Let me see
That dares attempt to force me. Why, you slaves,
Created only to make legs, and cringe;
To carry in a dish, and shift a trencher;
That have not souls only to hope a blessing
Beyond your master's leaving—who advances?
Who shews me the way! [Threatening them.

All the Servants. Help, fellows, help!—Within
Ord. Here comes my lady. [there!]

Enter LADY ALLWORTH.

Lady A. How now? What noise is this?

Well. [Advancing to her.] Madam, my designs
Bear me to you.

Lady A. To me?

Well. And, though I've met with
But ragged entertainment from your rooms here
I hope from you to receive that noble usage,
As may become the true friend of your husband,
And then I shall forget these.

Lady A. I'm amaz'd,
To see and hear this rudeness. Dar'st thou think
Though sworn, that it can ever find belief
That I, who to the best men of this country
Denied my presence since my husband's death,
Can fall so low, as to exchange words with thee?

Well. Scorn me not, good lady;
But, as in form you are angelical,
Imitate the heavenly natures, and vouchsafe
At the least awhile to hear me. You will grant
The blood that runs in this arm is as noble
As that which fills your veins: your swelling titles,
Your ample fortune, with your men's observance
And women's flattery, are in you no virtues;
Nor these rags, with my poverty, in me vices.
You have a fair fame, and, I know, deserve it;
Yet, lady, I must say, in nothing more
Than in the pious sorrow you have shewn
For your late noble husband.

Ord. There he touch'd her.

[Aside.

Well. That husband, madam, was once in his fortune

Almost as low as I; want, debts, and quarrels,
Lay heavy on him: let it not be thought
A boast in me, though I say I relieved him.
'Twas I that gave him fashion; mine the sword
That did on all occasions second his;
I brought him on and off with honour, lady;
And when in all men's judgments he was sunk,
And in his own hopes not to be buoy'd up,
I stepp'd unto him, took him by the hand,
And set him upright.

Fur. Are we not base rogues,
That could forget this? [Aside to Servants.

Well. I confess you made him
Master of your estate; nor could your friends,
Tho' he brought no wealth with him, blame you for't.
For he'd a shape, and to that shape a mind
Made up of all parts, either great or noble;
So winning a behaviour, not to be Resisted, madam.

Lady A. 'Tis most true, he had.

Well. For his sake, then, in that I was his friend,
Do not contemn me.

Lady A. For what's past excuse me:

I will redeem it. [Offers him her pocket-book.

Well. Madam, on no terms:

I will not beg nor borrow sixpence of you;
But be supplied elsewhere, or want thus ever.
One only suit I make; pray give me leave.

[Lady ALLWORTH signs to the Servants, who retire.
I will not tire your patience with relation

Of the bad art my uncle Overreach
Still forg'd, to strip me of my fair possessions;
Nor how he now shuts door upon my want.
Would you but vouchsafe
To your dear husband's friend—as well you may,
Your honour still let free—but such feign'd grace,
As might beget opinion in Sir Giles
Of a true passion tow'rd's me, you would see,
In the mere thought to prey on me again,
When all that's your's were mine, he'd turn my friend;

And, that no rub might stay my course to you,
Quit all my owings, set me trimly forth,
And furnish'd well with gold :—which I should use,
I trust, to your no shame, lady; but live
Ever a grateful debtor to your gentleness.

Lady A. What! nothing else?

[Offers her pocket-book again.

Well. Nothing, unless you please to charge your servants

To throw away a little respect upon me.

Lady A. All you demand is yours.

[She beckons the Servants, who advance a little.

Respect this gentleman,

As 'twere myself. Adieu, dear Master Wellborn—

Pray let me see you with your oftenest means :

I am ever bound to you.

[Going, WELLBORN waiting on her.

Well. Your honour's servant. [Kisses her hand.

[Exit Lady ALLWORTH.

All the Servants. [Coming up to WELLBORN with bows and cringes.] Ah, sweet sir—

Well. Nay, all's forgiven, all forgotten, friends :

And, for a lucky omen to my project,

Shake hands, and end all quarrels in the cellar.

All the Servants. Agreed, agreed! Still merry,
Master Wellborn. [Exeunt all the Servants.

Well. Faith, a right worthy and a liberal lady,

Who can at once so kindly meet my purposes,

And brave the flouts of censure, to redeem

Her husband's friend!—When, by this honest plot,

The world believes she means to heal my wants

With her extensive wealth, each noisy creditor

Will be struck mute; and I, thus left at large

To practice on my uncle Overreach,

May work, perhaps, the measure to redeem

My mortgag'd fortune, which he stripp'd me of,

When headlong dissipation quell'd my reason.

The fancy pleases : if the plot succeed,

'Tis a new way to pay old debts, indeed [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Skirts of Lady Allworth's Park.

Enter MARRALL and Sir GILES.

Sir G. He's gone, I warrant thee; this commission crush'd him. [Miss

Mar. Your worship has the way on't and ne'er

To squeeze these unthrifths into air : and yet

The chap-fall'n justice did his part, returning,

For your advantage, the certificate,

Against his conscience and his knowledge too,

To the utter ruin

Of the poor farmer.

Sir G. 'Twas for these good ends

I made him a justice : he that bribes his belly,

Is certain to command his soul.

Mar. I wonder why, your worship having

The power to put this thin-gut in commission,

You are not in't yourself.

Sir G. Thou art a fool;

In being out of office, I am out of danger;

Where, if I were a justice, besides the trouble,

I might, or out of wilfulness, or error,

Run myself finely into a præmunire,

And so become a prey to the informer;

No, I'll have none on't : 'tis enough I keep

Greedy at my devotion : so he serve

My purposes, let him hang, or damn, I care not;

Friendship is but a word.

Mar. You are all wisdom. [wisdom,

Sir G. I would be worldly wise; for the other

That does prescribe us a well-govern'd life,

And to do right to others as ourselves,

I value not an atom.

Mar. What course take you,

To hedge in the manor

Of your neighbour, Mr. Frugal? As 'tis said,

He will nor sell, nor borrow, nor exchange;

And his land, lying in the midst of your many lord-

Is a foul blemish. [ships,

Sir G. I have thought o't, Marrall;

And it shall take. [Placing his hand on MARRALL'S shoulder.] I must have all men, sellers,

And I the only purchaser.

Mar. 'Tis most fit, sir. [manor;

Sir G. I'll therefore buy some cottage near his

Which done, I'll make my men break ope his fences,

Ride o'er his standing corn, and in the night

Set fire to his barns, or break his cattle's legs;

These trespasses draw on suits, and suits expenses,

Which I can spare, but will soon beggar him.

When I have harried him thus two or three years,

Though he sue in forma pauperis, in spite

Of all his thrift and care, he'll grow behind-hand.

Mar. The best I ever heard! I could adore you.

Sir G. Then with the favour of my man of law,

I will pretend some title : want will force him

To put it to arbitrement; then, if he sell

For half the value, he shall have ready money,

And I possess his land.

Mar. Wellborn was apt to sell, and needed not

These fine arts, sir, to hook him in.

Sir G. Well thought on :

That varlet, Wellborn, lives too long, to upbraid me

With my close cheat put upon him. Will nor cold

Nor hunger kill him?

Mar. I know not what to think on't;

I've us'd all means; and, the last night, I caus'd

His host the tapster turn him out of doors;

And have been since with all your friends and tenants,

And, on the forfeit of your favour, charg'd them,

Though a crust of mouldy bread would keep him from starving,

Yet they should not relieve him. This is done, sir.

Sir G. That was something, Marrall; but thou

And suddenly, Marrall. [must go further,

Mar. Where and when you please, sir. [canst,

Sir G. I'd have thee seek him out, and, if thou

Persuade him that 'tis better steal than beg :

Then, if I prove he has but robb'd a hen-roost,

Not all the world shall save him from the gallows.

Do any thing to work him to despair,

And 'tis thy master-piece.

Mar. I'll do my best, sir. [Lovell,

Sir G. I'm now on my main work, with the Lord

The gallant-minded, popular, Lord Lovell,

The minion of the people's love. I hear

He's come into the country; and my aims are,
To insinuate myself into his knowledge,
And then invite him to my house.

Mar. I have you;

This points at my young mistress.

Sir G. She must part with

That humble title, and be honourable, [daughter,
Right honourable, Marrall; my right honourable
If all I have, or e'er shall get, will do it!
I'll have her well attended; there are ladies
Of errant riches decay'd, and brought so low,
That, for cast clothes and meat, will gladly serve her
And 'tis my glory, tho' I come from the city,
To have their issue, whom I have undone,
To kneel to mine, as bond-slaves.

Mar. 'Tis fit state, sir.

[maid

Sir G. And therefore, I'll not have a chamber-
That ties her shoes, or any meaner office,
But such whose fathers were right worshipful.
'Tis a rich man's pride! there having ever been
More than a feud, a strange antipathy,
Between us and true gentry.

Enter WELLBORN.

Mar. See, who's here, sir.

Sir G. Hence, monster! prodigy!

Well. Call me what you will;—

I am your nephew, sir, your sister's son. [rogue!

Sir G. Avoid my sight! thy breath's infectious,
I shun thee as a leprosy, or the plague.

Come hither, Marrall.—This is the time to work him.

Mar. I warrant you, sir.

[Exit Sir GILES.

Well. By this light, I think, he's mad,

Mar. Mad! had you ta'en compassion on yourself,
You long since had been mad.

Well. You've ta'en a course,

Between you and my venerable uncle,
To make me so.

Mar. The more pale spirited you,

That would not be instructed. I swear deeply—

Well. By what?

Mar. By my religion.

Well. Thy religion!

The devil's creed!—But what would you have done?

Mar. Had there been but one tree in the whole
Or any hope to compass a single halter, [shire

Before, like you, I had outliv'd my fortunes,

A withe had serv'd my turn to hang myself.

I'm zealous in your cause: 'pray, hang yourself,
And presently, as you love your credit.

Well. I thank you.

Mar. Will you stay till you die in a ditch?

Or, if you dare not do the feat yourself,
But that you'll put the state to charge and trouble,

Is there no purse to be cut? house to be broken?

Or market-woman with eggs that you may murder,
And so despatch the business?

Well. Here's variety,

I must confess; but I'll accept of none

Of all your gentle offers, I assure you.

Mar. If you like not hanging, drown yourself;
For your reputation. [take some course

Well. 'Twill not do, dear tempter,

With all the rhetoric the fiend hath taught you,

I am as far as thou art from despair;

Nay, I have confidence, which is more than hope,

To live, and suddenly, better than ever.

Mar. Ha! ha! these castles, you build in the air,

Will not persuade me or to give or lend

A token to you

Well. I'll be more kind to thee:

Come, thou shalt dine with me.

Mar. With you!

Well. Nay, more; dine gratis! [cost?

Mar. Under what hedge, I pray you? or at whose
Are they padders, or gipsies, that are your consorts?

Well. Thou art incredulous; but thou shalt dine,
Not alone at her house, but with a gallant lady;

With me, and with a lady.

Mar. Lady! what lady?

With the lady of the lake, or queen of fairies?

For, I know, it must be an enchanted dinner.

Well. With the Lady Allworth, knave.

Mar. Nay, now there's hope

Thy brain is crack'd.

Well. Mark there with what respect

I am entertained.

Mar. With choice, no doubt, of dog-whips.

Why, dost thou ever hope to pass her porter?

Well. 'Tis not far off, go with me: trust thine own eyes.

Mar. Troth, in my hope, or my assurance rather,
To see thee curvet and mount like a dog in a blanket,
If ever thou presume to pass her threshold,
I will endure thy company.

Well. Come along then.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—The Hall in Lady Allworth's House.

Enter WATCHALL, FURNACE, ORDER, AMBLE, and ALLWORTH.

All. Your courtesies o'erwhelm me: I much grieve
To part with such true friends; and yet find comfort.
My attendance on my honourable lord,
Whose resolution holds to visit my lady,
Will speedily bring me back.

[WELLBORN and MARRALL without. WELL-
BORN knocks. Exit WATCHALL.

Mar. Dar'st thou venture further?

Well. Yes, yes, and knock again.

[Knocks.

Ord. 'Tis he; disperse.

Amb. Perform it bravely.

Fur. I know my cue, ne'er doubt me.

[Exeunt FURNACE, ORDER, and AMBLE.

Enter WATCHALL, WELLBORN, and MARRALL.

Wat. Beast that I was, to make you stay! Most
You were long since expected. [welcome;

Well. Say so much

To my friend, I pray you.

Wat. For your sake, I do, sir.

Mar. For his sake!

Well. Mum; this is nothing.

Mar. More than ever

I'd have believ'd, tho' I had found it in my primer.

All. When I have given you reasons for my late harshness;

You'll pardon and excuse me; for, believe me,

Though now I part abruptly, in my service

I will deserve it.

Mar. Service! with a vengeance!

Well. I'm satisfied: farewell, Tom.

All. All joy stay with you;

[Exit.

Enter AMBLE.

Amb. You're happily encounter'd; I ne'er yet
Presented one so welcome as I know

You will be to my lady.

Mar. This is some vision;

Or, sure, these men are mad, to worship a dunghill:
It cannot be a truth.

Well. Be still a pagan,

An unbelieving infidel; be so, miscreant,
And meditate on blankets, and on dog-whips!

Enter FURNACE.

Fur. I'm glad you're come; until I know your pleasure,

I knew not how to serve up my lady's dinner.

Mar. His pleasure! is it possible!

Well. What's thy will?

Fur. Marry, sir, I have

[you,

Some rails and quails, and my lady will'd me ask
What kind of sauces best affect your palate,
That I may use my utmost skill to please it.

[WELLBORN whispers FURNACE up the stage.

Mar. [Walking about amazed.] The devil's enter'd this cook: sauce for his palate,

That, on my knowledge,

[Sundays!

Durst wish but cheese-parings and brown bread on

Well. That way I like them best.

Fur. It shall be done, sir.

[Erit FURNACE.

Well. What think you of the hedge we shall dine
Shall we feed gratis?

[under?

Mar. I know not what to think;

'Pray you, make me not mad.

Enter ORDER.

Ord. This place becomes you not;

'Pray you, walk, sir, to the dining-room.

Well. I am well here,

Till her ladyship quits her chamber.

Mar. Well here, say you?

'Tis a rare change! but yesterday, you thought

Yourself well in a barn, wrapp'd up in pease-straw.

Enter TABITHA and ABIGAIL.

Tab. O! you're much wish'd for, sir.

Abi. Last night, my lady

Dreamt of you; and her first command this morning,
Was to have notice, sir, of your arrival.

Wat. See my lady.

Enter Lady ALLWORTH.—ORDER bows and exit.

Lady A. I come to meet you, and languish'd till
I saw you.

This first kiss is for form: I allow a second
To such a friend.

Mar. To such a friend! heaven bless me!

Well. I'm wholly your's; yet, madam, if you
To grace this gentleman with a salute—

[please

[Puts MARRALL over to Lady ALLWORTH.

Mar. Salute me at his bidding!

[MARRALL retreats towards the door.

Well. I shall receive it

As a most high favour.

Lady A. Your friends are ever welcome to me.

Well. [Brings MARRALL back.] Run backward from a lady! and such a lady!

Mar. To kiss her foot is, to poor me, a favour
I am unworthy of—

[Offers to kiss her foot.

Lady A. Nay, 'pray you, rise;

And, since you are so humble, I'll exalt you:

You shall dine with me to-day at mine own table.

Mar. Your ladyship's table! I'm not good enough
To sit at your steward's board.

Lady A. You are too modest;
I will not be denied.

Enter ORDER.

Ord. Dinner is ready for your ladyship.

Lady A. Come, Master Wellborn:—

[To MARRALL, who is retreating again.

Nay, keep us company.

Mar. I was ne'er so grac'd.

[Exeunt Lady ALLWORTH and WELLBORN, taking MARRALL by the hand, he bowing with the greatest servility, followed by ABI-GAIL, TABITHA, AMBLE, and WATCHALL.

Enter FURNACE.

Ord. So, we've play'd our parts, and are come off
But if I know the mystery why my lady [well:
Consented to it, may I perish!

Fur. Would I had

The roasting of his heart that cheated him,
And forces the poor gentleman to these shifts!
By fire—for cooks are Persians, and swear by it—
Of all the griping and extorting tyrants
I ever heard or read of, I ne'er met
A match to Sir Giles Overreach.

Wat. What will you take

To tell him so, fellow Furnace?

Fur. Just as much

[on't.

As my throat is worth; for that would be the price
To have a usurer that starves himself,

To grow rich, and then purchase, is too common:
But this Sir Giles feeds high; keeps many servants;
Rich in his habit; vast in his expenses;

Yet he, to admiration, still increases

In wealth and lordships.

Ord. He frights men out of their estates;

And breaks through all law-nets, made to curb ill
men,

As they were cobwebs. No man dares reprove him.
Such a spirit to dare, and power to do, were never Lodg'd so unluckily.

Enter AMBLE.

Amb. Ha! ha! I shall burst.

Ord. Contain thyself, man.

Fur. Or make us partakers

Of your sudden mirth.

Amb. Ha! ha! my lady has got

Such a guest at her table!—this term driver, Marrall,
This snip of an attorney!

Wat. What of him, man?

Amb. The knave feeds so slovenly!

Fur. Is this all?

Amb. My lady

[Wellborn;

Drank to him for fashion's sake, or to please Master
As I live, he rises and takes up a dish
In which there were some remnants of a boild capon,
And pledges her in white broth!

Fur. Nay, 'tis like

The rest of his tribe.

Amb. And when I brought him wine,

He leaves his chair, and, after a leg or two,

Most humbly thanks my worship—my worship!

All the Servants. Ha! ha! ha!

Ord. Risen already?

Fur. My lady frowns.

Amb. I shall be chid.

[Erit FURNACE.

Enter Lady ALLWORTH, WELLBORN, and MARRALL.

Lady A. You attend us well!

[ing:

Let me have no more of this: I observ'd your leer—
Sir, I will have you know, whom I think worthy
To sit at my table,

When I am present, is not your companion.

Ord. [Aside.] Nay, she'll preserve what's due to her.

Lady A. [To WELLBORN.] You are master
Of your own will. I know so much of manners,
As not to inquire your purposes; in a word,

[Crosses, WELLBORN following her.

To me you are ever welcome, as to a house
That is your own.

Well. [To MARRALL.] Mark that!

Mar. With reverence, sir,

And it like your worship.

Well. Trouble yourself no further,

Dear madam, my heart's full of zeal and service;
However in my language I am sparing.

Come, Master Marrall.

Mar. I attend your worship.

[Exeunt WATCHALL, WELLBORN, and MARRALL.]

Lady A. [To the Servants.] I see in your looks you are sorry, and you know me

An easy mistress: be merry; I have forgot all.
Order and Amble, come with me; I must give you
Further directions.

Ord. What you please.

Amb. We are ready. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The open Country.

Enter WELLBORN and MARRALL.

Well. I think I'm in a good way.

Mar. Good, sir! The best way;

The certain best way. [right-worshipful.]

You are worshipful—and I hope you will become

Well. Is't for your ease

You keep your hat off?

Mar. Ease, and it like your worship!

I hope Jack Marrall shall not live so long,
To prove himself such an unmannerly beast,
Though it hail hazel-nuts, as to be covered
When your worship's present.

Well. [Aside.] Is not this a true rogue,
That, out of mere hope of a future coz'nage,
Can turn thus suddenly? 'tis rank already.

Mar. I know your worship's wise and needs no
Yet if, in my desire to do you service, [counsel;]
I humbly offer my advice, (but still Under correction), I hope I shall not Incur your high displeasure.

Well. No; speak freely. [judgment,]

Mar. Then, in my judgment, sir, my simple (Still with your worship's favour), I could wish you
A better habit; for this cannot be
But much distasteful to the noble lady
That loves you:

I have twenty pounds here,
Which, out of my true love, I'll presently Lay down at your worship's feet; 'twill serve to
A riding suit. [buy you]

Well. But where's the horse?

Mar. My gelding

Is at your service: nay, you shall ride me,
Before your worship shall be put to the trouble
To walk afoot. Alas! when you are lord
Of this lady's manor, (as I know you will be),
You may with the lease of glebe land, call'd Knaves

Acre,

A place I would manure, requite your vassal.

Well. I thank thy love; but will make no use of it.
Did I want clothes think'st thou I could not have
For one word to my lady? ['em]

Mar. As I know not that—

[thee.]

Well. Come, I'll tell thee a secret, and so leave
I'll not give her the advantage, though she be
A gallant-minded lady, after we're married,
To hit me in the teeth and say, she was forc'd
To buy my wedding clothes.—

No, I'll be furnish'd something like myself,
And so farewell.—For thy suit touching Knaves

Acre,

When it is mine, 'tis thine. [Erit WELLBORN.]

Mar. I thank your worship

How was I cozen'd in the calculation
Of this man's fortune! My master's cozen'd too,
Whose pupil I am in the art of undoing men;

For that is our profession. Well, well, master

Wellborn;

You are of a sweet nature, and fit again to be cheated;
Which, if the fates please, when you are possess'd
Of the land and lady, you sans question shall be.
I'll presently think of the means. [Musing.]

Sir G. [Without.] Sirrah, take my horse,
I'll walk, to get me an appetite; 'tis but a mile;
And exercise will keep me from being pursy.

Enter Sir GILES.

Ha! Marrall!—Is he conjuring? Perhaps
The knave has wrought the prodigal to do
Some outrage on himself, and now he feels Compunction in his conscience for't: no matter,
So it be done.—Marrall! Marrall!

Mar. Sir?

Sir G. How succeed we
In our plot on Wellborn?

Mar. Never better, Sir.

Sir G. Has he hang'd or drown'd himself?

Mar. No, Sir, he lives;

Lives, once more to be made a prey to you,
A greater prey than ever.

Sir G. Art thou in thy wits?

If thou art, reveal this miracle, and briefly.

Mar. A lady, sir, is fallen in love with him.

Sir G. With him! What lady?

Mar. The rich lady Allworth.

Sir G. Thou dolt! how dar'st thou speak this?

Mar. I speak truth,
And I do so but once a-year, unless
It be to you, sir. We din'd with her ladyship;
I thank his worship.

Sir G. His worship!

Mar. As I live, sir,

I din'd with him, at the great lady's table, [him,]
Simple as I stand here; and saw when she kiss'd
And would, at his request, have kiss'd me too.

Sir G. Why, thou rascal!

To tell me these impossibilities.

Dine at her table! and kiss him! or thee!

Impudent varlet, have not I myself,
Ten times attempted, since her husband's death,
In vain, to see her, though I came—a suitor?
And yet your good solicitorship, and rogue Wellborn,
Were brought into her presence, feasted with her!—
But that I know thee a dog that cannot blush,
This most incredible lie would call up one
On thy buttermilk cheeks.

Mar. Shall I not trust my eyes, sir,
Or taste? I feel her good cheer in my belly.

Sir G. You shall feel me, if you give not over, sirrah:

Recover your brains again, and be no more gull'd
With a beggar's plot, assisted by the aids
Of serving-men and chambermaids;
Or I'll quit you
From my employments.

Mar. Will you credit this yet?

[born—]

On my confidence of their marriage, I offer'd Well-
I'd give a crown now I durst say his worship, [Aside.]
My nag and twenty pounds.

Sir G. Did you so, idiot?

[Strikes him—MARRALL retreats.]

Was this the way to work him to despair,

Or rather to cross me?

[Beats him.]

Mar. Will your worship kill me?

Sir G. No, no; but drive the lying spirit out of you.

Mar. He's gone.

Sir G. I've done then. Now, forgetting
Your late imaginary feast and lady,
Know, my lord Lovell dines with me to-morrow:

Be careful nought be wanting to receive him;
And bid my daughter's women trim her up,
Though they paint her, so she catch the lord, I'll thank 'em.

There's a piece for my late blows.

Mar. [Aside.] I may yet cry quittance;

There may be a time—

Sir G. Do you grumble?

Mar. No, sir.

[Ereunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Skirts of Lady Allworth's Park.

Enter Lovell and Allworth.

Lov. [Speaking as he enters.] Drive the coach round the hill: something in private
I must impart to Allworth.

All. O, my lord,

What sacrifice of reverence, duty, watching,
Although I could put off the use of sleep,
And ever wait on your command to serve 'em;
What dangers, though in ne'er so horrid shapes,
Nay death itself, though I should run to meet it,
Can I, and with a thankful willingness, suffer;
But still the retribution will fall short
Of your bounties shower'd upon me?

Lov. Nay, good youth,
Till what I purpose be put into act,
Do not o'erprize it. Since you've trusted me
With your soul's nearest, nay, her dearest secret,
Rest confident, 'tis in a cabinet lock'd
Treachery shall never open. I have found you
More zealous in your love and service to me
Than I have been in my rewards.

All. Still great ones,
Above my merit,
You have been
More like a father to me than a master:
'Pray you, pardon the comparison.

Lov. I allow it;
And to give you assurance I am pleas'd in't,
My carriage and demeanour to your mistress,
Fair Margaret, shall truly witness for me,
I can command my passions.

All. 'Tis a conquest
Few men can boast of, when they are tempted.—Oh!

Lov. Why do you sigh? Can you be doubtful of me?

By that fair name I in the wars have purchas'd,
And all my actions, hitherto untainted,
I will not be more true to mine own honour
Than to thee, Allworth!

All. Were you to encounter with a single foe,
The victory were certain: but to stand
The charge of two such potent enemies,
At once assaulting you, as wealth and beauty,
And those too seconded with power, is odds
Too great for Hercules.

Lov. Speak your doubts and fears,
Since you will nourish 'em, in plainer language,
That I may understand 'em.

All. My much-lov'd lord, were Margaret only fair,
You might command your passion;
But, when the well-tun'd accents of her tongue
Make music to you, and with numerous sounds
Assault your hearing,
Hippolytus himself would leave Diana,
To follow such a Venus.

Lov. Love hath made you
Poetical, Allworth.

All. Grant all these beat off

(Which if it be in man to do, you'll do it),
Mammon, in Sir Giles Overreach, steps in
With heap of ill-got gold, and as much land
As would tire

A falcon's wings, in one day to fly over.

I here release your trust:

'Tis happiness enough for me, to serve you,
And sometimes with chaste eyes, to look upon her.

Lov. Why, shall I swear?

All. O, by no means, my lord!

Lov. Suspend

Your judgment to the trial. — How far is't

To Overreach's house?

All. At the most, some half hour's riding;

You'll soon be there.

Lov. And you the sooner freed

From your jealous fears.

All. Oh, that I durst but hope it! [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—The Hall in Sir Giles' House.

*Enter Sir GILES, GREEDY, and MARRALL; Sir
GILES and MARRALL remain up stage, GREEDY advances to front.*

Sir G. Spare for no cost; let my dresser crack with the weight
Of curious viands.

Gree. Store indeed's no sore, sir. [Greedy.]

Sir G. That proverb fits your stomach, master Gree. It does indeed, Sir Giles: I do not like to see a table ill-spread, poor, meagre, just sprinkled o'er with salads, slic'd beef, giblets, and pig's petitoes. But the substantials!—O, Sir Giles, the substantials! The state of a fat turkey now! the decorum, the grandeur, he marches in with! O, I declare, I do much honour a chine of beef! O, I do reverence a loin of veal!

Sir G. And let no plate be seen, but what's pure gold,

Or such whose workmanship exceeds the matter
That it is made of: let my choicest linen
Perfume the room; and, when we wash, the water,
With precious powders mix'd, so please my lord,
That he may with envy wish to bathe so ever.

Mar. 'Twill be very chargeable.

Sir G. Avaunt, you drudge!

Now all my labour'd ends are at the stake,
I'st a time to think of thrift? Call in my daughter,
Call in my daughter. [Exit MARRALL.]
And, master justice, since you love choice dishes,
And plenty of 'em—

Gree. As I do indeed, sir,
Almost as much as to give thanks for 'em.

Sir G. I do confer that providence, with my power
Of absolute command to have abundance,
To your best care.

Gree. I'll punctually discharge it,
And give the best directions.—

[Sir GILES retires up the stage]

Now am I,

In mine own conceit, a monarch; at least,
Arch-president o' the boil'd, the roast, the bak'd;—
I'd not change my throne for the Great Mogul's;
For which I will eat often; and give thanks,
When my belly's brae'd up like a drum; and that's pure justice. [Exit GREEDY.]

Sir G. [Advancing.] It must be so; should the foolish girl prove modest,
She may spoil all; she had it not from me,

But from her mother : I was ever forward,
As she must be ; and therefore I'll prepare her.
Enter MARRALL, followed by MARGARET, and two female Attendants.

Alone, Margaret—
Alone—and let your women wait without.

[Exit Women and MARRALL.]

Marg. Your pleasure, sir ?

Sir G. Ha ! this is a neat dressing !

[Walks round her.]

These orient pearls and diamonds well plac'd too !
The gown affects me not, it should have been Embroider'd o'er and o'er with flowers of gold ;
But these rich jewels and quaint fashion help it.
How like you your new woman,
The Lady Downfallen ?

Marg. Well, for a companion :

Not as a servant.

Sir G. Is she humble, Meg,
And careful too ; her ladyship forgotten ?

Marg. I pity her fortune.

Sir G. Pity her ! Trample on her.

I took her up in an old tamin gown.
E'en starv'd for very want of food, to serve thee,
And if I understand she but repines
To do thee any duty, though ne'er so servile,
I'll pack her to her knight, where I have lodg'd him,
Into the counter, and there let e'em howl together.

Marg. You know your own ways, but for me, I blush

When I command her that was once attended
With persons not inferior to myself
In birth.

Sir G. In birth ! Why, art thou not my daughter,
The blest child of my industry and wealth ?
Part with these humble thoughts, and apt thyself
To the noble state I labour to advance thee ;
Or, by my hopes to see thee honourable,
I will adopt a stranger to my fortunes,
And throw thee from my care : Do not provoke me.

Marg. I will not, sir ; mould me which way you
please.

Enter GREEDY, with a napkin round his neck, and a dumpling in his hand.

Gree. Sir Giles, Sir Giles—

Sir G. How ! interrupted ? [Crosses to him.]

Gree. 'Tis matter of importance.

The cook, sir, is self-willed, and will not learn [sir,
From my experience. There's a fawn brought in,
And, for my life, I cannot make him roast it whole,
With a Norfolk dumpling in the belly of it :
And, sir, we wise men know, that without the dumpling

'Tis not worth three-pence.

Sir G. Would it were whole in thy belly, [me.
To stuff it out ! Cook it any way : Pr'ythee, leave
Gree. Without order for the dumpling ?

Sir G. Let it be dumpled

Which way thou wilt ; or tell him, I will scald him
In his own caldron.

Gree. I had lost my stomach

Had I lost my dumpling. [Exit GREEDY.]
Sir G. But to our business, Meg :—You've heard who dines here ?

Marg. I have, sir.

Sir G. 'Tis an honourable man ;

A lord, Meg, and commands a regiment
Of soldiers ; and, what's rare, is one himself,
A bold and understanding one ; and to be
A lord, and a good leader, in one volume,
Is granted unto few, but such as rise up
The kingdom's glory.

Re-enter GREEDY, with a toast and fork.

Gree. I'll resign my office,

If I be not better obey'd. [frantic ?]

Sir G. [Turning suddenly to him.] Slight, art thou Gree. Frantic ! 'twould make me frantic, and stark mad,

Were I not a justice of peace and quorum too,
Which this rebellious cook cares not a straw for.
There are a dozen of woodcocks.—
He has found out

A new device for sauce, and will not dish 'em
With toasts and butter.

Sir G. Crosses behind.] Cook !—rogue, obey him !
I've given the word : pray, now, remove yourself
To a collar of brawn, and trouble me no further.

Gree. I will, and meditate what to eat at dinner.

[Exit GREEDY.]

Sir G. And as I said, Meg, when this gull disturbed us,

This honourable lord, this colonel,
I would have thy husband.

Marg. There's too much disparity

Between his quality and mine, to hope it.

Sir G. I more than hope, and doubt not to affect it ;
Be thou no enemy to thyself : my wealth
Shall weigh his titles down, and make you equals.
Now for the means to assure him thine, observe me :
Remember, he's a courtier, and a soldier,
And not to be trifled with ; and therefore, when
He comes to woo you, see you do not coy it :
This mincing modesty hath spoil'd many a match
By a first refusal, in vain after hop'd for. [that]

Marg. You'll have me, sir, preserve the distance
Confines a virgin ?

Sir G. Virgin me no virgins !

I'll have you lose that name, or you lose me ;

I'll have you private—start not—I say, private.

If you are my true daughter,
You'll venture alone with one man, though he came
Like Jupiter to Semele, and come off too :
And therefore, when he kisses you, kiss close.

Marg. I've heard this is the wanton's fashion, sir,
Which I must never learn.

Sir G. Learn any thing,
And from any creature, that may make thee great ;
E'en from the devil himself : stand not on form ;
Words are no substances.

Marg. With your leave, sir—in worldly policy,
This is not the way to make me his wife :

My virgin scruples overcome so soon
Cannot but assure him,

I, that am light to him, will not hold weight
When tempted by others ; so, in judgment,
If, to obey you, I forget my honour,
He must and will forsake me.

Sir G. How ! forsake thee !

Do I wear a sword for fashion ? or is this arm
Shrunk up, or wither'd ? Does there live a man,
Of that large list I have encounter'd with,
Can truly say I e'er gave inch of ground
Not purchased with his blood that did oppose me ?
Forsake thee !—he dares not.

Though all his captains, echoes to his will,
Stood arm'd by his side, to justify the wrong ;
Spite of his lordship, and his colonelship,
I would make him render
A bloody and a strict account, and force him,
By marrying thee, to cure thy wounded honour.
Meg, I have said it.

Enter MARRALL, hastily.

Mar. Sir, sir, the man of honour's come,
Newly alighted.

Sir G. In, there, without reply, and wait my call:
And do as I command, or thou art lost.

[Exit MARGARET.]

What! is the loud music I gave orders for Ready to receive him?

Mar. 'Tis, sir.

Sir G. Let 'em sound

A princely welcome.

[Exit MARRALL,

Roughness, awhile leave me;

For fawning now, a stranger to my nature,

Must make way for me.

[Music.]

Enter MARRALL, LOVELL, and ALLWORTH, preceded and followed by Servants.

Lov. Sir, you meet your trouble.

[nour

Sir G. What you are pleas'd to style so, is an ho-
Above my worth and fortunes.

Allw. [Aside.] Strange! so humble!

Re-enter GREEDY, with a napkin under his chin.

Sir G. Faugh! [Points to napkin, which GREEDY instantly snatches off, and puts behind him.]

A justice of peace, my lord.

[Presents GREEDY to him.]

Lov. Your hand, good sir.

Gree. [Aside.] This is a lord; some would think this a favour;

But I had rather have my hand in my dumpling.

Sir G. Room for my lord.

Lov. I miss, sir, your fair daughter,

To crown my welcome.

Sir G. May it please my lord

To taste a glass of Greek wine first; and suddenly
She shall attend, my lord.

Lov. You'll be obeyed, sir.

[Exeunt all but Sir GILES.]

Sir G. 'Tis to my wish; as soon as come, ask for her.

Why, Meg! Meg Overreach!

Re-enter MARGARET.

How! tears in your eyes!

Hah! dry 'em quickly, or I'll dig 'em out.

Is this a time to whimper? meet that greatness

That flies into thy bosom; think what 'tis

For me to say, my honourable daughter.

No more; but be instructed, or expect—

He comes.

Re-enter LOVELL, ALLWORTH, GREEDY, and MARRALL.

A well form'd girl, my lord.

Lov. [Crosses to MARGARET.] As I live, a rare one!
[Salutes her.]

Allw. He's ta'en already: I am lost.

Sir G. That kiss

Came twanging off; I like it:—Quit the room.

[Exeunt GREEDY, MARRALL, and ALLWORTH.]

A little bashful, my good lord, but you,

I hope, will teach us boldness.

Lov. I am happy

In such a scholar: but—

Sir G. I am too old to learn,

And therefore leave you to yourselves. Remember!

[Aside to MARGARET and exit.]

Lov. You see, fair lady, your father is solicitous,
To have you change the barren name of virgin
Into a hopeful wife.

Marg. His haste, my lord,

Holds no power o'er my will.

Lov. But o'er your duty.

Marg. Which, forc'd too much, may break.

Lov. Bend rather, sweetest:

Think of your years.

Marg. Too few to match with yours.

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXXVI.

Lov. I can advance you.

Marg. To a hill of sorrow;

Where every hour I may expect to fall,
But never hope firm footing. You are noble,
I of a low descent, however rich;
O, my good lord, I could say more, but that
I dare not trust these walls.

Lov. Pray you, trust my ear then.

[They whisper up the stage.]

Re-enter Sir GILES, listening.

Sir G. Close at it! whispering!—this is excellent!
And by their postures, a consent on both parts.

Re-enter GREEDY.

Gree. Sir Giles! Sir Giles!

Sir G. The great fiend stop that clapper!

Gree. It must ring out, sir, when my belly rings noon.

The bak'd meats are run out, the roast turn'd powder.

Sir G. Stop your insatiate jaws, or

I shall powder you.

Gree. Beat me to dust, I care not;

In such a cause as this I'll die a martyr.

Sir G. Disturb my lord

When he is in discourse?

Gree. Is't a time to talk

When we should be munching?

[bargain

Sir G. Mum, villain; vanish! Shall we break a
Almost made up?

[Exit, thrusting GREEDY off before him.]

Lov. Lady, I understand you,

And wish you happy in your choice; believe it,

I'll be a careful pilot to direct

Your yet uncertain bark to a port of safety.

Marg. So shall your honour save two lives, and bind us

Your slaves for ever.

Lov. I'm in the act rewarded.

Since it is good; however, you must put on

An amorous carriage towards me, till our purpose

Be brought to the wish'd end.

Marg. I'm prone to that.

Lov. Now break we off our conference.—Sir Giles!

Where is Sir Giles?

[Coming forward.]

Enter Sir GILES. ALLWORTH, GREEDY, and MAR-RALL, ALLWORTH crosses behind.

Sir G. My noble lord; and how Does your lordship find her?

Lov. Apt, Sir Giles, and coming;

And I like her the better.

Sir G. [Aside] So do I too.

Lov. Yet should we take forts at the first assault,

'Twere poor in the defendant: I will confirm her

With a love-letter or two, which I shall have Deliver'd by my page: we must, for form, give way to't.

Sir G. With all my soul. [Crosses to ALLWORTH.]

A towardly gentleman!

Your hand, good master Allworth: know my house
Is ever open to you.

All. [Aside.] 'Twas shut till now.

Sir G. [To MARGARET.] Well done, well done, my honourable daughter!

Thou'rt so already; [*Puts MARGARET over to ALL-
WORTH*] know this gentle youth,

And cherish him, my honourable daughter!

Marg. I shall, with my best care.

Servants. [Without.] Room, room—make way
there for my lady.

Sir G. What noise?

Gree. More stops

Before we go to dinner! O my guts!

Enter six Servants, Lady ALLWORTH, and WELLBORN.

Lady A. [To WELLBORN.] If I find welcome,
You shall share in't; if not, I'll back again;
For I come arm'd for all can be objected.

Lov. How! the Lady Allworth?

Sir G. And thus attended!

[MARRALL and Sir GILES a little up the stage.]

Mar. No, I am a dolt;

The spirit of lies hath enter'd me.

Lov. Noble lady,

This is a favour to prevent my visit,

The service of my life can never equal. [hop'd]

Lady A. My lord, I laid wait for you; and much
You would have made my poor house your first inn:
And therefore, doubting that you might forget me,
I borrow'd so much from my long restraint,
And took the air, in person to invite you.

Lov. Your bounties are so great, they rob me,
Of words to give you thanks. [madam,

Lady A. Good Sir Giles Overreach—[Bows to him.
How dost thou, Marrall?—Lik'd you my meat so ill,
You'll dine no more with me?

Gree. I will, when you please,
An' it like your ladyship.

Lady A. When you please, Master Greedy;
If meat can do't you shall be satisfied.

And now, my lord, pray take into your knowledge
This gentleman: howe'er his outside's coarse,
[Presents WELLBORN.]

His inward linings are as fine and fair
As any man's;

And howsoe'er his humour carries him
To be thus accounted, or what taint soe'er,
For his wild life, hath struck upon his fame,
He may ere long, with boldness rank himself
With some that have condemn'd him. Sir Giles
If I am welcome, bid him so. [Overreach,

Sir G. My nephew! [Crosses to WELLBORN.
He has been too long a stranger: faith you have:
Pray, let it be mended.

[All converse apart, but Sir GILES and MARRALL.]

Mar. Why, sir, what do you mean?

This is rogue Wellborn, monster, prodigy,
No man of worship,
Much less your nephew.

Sir G. Well, sirrah, we shall reckon
For this hereafter.

Mar. I'll not lose my joke,
Though I be beaten dead for't. [Retires up the stage.]

Well. [Advancing.] Let my silence plead

In my excuse, my lord, till better leisure

Offer itself, to hear a full relation

Of my poor fortunes. [Aside to LOVELL.]

Lov. I would hear, and help 'em. [Bell rings.

Gree. Ah! [Runs about.]

Sir G. Your dinner waits you.

Lov. Pray you, lead; we follow. [my guest.

Lady A. Dear Master Wellborn, come.—You are [Takes WELLBORN's hand.—Music.—Event
all but GREEDY.]

Gree. Dear Master Wellborn! so she said:
Heaven, heaven!

If my belly would give me leave, I could ruminate
All day on this: I've granted twenty warrants
To have him committed, from all the prisons in the shire, [Wellborn!]

To Nottingham gaol! And now, "Dear Master
And, "My good nephew!"—But I play the fool,
To stand here prating, and forget my dinner. [Going.]

Re-enter MARRALL, meeting GREEDY.

Are they set, Marrall?

Mar. Long since. [GREEDY going, MARRALL prevents him.] Pray you a word, sir.

Gree. No wording now.

Mar. In troth, I must: my master, [you,
Knowing you are his good friend, makes bold with
And does entreat you, more guests being come in
Than he expected, especially his nephew,
The table being full too, you would excuse him,
And wait to sup with him on the cold meat.

Gree. How! no dinner,

After all my care.

Mar. 'Tis but a penance for
A meal; besides, you broke your fast—

Gree. That was

But a bit to stay my stomach. A man in commission,
Give place to a tatterdemalion?

Mar. No big words, sir!

Should his worship hear you—

Gree. Lose my dumpling too.

And butter'd toast and woodcocks?

Mar. Come, have patience.

If you will dispense a little with your justiceship,
And sit with the maids below there, you'll have
dumpling,

Woodcock, and butter'd toast too, by and by.

Gree. This revives me:

I will gorge there sufficiently.

Mar. There's your way, sir. [Exit MARRALL.]

Gree. I fear, we shall have but short commons below. I am no cameleon, to feed on air; nor Frenchman, to feast on a soused frog, or regale on an ounce of beef in a Mediterranean sea of soup; I love to see the board well spread, groaning under its savory burden, smoking hot, from spit, furnace, and cauldron.—Ods-me, Sir Giles! [Exit.]

Enter Sir GILES.

Sir G. She's caught? O, woman! What, neglect
my lord,

And all her compliments apply to Wellborn!

In the wine she drinks,

He being her pledge, she sends him burning kisses,
And sits on thorns till she be private with him.

But why grieve I

At this? It makes for me; if she prove his,

All that is hers is mine, as I will work him.

Enter MARRALL.

Mar. Sir, the whole board is troubled at your rising. [rall,

Sir G. No matter, I'll excuse it: Pr'ythee, Mar-
Watch an occasion to invite my nephew

To speak with me in private.

Mar. Who! the rogue

The lady scorn'd to look on?

Sir G. Sirrah, sirrah! [Crosses to meet LOVELL.]

Enter LOVELL, MARGARET, and ALLWORTH.

Sir G. [To LOVELL.] My good lord, excuse my
Lov. There needs none, Sir Giles; [manners.

I may ere long say—father, when it please

My dearest mistress to give warrant to it.

Sir G. She shall seal to it, my lord, and make me happy.

Lady A. [Without.] Nay, Master Wellborn—

Sir G. Grosser and grosser! [Exit.]

Enter Lady ALLWORTH, WELLBORN, and Servants.

Lady A. Provide my coach,
I'll instantly away;—my thanks, Sir Giles,
For my entertainment.

[MARRALL whispers WELLBORN.]

Sir G. 'Tis your nobleness,
To think it such.

Lady A. I must do you a further wrong,
In taking away your honourable guest. [Giles.]

Lov. I wait on you, madam; farewell, good Sir

Lady A. Nay, come, Master Wellborn.—

[Exit MARRALL.]

I must not leave you behind; in sooth, I must not.

Sir G. [Crosses to Lady ALLWORTH.] Rob me not, madam, of all joys at once: [coach,

Let my nephew stay behind; he shall have my

And after some small conference between us,

Soon overtake your ladyship.

Lady A. Stay not so long, sir. [day

Lov. Farewell, dear Margaret! You shall every

Hear from your servant, by my faithful page.

All. 'Tis a service I am proud of.

[Exit LOVELL, Lady ALLWORTH, ALLWORTH, and Servants.]

Sir G. Daughter, to your chamber.

[Exit MARGARET.]

You may wonder, nephew,

After so long an enmity between us,

I should desire your friendship.

Well. So I do, sir;

'Tis strange to me.

Sir G. But I make it no wonder;

And, what is more, unfold my nature to you.

We worldly men, when we see friends and kinsmen,

Past hope sunk in their fortunes, lend no hand

To lift 'em up, but rather set our feet

Upon their heads, to press 'em to the bottom;

As I must yield, with you I practis'd it;

But, now I see you in a way to rise,

I can and will assist you. 'This rich lady,

(And I am glad of't), is enamour'd of you.

Well. No such thing:

Compassion rather, sir.

Sir G. Well, in a word,

Because your stay is short, I'll have you seen

No more in this base shape; nor shall she say,

She married you like a beggar, or in debt.

Well. [Aside.] He'll run into the noose, and save my labour. [hence,

Sir G. You have a trunk of rich clothes, not far

In pawn; I will redeem 'em; and, that no clamour

May taint your credit for your petty debts,

You shall have wherewithal to cut 'em off,

And go a freeman to the wealthy lady.

Well. This done, sir, out of love, and no ends else—

Sir G. As it is, nephew.

Well. Binds me still your servant.

Sir G. No compliments: you're staid for. Ere you've supp'd [my nephew:]

You shall hear from me. My coach, knaves, for

To morrow I will visit you.

Well. Here's an uncle

In a man's extremes! How much they do belie you,

That say you are hard-hearted.

Sir G. My deeds, nephew,

Shall speak my love; what men report, I weigh not.

[Exit WELLBORN and Sir GILES.]

I now discharge you
From further service: mind your own affairs;
I hope they'll prove successful.
All. What is blest

With your good wish, my lord, cannot but prosper.

Let after-times report, and to your honour,

How much I stand engag'd, for I want language

To speak my debt; yet, if a tear or two

Of joy, for your much goodness, can supply

My tongue's defects, I could—

Lov. Nay, do not melt;

This ceremonial thanks, to me's superfluous.

Sir G. [Without.] Is my lord stirring?

Lov. 'Tis he! O, here's your letter.

[Takes the letter from the table, and gives it to

ALLWORTH.]

Let him in.

[ALLWORTH opens the door, and stands retired.

Enter Sir GILES, GREEDY, and MARRALL.]

Sir G. A good day to my lord!

Lov. You are an early riser,

Sir Giles.

Sir G. And reason, to attend your lordship.

Lov. And you, too, Master Greedy, up so soon!

Gree. In troth, my lord, after the sun is up

I cannot sleep: for I've a foolish stomach

That croaks for breakfast. With your lordship's favour, [Crosses to LOVELL.]

I have a serious question to demand

Of my worthy friend, Sir Giles.

Lov. Pray you, use your pleasure. [Retires.]

Gree. How far, Sir Giles, and pray you answer

Upon your credit, hold you it to be [me

From your manor-house to this of my Lady All-

Sir G. Why, some four miles. [worth's?

Gree. How! four mile, good Sir Giles—

Upon your reputation, think better;

For four miles' riding

Could not have rais'd so huge an appetite

As I feel gnawing on me.

Mar. Whether you ride,

Or go afoot, you're that way still provided,

An't please your worship.

Sir G. How now, sirrah? prating

Before my lord! no deference! Go to my nephew,

See all his debts discharg'd, and help his worship

To fit on his rich suit.

Mar. I may fit you too. [Exit MARRALL.]

Lov. I have writ this morning

A few lines to my mistress, your fair daughter.

Sir G. 'Twill fire her; for she's wholly your's

already. [you

Sweet Master Allworth, take my ring; 'twill carry

To her presence, I dare warrant you; and there plead

For my good lord, if you should find occasion.

That done, pray, ride to Nottingham, get a license,

Still by this token. [To LOVELL.] I will have't despatch'd,

And suddenly, my lord, that I may say,

My honourable, nay, right honourable daughter.

Gree. [Stopping ALLWORTH, who is crossing]

Take my advice, young gentleman; get your breakfast;

'Tis unwholesome to ride fasting; I'll eat with you,

And that abundantly.

Sir G. Some fury's in that gut:

Hungry again! did you not devour this morning

A shield of brawn, and a barrel of Colchester oysters?

Gree. Why, that was, sir, only to scour my

A kind of preparative. [stomach,

Lov. Haste your return.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room in Lady Allworth's House.—

Table and two chairs, pens, ink, paper, war, and lighted taper.

LOVELL discovered seated, sealing a letter, and ALL-
WORTH waiting on him.

Lov. 'Tis well.—May this succeed!

All. I will not fail, my lord.

Gree. Nor I, to line

My Christmas coffer.

Sir G. To my wish; [They sit.] we're private.

I come not to make offer with my daughter
A certain portion; that were poor and trivial:

In one word I pronounce, all that is mine,

In lands or leases, ready coin or goods,

With her, my lord, comes to you: nor shall you have

One motive to induce you to believe

I live too long; since every year I'll add

Something unto the heap, which shall be your's too.

Lov. You are a right kind father.

Sir G. You shall have reason

To think me such,

How do you like this seat of Lady Allworth's?

It is well wooded and well water'd, the acres

Fertile and rich; would it not serve, for change,

To entertain your friends in a summer progress?

What thinks my noble lord?

Lov. 'Tis a wholesome air,

And well-built pile: and she that's mistress of it,

Worthy the large revenue.

Sir G. She the mistress!

It may be so for a time; but, let my lord

Say, only that he but likes it, and would have it,

I say are long 'tis his.

Lov. Impossible!

Sir G. You conclude too fast, not knowing me,

Nor the engines that I work by. 'Tis not alone

The lady Allworth's lands,—for those, once Wellborn's,

As, by her doteage on him, I know they will be,

Shall soon be mine;—but point out any man's

In all the shire, and say they lie convenient

And useful for your lordship, and once more

I say aloud they're yours. [They rise.]

Lov. I dare not own

What's by unjust and cruel means extorted:

My fame and credit are more dear to me,

Than thus to expose 'em to be censur'd by

The public voice.

Sir G. You run, my lord, no hazard.

[Leans on the back of the chair.]

Your reputation shall still stand as fair

In all good men's opinions, as now:

For, though I do condemn report myself,

As a mere sound, I still will be so tender

Of what concerns you, in all points of honour,

That the immaculate whiteness of your fame,

Shall ne'er be sullied with one taint or spot.

All my ambition is, to have my daughter

Right honourable, which my lord can make her;

And, might I live to dance upon my knee

A young Lord Lovell, born by her unto you,

I write nil ultra to my proudest hopes.

Lov. Are you not mov'd with the sad imprecations

And curses of whole families, made wretched

By your sinister practices?

Sir G. Yes, as rocks are,

When foamy billows split themselves against

Their flinty ribs; or as the moon is mov'd,

When wolves, with hunger pin'd, howl at her bright-

I'm of a solid temper, and, like these [ness.

Steer on a constant course.

Nay, when my ears are pierc'd with widow's cries,

And undone orphans wash with tears my threshold,

I only think what 'tis to have my daughter

Right honourable; and 'tis a powerful charm

Makes me insensible of remorse, or pity,

Or the least sting of conscience.

[Exit.]

Lov. I admire

The toughness of your nature.

Sir G. 'Tis for you,

My lord, and for my daughter, I am marble;

Nay more, if you will have my character

In little, I enjoy more true delight

In my arrival at my wealth these dark

And crooked ways, than you shall e'er take pleasure

In spending what my industry hath compass'd.

My haste commands me hence; in one word, there-

Is it a match, my lord? [fore,]

Lov. I hope that is past doubt now. [kind here,]

Sir G. Then rest secure; not the hate of all man-

Nor fear of what can fall on me hereafter,

Shall make me study aught but your advancement

One story higher: an earl; if gold can do it.

Doubt not mine honour, nor my faith to you:

Though I am borne thus headlong by my will,

You may make choice of what belief you please.

To me 'tis equal; so, my lord, good morrow.

[Exit Sir GILES.]

Lov. He's gone: I wonder how the earth can

I, that have liv'd a soldier, [bear him!]

And stood the enemy's violent charge undaunted,

To hear this horrid monster, am all bath'd

In a cold sweat: yet, like a mountain, he

Is no more shaken, than Olympus is

When angry Boreas loads his double head

With sudden drifts of snow.

Enter Lady ALLWORTH.

Lady A. Save you, my lord!

Disturb I not your privacy?

Lov. No, good madam;

For your own sake, I'm glad you came no sooner

Since this bold, bad man, Sir Giles Overreach,

Made such a plain discovery of himself,

And read this morning such a devilish matins,

That I should think it a sin next to his

But to repeat it.

Lady A. I ne'er press'd my lord,

On others' privacy: yet, against my will,

Walking for health's sake, in the gallery here,

I was made,

So loud and vehement he was, partaker

Of his tempting offers.

But, my good lord, if I may use my freedom,

As to an honour'd friend—

Lov. You lessen else

Your favour to me.

Lady A. I dare, then, say thus:

However common men

Make sordid wealth the object and sole end

Of their industrious aims, 'twill not agree

With those of noble blood, of fame, and honour.

Lov. Madam, 'tis confess'd:

But what infer you from it?

Lady A. This, my lord:

I allow the heir of Sir Giles Overreach, Margaret,

A maid well qualified, and the richest match

Our north part can make boast of; yet she cannot,

With all that she brings with her, stop their mouths

That never will forget who was her father;

Or that my husband Allworth's lands, and Wellborn's

(How wrung from both, needs now no repetition).

Were real motives that more work'd your lordship

To join your families, than her form and virtues:

You may conceive the rest.

Lov. I do, good madam,

And long since have consider'd it.

And 'tis my resolution ne'er to wed

With the rich Margaret, Overreach's daughter.

Lady A. [Aside.] I'm glad to hear this.
Why then, my lord, pretend your marriage to her?
Dissimulation but ties false knots
On that straight line, by which you hitherto
Have measur'd all your actions.

Lov. I make answer,
And aptly, with a question. Wherefore have you,
That, since your husband's death, have liv'd a strict
And chaste nun's life, on the sudden given yourself
To visits and entertainments? Think you, madam,
'Tis not grown public conference; or the favours
Which you so prodigally have thrown on Wellborn
Incur not censure? [swear,

Lady A. I'm innocent here; and, on my life, I
My ends are good

Lov. So, on my soul, are mine
To Margaret:
And, since this friendly privacy does serve
As a fair offer'd means unto ourselves
To search each other further—you having shewn
Your care of me, I, my respect to you—
Deny me not, I dare not yet say more,
An afternoon's discourse.

Lady A. Affected coyness might deny your suit;
But, such your honour, frankness shall become me,
And bid my tongue avow my honest heart:
I shall attend your lordship.

Lov. My heart thanks you.

[Exeunt LOVELL and Lady ALLWORTH]

SCENE II.—A Village.

Enter FROTH and TAPWELL from the House.

Tap. Undone, undone! This was your counsel,
Froth. [rall—

Froth. Mine! I defy thee: did not Master Mar-
He has marr'd all, I am sure—strictly command us,
On pain of Sir Giles Overreach's displeasure,
To turn the gentleman out of doors?

Tap. 'Tis true:
But now, he's his uncle's darling; and has got Master Justice Greedy, since he fill'd his belly,
At his commandment to do any thing.
Woe, woe to us!

Froth. He may prove merciful.

Tap. Troth, we do not deserve it at his hands.

Froth. Then, he knows all the passages of our house;

As the receiving of stolen goods, and so forth.

When he was rogue Wellborn, no man would believe him;

And then his information could not hurt us;

But now he is right worshipful again,
Who dares but doubt his testimony?

Tap. Undone, undone! Methinks

I see thee, Froth, already in a cart;

And my hand hissing,

If I 'scape the halter, with the letter R

Printed upon it.

Froth. 'Would that were the worst!

That were but nine days' wonder. As for credit,
We've none to lose; but we shall lose his custom:
There's the devil on't. [drum;

Tap. He has summon'd all his creditors by the 'Tis said, he has found such a new way
To pay his old debts, as, 'tis very likely,
He shall be chronicled for it.

Froth. But are you sure his worship
Comes this way to my lady's?

[*Drum—and cry without of "Brave Master
Wellborn!"*

Tap. Hark, I hear him.

Froth. Be ready with your petition, and present it
To his good grace. [Drum—and cry again.]

Enter GREEDY, WELLBORN in a rich habit, MAR-
RALL.—Vintner, Tailor, with other Creditors.—
ORDER, FURNACE, and AMBLE.—TAPWELL and FROTH, kneeling, deliver a petition.

Well. How's this? petition'd too!

But note what miracles the payment of
A little trash, and a rich suit of clothes,
Can work upon these rascals. I shall be,
I think, Prince Wellborn.

Mar. When your worship's married,
You may be—I know; what I hope to see you.

Well. Then look thou for advancement.

Mar. To be known

Your worship's bailiff, is the mark I shoot at.

Well. And thou shalt hit it

Mar. Pray you, sir, despatch

These needy followers: and for my admittance,

[TAPWELL and FROTH flatter GREEDY.]
Provided you'll defend me from Sir Giles,
Whose service I am weary of, I'll say something
You shall give thanks for.

Well. Fear not Sir Giles.

[WELLBORN and MARRALL retire, and converse
apart.]

Gree. [Bringing TAPWELL and FROTH forward.]
Who? Tapwell—I remember; thy wife brought me,
Last new year's tide, a couple of fat turkies.

Tap. And shall do, every Christmas, let your
But stand my friend now. [worship]

Gree. How! with Master Wellborn?

I can do any thing with him, on such terms.

[WELLBORN advances.]
See you this honest couple? [To WELLBORN.]

They're good souls
As ever drew out spigot. Have they not
A pair of honest faces?

Well. I o'erheard you,
And the bribe he promis'd. You are cozen'd in 'em;
For, of all the scum that grew rich by my riots,
This, for a most unthankful knave, and this,
For a base quean and thief, have worse deserv'd me;
And therefore speak not for them. By your place,
You're rather to do me justice. Lend me thine ear:
Forget his turkies, and call in his license,
And every season I will send you venison,
To feast a mayor and corporation.

[Retires, and converses with MARRALL.]

Gree. I'm chang'd o' the sudden in my opinion.

—Mum.

Come near; [To TAP. and FROTH.] nearer, rascal!
And, now I view him better, did you e'er see
One look so like an arch knave? his very countenance,

Should an understanding judge but look upon him,
Would hang him, though he were innocent.

Tap. and Froth. Worshipful sir— [of turkies,

Gree. No; though the great Turk came, instead
To beg my favour, I'm inexorable.

Thou'st an ill name: I here do damn thy license,

Forbidding thee ever to tap or draw;

For instantly I will, in mine own person,

Command the constable to pull down thy sign,

And do't before I eat.

Froth. No mercy?

Gree. Vanish!—

If I show any, may my promis'd venison choke me!

Tap. Unthankful knaves are ever so rewarded.

[Exit with FROTH into the house.]
Well. On, Master Greedy. I'll be with you at dinner.

Gree. For heaven's sake, don't stay long :
'Tis almost ready. [Exit GREEDY.]

Well. Speak : what are you ?

Vint. [Comes forward.] A decay'd vintner, sir,
That might have thriv'd but that your worship broke
With trusting you with muscadine and eggs. [me,
And five-pound suppers, with your after-drinkings,
When you lodg'd upon the Bankside.

Well. I remember. [you ;
Vint. I've not been hasty, nor e'er laid to arrest
And therefore, sir—

Well. Thou art an honest fellow :
I'll set thee up again : [Vintner retires.

[To MARRALL.] See his bill paid.

[Tailor advances.] What are you ?

Tai. A tailor once, but now mere botcher.

I long time gave you credit for rich clothes :

But, you failing in payment,
I was remov'd from the shop-board, and confin'd
Under a stall. [no more.

Well. [To MARRALL.] See him paid : and botch
Tai. I ask no interest, sir.

Well. Such tailors need not :
If their bills are paid in one-and-twenty years,
They're seldom losers. See these men discharg'd.
[MARRALL motions to the Creditors to imply he will do so.

And, since old debts are clear'd by a new way,
A little bounty will not misbecome me :
There's something for you all.

[Throws a purse to Creditors.
All the Cred. Brave Master Wellborn !

[Drums and shouts.—Exeunt Creditors.
Well. Leave me, good friends : attend upon your lady.

[Exeunt AMBLE, FURNACE, and ORDER
Now, Master Marrall, what's the weighty secret
You promis'd to impart ?

Mar. Sir, time nor place
Allow me to relate each circumstance ;
This only, in a word :—I know Sir Giles
Will come upon you for security
For all the money which he now has lent you ;
This you must not consent to :
As he grows in heat, as I am sure he will ;
Be you but rough, and say he's in your debt
Ten times the sum, upon sale of your land :
I'd a hand in't, I speak it to my shame,
When you were defeated of it.

Well. That's forgiven. [duce
Mar. I shall deserve it.—Then urge him to pro-

The deed in which you pass'd it over to him ;
Which, I know, he'll have about him, to deliver
To the Lord Lovell. I'll instruct you further,
As I wait on your worship : if I play not my prize
To your full content, and your uncle's much vexation,
Hang up Jack Marrall.

Well. I rely upon thee. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Room in Sir Giles's House.—Table and two chairs, pen, ink, and paper.

Enter MARGARET, with a letter in her hand, and ALLWORTH.

Allw. Whether to yield the first praise to my lord's
Unequal'd temperance, or your constant sweetness,
I yet rest doubtful.

Marg. Give it to Lord Lovell ;
For what in him was bounty, in me's duty.
I make but payment of a debt to which
My vows, in that high office register'd,
Are faithful witnesses.

Allw. 'Tis true, my dearest ;
Yet—when I call to mind how many fair ones
Make wilful shipwreck of their faiths and oaths,
To fill the arms of greatness ;
While you, with matchless virtue, thus hold out,
Spurning at honour, when it comes to court you—
I am so tender of your good, that faintly
I wish myself that right, you're pleas'd to do me.

Marg. To me what's title, when content is want-
Or the smooth brow, and wealth, [ing ?
Of a pleas'd sire that slaves me to his will ;
And, so his vain ambition may be feasted
By my obedience, and he see me great,
Leaves to my soul nor faculties nor power
To make her own election ?

Allw. But the dangers
That follow the repulse—

Marg. To me they're nothing :
Let Allworth love, I cannot be unhappy.
Suppose the worst—that, in his rage, he kill me,
A tear or two, by you dropt on my hearse,
In sorrow for my fate, will call back life
So far as but to say, that I die your's ;
I then shall rest in peace.

Allw. Heaven avert
Such trials of your true affection to me !
Nor will it unto you, that are all mercy,
Show so much rigour. But, since we must run
Such desperate hazards, let us do our best
To steer between 'em.

Marg. Lord Lovell is our friend :
And, though but a young actor, second me
In doing to the life what he has plotted.

[Enter Sir GILES.
The end may yet prove happy.—[Aside.] Now, my Allworth. [ing anger.

Allw. [Aside.] To your letter, and put on a seem-

Marg. I'll pay my lord all debts due to his title :
And, when with terms not taking from his honour
He does solicit me, I shall gladly hear him ;
But, in this peremptory, nay, commanding way,
To fix a time and place, without my knowledge,
A priest to tie the knot can ne'er be undone
Till death unlose it, is a confidence
In his lordship will deceive him.

Allw. I hope better, good lady.
Marg. Hope, sir, what you please ; for me,
I must take a safe and secure course : I have
A father, and without his full consent,
Though all lords of the land kneel'd for my favour,
I can grant nothing.

Sir G. [Aside.] I like this obedience ;
But whatso'er my lord writes, must and shall be Accepted and embrac'd. Sweet Master Allworth,
You shew yourself a true and faithful servant
To your good lord : he has a jewel of you.
How ! frowning, Meg ? Are these looks to receive
A messenger from my lord ? What's this ? give me it.

Marg. A piece of arrogant paper !
Sir G. [Reads.]

" Fair mistress, from your servant learn all joys
That we can hope for, if deferr'd, prove toys :
Therefore this instant, and in private, meet
A husband that will gladly at your feet
Lay down his honours, tendering them to you
With all content, the church being paid her due."
Is this the arrogant piece of paper ? fool !
Will you still be one ? I the name of madness, what Could his good honour write more to content you ?
Is there aught else to be wish'd, after these two
That already offered ? Marriage first,
And lawful pleasure after :—What would you more ?

Marg. Why, sir, I would be married like your daughter,

Not hurried away i'the night I know not whither,
Without all ceremony; no friends invited,
To honour the solemnity.

Allw. An't please your honour,
For so before to-morrow I must style you,
My lord desires this privacy, in respect
His honourable kinsmen are far off,
And his desires to have it done, brook not
So long delay as to expect their coming;
And yet he stands resolv'd, with all due pomp,
To have his marriage at court celebrated,
When he has brought your honour up to London.

Sir G. He tells you true; 'tis the fashion on my knowledge.

Yet the good lord, to please your peevishness,
Must put it off, forsooth!

Marg. I could be contented,
Were you but by, to do a father's part,
And give me in the church.

Sir G. So my lord have you,
What do I care who gives you? Since my lord
Does purpose to be private, I'll not cross him.
I know not, Master Allworth, how my lord
May be provided, and therefore there's a purse
Of gold: 'twill serve this night's expense; to-morrow
I'll furnish him with any sums.

Use my ring to my chaplain; he is benefic'd
At my manor at Got'am, and call'd Parson Well-do:
'Tis no matter for a license; I'll bear him out in't.

Marg. With your favour, sir—what warrant is your ring?

He may suppose I got that twenty ways,
Without your knowledge; and then, to be refus'd
Were such a stain upon me!—If you pleas'd, sir,
Your presence would do better.

Sir G. Still perverse!

I say again I will not cross my lord:

Yet I'll prevent you too.—Paper and ink there.

Allw. Sir, 'tis ready here. [Goes up to the table.]

Sir G. I thank you.—I can write then to my chaplain. [Sir GILES sits down and writes.]

Allw. [Sits.] Sir, sir,—[lord,]
You may, if you please, leave out the name of my
In respect he would be private, and only write—
Marry her to this gentleman.

Sir G. Well advis'd—

'Tis done.—Away!—

[Gives ALLWORTH the paper—both rise.]

My blessing? Girl, thou hast it:
Nay, no reply.—Begone, good Master Allworth:—
This shall be the best night's work you ever made.

Allw. I hope so, sir.

[Exit MARGARET and ALLWORTH.]

Sir G. Now all's cock-sure.—

Methinks I hear already knights and ladies Say, Sir Giles Overreach, how is it with Your honourable daughter?—

My ends, my ends are compass'd!—Then, for Well-
And the lands—were he once married to the widow—
I have him here.—

[Touching his forehead with his finger.]

I can scarce contain myself,

I am so full of joy; nay, joy all over! [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Hall in Lady Allworth's House.
—Table, four chairs, and screen.—LOVELL and Lady ALLWORTH discovered seated at the table.

Lady A. By this you know how strong the motives
That did, my lord, induce me to dispense [were,
A little with my gravity, to advance
The plots and projects of the down-trod Wellborn.

Lov. What you intended, madam,
For the poor gentleman, hath found good success;
For, as I understand, his debts are paid,
And he once more furnish'd for fair employment:
But all the arts that I have us'd, to raise
The fortunes of your joy and mine, young Allworth,
Stand yet in supposition: though I hope well;
For the young lovers are in wit more pregnant
Than their years can promise. [Both rise.]

Lady A. Though my wishes
Are with yours, my lord: yet give me leave to fear
The building, though well-grounded. To deceive
Sir Giles, that's both a lion and a fox
In his proceedings, were a work beyond
The strongest undertakers; not the trial
Of two weak innocents.

Lov. Despair not, madam:
Hard things are compass'd off by easy means.
The cunning statesman, that believes he fathoms
The counsels of all kingdoms on the earth,
Is by simplicity oft over-reach'd.

Lady A. May he be so!—
The young ones have my warmest wishes with them.

Lov. O gentle lady, prove as kind to me!
You've deign'd to hear, now grant my honest suit;
And, if you may be won to make me happy,
But join your hand to mine, and that shall be
A solemn contract.

Lady A. I were blind to my own good,
Should I refuse it; yet, my lord, receive me
As such a one, the study of whose whole life
Shall know no other object but to please you.

Lov. If I return not, with all tenderness,
Equal respect to you, may I die wretched!

Lady A. There needs no protestation, my lord,
To her that cannot doubt.

Enter WELLBORN.

You're welcome, sir:

Now you look like yourself. [Crosses to WELLBORN.]

Well. And will continue

Such, in my free acknowledgment that I am
Your creature, madam—and will never hold
My life mine own, when you please to command it.

Lov. It is a thankfulness that well becomes you.

Lady A. For me, I am happy,
That my endeavours prosper'd.—Saw you of late
Sir Giles, your uncle?

Well. I heard of him, madam, [passions,]
By his minister, Marrall. He's grown into strange
About his daughter: this last night, he look'd for
Your lordship at his home; but, missing you,
And Margaret not appearing, he is coming
To seek her here at Lady Allworth's house.
His wise head is much perplex'd and troubled.

Lov. I hope my project took.

Lady A. I strongly hope it. [lump of nothing,]
Sir G. [Without.] Ha! find my daughter, thou
I'll bore thine eyes out else.

Well. May it please your lordship,

[Crosses to LOVELL.]

For some ends of mine own, but to withdraw
A little out of sight, though not of hearing,
You may, perhaps, have sport.

Lov. You shall direct me. [Exit LOVELL.]

Sir G. [Without.] Idiot! booby! booby!

Mar. [Without.] O, O, O!

Sir G. [Without.] I shall sol-fa you, rogue!

Mar. [Without.] Sir, for what cause

Do you use me thus?

Enter Sir GILES, with distracted looks, driving in MARRALL before him.

Sir G. Cause, slave! Why, I am angry,
And thou a subject only fit for beating.
And so to cool my choler. Look to the writing:
Let but the seal be broke upon the box
That has slept in my cabinet these three years,
I'll rack thy soul for't.

Mar. [Aside.] I may yet cry quittance:
Though now I suffer, and dare not resist.

Sir G. Lady, by your leave: did you see my daughter, lady?

And the lord her husband? Are they in your house?
If they are, discover, that I may bid 'em joy;
And as an entrance to her place of honour,
See you, on her left hand, bending down low,
When she nods on you; which you must receive
As a special favour.

Lady A. When I know, Sir Giles,
Her state requires such ceremony, I shall pay it;
But, in the meantime,
I give you to understand, I neither know
Nor care where her honour is.

Sir G. When you once see her
Led and supported by the lord her husband,
You'll be taught better [Crosses to WELLBORN.]— Nephew—

Well. Well?

Sir G. No more!

Well. 'Tis all I owe you.

Sir G. Have your redeem'd rags
Made you thus insolent?

Well. Insolent to you!

Why, what are you, sir, pray, unless in years,
More than myself?

Sir G. His fortune swells him:—

'Tis rank,—he's married.

Sir, in calm language, though I seldom use it.

[Crosses to Lady ALLWORTH.]
I am familiar with the cause that makes you
Bear up thus bravely; there's a certain buzz
Of a stolen marriage,—do you hear?—of a stolen marriage; [cozen'd;]
In which, 'tis said, there's somebody hath been
I name no parties.

Well. Well, sir, and what follows?

[Lady ALLWORTH turns away in astonishment.]

Sir G. Marry this, since you are so peremptory;
remember,

Upon mere hope of your great match, I lent you
Some certain monies; put me in good security,
And suddenly, by mortgage or by statute,
Of some of your new possessions, or I'll have you
Dragg'd in your lavender robes to the gaol; you
And therefore do not trifle. [know me,

Well. Can you be

So cruel to your nephew, now he's in
The way to rise? Was this the courtesy
You did me, in pure love, and no ends else?

Sir G. End me no ends! Engage the whole estate,
And force your spouse to sign it: you shall have Three or four thousand more, to roar and swagger,
And revel in drunken taverns.

Well. And beg after—

Mean you not so?

Sir G. My thoughts are mine and free.

Shall I have security?

Well. No, indeed, you shall not:

Nor bond, nor bill, nor bare acknowledgment.—

Your great looks fright not me.

Sir G. But my deeds shall.— [They both draw.]

Lady A. Help! murder! murder!

Enter AMBLE, WATCHALL, ORDER, and two Servants with drawn swords.

Well. Let him come on,
Arm'd with his cut-throat practices to guard him,
With all his wrongs and injuries about him,
The right that I bring with me will defend me,
And punish his extortion.

Sir G. That I had thee

But single in the field!

Lady A. You may; but make not

My house your quarrelling scene.

Sir G. Were't in a church,

By heaven and hell I'll do't.

[Lady ALLWORTH turns away.]

Mar. [To WELLBORN.] Now, put him to
The showing of the deed.

Well. This rage is vain, sir;
For fighting, fear not, you shall have your hands full Upon the least incitement;—and—whereas
You charge me with a debt of monies to you—
If there be law, howe'er you have no conscience,
Either restore my land, or I'll recover
A debt, that's truly due to me from you,
In value ten times more than what you challenge.

Sir G. I in thy debt; O, impudence! did I not purchase

The land left by thy father, that rich land
That had continued in Wellborn's name,

Enter two of Sir GILES's Servants with a box.

Twenty descents, which, like a riotous fool,
Thou did'st make sale of?—O, you're come at last.—
Is not here inclos'd [To Servants.]
The deed that does confirm it mine?

Mar. Now, now,— [Lady ALLWORTH advances.]

Well. I do acknowledge none; I ne'er pass'd o'er
Any such land; I grant, for a year or two,
You had it in trust; which if you do discharge,
Surrendering the possession, you shall ease
Yourself and me of chargeable suits in law;
Which if you prove not honest, as I doubt it,
Must of necessity follow.

Lady A. In my judgment,

He does advise you well.

Sir G. Good, good; Conspire

With your new husband, lady; second him

In his dishonest practices: but, when

This manor is extended to my use,

You'll speak in an humbler key, and sue for favour.

Lady A. Never: do not hope it.

Well. Let despair first seize me. [give]

Sir G. Yet, to shut up thy mouth, and make thee

Thyself the lie, the loud lie, I draw out

The precious evidence; if thou canst forswear

Thy hand and seal, and make a forfeit of

Thy ears to the pillory—

[Two Servants place the box on the table, Sir GILES unlocks it, and takes out the deed.]

See!—here's that will make

My interest clear.—Ha!

Lady A. [Looking over his shoulder.] A fair skin of parchment!

Well. Indented, I confess, and labels too:

But neither wax, nor words.—How? thunder-struck!

Is this your precious evidence? this, that makes Your interest clear!

Sir G. I am overwhelmed with wonder!

What prodigy is this? what subtle devil Hath raz'd out the inscription? the wax Turn'd into dust!—

Do you deal with witches, rascal?

There is a statute for you, which will bring Your neck in a hempen circle; yes, there is;— And, now 'tis better thought, for, cheater, know, This juggling shall not save you.

Well. To save thee

Would beggar the stock of mercy.

[Retires with Lady ALLWORTH up the stage.]

Sir G. Marrall—Marrall—

Mar. Sir?

[mony,

Sir G. Though the witnesses are dead, your testi- Help'd with an oath or two; and for thy master, Thy liberal master, my good honest servant, I know thou wilt swear any thing, to dash This cunning sleight;

The deed being drawn too

By thee, my careful Marrall, and deliver'd

When thou wast present, will make good my title:— Wilt thou not swear this?

Mar. I!—No, I assure you: [Breaks from him.]

I have a conscience, not sear'd up like yours;

I know no deeds.

Sir G. Wilt thou betray me? [Drawing his sword.]

Mar. Keep him [WELLBORN opposes him.]

From using of his hands, I'll use my tongue

To his no little torment

Sir G. Mine own varlet

Rebel against me!

Mar. Yes, and uncase you too:

The idiot, the patch, the slave, the booby,

Your drudge can now anatomize you, and lay open

All your black plots, and level with the earth

Your hill of pride; and shake,

Nay pulverize, the walls you think defend you.

Sir G. O, that I had thee in my gripe, I'd tear thee

Joint after joint.

Mar. I know you are a tearer;

But I'll have first your fangs par'd off, and then Come nearer to you;—[Sir GILES retreats.] when

I have discover'd,

And made it good before the judge, what ways

And devilish practices, you us'd to cozen with.

Well. All will come out.

Sir G. [Advancing.] But that I will live, rogue, to torture thee,

And make thee wish, and kneel, in vain, to die;

These swords that keep thee from me, should fix

here,

Although they made my body but one wound,

But I would reach thee. I play the fool,

And make my anger but ridiculous:

There will be a time and place, there will be, coward, When you shall feel what I dare do.

Well. I think so:

You dare do any ill; yet want true valour,

To be honest, and repent.

Sir G. They're words I know not,

Nor e'er will learn. Patience, the beggars' virtue,

Shall find no harbour here.

Enter two of Sir GILES' Servants.

Lady A. Whom have we here?

Sir G. After these storms,

At length a calm appears.—My chaplain comes.—

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXXVII.

Enter Parson WELLD, with a letter in his hand.

Welcome, most welcome!

There's comfort in thy looks!—Is the deed done?

Is my daughter married? Say but so, my chaplain,

And I am tame.

Welldo. Married? Yes, I assure you.

Sir G. Then vanish all sad thoughts!

My doubts and fears are in the titles drown'd

Of my honourable, my right honourable daughter.

Now, you that plot against me,

And hoped to trip my heels up, that condemn'd me.

Think on't and tremble.

[Music.]

Enter LOVELL behind.

They come!—I hear the music.—

A lane there for my lord.

Well. This sudden heat

May yet be cool'd, sir.

Sir G. Make way there for my lady and my lord.

[Music.]

Enter two of Sir GILES' Servants, MARGARET and ALLWORTH.

Mar. [Kneels.] Sir, first your pardon, then your blessing, with Your full allowance of the choice I've made.—

Not to dwell

Too long on words—this is my husband.

Sir G. How!

Allw. So, I assure you: all the rites of marriage,

With every circumstance, are past;

And for right honourable son-in-law, you may say,

Your dutiful daughter.

Sir G. [Advancing hastily upon WELLD.]

Devil!—Are they married? [em joy!]

Well. Do a father's part, and say, Heaven give

Sir G. Confusion and ruin! Speak, and speak quickly,

Or thou art dead.

[Seizes WELLD.]

Welldo. They're married.

Sir G. Thou hadst better

Have made a contract with the king of fiends,

Than these.—My brain turns!

Welldo. Why this rage to me?—

Is not this your letter, sir? and these the words—

"Marry her to this gentleman."

Sir G. It cannot:

Nor will I e'er believe it, 'sdeath! I will not,

That I, who never left a print

Where I have trod, for the most curious search

To trace my footsteps, should be gull'd by children!

Baffled and fool'd, and all my hopes and labours

Defeated and made void.

Well. As it appears,

You are so, my grave uncele.

Sir G. Village nurses

Revenge their wrongs with curses; I'll not waste

A syllable; but thus I take the life

Which, wretched, I gave to thee.

[Advances to kill MARGARET.]

Lov. [Stopping him.] Hold, for your own sake!

If charity to your daughter have quite left you,

Will you do an act, though in your hopes lost here,

Can leave no hope for peace or rest hereafter?

Consider, at the best, you're but a man;

And cannot so create your aims, but that

They may be cross'd.

Sir G. Lord! thus I spit at thee,

And at thy counsel; and again desire thee—

And as thou art a soldier—if thy valour

Dares shew itself where multitude and example

Lead not the way, let's quit the house, and change

Six words in private.

Lov. I am ready.

Lady A. Stay, sir :

Contest with one distracted ?

Well. You'll grow like him

Should you answer his vain challenge.

Sir G. Are you pale ?

Borrow their helps ; though Hercules call it odds,

I'll stand 'gainst all, as I am, hemm'd in thus.—

Say, there were a squadron

Of pikes, lin'd through with shot, when I am mounted

Upon my injuries, shall I fear to charge 'em ?

No ; I'll through the battalia, and, that routed,

I'll fall to execution. [Attempts to draw his sword.

Ha ! I'm feeble :

Some undone widow sits upon mine arm,

And takes away the use of 't ; and my sword,

Glued to my scabbard with wrong'd orphans' tears,
Will not be drawn.— [men

Ha ! what are these ? [Staggers back.] Sure, hang-

That come to bind my hands, and then to drag me

Before the judgment-seat.—Now, they are new shapes,

And do appear like Furies, with steel whips

To scourge my ulcerous soul. Shall I then fall

Ingloriously, and yield ?—No ; spite of fate,

I will be forc'd to hell, like to myself.

Though you were legions of accursed spirits,

Thus would I fly among you.— [He rushes madly towards his daughter, and falls exhausted, two servants raise him up—he somewhat recovers, looks wildly round, then fixing his eyes upon his daughter, drops his head upon his bosom, and is borne off by the two servants.]

Mar. Was it not a rare trick,

And please your worship, to make the deed nothing ?

Well. What arts didst use to raze out the conveyance ?

Mar. Certain minerals,

Incorporated in the ink and wax.

Besides he gave me nothing ; but still fed me

With hopes and blows.

If it please your worship

To call to memory, this mad beast once caus'd me

To urge you or to hang, or drown yourself :

I'll do the like to him, if you command me.

Well. You are a rascal ; and he that dares be false
To a master, though unjust, will very hardly Be true to any other. Begone,

And look not for

Reward or favour from me, till thou'st learn'd

To mend thy wicked life. [Exit MARRALL.

ALLWORTH and MARGARET advance.

Marg. O, my poor father ! your piety,

Allw. Nay, weep not, dearest ; though it shows
What is decreed by heaven, we cannot alter. [us

Lov. And heaven here gives a precedent to teach

That, when men leave religion, and turn atheists,

Their own abilities leave them.—Pray you take comfort ;— [To MARGARET.

I will endeavour—you shall be his guardians

In his distractions ;—and for your land, Wellborn,

I'll be an umpire

Between you and this the undoubted heir

Of Sir Giles Overreach :—for me, here's the anchor

That I must fix on. [To Lady ALLWORTH.

All. What you shall determine,

My lord, we will allow of.

Well. 'Tis the language

That I speak too ; but there is something else,

Beside the re-possession of my land,

And payment of my debts, that I must practice :

I had a reputation, but 'twas lost

In my loose course ; and until I redeem it

Some noble way, I am but half made up.

It is a time of action ; if your lordship

Will please to confer a company upon me

In your command, I doubt not, in my service

To my king and country, but I shall do something

That may make me right again.

Lov. Your suit is granted,

And you lov'd for the motion.

Well. Nothing then [To the Audience.

Now wants but your allowance ; and in that

Our all is comprehended : which if you

Grant willingly, as a fair favour due

To the poet's, and our labours, as you may ;

For we despair not, gentlemen, of the play :

You may expect, the grace you show to-night,

Will teach us how to act, our poets how to write.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Skirts of Count Wintensen's Park.
—The park gates in the centre; on one side a low lodge among the trees, a peasant's hut on the other.

Enter PETER.

Pet. Pooh! pooh!—never tell me.—I'm a clever lad, for all father's crying out every minute, "Peter," and "stupid Peter!" But I say, Peter is not stupid, though father will always be so wise. First, I talk too much; then I talk too little; and if I talk a bit to myself, he calls me a driveller. Now I like best to talk to myself; for I never contradict myself, and I don't laugh at myself as other folks do. That laughing is often a plaguy teasing custom. To be sure, when Mrs. Haller laughs, one can bear it well enough; there is a sweetness even in her reproof, that somehow—But, lud! I had near forgot what I was sent about.—Yes, then they would have laughed at me indeed.—[Draws a green purse from his pocket.]—I am to carry this money to old Tobias; and Mrs. Haller said I must be sure not to blab, or say that she had sent it. Well, well, she may be easy for that matter; not a word shall drop from my lips. Mrs. Haller is charming, but silly, if father is right; for father says, "He that spends his money, is not wise," but "he that gives it away, is stark mad."

[Going up to the hut.]

Enter the STRANGER from the Lodge, followed by FRANCIS.—At sight of PETER, the STRANGER stops, and looks suspiciously at him. PETER stands opposite to him, with his mouth wide open. At length he takes off his hat, scrapes a bow, and goes into the hut.

Stra. Who is that?

Fra. The steward's son.

Stra. Of the castle?

Fra. Yes.

Stra. [After a pause.] You were—you were speaking last night—

Fra. Of the old countryman?

Stra. Ay.

Fra. You would not hear me out.

Stra. Proceed.

Fra. He is poor.

Stra. Who told you so?

Fra. Himself.

Stra. Ay, ay; he knows how to tell his story, no doubt.

Fra. And to impose, you think?

Stra. Right!

Fra. This man does not.

Stra. Fool!

Fra. A feeling fool is better than a cold sceptic.

Stra. False!

Fra. Charity begets gratitude.

Stra. False!

Fra. And blesses the giver more than the receiver.

Stra. True.

Fra. Well, sir. This countryman—

Stra. Has he complained to you?

Fra. Yes.

Stra. He who is really unhappy never complains. [Pauses.] Francis, you have had means of education beyond your lot in life, and hence you are encouraged to attempt imposing on me:—but go on.

Fra. His only son has been taken from him.

Stra. Taken from him?

Fra. By the exigency of the times, for a soldier.

Stra. Ay.

Fra. The old man is poor.

Stra. 'Tis likely.

Fra. Sick and forsaken.

Stra. I cannot help him.

Fra. Yes.

Stra. How?

Fra. By money. He may buy his son's release.

Stra. I'll see him myself.

Fra. Do so.

Stra. But if he is an impostor?—

Fra. He is not.

Stra. In that hut?

Fra. In that hut. [STRANGER goes into the hut.]

A good master, though one almost loses the use of speech by living with him. A man kind and clear—though I cannot understand him. He rails against the whole world, and yet no beggar leaves his door unsatisfied. I have now lived three years with him, and yet I know not who he is. A hater of society, no doubt; but not by Providence intended to be so. Misanthropy in his head, not in his heart.

Enter PETER and the STRANGER from the hut.

Pet. Pray walk on.

Stra. [To FRANCIS.] Fool!

Fra. So soon returned!

Stra. What should I do there?

Fra. Did you find it as I said?

Stra. This lad I found.

Fra. What has he to do with your charity?

Stra. The old man and he understand each other perfectly well.

Fra. How?

Stra. What were this boy and the countryman doing?

Fra. [Smiling, and shaking his head.] Well, you shall hear. [To PETER.] Young man, what were you doing in that hut?

Pet. Doing!—Nothing.

Fra. Well, but you could not go there for nothing?

Pet. And why not, pray?—But I did go there for nothing, though.—Do you think one must be paid for every thing?—If Mrs. Haller were to give me but a smiling look, I'd jump up to my neck in the great pond for nothing.

Fra. It seems then Mrs. Haller sent you?

Pet. Yes she did—But I'm not to mention it to any body.

Fra. Why so?

Pet. How should I know? “Look you,” says Mrs. Haller, “Master Peter, be so good as not to mention it to any body.” [With consequence.] “Master Peter, be so good!”—Hi! hi! hi!—“Master Peter, be so!”—Hi! hi! hi!—

Fra. Oh! that is quite a different thing. Of course you must be silent then.

Pet. I know that; and so I am too. For I said to old Tobias—says I, “Now, you're not to think as how Mrs. Haller sent this money; for she told me not to say a word about that as long as I live,” says I.

Fra. There you were very right. Did you carry him much money?

Pet. I don't know; I did not count it. It was in a bit of a green purse. Mayhap it may be some little matter that she has scraped together in the last fortnight.

Fra. And why just in the last fortnight?

Pet. Because, about a fortnight since, I carried him some money before.

Fra. From Mrs. Haller?

Pet. Ay, sure; who else, think you? Father's not such a fool. He says it is our bounden duty, as Christians, to take care of our money, and not give any thing away, especially in summer; for then, says he, there's herbs and roots enough in conscience to satisfy all the reasonable hungry poor. But I say, father's wrong, and Mrs. Haller right.

Fra. Yes, yes.—But this Mrs. Haller seems a strange woman, Peter?

Pet. Ay, at times she is plaguily odd. Why she'll sit and cry you a whole day through, without any one knowing why, or wherefore. And, somehow or other, whenever she cries I always cry too—without knowing why, or wherefore.

Fra. [To the Stranger.] Are you satisfied?

Stra. Rid me of that babbler.

Fra. Good day, Master Peter.

Pet. You're not going yet, are you?

Fra. Mrs. Haller will be waiting for an answer.

Pet. So she will. And I have another place or two to call at. [Takes off his hat to the Stranger.]

Servant, sir!

Stra. Pshaw!

Pet. Pshaw! What—he's angry? [Peter turns to Francis in a half whisper.] He's angry, I suppose because he can get nothing out of me.

Fra. It almost seems so.

Pet. Ay, I'd have him to know I'm no blab. [Exit.]

Fra. Now, sir?

Stra. What do you want?

Fra. Were you not wrong, sir?

Stra. Hem! Wrong!

Fra. Can you still doubt?

Stra. I'll hear no more! Who is this Mrs. Haller? Why do I always follow her path? Go where I will, whenever I try to do good, she has always been before me.

Fra. You should rejoice at that.

Stra. Rejoice!

Fra. Surely! That there are other good and charitable people in the world beside yourself.

Stra. Oh, yes

Fra. Why not seek to be acquainted with her? I saw her yesterday in the garden up at the Castle. Mr. Solomon, the steward, says she has been unwell, and confined to her room almost ever since we have been here. But one would not think it, to look at her; for a more beautiful creature I never saw.

Stra. So much the worse. Beauty is a mask.

Fra. In her it seems a mirror of the soul. Her charities—

Stra. Talk not to me of her charities. All women wish to be conspicuous:—in town by their wit; in the country by their heart.

Fra. 'Tis immaterial in what way good is done.

Stra. No; 'tis not immaterial.

Fra. To this poor old man, at least.

Stra. He needs no assistance of mine.

Fra. His most urgent wants, indeed, Mrs. Haller may have relieved; but whether she has or could have given as much as would purchase liberty for the son, the prop of his age—

Stra. Silence! I will not give him a do! You interest yourself very warmly in his behalf. Perhaps you are to be a sharer in the gift.

Fra. Sir, sir, that did not come from your heart.

Stra. [Recollecting himself.] Forgive me!

Fra. My poor master! How must the world have used you before it could have instilled this hatred of mankind, this constant doubt of honesty and virtue!

Stra. Leave me to myself!

[Throws himself on a seat; takes from his pocket a “Zimmerman on Solitude,” and reads.]

Fra. [Aside, surveying him.] Again reading! Thus it is from morn to night. To him nature has no beauty; life no charm. For three years I have never seen him smile. [Tobias enters from the hut.]

What will be his fate at last? Nothing diverts him. Oh, if he would but attach himself to any living thing! Were it but an animal—for something man must love.

TOBIAS advances.

Tob. Oh! how refreshing, after seven long weeks, to feel these warm sun-beams once again! Thanks! thanks! bounteous Heaven, for the joy I taste.

[Presses his cap between his hands, looks up and prays—The Stranger observes him attentively.]

Fra. [To the Stranger.] This old man's share of earthly happiness can be but little; yet mark how grateful he is for his portion of it.

Stra. Because, though old, he is but a child in the leading strings of Hope.

Fra. Hope is the nurse of life.

Stra. And her cradle is the grave.

Fra. I wish you joy. I am glad to see you are so much recovered.

Tob. Thank you. Heaven, and the assistance of a kind lady, have saved me for another year or two.

Fra. How old are you, pray?

Tob. Fourscore and four. To be sure, I can expect but little joy before I die. Yet, there is another and a better world.

Fra. To the unfortunate, then, death is scarce an evil?

Tob. And am I so unfortunate? Do I not enjoy this glorious morning! Am I not in health again? Believe me, sir, he, who, leaving the bed of sickness, for the first time breathes the fresh pure air, is, at that moment, the happiest of his Maker's creatures.

Fra. Yet 'tis a happiness that fails upon enjoyment.

Tob. True; but less so in old age. Some sixty years ago, my father left me this cottage. I was a strong lad; and took an honest wife. Heaven blessed my farm with rich crops, and my marriage with five children. This lasted nine or ten years. Two of my children died. I felt it sorely. The land was afflicted with a famine. My wife assisted me in supporting our family: but four years after she left our dwelling for a better place. And of my five children only one son remained. This was blow upon blow. It was long before I regained my fortitude. At length, resignation and religion had their effect. I again attached myself to life. My son grew, and helped me in my work. Now the State has called him away to bear a musket. This is to me a loss indeed. I can work no more. I am old and weak; and true it is, but for Mrs. Haller, I must have perished.

Fra. Still, then, life has its charms for you?

Tob. Why not, while the world holds any thing that's dear to me? Have not I a son?

Fra. Who knows that you will ever see him more? He may be dead.

Tob. Alas! he may. But as long as I am not sure of it, he lives to me: and, if he falls, 'tis in his country's cause. Nay, should I lose him, still I should not wish to die. Here is the hut in which I was born. Here is the tree that grew with me; and, I am almost ashamed to confess it—I have a dog which I love. [Stranger rises and advances.]

Fra. A dog!

Tob. Yes!—Smile, if you please: but hear me. My benefactress once came to my hut herself, some time before you fixed here. The poor animal, unused to see the form of elegance and beauty enter the door of penury, growled at her.—“I wonder you keep that surly, ugly animal, Mr. Tobias,” said she; “you, who have hardly food enough for yourself.”—“Ah, madam,” I replied, “and if I part with him, are you sure that any thing else will love me?”—She was pleased with my answer.

Fra. [To STRANGER.] Excuse me, sir; but I wish you had listened.

Stra. I have listened.

Fra. Then sir, I wish you would follow this poor old man's example.

Stra. Here; take this book, and lay it on my desk. [FRANCIS goes into the lodge with a book.] How much has this Mrs. Haller given you?

Tob. Oh, sir, she has given me so much that I can look towards winter without fear.

Stra. No more?

Tob. What could I do with more?—Ah! true; I might—

Stra. I know it.—You might buy your son's release.—There!

[Presses a purse into his hand, and exit.]

Tob. What is all this? [Opens the purse.] Merciful heaven!

Enter FRANCIS from the lodge, just in time to see the STRANGER give the purse.

—Now look, sir; is confidence in heaven unrewarded?

Fra. I wish you joy! My master gave you this?

Tob. Yes, your noble master. Heaven reward him!

Fra. Just like him. He sent me with his book, that no one might be witness to his bounty.

Tob. He would not even take my thanks. He was gone before I could speak.

Fra. Just his way.

Tob. Now I'll go as quick as these old legs will bear me. What a delightful errand! I go to release my Robert! How the lad will rejoice! There is a girl, too, in the village that will rejoice with him. O, Providence, how good art thou! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—An Anti-chamber in Wintersen Castle.

Enter SUSAN, meeting GEORGE.

Susan. Why, George! Harry! Where have you been loitering? Put down these things. Mrs. Haller has been calling for you this half hour.

Geo. Well, here I am, then. What does she want with me?

Susan. That she will tell you herself. Here she comes.

Enter Mrs. HALLER, with a letter, HANNAH following.

Mrs. H. Very well; if those things are done, let the drawing-room be made ready immediately. [Ereunt Maids.] And, George, run immediately into the park, and tell Mr. Solomon I wish to speak with him. [Exit GEORGE.] I cannot understand this. I do not learn whether their coming to this place be but the whim of a moment, or a plan for a longer stay! If the latter, farewell, solitude! Farewell, study!—farewell!—Yes, I must make room for gaiety and mere frivolity. Yet could I willingly submit to all: but should the Countess give me new proofs of her attachment, perhaps of her respect, Oh! how will my conscience upbraid me! Or if this seat be visited by company, and chance should conduct hither any of my former acquaintance.—Alas! alas! how wretched is the being who fears the sight of any one fellow creature! But, Oh! superior misery! to dread still more the presence of a former friend!—[PETER knocks.] Who's there?

Enter PETER.

Pet. Nobody. It's only me.

Mrs. H. So soon returned?

Pet. Sharp lad, an't I? On the road I've had a bit of talk too, and—

Mrs. H. But you have observed my directions?

Pet. Oh, yes, yes!—I told old Tobias as how he would never know, as long as he lived, that the money came from you.

Mrs. H. You found him quite recovered, I hope?

Pet. Ay, sure, did I. He's coming out to-day, for the first time.

Mrs. H. I rejoice to hear it.

Pet. He said that he was obliged to you for all; and before dinner would crawl up to thank you.

Mrs. H. Good Peter, do me another service.

Pet. Ay, a hundred, if you'll only let me have a good long stare at you.

Mrs. H. With all my heart! Observe when old Tobias comes, send him away. Tell him I am busy, or asleep, or unwell, or what you please.

Pet. I will, I will.

Sol. [Without.] There, there, go to the post-office.

Mrs. H. Oh! here comes Mr. Solomon.

Pet. What! father?—Ay, so there is. Father's a main clever man: he knows what's going on all over the world.

Mrs. H. No wonder; for you know he receives as many letters as a prime minister and all his secretaries.

Enter SOLOMON.

Sol. Good morning, good morning to you, Mrs. Haller. It gives me infinite pleasure to see you look so charmingly well. You have had the goodness to send for your humble servant. Any news from the Great City? There are very weighty matters in agitation. I have my letters too.

Mrs. H. [Smiling.] I think, Mr. Solomon, you must correspond with the four quarters of the globe.

Sol. Beg pardon, not with the whole world, Mrs. Haller; but, [consequently.] to be sure, I have correspondents, on whom I can rely, in the chief cities of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.

Mrs. H. And yet I have my doubts whether you know what is to happen this very day, at this very place.

Sol. At this very place! Nothing material. We meant to have sown a little barley to-day, but the ground is too dry: and the sheep-shearing is not to be till to-morrow.

Pet. No nor the bull-baiting till—

Sol. Hold your tongue, blockhead! Get about your business.

Pet. Blockhead! There again! I suppose I'm not to open my mouth. [To Mrs. Haller.] Good bye! [Exit.]

Mrs. H. The Count will be here to-day.

Sol. How! What.

Mrs. H. With his lady, and his brother-in-law, Baron Steinfort.

Sol. My letters say nothing of this. You are laughing at your humble servant.

Mrs. H. You know, sir, I'm not much given to jesting.

Sol. Peter!—Good lack-a-day!—His Right Honourable Excellency the Count Wintersen, and her Honourable Excellency the Countess Wintersen, and his Honourable Lordship Baron Steinfort.—And, Lord have mercy! Nothing in proper order!—Here, Peter! Peter!

Enter PETER.

Pet. Well, now; what's the matter again?

Sol. Call all the house together directly! Send to the gamekeeper; tell him to bring some venison. Tell Rebecca to uncass the furniture, and take the covering from the Venetian looking-glasses, that her Right Honourable Ladyship may look at her gracious countenance; and tell the cook to let me see him without loss of time: and tell John to catch a brace or two of carp. And tell—and tell—and tell—tell Frederick to friz my Sunday wig. Mercy on us—tell—There—Go! [Exit PETER.] Heavens and earth! So little of the new furnishing of this old castle is completed!—Where are we to put his Honourable Lordship the Baron?

Mrs. H. Let him have the little chamber at the head of the stairs; it is a neat room, and commands a beautiful prospect.

Sol. Very right, very right. But that room has always been occupied by the Count's private secretary. Suppose!—Hold, I have it. You know the little lodge at the end of the park: we can thrust the secretary into that.

Mrs. H. You forget, Mr. Solomon; you told me that the stranger lived there.

Sol. Pshaw! What have we to do with the stranger?—Who told him to live there?—He must turn out.

Mrs. H. That would be unjust; for you said that you let the dwelling to him, and by your own account he pays well for it.

Sol. He does, he does. But nobody knows who he is. The devil himself can't make him out. To be sure, I lately received a letter from Spain, which informed me that a spy had taken up his abode in this country, and from the description—

Mrs. H. A spy! Ridiculous! Every thing I have heard bespeaks him to be a man who may be allowed to dwell any where. His life is solitude and silence.

Sol. So it is.

Mrs. H. You tell me, too, he does much good.

Sol. That he does.

Mrs. H. He hurts nothing; not the worm in his way.

Sol. That he does not.

Mrs. H. He troubles no one.

Sol. True! true!

Mrs. H. Well, what do you want more?

Sol. I want to know who he is. If the man would only converse a little, one might have an opportunity of pumping; but if one meets him in the lime-walk, or by the river, it is nothing but—"Good morrow; and off he marches. Once or twice I have contrived to edge in a word—"Fine day."—"Yes."—"Taking a little exercise, I perceive."—"Yes; and off again like a shot. The devil take such close fellows, say I. And, like master like man; not a syllable do I know of that mumps, his servant, except that his name is Francis.

Mrs. H. You are putting yourself into a passion, and quite forget who are expected.

Sol. So I do—Mercy on us!—There now, you see what misfortunes arise from not knowing people.

Mrs. H. 'Tis near twelve o'clock! If his lordship has stolen an hour from his usual sleep, the family must soon be here. I go to my duty; you will attend to yours, Mr. Solomon. [Exit.]

Sol. Yes, I'll look after my duty, never fear. There goes another of the same class. Nobody knows who she is, again. However, thus much I do know of her, that her Right Honourable Lady-ship the Countess, all at once, popped her into the house, like a blot of ink upon a sheet of paper. But why, wherefore, or for what reason, not a soul can tell.—“She is to manage the family within doors.” She to manage! Fire and faggots! Hav’n’t I managed every thing within and without, most reputably, these twenty years? I must own I grow a little old, and she does take a deal of pains: but all this she learned of me. When she first came here—Mercy on us! she didn’t know that linen was made of flax. But what was to be expected from one who has no foreign correspondence? [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Drawing-room in the Castle, with sofa and chairs.—Rural music heard without.

Enter SOLOMON.

Pet. [Without.] Stop; not yet, not yet; but make way there, make way, my good friends, tenants, and villagers.—John, George, Frederick! Good friends, make way.

Sol. It is not the Count: it’s only Baron Steinfort. Stand back, I say; and stop the music!

Enter BARON STEINFORT, ushered in by PETER, who mimicks and apes his father.

I have the honour to introduce to your lordship myself, Mr. Solomon, who blesses the hour in which fortune allows him to become acquainted with the the Honourable Baron Steinfort, [BARON passes SOLOMON and throws himself on the sofa,] brother-in-law of his Right Honourable Excellency Count Wintersen, my noble master.

Pet. Bless our noble master!

Bar. Old and young, I see they’ll allow me no peace. [Aside.] Enough, enough, good Mr. Solomon, I am a soldier. I pay but few compliments, and require as few from others.

Sol. I beg pardon, my lord.—We do live in the country to be sure, but we are acquainted with the reverence due to exalted personages.

[Sitting beside the BARON.]

Pet. Yes.—We are acquainted with exalted personages.

Bar. What is to become of me?—Well, well, I hope we shall be better acquainted. You must know, Mr. Solomon, I intend to assist, for a couple of months at least, in attacking the well-stocked cellars of Wintersen.

Sol. Why not whole years, my lord?—Inexpressible would be the satisfaction of your humble servant. And, though I say it, well stocked indeed are our cellars. I have, in every respect, here managed matters in so frugal and provident a way, that his Right Honourable Excellency the Count will be astonished. [BARON yawns.] Extremely sorry it is not in my power to entertain your lordship.

Pet. Extremely sorry.

Sol. Where can Mrs. Haller have hid herself?

Bar. Mrs. Haller! Who is she?

Sol. Why, who she is, I can’t exactly tell your lordship.

Pet. No, nor I.

Sol. None of my correspondents give any account of her. She is here in the capacity of a kind of a superior housekeeper. Methinks I hear her silver voice upon the stairs. I will have the honour of sending her to your lordship in an instant.

Bar. Oh! don’t trouble yourself.

Sol. No trouble whatever! I remain, at all times, your honourable lordship’s most obedient, humble, and devoted servant.

[Exit, bowing.]

Pet. Devoted servant.

Bar. Now for a fresh plague. Now am I to be tormented by some chattering old ugly hag, till I am stunned with her noise and officious hospitality. Oh, patience! what a virtue art thou!

Enter Mrs. HALLER, with a courtesy; Baron rises, and returns a bow, in confusion.

[Aside.] No, old she is not. [Casts another glance at her.] No, by Jove, nor ugly.

Mrs. H. I rejoice, my lord, in thus becoming acquainted with the brother of my benefactress.

Bar. Madam, that title shall be doubly valuable to me, since it gives me an introduction equally to be rejoiced at.

Mrs. H. [Without attending to the compliment.] This lovely weather, then, has enticed the Count from the city.

Bar. Not exactly that. You know him. Sunshine or clouds are to him alike, as long as eternal summer reigns in his own heart and family.

Mrs. H. The Count possesses a most cheerful and amiable philosophy. Ever in the same happy humour; ever enjoying each minute of his life. But you must confess, my lord, that he is a favourite child of fortune, and has much to be grateful to her for. Not merely because she has given him birth and riches, but for a native sweetness of temper, never to be acquired; and a graceful suavity of manners, whose school must be the mind. And, need I enumerate among fortune’s favours, the hand and affections of your accomplished sister?

Bar. [More admiringly.] True, madam. My good easy brother, too, seems fully sensible of his happiness, and is resolved to retain it. He has quitted the service to live here. I am yet afraid he may soon grow weary of Wintersen and retirement.

Mrs. H. I should trust not. They, who bear a cheerful and unrepining conscience into solitude, surely must increase the measure of their own enjoyments. They quit the poor, precarious, the dependent pleasures, which they borrowed from the world, to draw a real bliss from that exhaustless source of true delight, the fountain of a pure unsullied heart.

Bar. Has retirement long possessed so lovely an advocate?

Mrs. H. I have lived here three years.

Bar. And never felt a secret wish for the society you left, and must have adorned?

Mrs. H. Never.

Bar. To feel thus belongs either to a very rough or a very polished soul. The first sight convinced me in which class I am to place you.

Mrs. H. [With a sigh.] There may, perhaps, be a third class.

Bar. Indeed, madam, I wish not to be thought forward; but women always seemed to me less calculated for retirement than men. We have a thousand employments, a thousand amusements, which you have not.

Mrs. H. Dare I ask what they are?

Bar. We ride—we hunt—we play—we read—we write—

Mrs. H. The noble employments of the chase, and the still more noble employment of play, I grant you.

Bar. Nay, but dare I ask what are your employments for a day?

Mrs. H. Oh, my lord! you cannot imagine how quickly time passes when a certain uniformity guides the minutes of our life. How often do I ask, "Is Saturday come again so soon?" On a bright cheerful morning my books and breakfast are carried out upon the grass plot. Then is the sweet picture of reviving industry, and eager innocence, always new to me. The birds' notes so often heard, still waken new ideas: the herds are led into the fields; the peasant bends his eye upon his plough. Every thing lives and moves; and in every creature's mind it seems as it were morning. Towards evening I begin to roam abroad, from the park into the meadows. And sometimes, returning, I pause to look at the village boys and girls as they play. Then do I bless their innocence, and pray to Heaven those laughing thoughtless hours could be their lot for ever.

Bar. This is excellent!—But these are summer amusements. The winter! the winter!

Mrs. H. Why for ever picture winter like old age, torpid, tedious, and uncheerful? Winter has its own delights: this is the time to instruct and mend the mind by reading and reflection. At this season, too, I often take my harp, and amuse myself by playing or singing the little favourite airs that remind me of the past, or solicit hope for the future.

Bar. Happy indeed are they, who can thus create and vary their own pleasures and employments.

Enter PETER.

Pet. Well—well—Pray now—I was ordered—I can keep him out no longer—'Tis old Tobias: he will come in.

Enter TOBIAS, forcing his way; Exit PETER.

Tob. I must, good Heaven, I must!

Mrs. H. [Confused.] I have no time at present—I—I—You see I am not alone.

Tob. Oh! this good gentleman will forgive me.

Bar. What do you want?

Tob. To return thanks. Even charity is a burden if one may not be grateful for it.

Mrs. H. To-morrow, good Tobias; to-morrow.

Bar. Nay, no false delicacy, madam. Allow him to vent the feelings of his heart; and permit me to witness a scene which convinces me, even more powerfully than your conversation, how nobly you employ your time. Speak, old man.

Tob. Oh, lady, that each word which drops from my lips, might call down a blessing on your head! I lay forsaken and dying in my hut: not even bread nor hope remained. Oh! then you came in the form of an angel; brought medicines to me; and your sweet consoling voice did more than those. I am recovered. To-day, for the first time, I have returned thanks in presence of the sun: and now I come to you, noble lady. Let me drop my tears upon your charitable hand. For your sake, Heaven has blessed my latter days. The Stranger too, who lives near me, has given me a purse of gold to buy my son's release. I am on my way to the city: I shall purchase my Robert's release. Then I shall have an honest daughter-in-law. And you, if ever after that you pass our happy cottage, oh! what must you feel when you say to yourself, "This is my work!"

Mrs. H. [In a tone of entreaty.] Enough, Tobias; enough!

Tob. I beg pardon! I cannot utter what is breathing in my breast. There is One who knows it, May His blessing and your own heart reward you!

[Exit.]

Mrs. H. I suppose, my lord, we may expect the Count and Countess every moment now?

Bar. Not just yet, madam. He travels at his leisure. I am selfish, perhaps, in not being anxious for his speed: the delay has procured me a delight which I never shall forget.

Mrs. H. [Smiling.] You satirise mankind, my lord.

Bar. How so?

Mrs. H. In supposing such scenes to be uncommon.

Bar. I confess I was little prepared for such an acquaintance as yourself: I am extremely surprised. When Solomon told me your name and situation, how could I suppose that—Pardon my curiosity: You have been, or are, married?

Mrs. H. [Suddenly sinking from her cheerful railway into mournful gloom.] I have been married, my lord.

Bar. A widow, then?

Mrs. H. I beseech you—There are strings in the human heart, which touched, will sometimes utter dreadful discord—I beseech you—

Bar. I understand you. I see you know how to conceal every thing except your perfections.

Mrs. H. My perfections, alas!—[Rural music without.] But I hear the happy tenantry announce the Count's arrival. Your pardon, my lord, I must attend them.

[Exit.]

Bar. Excellent creature!—What is she, and what can be her history? I must seek my sister instantly. How strong and how sudden is the interest I feel for her! But it is a feeling I ought to check. And yet, why so? Whatever are the emotions she has inspired, I am sure they arise from the perfections of the mind; and never shall be met by unworthiness in mine.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Lawn.

Enter SOLOMON and PETER, ushering in the COUNT, Countess WINTERSEN, leading a Child; Mrs. HALLER, the BARON, and Servants following.

Sol. Welcome, ten thousand welcomes, your Excellencies!

Count. Well! here we are! Heaven bless our advance and retreat! Mrs. Haller, I bring you an invalid, who in future will swear to no flag but yours,

Mrs. H. Mine flies for retreat and rural happiness.

Count. But not without retreating Graces, and retiring Cupids too.

Countess. [Who has in the meantime kindly embraced Mrs. HALLER, and by her been welcomed to Wintersen.] My dear Count, you forget that I am present.

Count. Why, in the name of chivalry, how can I do less than your gallant brother, the Baron, who has been so kind as nearly to kill my four greys, in order to be here five minutes before me?

Bar. If I had known all the charms of this place, you should have said so with justice.

Countess. Don't you think William much grown?

[Puts WILLIAM over to Mrs. HALLER.]

Mrs. H. The sweet boy!

[Stoops to kiss him, and deep melancholy overshadows her countenance. Retires with the Child a little.] Count. Well, Solomon, you've provided a good dinner?

Sol. As good as haste would allow, please your Right honourable Excellency!

Pet. Yes, as good as—

[COUNT retires a little with SOLOMON and PETER.]

Bar. Tell me, I conjure you, sister, what jewel you have thus buried in the country?

Countess. Ha! ha! ha! What, brother, you caught at last?

Bar. Answer me.

Countess. Well, her name is Mrs. Haller.

Bar. That I know; but—

Countess. But!—but I know no more myself.

Bar. Jestings apart, I wish to know.

Countess. And, jestings apart, I wish you would not plague me. I have at least a hundred thousand important things to do. Heavens! the vicar may come to pay his respects to me before I have been at my toilet; of course I must consult my looking-glass on the occasion. Come, William, will you help to dress me, or stay with your father?

Count. We'll take care of him. [Goes to the child.]

Countess. Come, Mrs. Haller.

[Mrs. Haller crosses to the Countess.]

[Exit with Mrs. Haller, SUSAN and HANNAH following.]

Bar. [Aside, and going.] I am in a very singular humour.

Count. Whither so fast, good brother?

Bar. To my apartment: I have letters to—I

Count. Pshaw! Stay. Let us take a turn in the park together.

Bar. Excuse me. I am not perfectly well. I should be but bad company. I— [Exit.]

Count. [SOLOMON and PETER advance, bowing.] Well, Solomon, you are as great a fool as ever, I see.

Sol. Ha! ha! At your Right Honourable Excellency's service.

Count. [Points to PETER.] Who is that ape at your elbow?

Sol. Ape!—Oh! that is—with respect to your Excellency be it spoken—the son of my body; by name, Peter. [PETER bows.]

Count. So, so! Well, how goes all on?

Sol. Well and good; well and good. Your Excellency will see how I've improved the park. You'll not know it again. A hermitage here; serpentine walks there; an obelisk; a ruin; and all so sparingly, all done with the most economical economy.

Count. Well, I'll have a peep at your obelisk and ruins, while they prepare for dinner.

Sol. I have already ordered it, and will have the honour of attending your Right Honourable Excellency.

Count. Come, lead the way. Peter, attend your young master to the house; we must not tire him.

[Ereunt.]

Pet. We'll go round this way, your little Excellency, and then we shall see the bridge as we go by; and the new boat, with all the fine ribands and streamers. This way, your little Excellency. [Exit]

SCENE III.—The Antichamber.

Enter Mrs. Haller.

Mrs. H. What has thus alarmed and subdued me? My tears flow; my heart bleeds. Already had I apparently overcome my chagrin; already had I at least assumed that easy gaiety once so natural to me, when the sight of this child in an instant overpowered me. When the Countess called him William—Oh! she knew not that she plunged a poignard in my heart. I have a William too, who must be as tall as this, if he be still alive. Ah!

ACT. DRAMA.—NO. XXXVIII.

yes, if he be still alive. His little sister, too! Why, fancy, dost thou rack me thus? Why dost thou image my poor children, fainting in sickness, and crying to their mother? To the mother who has abandoned them? What a wretched outcast am I! And that just to-day I should be doomed to feel these horrible emotions! Just to-day, when disguise was so necessary.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Very pretty, very pretty, indeed! Better send me to the garret at once. Your servant, Mrs. Haller. I beg, madam, I may have a room fit for a respectable person.

Mrs. H. The chamber into which you have been shown is, I think, a very neat one.

Char. A very neat one, is it? Up the back stairs, and over the laundry! I should never be able to close my eyes.

Mrs. H. I slept there a whole year.

Char. Did you? Then I advise you to remove into it again, and the sooner the better. I'd have you to know, madam, there is a material difference between certain persons and certain persons. Much depends upon the manner in which one has been educated. I think, madam, it would only be proper if you resigned your room to me.

Mrs. H. If the Countess desires it, certainly.

Char. The Countess! Very pretty, indeed! Would you have me think of plaguing her ladyship with such trifles? I shall order my trunks to be carried wherever I please.

Mrs. H. Certainly; only not into my chamber.

Char. Provoking creature! But how could I expect to find breeding among creatures born of one knows not whom, and coming one knows not whence?

Mrs. H. The remark is very just.

Enter PETER.

Pet. Oh lud! Oh lud! Oh lud! Oh lud

Mrs. H. What's the matter?

Pet. The young Count has fallen into the river! His little Excellency is drowned.

Mrs. H. Who? What?

Pet. His honour, my young master!

Mrs. H. Drowned?

Pet. Yes.

Mrs. H. Dead?

Pet. No; he's not dead.

Mrs. H. Well, well, then softly;—you will alarm the Countess.

Pet. Oh lud! Oh lud!—

Enter the BARON.

Bar. What is the matter? Why all this noise?

Pet. Noise? Why—

Mrs. H. Be not alarmed, my lord. Whatever may have happened, the dear child is now at least safe. You said so, I think, master Peter.

Pet. Why, to be sure, his little Excellency is not hurt, but he's very wet though: and the Count is taking him by the garden door to the house.

Bar. Right, that the Countess may not be alarmed. But how could it happen? Pray tell us, young man?

Pet. What, from beginning to end?

Mrs. H. Never mind particulars. You attended the dear child?

Pet. True.

Mrs. H. Into the park?

Pet. True.

Mrs. H. And then you went to the river?

Pet. True.—Why, rabbit it, I believe you're a witch.

Mrs. H. Well, and what happened further?

Pet. Why, you see, his dear little Excellency would see the bridge that father built out of the old summer-house; and the streamers, and the boat, and all that.—I only turned my head round for a moment, to look after a magpie—Crush! Down went the bridge with his little Excellency; and oh, how I was scared to see him carried down the river!

Bar. And you drew him out again directly?

Pet. No, I didn't.

Mrs. H. No; your father did?

Pet. No, he didn't.

Mrs. H. Why, you did not leave him in the water?

Pet. Yes, we did!—But we bawled as loud as we could! You might have heard us down to the village.

Mrs. H. Ay—and so the people came immediately to his assistance?

Pet. No, they didn't; but the Stranger came, that lives yonder, close to old Toby, and never speaks a syllable. Odsbodikins! What a devil of a fellow it is! With a single spring bounce he slaps into the torrent; sails and dives about and about like a duck; gets me hold of the little angel's hair, and Heaven bless him! pulls him safe and sound to dry land again.—Ha! ha! ha!

Bar. Is the Stranger with them?

Pet. Oh, lud! no. He ran away. His Excellency wanted to thank him, and all that; but he was off; vanquished—like a ghost.

Enter SOLOMON.

Sol. Oh! thou careless varlet! I disown you! What an accident might have happened! And how you have terrified his Excellency! But I beg pardon, his Right Honourable Excellency, the Count requests you:—

Bar. We come.

[Exit.

Char. Ha! ha! ha! Why, Mr. Solomon, you seem to have a hopeful pupil.

Sol. Ah! Sirrah!

Char. But Mr. Solomon, why were you not nimble enough to have saved his young lordship?

Sol. Not in time, my sweet Miss. Besides, mercy on us! I should have sunk like a lump of lead: and I happened to have a letter of consequence in my pocket, which would have been made totally illegible, a letter from Constantinople, written by Chevalier—What's his name? [Draws a letter from his pocket, and, putting it up again directly, drops it. PETER takes it up slyly and unobserved.] It contains momentous matter, I assure you. The world will be astonished when it comes to light; and not a soul will suppose that old Solomon had a finger in the pye.

Char. No, that I believe.

Sol. But I must go and see to the cellar. Miss, your most obedient servant. O sirrah, O! [Exit.

Char. Your servant, Mr. Solomon.

Pet. Here's the letter from Constantinople. I wonder what it can be about. Now for it!

[Opens it.

Char. Aye, let us have it.

Pet. [Reads.] "If so be you say so, I'll never work for you, never no more. Considering as how your Sunday waistcoat has been turned three times, it doesn't look amiss, and I've charged as little as any tailor of 'em all. You say I must pay for the buckram; but I say, I'll be damn'd if I do. So no more from your loving nephew, TIMOTHY TWIST."

From Constantinople! Why, cousin Tim writ it!

Char. Cousin Tim! Who is he?

Pet. Good lack! Don't you know cousin Tim? Why, he's one of the best tailors in all—

Char. A tailor! No, sir, I do not know him. My father was state coachman, and wore his Highness's livery.

[Exit.

Pet. "My father was state coachman, and wore his Highness's livery."—Well, and cousin Tim could have made his Highness's livery, if you go to that. State coachman, indeed!

[Exit.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Skirts of the Park and Lodge, &c. as before. The STRANGER is discovered on a seat, reading.

Enter FRANCIS, from the Lodge.

Fra. Sir, sir, dinner is ready.

Stra. I want no dinner.

Fra. I've got something good.

Stra. Eat it yourself.

Fra. You are not hungry?

Stra. No.

Fra. Nor I. The heat does take away all appetite.

Stra. Yes.

Fra. I'll put it by; perhaps at night—

Stra. Perhaps.

Fra. Dear sir, dare I speak?

Stra. Speak.

Fra. You have done a noble action.

Stra. What?

Fra. You have saved a fellow creature's life.

Stra. Peace!

Fra. Do you know who he was?

Stra. No.

Fra. The only son of Count Wintensen.

Stra. Immaterial.

Fra. A gentleman, by report, worthy and benevolent as yourself.

Stra. Silence! Dare you flatter me?

Fra. As I look to Heaven for mercy, I speak from my heart. When I observe how you are doing good around you, how you are making every individual's wants your own, and are yet yourself unhappy, alas! my heart bleeds for you.

Stra. I thank you, Francis. I can only thank you. Yet share this consolation with me;—my sufferings are unmerited.

Fra. My poor master!

Stra. Have you forgotten what the old man said this morning? "There is another and a better world!" Oh, 'tis true. Then let us hope with fervency, and yet endure with patience:—[CHARLOTTE singing without.] What's here?

Enter CHARLOTTE, (singing.)

Char. I presume, sir, you are the strange gentleman that drew my young master out of the water? [The STRANGER reads.] Or [To FRANCIS.] Are you he? [FRANCIS makes a wry face.] Are the creatures both dumb? [Looks at them by turns.] Surely, old Solomon has fixed two statues here, by way of ornament; for of any use there is no sign. [Approaches FRANCIS.] No, this is alive, and breathes; yes, and moves its eyes. [Bawls in his ear.] Good friend!

Fra. I'm not deaf, I assure you.

Char. No, nor dumb, I perceive at last.—Is you lifeless thing your master?

Fra. That honest, silent gentleman, is my master.

Char. The same that drew the young Count out of the water?

Fra. The same.

Char. [To the STRANGER.] Sir, my master and mistress, the Count and Countess, present their respectful compliments, and request the honour of your company at a family supper this evening.

Str. I shall not come.

Char. But you'll scarce send such an uncivil answer as this. The Count is overpowered with gratitude. You saved his son's life.

Str. I did it willingly.

Char. And won't accept of "I thank you," in return.

Str. No.

Char. You really are cruel, sir, I must tell you. There are three of us ladies at the Castle, and we are all dying with curiosity to know who you are. [Exit STRANGER.] The master is crabbed enough, however. Let me try what I can make of the man. Pray, sir—The beginning promises little enough. Friend, why won't you look at me?

Fra. I like to look at green trees better than green eyes.

Char. Green eyes, you monster! Who told you that my eyes were green? Let me tell you, there have been sonnets made on my eyes before now. Green eyes!

Fra. Glad to hear it.

Char. To the point, then, at once. What is your master?

Fra. A man.

Char. Unsurmised as much. But what's his name?

Fra. The same as his father's.

Char. Not unlikely; and his father was—

Fra. Married.

Char. To whom?

Fra. To a woman.

Char. I'll tell you what; who your master is I see I shall not learn, and I don't care; but I know what you are.

Fra. Well, what am I?

Char. A bear!

[Exit

Fra. Thank you! Now to see how habit and example corrupt one's manners. I am naturally the civillest spoken fellow in the world to the pretty prattling rogues; yet, following my master's humour, I've rudely driven this wench away. I must have a peep at her though.

Enter STRANGER.

Str. Is that woman gone?

Fra. Yes.

Str. Francis!

Fra. Sir.

Str. We must be gone, too.

Fra. But whither?

Str. I don't care.

Fra. I'll attend you.

Str. To any place?

Fra. To death.

Str. Heaven grant it—to me, at least! There is peace.

Fra. Peace is every where. Let the storm rage without, if the heart be at rest. Yet I think we are very well where we are; the situation is inviting; and nature lavish of her beauties, and of her bounties too.

Str. But I am not a wild beast, to be starved at, and sent for as a show. Is it fit I should be?

Fra. Another of your interpretations! That a man, the life of whose only son you have saved, should invite you to his house, seems to me not very unnatural.

Str. I will not be invited to any house.

Fra. For once, methinks, you might submit. You'll not be asked a second time. [Half aside.

Str. Proud wretches! They believe the most essential service is required, if one may but have the honour of sitting at their table. Let us begone.

Fra. Yet hold, sir! This bustle will soon be over. Used to the town, the Count and his party will soon be tired of simple nature, and you will again be freed from observation.

Str. Not from your's.

Fra. This is too much. Do I deserve your doubts?

Str. Am I in the wrong?

Fra. You are, indeed!

Str. Francis, my servant, you are my only friend.

Fra. That title makes amends for all.

Str. But, look! look, Francis! There are uniforms and gay dresses in the walk again. No; I must be gone. Here I'll stay no longer.

Fra. Well, then, I'll tie up my bundle.

Str. The sooner the better! They come this way. Now must I shut myself in my hovel, and lose this fine breeze. Nay, if they be your high-bred class of all, they may have impudence enough to walk into my chamber. Francis, I shall lock the door. [Exit.

Fra. And I'll be your centinel.

Str. Very well.

[Closes the shutters.

Fra. Now, should these people be as inquisitive as their maid, I must summon my whole stock of impertinence. But their questions and my answers need little study. They can learn nothing of the Stranger from me; for the best of all possible reasons—I know nothing of him myself.

Enter BARON and COUNTESS.

Countess. There is a strange face. The servant, probably.

Bar. Friend, can we speak to your master?

Fra. No.

Bar. Only for a few minutes.

Fra. He has locked himself in his room.

Countess. Tell him a lady waits for him.

Fra. Then he's sure not to come.

Countess. Does he hate our sex?

Fra. He hates the whole human race, but women particularly.

Countess. And why?

Fra. He may have been deceived.

Countess. This is not very courteous.

Fra. My master is not over courteous; but when he sees a chance of saving a fellow-creature's life, he'll attempt it at the hazard of his own.

Bar. You are right. Now hear the reason of our visit. The wife and brother-in-law of the man, whose child your master has saved, wish to acknowledge their obligations to him.

Fra. That he dislikes. He only wishes to live unnoticed.

Countess. He appears to be unfortunate.

Fra. Appears!

Countess. An affair of honour, perhaps, or some unhappy attachment may have—

Fra. It may.

Countess. Be this as it may, I wish to know who he is.

Fra. So do I.

Count. What! Don't you know him yourself?

Fra. Oh! I know him well enough. I mean his real self—his heart—his soul—his worth—his honour!—Perhaps you think one knows a man when one is acquainted with his name and person.

Countess. 'Tis well said, friend; you please me much. And now I should like to know you. Who are you?

Fra. Your humble servant.

[Exit.]

Countess. This is affectation! A desire to appear singular! Every one wishes to make himself distinguished. One sails round the world; another creeps into a hovel.

Bar. And the man apes his master!

Countess. Come, brother, let us seek the Count. He and Mrs. Haller turned into the lawn—

Bar. Stay. First a word or two, sister. I am in love.

Countess. For the hundredth time.

Bar. For the first time in my life.

Countess. I wish you joy.

Bar. Till now you have evaded my inquiries. Who is she? I beseech you, sister, be serious. There is a time for all things.

Countess. Well, if I am to be serious, I obey. I do not know who Mrs. Haller is, as I have already told you; but what I do know of her, shall not be concealed from you. It may now be three years ago, when, one evening, about twilight, a lady was announced, who wished to speak to me in private. Mrs. Haller appeared with all that grace and modesty which have enchanted you. Her features, at that moment, bore keener marks of the sorrow and confusion which have since settled into gentle melancholy. She threw herself at my feet; and besought me to save a wretch who was on the brink of despair. She told me she had heard much of my benevolence, and offered herself as a servant to attend me. I endeavoured to dive into the cause of her sufferings, but in vain. She concealed her secret; yet opening to me more and more each day a heart, chosen by virtue as her temple, and an understanding improved by the most refined attainments. She no longer remained my servant, but became my friend; and, by her own desire, has ever since resided here. Brother, I have done.

Bar. Too little to satisfy my curiosity; yet enough to make me realise my project. Sister, lend me your aid—I would marry her.

Countess. You?

Bar. I.

Countess. Baron Steinfort!

Bar. For shame! If I understand you.

Countess. Not so harsh, and not so hasty! Those great sentiments of contempt of inequality in rank are very fine in a romance; but we happen not to be inhabitants of an ideal world. How could you introduce her to the circle we live in? You, surely, would not attempt to present her to—

Bar. Object as you will—my answer is—I love. Sister, you see a man before you, who—

Countess. Who wants a wife.

Bar. No; who has deliberately poised advantage against disadvantage; domestic ease and comfort against the false gaieties of fashion. I can withdraw into the country: I need no honours to make my tenants happy; and my heart will teach me to make their happiness my own. With such a wife as this, children who resemble her, and fortune enough to spread comfort around me, what would the soul of man have more?

Countess. This is all vastly fine. I admire your plan; only you seem to have forgotten one trifling circumstance.

Bar. And that is—

Countess. Whether Mrs. Haller will have you or not.

Bar. There, sister, I just want your assistance.—Good Henrietta!

Countess. Well, here's my hand. I'll do all I can for you. St!—We had near been overheard. They are coming. Be patient and obedient.

Enter COUNT, and Mrs. HALLER leaning on his arm.

Count. Upon my word, Mrs. Haller, you are a nimble walker: I should be sorry to run a race with you.

Mrs. H. Custom, my lord. You need only take the same walk every day for a month.

Count. Yes; if I wanted to resemble my greyhounds—Well, what says the Stranger?

Countess. He gave Charlotte a flat refusal, and you see his door, and even his shutters, are closed against us.

Count. What an unaccountable being! But it won't do. I must show my gratitude one way or other. Steinfort, we will take the ladies home, and then you shall try once again to see him. You can talk to these oddities better than I can.

Bar. If you wish it, with all my heart.

Count. Thank you, thank you. Come, ladies: come, Mrs. Haller. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in the Castle.

Enter COUNTESS and Mrs. HALLER.

Countess. Well, Mrs. Haller, how do you like the man that just now left us?

Mrs. H. Who do you mean, madam?

Countess. My brother.

Mrs. H. He deserves to be your brother.

Countess. Your most obedient! That shall be written in my pocket-book.

Mrs. H. Without flattery then, madam, he appears to be most amiable.

Countess. Good!—And a handsome man?

Mrs. H. Oh, yes.

Countess. "Oh, yes!" It sounded almost like "Oh no!" But I must tell you, that he looks upon you to be a handsome woman. You make no reply to this?

Mrs. H. What shall I reply? Derision never fell from your lips; and I am little calculated to support it.

Countess. As little as you are calculated to be the cause of it. No;—I was in earnest.—Now?

Mrs. H. You confuse me!—But why should I play the prude? I will own there was a time when I thought myself handsome. 'Tis past. Alas! The enchanting beauties of a female countenance arise from peace of mind—the look, which captivates an honourable man, must be reflected from a noble soul.

Countess. Then heaven grant my bosom may ever hold as pure a heart, as now those eyes bear witness lives in yours.

Mrs. H. Oh! Heaven forbid!

Countess. How!

Mrs. H. Spare me! I am a wretch. The sufferings of three years can give me no claim to your friendship—No, not even to your compassion. Oh! Spare me!

Countess. Stay, Mrs. Haller. For the first time, I beg your confidence.—My brother loves you.

Mrs. H. For mirth, too much—for earnest, too mournful!

Countess. I revere that modest blush. Discover to me who you are. You risk nothing. Pour all your griefs into a sister's bosom. Am I not kind? And can I not be silent?

Mrs. H. Alas! But a frank reliance on a generous mind is the greatest sacrifice to be offered by true repentance. This sacrifice I will offer. Did you never hear—Pardon me—Did you never hear—Oh! how shocking is it to unmask a deception, which alone has recommended me to your regard! But it must be so.—Madam—Fie, Adelaide! Does pride become you? Did you ever hear of the Countess Waldbourg?

Countess. I think I did hear, at the neighbouring court, of such a creature. She plunged an honourable husband into misery. She ran away with a villain.

Mrs. H. She did indeed. Do not cast me from you.

Countess. For Heaven's sake! You are—

Mrs. H. I am that wretch.

Countess. Ha!—Begone! Yet, she is unfortunate: she is unfriended! Her image is repentance—Her life the proof. Be still awhile, remorseless prejudice, and let the genuine feelings of my soul avow, they do not truly honour virtue, who can insult the erring heart that would return to her sanctuary. Rise, I beseech you, rise! My husband and my brother may surprise us. I promise to be silent.

Mrs. H. Yes, you will be silent—But oh! Conscience! conscience! thou never wilt be silent. Do not cast me from you.

Countess. Never! Your lonely life, your silent anguish and contrition, may at length atone your crime. And never shall you want an asylum, where your penitence may lament your loss. Your fault was youth and inexperience; your heart never was, never could be concerned in it.

Mrs. H. Oh! spare me! My conscience never reproaches me so bitterly, as when I catch my base thoughts in search of an excuse! No, nothing can palliate my guilt; and the only just consolation left me, is to acquit the man I wronged, and own I erred without a cause of fair complaint.

Countess. And this is the mark of true repentance. Alas! my friend, when superior sense, recommended too by superior charms of person, assail a young, though wedded—

Mrs. H. Ah! not even that mean excuse is left me. In all that merits admiration, respect, and love, he was far, far beneath my husband. But to attempt to account for my strange infatuation—I cannot bear it. I thought my husband's manner grew colder to me. 'Tis true I knew, that his expenses, and his confidence in deceitful friends, had embarrassed his means, and clouded his spirits; yet I thought he denied me pleasures and amusements still within our reach. My vanity was mortified! My confidence not courted. The serpent tongue of my seducer promised every thing. But never could such arguments avail, till, assisted by forged letters, and the treachery of a servant, whom I most confided in, he fixed my belief that my lord was false, and that all the coldness I complained of was disgust to me, and love for another; all his home retrenchments but the means of satisfying a rival's luxury. Maddened with this conviction, (conviction it was, for artifice was most ingenious in its proof.) I left my children—father—husband, to follow—a villain.

Countess. But, with such a heart, my friend could not remain long in her delusion?

Mrs. H. Long enough to make a sufficient penitence impossible. Oh, what were my sensations when the mist dispersed before my eyes! I called for my husband, but in vain!—I listened for the prattle of my children, but in vain!

Countess. [Embracing her.] Here, here, on this bosom only shall your future tears be shed; and may I, dear sufferer, make you again familiar with hope!

Mrs. H. Oh! impossible!

Countess. Have you never heard of your children?

Mrs. H. Never.

Countess. We must endeavour to gain some account of them. We must—Hold! My husband and my brother! Oh, my poor brother! I had quite forgotten him. Quick, dear Mrs. Haller, wipe your eyes. Let us meet them.

Mrs. H. Madam, I'll follow. Allow me a moment to compose myself.—[Exit Countess.]—I pause!—Oh! yes—to compose myself! [Ironically.] She little thinks it is but to gain one solitary moment to vent my soul's remorse. Once, the purpose of my unsettled mind was self-destruction. Heaven knows how I have sued for hope and resignation. I did trust my prayers were heard.—Oh! spare me further trial! I feel, I feel my heart and brain can bear no more. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Shirts of the Park, Lodge, &c. as before.—A table spread with fruits, &c.

FRANCIS discovered placing the supper.

Fra. I know he loves to have his early supper in the fresh air; and, while he sups, not that I believe any thing can amuse him, yet I will try my little Savoyard's pretty voices. I have heard him speak as if he had loved music. [Music without.] Oh, here they are.

Enter ANNETTE and CLAUDINE, playing on their guitars.

Ann. To welcome mirth and harmless glee,
We rambling minstrels, blithe and free,
With song the laughing hours beguile,
And wear a never-fading smile:

Where'er we roam,

We find a home,

And greeting, to reward our toil.

Claud. No anxious griefs disturb our rest,
Nor busy cares annoy our breast;
Fearless we sink in soft repose,
While night her sable mantle throws.

With grateful lay,

Hail, rising day,

That rosy health and peace bestows!

During the duet, the STRANGER looks from the lodge window, and at the conclusion he comes out.

Str. a. What mummery is this?

Fra. I hoped it might amuse you, sir.

Str. a. Amuse me—fool!

Fra. Well then, I wish to amuse myself a little. I don't think my recreations are so very numerous.

Str. a. That's true, my poor fellow; indeed they are not. Let them go on.—I'll listen.

[Retires and sits down.]

Fra. But to please you, my poor master, I fear it must be a sadder strain.—Annette, have you none but these cheerful songs?

Ann. O, plenty. If you are dolefully given, we can be as sad as night. I'll sing you an air Mrs. Haller taught me, the first year she came to the castle.

Fra. Mrs. Haller! I should like to hear that.

Ann. I have a silent sorrow here,
A grief I'll ne'er impart;
It breathes no sigh, it sheds no tear,
But it consumes my heart.
This cherish'd woe, this loved despair
My lot for ever be,
So, my soul's lord, the pangs I bear
Be never known by thee!

And when pale characters of death
Shall mark this alter'd cheek,
When my poor wasted trembling breath
My life's last hope would speak,
I shall not raise my eyes to heaven,
Nor mercy ask for me;
My soul despairs to be forgiven,
Unpardn'd, love, by thee.

Stra. [Surprised and moved.] Oh! I have heard that air before, but 'twas with other words. [Rises.] Francis, share our supper with your friends—I need none. [Enters the lodge.]

Fra. So I feared. Well, my pretty favourites, here are refreshments. [Leads them to the table.]—So, disturbed again! Now will this gentleman call for more music, and make my master mad. Go, go, and return when you observe this man is gone.—[Exeunt, ANNETTE and CLAUDINE, singing.—FRANCIS sits and eats.]—I was in hopes that I might at least eat my supper peaceably in the open air; but they follow at our heels like blood-hounds.

Enter BARON from gates.

Bar. My good friend, I must speak to your master.

Fra. Can't serve you.

Bar. Why not?

Fra. It's forbidden.

Bar. [Offers money.] There! Announce me.

Fra. Want no money.

Bar. Well, only announce me then.

Fra. [Rising.] I will announce you, sir; but it won't avail! I shall be abused, and you rejected. However, we can but try. [Going.]

Bar. I only ask half a minute. [FRANCIS goes into the lodge.] But when he comes, how am I to treat him? I never encountered a misanthrope before. I have heard of instructions as to conduct in society; but how I am to behave towards a being who loathes the whole world, and his own existence, I have never learned.

Enter the STRANGER from lodge.

Stra. Now; what's your will?

Bar. I beg pardon, sir, for—[Suddenly recognizing him.]—Charles!

Stra. Steinfort! [They embrace.]

Bar. Is it really you, my dear friend?

Stra. It is.

Bar. Merciful heavens! How you are alter'd!

Stra. The hand of misery lies heavy on me.—But how came you here? What want you?

Bar. Strange! Here was I ruminating how to address this mysterious recluse: he appears, and proves to be my old and dearest friend.

Stra. Then you were not in search of me, nor knew that I lived here?

Bar. As little as I know who lives on the summit of Caucasus. You this morning saved the life of my brother-in-law's only son: a grateful family wishes to behold you in its circle. You refused my sister's messenger; therefore, to give more weight to the invitation, I was deputed to be the bearer of it. And thus has fortune restored to me a friend, whom my heart has so long missed, and whom my heart just now so much requires.

Stra. Yes, I am your friend; your sincere friend. You are a true man: an uncommon man. Towards you my heart is still the same. But if this assurance be of any value to you—go—leave me—and return no more.

Bar. Stay! All that I see and hear of you is inexplicable. 'Tis you; but these, alas! are not the features which once enchanted every female bosom, beamed gaiety through all society, and won your friends before your lips were opened! Why do you avert your face? Is the sight of a friend become hateful? Or, do you fear that I should read in your eye what passes in your soul? Where is that open look of fire, which at once penetrated into every heart, and revealed your own?

Stra. [With asperity.] My look penetrate into every heart!—Ha! ha! ha!

Bar. Oh, heavens! Rather may I never hear you laugh, than in such a tone!—For heaven's sake, tell me, Charles! tell me, I conjure you, what has happened to you?

Stra. Things that happen every day; occurrences heard of in every street. Steinfort, if I am not to hate you, ask me not another question. If I am to love you, leave me.

Bar. Oh, Charles! awake the faded ideas of past joys. Feel, that a friend is near. Recollect the days we passed in Hungary, when we wandered arm-in-arm upon the banks of the Danube, while nature opened our hearts, and made us enamoured of benevolence and friendship. In those blessed moments you gave me this seal as a pledge of your regard. Do you remember it?

Stra. Yes.

Bar. Am I since that time become less worthy of your confidence?

Stra. No?

Bar. Charles! it grieves me that I am thus compelled to enforce my rights upon you. Do you know this scar?

Stra. Comrade! Friend! It received and resisted the stroke aimed at my life. I have not forgotten it. You knew not what a present you then made me.

Bar. Speak then, I beseech you.

Stra. You cannot help me.

Bar. Then I can mourn with you.

Stra. That I hate. Besides, I cannot weep.

Bar. Then give me words instead of tears. Both relieve the heart.

Stra. Relieve the heart! My heart is like a close-shut sepulchre. Let what is within it moulder and decay. Why, why open the wretched charnel-house to spread a pestilence around?

Bar. How horrid are your looks; For shame! A man like you thus to crouch beneath the chance of fortune!

Stra. Steinfort! I did think, that the opinion of all mankind was alike indifferent to me; but I feel that it is not so. My friend, you shall not quit me without learning how I have been robbed of every joy which life afforded. Listen: much misery may be contained in a few words. Attracted by my native country, I quitted you and the service. What pleasing pictures did I form of a life employed in improving society, and diffusing happiness! I fixed on Cassel to be my abode. All went on admirably. I found friends. At length, too, I found a wife; a lovely, innocent creature, scarce sixteen years of age. Oh! how I loved her! She bore me a son and a daughter. Both were endowed by nature with the beauty of their mother. Ask me not how I loved my wife and children! Yes; then, then I was really happy. [Wiping his eyes.] Ha! a tear! I could not have believed it. Welcome, old friends! 'Twas long since we have known each other. Well; my story is nearly ended. One of my friends, for whom I had become engaged, treacherously lost me more than half my fortune. This hurt me. I was obliged to retrench my expenses. Contentment needs but little. I forgave him. Another friend—a villain! to whom I was attached heart and soul; whom I had assisted with my means, and promoted by my interest; this fiend! seduced my wife, and bore her from me. Tell me, sir, is this enough to justify my hatred of mankind, and palliate my seclusion from the world?—Kings, laws, tyranny, or guilt, can but imprison me, or kill me. But, O God! O God! Oh! what are chains or death compared to the tortures of a deceived yet doting husband!

Bar. To lament the loss of a faithless wife is madness.

Stra. Call it what you please—say what you please—I love her still.

Bar. And where is she?

Stra. I know not, nor do I wish to know.

Bar. And your children?

Bar. But why did you not keep your children with you? They would have amused you in many a dreary hour.

Stra. Amused me! Oh, yes! while their likeness to their mother should every hour remind me of my past happiness! No. For three years I have never seen them. I hate that any human creature should be near me, young or old! Had not ridiculous habit made a servant necessary, I should never have engaged him, though he is not the worst among the bad.

Bar. Such too often are the consequences of great alliances. Therefore, Charles, I have resolved to take a wife from a lower rank of life.

Stra. You marry!

Bar. You shall see her. She is in the house where you are expected. Come with me.

Stra. What! I mix again with the world!

Bar. To do a generous action without requiring thanks is noble and praiseworthy. But so obstinately to avoid those thanks, as to make the kindness a burthen, is affectation.

Stra. Leave me! leave me! Every one tries to form a circle of which he may be the centre. So do I. As long as there remains a bird in these woods to greet the rising sun with its melody, I shall court no other society.

Bar. Do as you please to-morrow; but give me your company this evening.

Stra. No!

Bar. Not though it were in your power, by this single visit, to secure the happiness of your friend for life?

Stra. Ha! Then I must.—But how?

Bar. You shall sue in my behalf to Mrs. Haller. You have the talent of persuasion.

Stra. I! my dear Steinfort!

Bar. The happiness or misery of your friend depends upon it. I'll contrive that you shall speak to her alone. Will you?

Stra. I will; but upon one condition.

Bar. Name it.

Stra. That you allow me to be gone to-morrow, and not endeavour to detain me.

Bar. Go! Whither?

Stra. No matter. Promise this, or I will not come.

Bar. Well, I do promise. Come.

Stra. I have directions to give my servant.

Bar. In half an hour, then, we shall expect you. Remember, you have given your word.

Stra. I have. [Exit BARON through gate.] Francis! Francis!

Enter FRANCIS from lodge.

Stra. Why are you out of the way?

Fra. Sir, I came when I heard you call.

Stra. I shall leave this place to-morrow.

Fra. With all my heart.

Stra. Perhaps to go into another land.

Fra. With all my heart again.

Stra. Perhaps into another quarter of the globe.

Fra. With all my heart still. Into which quarter?

Stra. Wherever heaven directs! Away! away! from Europe! From this cultivated moral lazaret! Do you hear, Francis? To-morrow, early.

Fra. Very well.

[Going.]

Stra. Come here, come here first, I have an errand for you. Hire that carriage in the village; drive to the town hard by; you may be back by sun-set. I shall give you a letter to a widow who lives there. With her you will find two children. They are mine.

Fra. [Astonished.] Your children, sir?

Stra. Take them and bring them hither.

Fra. Your children, sir?

Stra. Yes, mine! Is it so very inconceivable?

Fra. That I should have been three years in your service, and never have heard them mentioned, is somewhat strange.

Stra. Pshaw! Blockhead!—

Fra. You have been married, then?

Stra. Well—go, go, and prepare for our journey.

Fra. That I can do in five minutes. [Going.]

Stra. I shall come and write the letter directly.

Fra. Very well, sir.

[Exit.]

Stra. Yes, I'll take them with me. I'll accustom myself to the sight of them. The innocents! they shall not be poisoned by the refinements of society. Rather let them hunt their daily sustenance upon some desert island with their bow and arrow; or creep, like torpid Hottentots, into a corner, and stare at each other. Fool that I was, to be prevailed upon once more to exhibit myself among these apes! What a ridiculous figure shall I make! And in the character of a suitor too! He cannot be serious! 'Tis but some friendly artifice to draw me from my solitude. Why did I promise him? Yet, my sufferings have been many; and, to oblige a friend, why should I hesitate to add another painful hour to the wretched calendar of my life! I'll go, I'll go.

[Exit into lodge.]

SCENE II.—The Anti-chamber.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. No, indeed, my lady! If you choose to bury yourself in the country, I shall take my leave.

I am not calculated for a country life. And, to sum up all, when I think of this Mrs. Haller—

Enter SOLOMON.

Sol. What of Mrs. Haller, my sweet miss?

Char. Why, Mr. Solomon, who is Mrs. Haller? You know every thing; you hear every thing.

Sol. I have received no letters from any part of Europe on the subject, miss.

Char. But who is to blame? The Count and Countess. She dines with them; and at this very moment is drinking tea with them. Is this proper?

Sol. By no means.

Char. Should not a Count and Countess, in all their actions, show a proper degree of pride and pomposity?

Sol. To be sure! To be sure, they should!

Char. No, I won't submit to it. I'll tell her ladyship, when I dress her to-morrow, that either Mrs. Haller or I must quit the house.

Sol. [Seeing the BARON.] St!

Enter BARON.

Bar. Didn't I hear Mrs. Haller's name here?

Sol. [Confused.] Why—yes—we—we—

Bar. Charlotte, tell my sister I wish to see her as soon as the tea-table is removed.

Char. Either she or I go, that I'm determined. [Exit.]

Bar. May I ask what it was you were saying?

Sol. Why, please your Honourable Lordship, we were talking here and there—this and that—

Bar. I almost begin to suspect some secret.

Sol. Secret! Heaven forbid! Mercy on us! No! I should have had letters on the subject if there had been a secret.

Bar. Well then, since it was no secret, I presume I may know your conversation.

Sol. You do us great honour, my lord. Why, then, at first, we were making a few common-place observations. Miss Charlotte remarked we had all our faults. I said, "Yes." Soon after, I remarked that the best persons in the world were not without their weaknesses. She said, "Yes."

Bar. If you referred to Mrs. Haller's faults and weaknesses, I am desirous to hear more.

Sol. Sure enough, sir, Mrs. Haller is an excellent woman; but she's not an angel, for all that. I am an old faithful servant to his Excellency the Count, and therefore it is my duty to speak when any thing is done disadvantageous to his interest.

Bar. Well!

Sol. For instance, now; his Excellency may think he has at least some score of dozens of the old six-and-twenty hock. Mercy on us! There are not ten dozen bottles left; and not a drop has gone down my throat, I'll swear.

Bar. [Smiling.] Mrs. Haller has not drank it, I suppose?

Sol. Not she herself, for she never drinks wine. But if any body be ill in the village, any poor woman lying-in, away goes a bottle of the six-and-twenty! Innumerable are the times that I've reprov'd her; but she always answers me snappishly, that she will be responsible for it.

Bar. So will I, Mr. Solomon.

Sol. Oh! with all my heart, your Honourable Lordship. It makes no difference to me. I had the care of the cellar twenty years, and can safely take my oath, that I never gave the poor a single drop in the whole course of my life.

Bar. How extraordinary is this woman!

Sol. Extraordinary! one can make nothing of her. To-day, the vicar's wife is not good enough for her. To-morrow, you may see her sitting with all the women of the village. To be sure, she and I agree pretty well; for, between me and your Honourable Lordship, she has cast an eye upon my son Peter.

Bar. Has she?

Sol. Yes—Peter's no fool, I assure you. The school-master is teaching him to write. Would your Honourable Lordship please to see a specimen? I'll go for his copybook. He makes his pot-hooks capitally.

Bar. Another time, another time. Good bye for the present, Mr. Solomon. [SOLOMON bows.] Good day, Mr. Solomon.

Sol. Your Honourable Lordship's most obedient servant.

Bar. Mr. Solomon, I wish to be alone.

Sol. As your lordship commands. If the time should seem long in my absence, and your lordship wishes to hear the newest news from the seat of war, you need only send for old Solomon. I have letters from Leghorn, Cape Horn, and every known part of the habitable globe. [Exit.]

Bar. Tedious old fool! Yet hold. Did he not speak in praise of Mrs. Haller? Pardon'd be his rage for news and politics.

Enter COUNTESS.

Well, sister, have you spoken to her?

Countess. I have: and if you do not steer for another haven, you will be doomed to drive upon the ocean for ever.

Bar. Is she married?

Countess. I don't know.

Bar. Is she of a good family?

Countess. I can't tell.

Bar. Does she dislike me?

Countess. Excuse my making a reply.

Bar. I thank you for your sisterly affection, and the explicitness of your communications. Luckily, I placed little reliance on either; and have found a friend, who will save your ladyship all further trouble.

Countess. A friend!

Bar. Yes. The Stranger, who saved your son's life this morning, proves to be my intimate friend.

Countess. What's his name?

Bar. I don't know.

Countess. Is he of good family?

Bar. I can't tell.

Countess. Will he come hither?

Bar. Excuse my making a reply.

Countess. Well, the retort is fair—but insufferable.

Bar. You can't object to the Da Capo of your own composition.

Enter COUNT and MRS. HALLER.

Count. Zounds! do you think I am Xenocrates: or like the poor sultan with marble legs? There you leave me tête-à-tête with Mrs. Haller, as if my heart were a mere flint. So you prevailed, brother. The Stranger will come then, it seems.

Bar. I expect him every minute.

Count. I'm glad to hear it. One companion more, however. In the country, we never can have too many.

Bar. This gentleman will not exactly be an addition to your circle, for he leaves this place to-morrow.

Count. But he won't, I think. Now, Lady Winterson, summon all your charms. There is no art in conquering us poor devils; but this strange man, who does not care a doit for you all together, is worth your efforts. Try your skill. I shan't be jealous.

Countess. I allow the conquest to be worth the trouble. But what Mrs. Haller has not been able to effect in three months, ought not to be attempted by me.

Mrs. H. Oh, madam, he has given me no opportunity of trying the force of my charms, for I have never once happened to see him.

Count. Then he's a blockhead; and you an idler.

Sol. [Without.] This way, sir! This way!

Enter SOLOMON.

Sol. The Stranger begs leave to have the honour—

[Exit SOLOMON.]

Count. Welcome! Welcome! [Runs to meet the STRANGER, whom he conducts in by the hand.] My dear sir—Lady Wintensen—Mrs. Haller—

[Mrs. HALLER, as soon as she sees the STRANGER, shrieks and swoons in the arms of the BARON. The STRANGER casts a look at her, and rushes out. The BARON and COUNTESS bear Mrs. HALLER off, followed by the COUNT.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Anti-chamber.

Enter BARON

Bar. Oh! deceitful hope! Thou phantom of future happiness. To thee have I stretched out my arms, and thou hast vanished into air! Wretched Steinfort! The mystery is solved. She is the wife of my friend! I cannot myself be happy; but I may, perhaps, be able to reunite two lovely souls whom cruel fate has severed. Ha! they are here. I must propose it instantly.

Enter COUNTESS and Mrs. HALLER.

Countess. Into the garden, my dear friend! Into the air!

Mrs. H. I am quite well. Do not alarm yourselves on my account.

Bar. Madam, pardon my intrusion; but to lose a moment may be fatal. He means to quit the country to-morrow. We must devise means to reconcile you to—the Stranger.

Mrs. H. How, my lord? You seem acquainted with my history?

Bar. I am. Waldbourg has been my friend ever since we were boys. We served together from the rank of cadet. We have been separated seven years. Chance brought us this day together, and his heart was open to me.

Mrs. H. How do I feel what it is to be in the presence of an honest man, when I dare not meet his eye.

Bar. If sincere repentance, if years without reproach, do not give us a title to man's forgiveness, what must we expect hereafter? No, lovely penitent! your contrition is complete. Error for a moment wrested from slumbering virtue the dominion of your heart: but she awoke, and, with a look, banished her enemy for ever. I know my friend. He has the firmness of a man; but, with it, the gentlest feelings of your sex. I hasten to him. With the fire of pure disinterested friendship will I enter on this work; that, when I look back upon my past life, I may derive from this good action consolation in disappointment, and even resignation in despair.

Mrs. H. Oh, stay! What would you do? No! never! My husband's honour is sacred to me. I love him unutterably; but never, never can I be his wife again; even if he were generous enough to pardon me.

Bar. Madam! Can you, Countess, be serious?

Mrs. H. Not that title, I beseech you! I am not a child who wishes to avoid deserved punishment. What were my penitence, if I hoped advantage from it beyond the consciousness of atonement for past offence?

Countess. But if your husband himself?—

Mrs. H. Oh! he will not! he cannot! And let him rest assured I never would replace my honour at the expense of his.

Bar. He still loves you.

Mrs. H. Loves me! Then he must not—No—he must purify his heart from a weakness which would degrade him!

Bar. Incomparable woman! I go to my friend—perhaps, for the last time! Have you not one word to send him?

Mrs. H. Yes, I have two requests to make. Often when, in excess of grief, I have despaired of every consolation, I have thought I should be easier if I might behold my husband once again, acknowledge my injustice to him, and take a gentle leave of him for ever. This, therefore, is my first request—a conversation for a few short minutes, if he does not quite abhor the sight of me. My second request is—Oh—not to see, but to hear some account of my poor children.

Bar. If humanity and friendship can avail, he will not for a moment delay your wishes.

Countess. Heaven be with you!

Mrs. H. And my prayers. [Exit BARON.]

Countess. Come, my friend, come into the air, till he returns with hope and consolation.

Mrs. H. Oh, my heart! how art thou afflicted! My husband! My little ones! Past joys and future fears.—Oh, dearest madam, there are moments in which we live years. Moments which steal the roses from the cheek of health, and plough deep furrows in the brow of youth.

Countess. Banish these sad reflections. Come, let us walk. The sun will set soon; let nature's beauties dissipate anxiety.

Mrs. H. Alas! Yes, the setting sun is a proper scene for me.

Countess. Never forget a morning will succeed.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Skirts of the Park, Lodge, &c.

Enter BARON, from gates.

Bar. On earth there is but one such pair. They shall not be parted. Yet what I have undertaken is not so easy as I at first hoped. What can I answer when he asks me, whether I would persuade him to renounce his character, and become the derision of society? For he is right: a faithless wife is a dishonour! and to forgive her, is to share her shame. What though Adelaide may be an exception; a young deluded girl, who has so long and so sincerely repented; yet what cares an unfeeling world for this? The world! He has quitted it. 'Tis evident he loves her still; and upon this assurance builds my sanguine heart the hope of a happy termination to an honest enterprise.

Enter FRANCIS with two Children, WILLIAM and AMELIA.

Fra. Come along my pretty ones—come.

Will. Is it far to home?

Fra. No, we shall be there directly now.

Bar. Hold! Whose children are these?

Fra. My master's.

Will. Is that my father?

Bar. It darts like lightning through my brain. A word with you. I know, you love your master. Strange things have happened here. Your master has found his wife again.

Fra. Indeed! Glad to hear it.

Bar. Mrs. Haller—

Fra. Is she his wife? Still more glad to hear it.

Bar. But he is determined to go from her.

Fra. Oh!

Bar. We must try to prevent it.

Fra. Surely.

Bar. The unexpected appearance of the children may perhaps assist us.

Fra. How so?

Bar. Hide yourself with them in that hut. Before a quarter of an hour is passed you shall know more.

Fra. But—

Bar. No more questions, I entreat you. Time is precious.

Fra. Well, well: questions are not much in my way. Come, children.

Will. Why, I thought you told me I should see my father?

Fra. So you shall, my dear. Come, moppets.

[Goes into the hut with the Children.]

Bar. Excellent! I promise myself much from this little artifice. If the mild look of the mother fails, the innocent smiles of these his own children will surely find the way to his heart. [Taps at the lodge door; the STRANGER comes out.] Charles, I wish you joy.

Str. Of what?

Bar. You have found her again.

Str. Show a bankrupt the treasure which he once possessed, and then congratulate him on the amount!

Bar. Why not, if it be in your power to retrieve the whole?

Str. I understand you: you are a negotiator from my wife. It won't avail.

Bar. Learn to know your wife better. Yes, I am a messenger from her; but without power to treat. She, who loves you unutterably, who without you never can be happy, renounces your forgiveness; because, as she thinks, your honour is incompatible with such a weakness.

Str. Pshaw! I am not to be caught.

Bar. Charles! consider well—

Str. Steinfort, let me explain all this. I have lived here four months. Adelaide knew it.

Bar. Knew it! She never saw you till to-day.

Str. That you may make fools believe. Hear further: she knows too, that I am not a common sort of man; that my heart is not to be attacked in the usual manner. She, therefore, framed a deep-concerted plan. She played a charitable part; but in such a way, that it always reached my ears. She played a pious, modest, reserved part, in order to excite my curiosity. And, at last, to-day she plays the prude. She refuses my forgiveness, in hopes, by this generous device, to extort it from my compassion.

Bar. Charles! I have listened to you with astonishment. This is a weakness only to be pardoned in a man who has so often been deceived by the world. Your wife has expressly and steadfastly declared, that she will not accept your forgiveness, even if you yourself were weak enough to offer it.

Str. What then has brought you hither?

Bar. More than one reason. First, I am come in my own name, as your friend and comrade, to conjure you solemnly not to spurn this creature from you; for, by my soul, you will not find her equal.

Str. Give yourself no further trouble.

Bar. Be candid, Charles. You love her still.

Str. Alas! yes.

Bar. Her sincere repentance has long since obliterated her crime.

Str. Sir! a wife, once induced to forfeit her honour, must be capable of a second crime.

Bar. Not so, Charles. Ask your heart what portion of the blame may be your own.

Str. Mine?

Bar. Yours. Who told you to marry a thoughtless inexperienced girl? One scarce expects established principles at five and-twenty in a man, yet you require them in a girl of sixteen! But of this no more. She has erred; she has repented; and, during three years, her conduct has been so far above reproach, that even the piercing eye of calumny has not discovered a speck upon this radiant orb.

Str. Now, were I to believe all this—and I confess that I would willingly believe it—yet can she never again be mine. Oh! what a feast would it be for the painted dolls and vermin of the world, when I appear among them with my runaway wife upon my arm! What mocking, whispering, pointing!—Never! Never! Never!

Bar. Enough! As a friend I have done my duty: I now appear as Adelaide's ambassador. She requests one moment's conversation: she wishes once again to see you, and never more! You cannot deny her this only, this last request.

Str. I understand this too: she thinks my firmness will be melted by her tears: she is mistaken. She may come.

Bar. She will come, to make you feel how much you mistake her. I go for her.

Str. Another word.

Bar. Another word!

Str. Give her this paper, and these jewels. They belong to her.

Bar. That you may do yourself.

[Exit.]
Str. The last anxious moment of my life draws near. I shall see her once again; I shall see her on whom my soul doats. Is this the language of an injured husband? What is this principle which we call honour? Is it a feeling of the heart, or a quibble in the brain? I must be resolute: it cannot now be otherwise. Let me speak solemnly, yet mildly; and beware that nothing of reproach escape my lips.

Enter COUNTESS, MRS. HALLER, and BARON.

Yes, her penitence is real, it is real. She shall not be obliged to live in mean dependence: she shall be mistress of herself, she shall—Ha! they come. Awake, insulted pride! Protect me, injured honour!

Mrs. H. Leave me now, I beseech you, my lord!

Str. What would you with me, Adelaide?

Mrs. H. No—for Heaven's sake! I was not prepared for this—Adelaide!—No, no. For Heaven's sake!—Harsh words alone are suited to a culprit's ear.

Stra. Well, madam!

Mrs. H. Oh! If you will ease my heart, if you will spare and pity me, use reproaches.

Stra. Reproaches! Here they are; here on my sorrowful cheek—here in my hollow eye—here in my faded form. These reproaches I could not spare you.

Mrs. H. Were I a hardened sinner, this forbearance would be charity: but I am a suffering penitent, and it overpowers me! Alas! then I must be the herald of my own shame. For where shall I find peace till I have eased my soul by my confession.

Stra. No confession, madam. I release you from every humiliation. I perceive you feel that we must part for ever.

Mrs. H. I know it. Nor come I here to supplicate your pardon; nor has my heart contained a ray of hope that you would grant it. All I dare ask is, that you will not curse my memory.

Stra. No, I do not curse you. I shall never curse you.

Mrs. H. From the inward conviction that I am unworthy of your name, I have, during three years, abandoned it. But this is not enough; you must have that redress which will enable you to choose another—another wife; in whose chaste arms may Heaven protect your hours in bliss! This paper will be necessary for the purpose; it contains a written acknowledgment of my guilt.

Stra. [Tearing it.] Perish the record for ever!—No, Adelaide, you only have possessed my heart; and, I am not ashamed to own it, you alone will reign there for ever.—Your own sensations of virtue, your resolute honour, forbid you to profit by my weakness; and even if—this is beneath a man! But—never—will another fill Adelaide's place here.

Mrs. H. Then nothing now remains but that one sad, hard, just word—Farewell!

Stra. Stay a moment. For some months we have, without knowing it, lived near each other. I have learnt much good of you. You have a heart open to the wants of your fellow creatures. I am happy that it is so. You shall not be without the power of gratifying your benevolence. I know you have a spirit that must shrink from a state of obligation. This paper, to which the whole remnant of my fortune is pledged, secures you independence, Adelaide; and let the only recommendation of the gift be, that it will administer to you the means of indulging in charity, the divine propensity of your nature.

Mrs. H. Never! To the labour of my hands alone will I owe my sustenance. A morsel of bread, moistened with the tear of penitence, will suffice my wishes, and exceed my merits. It would be an additional reproach, to think that I served myself, or even others, from the bounty of the man whom I had so deeply injured.

Stra. Take it, madam; take it.

Mrs. H. I have deserved this. But I throw myself upon your generosity. Have compassion on me!

Stra. [Aside.] Villain! Of what a woman hast thou robbed me!—Well, madam, I respect your sentiments, and withdraw my request; but on condition, that if ever you shall be in want of any thing, I may be the first and only person in the world to whom you will make your application.

Mrs. H. I promise it, my lord.

Stra. And now I may, at least, desire you to take back what is your own—your jewels.

Mrs. H. How well do I recollect the sweet evening when you gave me these! That evening my father joined our hands; and joyfully I pronounced the oath of eternal fidelity.—It is broken. This locket you gave me on my birth-day.—That was a happy day! We had a country feast—How cheerful we all were!—This bracelet I received after my William was born!—No! Take them—take them—I cannot take these, unless you wish that the sight of them should be an incessant reproach to my almost broken heart.

Stra. I must go. My soul and pride will hold no longer. Farewell.

Mrs. H. Oh! But one minute more! An answer to but one more question.—Feel for a mother's heart!—Are my children still alive?

Stra. Yes, they are alive.

Mrs. H. And well?

Stra. Yes, they are well.

Mrs. H. Heaven be praised! William must be much grown?

Stra. I believe so.

Mrs. H. What! Have you not seen them then?—And little Amelia, is she still your favourite? Oh! generous man, allow me to behold them once again!—Let me once more kiss the features of their father in his babes, and I will kneel to you, and part with them for ever. [She kneels—he raises her.]

Stra. Willingly, Adelaide! This very night. I expect the children every minute. They have been brought up near this spot. I have already sent my servant for them. He might, ere this time, have returned. I pledge my word to send them to the Castle as soon as they arrive. There, if you please, they may remain 'till day-break to-morrow: then they must go with me.

[THE COUNTESS AND BARON exchange signals; BARON goes into the Hut, and soon returns with the CHILDREN.]

Mrs. H. In this world then—We have no more to say.—[Seizing his hand.] Forget a wretch, who never will forget you.—Let me press this hand once more to my lips—this hand which once was mine. And when my penance shall have broken my heart, when we again meet in a better world—

Stra. There, Adelaide, you may be mine again.

Stra. } Oh! Oh!

[Parting.]

Mrs. H. } Children entering. Dear father! Dear mother!

[They press the Children in their arms, then separate themselves instantly—gaze at each other, and rush into an embrace. The Children cling round their parents.]

SCENE—Germany.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—*A Highroad, a Town at a distance.—
An Inn on one side, and a Cottage on the other.*

The LANDLORD pushes AGATHA out of the inn.

Lan. No, no! no room for you any longer.—It is the fair to-day in the next village; as great a fair as any in the German dominions. The country people with their wives and children take up every corner we have.

Aga. You will turn a poor sick woman out of doors, who has spent her last farthing in your house?

Lan. For that very reason; because she has spent her last farthing.

Aga. I can work.

Lan. You can hardly move your hands.

Aga. My strength will come again.

Lan. Then you may come again.

Aga. What am I to do? Where shall I go?

Lan. It is fine weather—you may go any where.

Aga. Who will give me a morsel of bread to satisfy my hunger?

Lan. Sick people eat but little.

Aga. Hard, unfeeling man, have pity.

Lan. When times are hard, pity is too expensive for a poor man. Ask alms of the different people that go by.

Aga. Beg! I would rather starve.

Lan. You may beg, and starve, too. What a fine lady you are! Many an honest woman has been obliged to beg. Why should not you? [AGATHA sits down upon a large stone under a tree.] For instance, here comes somebody; and I will teach you how to begin.

Enter a Countryman with working tools.

Good day, neighbour Nicholas.

Cou. Good day.

Lan. Won't you give a trifle to this poor woman? [Countryman takes no notice, but walks off.] That would not do—the poor man has nothing himself but what he gets by hard labour. Here comes a rich farmer; perhaps he will give you something.

Enter Farmer.

Good morning to you, sir. Under yon tree sits a poor woman in distress, who is in need of your charity.

Far. Is she not ashamed of herself? Why don't she work?

Lan. She has had a fever. If you would but pay for one dinner—

Far. The harvest has been but indifferent, and my cattle and sheep have suffered by a distemper.

[Erit.

Lan. My fat smiling face was not made for begging; you'll have more luck with your thin, sour one—so, I'll leave you to yourself. [Erit into house.

Aga. [Rises and comes forward.] Oh, Providence! thou hast till this hour protected me, and hast given me fortitude not to despair. Receive my humble thanks, and restore me to health, for the sake of my poor son, the innocent cause of my sufferings, and yet my only comfort. [Kneeling.] Oh, grant that I may see him once more! See him improved in strength of mind and body; and that by thy gracious mercy he may never be visited with affliction great as mine. Protect his father, too, merciful Providence, and pardon his crime of perjury to me! Here, in the face of heaven (supposing my end approaching, and that I can but a few days longer struggle with want and sorrow), here, I solemnly forgive my seducer for all the ills, the accumulated evils, which his allurements, his deceit and cruelty, have, for twenty years past, drawn upon me.

Enter a Country Girl with a basket.

Ag. [Near fainting.] My dear child, if you could spare me a trifle—

Girl. I have not a farthing in the world—but I am going to market to sell my eggs, and as I come back I'll give you threepence—And I'll be back as soon as ever I can. [Exit.]

Ag. There was a time when I was as happy as this country girl, and as willing to assist the poor in distress. [Retires to the tree, and sits down.]

Enter FREDERICK, in a German soldier's uniform, with a knapsack on his shoulders.

Fre. Halt! Stand at ease! It is a very hot day—[Throws down his sword and knapsack.] A draught of good wine will not be amiss. But first let me consult my purse. [Takes out a couple of pieces of money, which he turns about in his hand.] This will do for a breakfast—the other remains for my dinner; and in the evening I shall be at home. [Going up to house.] Ha! Halloo! Landlord! [Sees AGATHA, who is leaning against the tree.] Who is that? A poor sick woman! She don't beg; but her appearance makes me think she is in want. Must one always wait to give till one is asked? Shall I go without my breakfast now, or lose my dinner? The first, I think, is the best. Ay, I don't want a breakfast, for dinner-time will soon be here. To do good satisfies both hunger and thirst. [Goes to her.] Take this, good woman.

Ag. [Stretches forth her hand, and looks steadily at him.] Frederick!

Fre. Mother!—Mother! For God's sake what is this! How is this! And why do I find my mother thus? Speak!

Ag. I cannot speak, dear son! [Embracing.] My dear Frederick! The joy is too great—I was not prepared—

Fre. Dear mother, compose yourself: [Leans her head against his breast.] Now then, be comforted! How she trembles! She is fainting.

Ag. I am so weak, and my head so giddy—I had nothing to eat all yesterday.

Fre. Good heavens! here is my little money, take it all. Oh, mother! mother! [Runs to the inn.] Landlord! Landlord!

[FREDERICK knocks violently at the door; the LANDLORD comes out.]

Lan. What is the matter?

Fre. A bottle of wine—quick, quick!

Lan. A bottle of wine! For whom?

Fre. For me. Why do you ask? Why don't you make haste?

Lan. Well, well, Mr. Soldier: but can you pay for it?

Fre. Here is money—make haste, or I'll break every window in your house.

Lan. Patience! Patience! [Goes into house.]

Fre. [To AGATHA.] You were hungry yesterday, when I sat down to a comfortable dinner. You were hungry when I partook of a good supper. Oh! why is so much bitter mixed with the joy of my return?

Ag. Be patient, my dear Frederick. Since I see you, I am well. But I have been very ill: so ill that I despaired of ever beholding you again.

Fre. Ill, and I was not with you? I will, now, never leave you more. Look, mother, how tall and strong I am grown. These arms can now afford, you support. They can, and shall, procure you subsistence.

Lan. [Coming out of the house with a small pitcher.] Here is wine—a most delicious nectar. [Aside.] It is only Rhenish; but it will pass for the best old Hock.

Fre. [Snatching the pitcher.] Give it me.

Lan. No, no; the money first. One shilling and twopence, if you please.

Fre. [Gives him money.] This is all I have.—Here, here, mother.

[While AGATHA drinks, LANDLORD counts the money.]

Lan. Three-halfpence too short! However, one must be charitable. [Exit into house.]

Ag. I thank you, my dear Frederick.—Wine revives me—Wine from the hand of my son gives me almost a new life.

Fre. Don't speak too much, mother—Take your time.

Ag. Tell me, dear child, how you have passed the five years since you left me.

Fre. Both good and bad, mother. To-day plenty—to-morrow not so much—and sometimes nothing at all.

Ag. You have not written to me this long while.

Fre. Dear mother, consider the great distance I was from you!—And then, in the time of war, how often letters miscarry.—Besides—

Ag. No matter, now I see you. But have you obtained your discharge?

Fre. Oh, no, mother; I have leave of absence only for two months; and that for a particular reason. But I will not quit you so soon, now I find you are in want of my assistance.

Ag. No, no, Frederick; your visit will make me so well, that I shall in a very short time recover strength to work again; and you must return to your regiment, when your furlough is expired. But you told me leave of absence was granted you for a particular reason.—What reason?

Fre. When I left you, five years ago, you gave me every thing you could afford, and all you thought would be necessary for me. But one trifle you forgot, which was the certificate of my birth from the church-book. You know, in this country, there is nothing to be done without it. At the time of parting from you, I little thought it could be of that consequence to me, which I have since found it would have been. Once I became tired of a soldier's life, and, in the hope I should obtain my discharge, offered myself to a master to learn a profession; but his question was, "Where is your certificate from the church-book of the parish in which you were born?" It vexed me that I had not it to produce, for my comrades laughed at my disappointment. My captain behaved kinder, for he gave me leave to come to fetch it—and you see, mother, here I am.

Ag. So you are come for the purpose of fetching your certificate from the church-book?

Fre. Yes, mother.

Ag. Oh! oh!

Fre. What is the matter? For heaven's sake, mother, tell me what's the matter?

Ag. You have no certificate.

Fre. No!

Ag. No.—The laws of Germany excluded you from being registered at your birth—for you are a natural son.

Fra. [After a pause.] So!—And who is my father?

Ag. Oh, Frederick, your wild looks are daggers to my heart. Another time.

Fre. No, no—I am still your son—and you are still my mother. Only tell me, who is my father?

Ag. When we parted, five years ago, you were too young to be intrusted with a secret of so much importance. But the time is come, when I can, in confidence, open my heart, and unload that burden with which it has been long oppressed. And yet, to reveal my errors to my child, and sue for his mild judgment on my conduct—

Fre. You have nothing to sue for; only explain this mystery.

Ag. I will, I will. But—my tongue is locked with remorse and shame. You must not look at me.

Fre. Not look at you! Cursed be that son, who could find his mother guilty, although the world should call her so.

Ag. Then listen to me, and take notice of that village, of that castle, and of that church. In that village I was born—in that church I was baptized. My parents were poor, but reputable farmers. The lady of that castle and estate requested them to let me live with her, and she would provide for me through life. They resigned me; and, at the age of fourteen, I went to my patroness. She took pleasure to instruct me in all kinds of female literature and accomplishments; and three happy years had passed, under her protection, when her only son, who was an officer in the Saxon service, obtained permission to come home. I had never seen him before—he was a handsome young man, in my eyes, a prodigy; for he talked of love, and promised me marriage. He was the first man who had ever spoken to me on such a subject. His flattery made me vain, and his repeated vows—Don't look at me, dear Frederick: I can say no more. Oh! oh! my son! I was intoxicated by the fervent caresses of a young, inexperienced, capricious young man, and did not recover from the delirium till it was too late.

Fre. Go on. Let me know more of my father.

Ag. When the time drew near that I could no longer conceal my guilt and shame, my seducer prevailed on me not to expose him to the resentment of his mother. He renewed his former promises of marriage at her death; on which relying, I gave him my word to be secret—and I have to this hour buried his name deep in my heart.

Fre. Proceed, proceed! give me full information—I will have courage to hear it all.

Ag. His leave of absence expired, he returned to his regiment, depending on my promise, and well assured of my esteem. As soon as my situation became known, I was questioned, and received many severe reproaches: but I refused to confess who was my undoer; and for that obstinacy was turned from the castle. I went to my parents; but their door was shut against me. My mother, indeed, wept as she bade me quit her sight for ever; but my father wished increased affliction might befall me.

Fre. Be quick with your narrative, or you'll break my heart.

Ag. I now sought protection from the old clergyman of the parish. He received me with compassion. On my knees I begged forgiveness for the scandal I had caused to his parishioners; promised amendment; and he said he did not doubt me. Through his recommendation I went to town, and, hid in humble lodgings, procured the means of subsistence by teaching to the neighbouring children what I had learnt under the tuition of my benefactress. To instruct you, my Frederick, was my care and delight; and, in return for your filial love, I would not thwart your wishes when they led to a soldier's life; but I saw you go from me with an aching heart. Soon after my health declined, I was compelled to give up my employment; and, by degrees, became the object you now see me. But, let me add, before I close my calamitous story, that, when I left the good old clergyman, taking along with me his kind advice and his blessing, I left him with a firm determination to fulfil the vow I had made of repentance and amendment. I have fulfilled it—and now, Frederick, you may look at me again.

Fre. But my father all this time? I apprehend he died.

Ag. No—he married.

Fre. Married!

Ag. A woman of virtue—of noble birth and immense fortune. Yet I had written to him many times; had described your infant innocence and wants; had glanced obliquely at former promises—

Fre. No answer to these letters?

Ag. Not a word. But in the time of war, you know, letters miscarry.

Fre. Nor did ever return to this estate?

Ag. No—since the death of his mother this castle has only been inhabited by servants—for he settled as far off as Alsace, upon the estate of his wife.

Fre. I will carry you in my arms to Alsace. No—why should I ever know my father? My heart is satisfied with a mother. No—I will not go to him. I will not disturb his peace—I leave that task to his conscience. What say you, mother, can't we do without him?—We don't want him. I will write directly to my captain. Let the consequence be what it will, leave you again I cannot. Should I be able to get my discharge, I will work all day at the plough, and all the night with my pen. It will do mother, it will do! heaven's goodness will assist me—it will prosper the endeavours of a dutiful son for the sake of a helpless mother.

Ag. Where could be found such another son?

Fre. But tell me my father's name, that I may know how to shun him.

Ag. Baron Wildenhaim,

Fre. Baron Wildenhaim! I shall never forget it.—Oh! you are near fainting. Your eyes are cast down. What's the matter? Speak, mother!

Ag. Nothing particular: only fatigued with talking. I wish to take a little rest.

Fre. I did not consider that we have been all this time in the open road. [Goes to the inn, and knocks at the door.] Here, landlord!

LANDLORD re-enters from house.

Lan. Well, what is the matter now?

Fre. Make haste, and get a bed ready for this good woman.

Lan. A bed for this good woman! Ha! ha! ha! She slept last night in that pent-house; so she may to-night. [Exit, shutting the door.]

Fre. You are an infamous—Oh! my poor mother—Ha! halloo! Who's there?

Enter COTTAGER, from cottage.

Cot. Good day, young soldier. What is it you want?

Fre. Good friend, look at that poor woman. She is perishing in the public road! It is my mother. Will you give her a small corner in your hut? I beg for mercy's sake—Heaven will reward you.

Cot. Can't you speak quietly? I understand you very well. Wife, shake up our bed—here is a poor sick woman wants it.

Enter WIFE.

Why could not you say all this in fewer words? Why such a long preamble? Why for mercy's sake, and heaven's reward? Why talk about reward for such trifles as these? Come, let us lead her in; and welcome she shall be to a bed, as good as I can give her, and to our homely fare.

Fre. Ten thousand thanks and blessings on you!

Wife. Thanks and blessings; here's a piece of work indeed about nothing!—Good sick lady, lean on my shoulder. [To FREDERICK.] Thanks and rewards, indeed! Do you think husband and I have lived to these years, and don't know our duty?—Lean on my shoulder. [Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in the Cottage.

AGATHA, COTTAGER, his WIFE, and FREDERICK, discovered.—AGATHA reclining upon a Bench; FREDERICK leaning over her.

Fre. Good people, have you nothing to give her? Nothing that's nourishing?

Wife. Run, husband, run, and fetch a bottle of wine from the landlord of the inn.

Fre. No, no; his wine is as bad as his heart: she has drank some of it, which I am afraid has turned to poison.

Cot. Suppose, wife, you look for a new-laid egg?

Wife. Or a drop of brandy, husband; that mostly cures me.

Fre. Do you hear, mother? Will you, mother? She will not. Is there no doctor in this neighbourhood?

Wife. At the end of the village there lives a horse-doctor. I have never heard of any other.

Fre. What shall I do? She is dying. My mother is dying; pray for her, good people!

Ag. Make yourself easy, dear Frederick; I am well, only weak,—some wholesome nourishment—

Fre. Yes, mother, directly—directly. [Aside.] Oh! where shall I—no money—not a farthing left.

Wife. Oh, dear me! Had you not paid the rent yesterday, husband—

Cot. I then should know what to do. But, as I hope for mercy, I have not a penny in my house.

Fre. Then I must—[Apart.]—Yes I will go and beg. But, should I be refused—I will then—I leave my mother in your care, good people; do all you can for her, I beseech you! I shall soon be with you again. [Erit.]

Cot. If he should go to our parson, I am sure he would give him something. [AGATHA rises.]

Ag. Is that good old man still living who was minister here some time ago?

Wife. No—it pleased Providence to take that worthy man to heaven two years ago. We have lost in him both a friend and a father. We shall never get such another.

Cot. Wife, wife, our present rector is likewise a very good man.

Wife. Yes; but he is so very young.

Cot. Our late parson was once young too.

Wife. [To AGATHA.] This young man being tutor in our Baron's family, he is very much beloved by them all; and so the baron gave him this living in consequence.

Cot. And well he deserved it for his pious instructions to our young lady; who is, in consequence, good and friendly to every body.

Ag. What young lady do you mean?

Cot. Our baron's daughter.

Ag. Is she here?

Wife. Dear me! Don't you know that? I thought every body had known that. It is almost five weeks since the baron and all his family arrived at the castle.

Ag. Baron Wildenhaim?

Wife. Yes, Baron Wildenhaim.

Ag. And his lady?

Cot. His lady died in France, many miles from hence; and her death, I suppose, was the cause of his coming to this estate—for the baron has not been here till within these five weeks ever since he was married. We regretted his absence much, and his arrival has caused great joy.

Wife. By all accounts the baroness was very haughty, and very whimsical.

Cot. Wife, wife, never speak ill of the dead. Say what you please against the living, but not a word against the dead.

Wife. And yet, husband, I believe the dead care the least what is said against them.—And so, if you please, I'll tell my story. The late baroness was, they say, haughty and proud; and they do say, the baron was not so happy as he might have been: but he, bless him—our good baron, is still the same as when a boy. Soon after madam had closed her eyes, he left France, and came to Wildenhaim, his native country.

Cot. Many times has he joined in our village dances. Afterwards, when he became an officer, he was rather wild, as most young men are.

Wife. Yes, I remember when he fell in love with poor Agatha, Friburg's daughter: what a piece of work that was—It did not do him much credit. That was a wicked thing.

Cot. Have done—no more of this. It is not well to stir up old grievances.

Wife. Why, you said I might speak ill of the living. 'Tis very hard, indeed, if one must not speak ill of one's neighbours, dead or alive.

Cot. Who knows whether he was the father of Agatha's child? She never said he was.

Wife. Nobody but him, that I'm sure. I would lay a wager—no, no, husband, you must not take his part—it was very wicked! Who knows what is now become of that poor creature? She has not been heard of this many a year. May be, she is starving for hunger. Her father might have lived longer, too, if that misfortune had not happened.

Cot. See here! Help! She is fainting—take hold.

Wife. Oh, poor woman!

Cot. Let us take her into the next room.

Wife. Oh, poor woman! I am afraid she will not live. Come, cheer up, cheer up. You are with those who feel for you. [They lead her into the cottage.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in the Castle.

Baron WILDENHAIM enters, attended by a gentleman in waiting.

Bar. Has not Count Cassel left his chamber yet?

Gen. No, my lord, he has but now rung for his valet.

Bar. The whole castle smells of his perfumery.—Go, call my daughter hither. [Erit Gentleman.] And am I, after all, to have an ape for a son-in-law? No, I shall not be in a hurry—I love my daughter too well. We must be better acquainted before I give her to him. I shall not sacrifice my Amelia to the will of others, as I myself was sacrificed. The poor girl might, in thoughtlessness, say yes, and afterwards be miserable. What a pity she is not a boy! The name of Wildenheim will die with me. My fine estates, my good peasants, all will fall into the hands of strangers. Oh! why was not my Amelia a boy!

Enter AMELIA.

Ame. Good morning, dear my lord.

Bar. Good morning, Amelia. Have you slept well?

Ame. Oh! yes, papa. I always sleep well.

Bar. Not a little restless last night?

Ame. No.

Bar. Amelia, you know you have a father who loves you, and I believe you know you have a suitor, who is come to ask permission to love you. Tell me candidly how you like Count Cassel?

Ame. Very well.

Bar. Do not you blush when I talk of him?

Ame. No.

Bar. No?—I am sorry for that—[Aside.] Have you dream'd of him?

Ame. No.

Bar. Have you not dream'd at all to-night?

Ame. Oh, yes—I have dream'd of our chaplain, Mr. Anhalt.

Bar. Ah, ha! As if he stood before you and the Count to ask for the ring.

Ame. No, not that. I dream'd we were all still in France; and he, my tutor, just going to take his leave of us for ever.—I woke with the fright, and found my eyes full of tears.

Bar. Pshaw! I want to know if you can love the count. You saw him at the last ball we were at in France; when he capered round you; when he danced minuets; when he—but I cannot say what his conversation was.

Ame. Nor I either—I do not remember a syllable of it.

Bar. No? then I do not think you like him.

Ame. I believe not.

Bar. But I think proper to acquaint you, he is rich, and of great consequence: rich, and of consequence; do you hear?

Ame. Yes, dear papa. But my tutor has always told me, that birth and fortune are inconsiderable things, and cannot give happiness.

Bar. There he is right. But if it happens, that birth and fortune are joined with sense and virtue—

Ame. But is it so with Count Cassel?

Bar. Hem! Hem! [Aside.] I will ask you a few questions on this subject; but be sure to answer me honestly—Speak the truth.

Ame. I never told an untruth in my life.

Bar. Nor ever conceal the truth from me, I command you.

Ame. Indeed, my lord, I never will.

Bar. I take you at your word. And now reply to me truly—Do you like to hear the count spoken of?

Ame. Good or bad?

Bar. Good. Good.

Ame. Oh, yes; I like to hear good of every body.

Bar. But do you not feel a little fluttered when he is talked of?

Ame. No.

Bar. Are not you a little embarrassed?

Ame. No.

Bar. Don't you wish sometimes to speak to him, and have not the courage to begin?

Ame. No.

Bar. Do you not wish to take his part, when his companions laugh at him?

Ame. No—I love to laugh at him myself.

Bar. Provoking! [Aside.] Are not you afraid of him when he comes near you?

Ame. No, not at all.—Oh, yes, once.

Bar. Ah! now it comes!

Ame. Once at a ball he trod on my foot; and I was so afraid he should tread on me again.

Bar. You put me out of patience. Hear me, Amelia. To see you happy is my wish. But matrimony without concord is like a duetto badly performed; for that reason, nature, the great composer of all harmony, has ordained, that, when bodies are allied, hearts should be in perfect unison. However, I will send Mr. Anhalt to you—

Ame. Do, papa.

Bar. He shall explain to you my sentiments. [Rings.] A clergyman can do this better than—

Enter a Servant.

Go directly to Mr. Anhalt; tell him I shall be glad to see him for a quarter of an hour if he is not engaged. [Erit Servant.]

Ame. [Calls after him.] Wish him a good morning from me.

Bar. The count is a tedious time dressing.—Have you breakfasted, Amelia?

Ame. No, papa.

[They sit down at table to breakfast.]

Bar. How is the weather? Have you walked this morning?

Ame. Oh, yes—I was in the garden at five o'clock; it is very fine.

Bar. Then I'll go out shooting. I do not know in what other way to amuse my guest.

Enter Count CASSEL.

Cou. Ah, my dear Colonel! Miss Wildenheim, I kiss your hand.

Bar. Good morning; good morning; though it is late in the day, count. In the country we should rise earlier.

Cou. It is Hebe herself, or Venus, or—

Ame. Ha! ha! ha! Who can help laughing at his nonsense.

Bar. Neither Venus nor Hebe, but Amelia Wildenheim, if you please. [Rises.]

Cou. [Sitting down to breakfast.] You are beautiful, Miss Wildenheim.—Upon my honour, I think so. I have travelled, and seen much of the world, and yet I can positively admire you.

Ame. I am sorry I have not seen the world.

Cou. Wherefore?

Ame. Because I might then, perhaps, admire you.

Cou. True; for I am an epitome of the world. In my travels I learnt delicacy in Italy—(a little more cream)—[Puts his cup over to Amelia.]—hau-tour in Spain—in France, enterprise—in Russia, prudence—in England, sincerity—in Scotland, frugality—(a little more sugar, if you please, Miss Wildenheim)—in Ireland, hospitality—and in the wilds of America I learnt love.

Ame. Is there any country where love is taught?

Cou. In all barbarous countries. But the whole system is exploded in places that are civilized.

Ame. And what is substituted in its stead?

Cou. Intrigue.

Ame. What a poor uncomfortable substitute!

Cou. There are other things—Song, dance, the opera, and war.

Bar. What are you talking of there?

Cou. Of war, colonel.

Bar. [Rising.] Ay, we like to talk of what we don't understand.

Cou. [Rising.] Therefore, to a lady, I always speak of politics; and to her father on love

Bar. I believe, count, notwithstanding your sneer, I am still as much a proficient in that art as yourself.

Cou. I do not doubt it, my dear colonel, for you are a soldier; and, since the days of Alexander, whoever conquers men, is certain to overcome women.

Bar. An achievement to animate a poltroon.

Cou. And, I verily believe, gains more recruits than the king's pay.

Bar. Now we are on the subject of arms, should you like to go out a shooting with me for an hour before dinner?

Cou. Bravo, colonel! A charming thought! This will give me an opportunity to use my elegant gun: the butt is inlaid with mother-of-pearl. You cannot find better work, or better taste.—Even my coat-of-arms is engraved.

Bar. But can you shoot?

Cou. That I have never tried—except with my eyes, at a fine woman.

Bar. I am not particular what game I pursue.—I have an old gun; it does not look fine; but I can always bring down my bird.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Mr. Anhalt begs leave—

Bar. Tell him to come in.—I shall be ready in a moment. [Exit Servant.]

Cou. Who is Mr. Anhalt?

Ame. Oh, a very good man.

Cou. A good man! In Italy, that means a religious man; in France, it means a cheerful man; in Spain, it means a wise man; and in England, it means a rich man.—Which good man of all these is Mr. Anhalt?

Ame. A good man in every country except England.

Cou. And give me the English good man before that of any other nation.

Bar. And of what nation would you prefer your good woman to be, count?

Cou. Of Germany.

Ame. In compliment to me?

Cou. In justice to my own judgment.

Bar. Certainly. For have we not an instance of one German woman, who possesses every virtue that ornaments the whole sex; whether as a woman of illustrious rank, or in the more exalted character of a wife and a mother?

Enter Mr. ANHALT.

Anh. I come by your command, baron—

Bar. Quick, count. Get your elegant gun. I pass your apartments, and will soon call for you.

Cou. I fly.—Beautiful Amelia, it is a sacrifice I make to your father, that I leave for a few hours his amiable daughter. [Exit.]

Bar. My dear Amelia, I think it scarcely necessary to speak to Mr. Anhalt, or that he should speak to you on the subject of the count; but, as he is here, leave us alone.

Ame. Good morning, Mr. Anhalt.—I hope you are very well. [Exit.]

Bar. I'll tell you in a few words why I sent for you. Count Cassel is here, and wishes to marry my daughter.

Anh. Really!

Bar. He is—he—in a word, I don't like him.

Anh. And Miss Wildenhaim—

Bar. I shall not command, neither persuade her to the marriage—I know too well the fatal influence of parents on such a subject. Objections, to be sure, if they could be removed—but when you find a man's head without brains, and his bosom without a heart, these are important articles to supply. Young as you are, Anhalt, I know no one so able to restore, or to bestow those blessings on his fellow creatures, as you. The count wants a little of my daughter's simplicity and sensibility. Take him under your care while he is here, and make him something like yourself. You have succeeded to my wish in the education of my daughter. Form the count after your own manner. I shall then have what I have sighed for all my life—a son.

Anh. With your permission, baron, I will presume to ask one question. What remains to interest you in favour of a man whose head and heart are good for nothing?

Bar. Birth and fortune. Yet, if I thought my daughter absolutely disliked him, or that she loved another, I would not thwart a first affection; no, for the world I would not. But that her affections are already bestowed is not probable.

Anh. Are you of opinion that she will never fall in love?

Bar. Oh, no! I am of opinion that no woman ever arrived at the age of twenty without that misfortune.—But this is another subject.—Go to Amelia, explain to her the duties of a wife, and of a mother—If she comprehends them as she ought, then ask her if she thinks she could fulfil those duties as the wife of Count Cassel.

Anh. I will.—But—I—Miss Wildenhaim—I—I shall—I—I shall obey your commands.

Bar. Do so. Ah! so far this weight is removed; but there lies still a heavier next my heart. You understand me.—How is it, Mr. Anhalt? Have you not yet been able to make any discoveries on that unfortunate subject?

Anh. I have taken infinite pains; but in vain. No such person is to be found.

Bar. Believe me, this burden presses on my thoughts so much, that many nights I go without sleep. A man is sometimes tempted to commit such depravity when young.—Oh, Anhalt! had I, in my youth, had you for a tutor; but I had no instructor but my passions; no governor but my own will. [Exit.]

Anh. This commission of the baron's, in respect to his daughter—I am—if I should meet her now, I cannot—I must recover myself first, and then prepare. A walk in the fields, and a fervent prayer.—After these, I trust, I shall return as a man whose views are solely placed on a future world; all hopes in this with fortitude resigned. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Open Field.

Enter FREDERICK, with a few pieces of money, which he turns about in his hand.

Fre. To return with this trifle, for which I have stooped to beg! return to see my mother dying! I would rather fly to the world's end. What can I buy with this; it is hardly enough to pay for the nails that will be wanted for her coffin. My great anxiety will drive me to distraction. However, let the consequence of our affliction be what it may, all will fall upon my father's head; and may he pant for heaven's forgiveness as my poor mother.—[At a distance is heard the firing of a gun, then the cry of "Halloo, halloo!"—Gamekeepers and Sportsmen run across the stage.] Here they come—a nobleman, I suppose, or a man of fortune. Yes, yes—and I will once more beg for my mother.—May heaven send relief!

Enter the BARON, followed by the COUNT.

Bar. Quick, quick, count! Aye, aye, that was a blunder, indeed. Don't you see the dogs? There they run—they have lost the scent. [Exit.]

Cou. So much the better, colonel, for I must take a little breath.

[FREDERICK goes up to him with great modesty.]

Fre. Gentleman, I beg you will bestow, from your superfluous wants, something to relieve the pain, and nourish the weak frame, of an expiring woman.

Re-enter the BARON.

Cou. What police is here! that a nobleman's amusements should be interrupted by the attack of vagrants.

Fre. [To the BARON.] Have pity, noble sir, and relieve the distress of an unfortunate son, who supplicates for his dying mother.

Bar. [Taking out his purse.] I think, young soldier, it would be better if you were with your regiment on duty, instead of begging.

Fre. I would with all my heart: but at this present moment my sorrows are too great. I entreat your pardon. What you have been so good as to give me, is not enough.

Bar. Not enough!

Fre. No, it is not enough.

Cou. The most singular beggar I ever met in all my travels.

Fre. If you have a charitable heart, give me one dollar.

Bar. This is the first time I was ever dictated to by a beggar what to give him.

Fre. With one dollar you will save a distracted man.

Bar. I don't choose to give any more. Count, go on.

[Exit COUNT, and as the BARON turns to follow him, FREDERICK seizes him by the breast, and draws his sword.]

Fre. Your purse, or your life.

Bar. Here! here! seize and secure him.

[Enter Gamekeepers, who lay hold of FREDERICK, and disarm him.]

Fre. What have I done!

Bar. Take him to the castle, and confine him in one of the towers. I shall follow you immediately.

Fre. One favour I have to beg, one favour only.—I know that I am guilty, and am ready to receive the punishment my crime deserves. But I have a mother who is expiring for want,—pity her, if you cannot pity me—bestow on her relief. If you will send to yonder hut, you will find that I do not impose on you a falsehood. For her it was I drew my sword—for her I am ready to die.

Bar. Take him away, and imprison him where I told you.

Fre. 'Woe to that man to whom I owe my birth!

[Exit with Gamekeepers.]

Bar. Here, Frank, run directly to yonder hamlet; inquire in the first, second, and third cottage, for a poor sick woman—and if you really find such a person, give her this purse. [Exit Gamekeeper.] A most extraordinary event! And what a well-looking youth; something in his countenance and address which struck me inconceivably! If it is true that he begged for his mother—but if he did—for the attempt upon my life he must die. Vice is never half so dangerous as when it assumes the garb of morality. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the Castle.—Four chairs.

Enter AMELIA.

Ame. Why am I so uneasy, so peevish; who has offended me? I did not mean to come into this room. In the garden I intended to go. [Going—turns back.] No, I will not—yes, I will—just go and look if my auriculas are still in blossom, and if the apple-tree is grown which Mr. Anhalt planted. I feel very low spirited—something must be the matter.—Why do I cry?—Am I not well?

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Ah! good morning, my dear sir—Mr. Anhalt, I mean to say.—I beg pardon.

Anh. Never mind, Miss Wildenheim—I don't dislike to hear you call me as you did.

Ame. In earnest!

Anh. Really. You have been crying. May I know the reason? The loss of your mother still?—

Ame. No; I have left off crying for her.

Anh. I beg pardon if I have come at an improper hour; but I wait upon you by the commands of your father.

Ame. You are welcome at all hours. My father has more than once told me, that he who forms my mind, I should always consider as my greatest benefactor. And my heart tells me the same.

Anh. I think myself amply rewarded by the good opinion you have of me.

Ame. When I remember what trouble I have sometimes given you, I cannot be too grateful.

Anh. [Aside.] Oh, heavens! [To AMELIA.] I—I come from your father with a commission.—If you please we will sit down. [He places chairs, and they sit.] Count Cassel is arrived.

Ame. Yes, I know.

Anh. And do you know for what reason?

Ame. He wishes to marry me.

Anh. Does he? But, believe me, the baron will not persuade you. No, I am sure he will not.

Ame. I know that.

Anh. He wishes that I should ascertain whether you have an inclination—

Ame. For the count, or for matrimony, do you mean?

Anh. For matrimony.

Ame. All things that I don't know, and don't understand, are quite indifferent to me.

Anh. For that very reason I am sent to you to explain the good and the bad of which matrimony is composed.

Ame. Then I beg first to be acquainted with the good.

Anh. When two sympathetic hearts meet in the marriage state, matrimony may be called a happy life. When such a wedded pair find thorns in their path, each will be eager, for the sake of the other, to tear them from the root. Where they have to mount hills, or wind a labyrinth, the most experienced will lead the way, and be a guide to his companion. Patience and love will accompany them in their journey, while melancholy and discord they leave far behind. Hand in hand they pass on from morning till evening, through their summer's day, till the night of age draws on, and the sleep of death overtakes the one. The other, weeping and mourning, yet looks forward to the bright region where he shall meet his still surviving partner among trees and flowers, which themselves have planted in the fields of eternal verdure.

Ame. Oh, you may tell my father I'll marry.

[Rising.]

Anh. [Rising.] This picture is pleasing; but I must beg you not to forget that there is another on the same subject. When convenience and fair appearance, joined to folly and ill-humour, forge the fetters of matrimony, they gall with their weight the married pair. Discontented with each other—at variance in opinions—their mutual aversion increases with the years they live together. They contend most where they should most unite—torment where they should most soothe. In this rugged way, choked with the weeds of suspicion, jealousy, anger, and hatred, they take their daily journey till one of these also sleep in death. The other then lifts up his dejected head, and calls out in acclamations of joy—oh, liberty! dear liberty!

Ame. I will not marry.

Anh. You mean to say you will not fall in love.

Ame. Oh, no! I am in love.

Anh. Are in love! [Starting.] And with the count?

Ame. I wish I was.

Anh. Why so?

Ame. Because he would, perhaps, love me again.

Anh. Who is there that would not?

Ame. Would you?

Anh. I—I—me—I—I am out of the question.

Ame. No; you are the very person to whom I have put the question.

Anh. What do you mean?

Ame. I am glad you don't understand me. I was afraid I had spoken too plain.

Anh. Understand you! As to that—I am not dull.

Ame. I know you are not; and, as you have for a long time instructed me, why should not I now begin to teach you?

Anh. Teach me what?

Ame. Whatever I know and you don't.

Anh. There are some things I had rather never know.

Ame. So, you may remember, I said when you began to teach me mathematics. I said I had rather not know it; but now I have learnt it, it gives me a great deal of pleasure—and—perhaps, who can tell but that I might teach something as pleasant to you as resolving a problem is to me.

Anh. Woman herself is a problem.

Ame. And I'll teach you to make her out.

Anh. You teach?

Ame. Why not? None but a woman can teach the science of herself: and though I own I am very young, a young woman may be as agreeable for a tutress as an old one. I am sure I always learnt faster from you than from the old clergyman who taught me before you came.

Anh. This is nothing to the subject.

Ame. What is the subject?

Anh. Love.

Ame. [Going up to him.] Come, then, teach it me—teach it me as you taught me geography, languages, and other important things.

Anh. [Turning from her.] Pshaw!

Ame. Ah! you won't—you know you have already taught me that, and you won't begin again.

Anh. You misconstrue—you misconceive every thing I say or do. The subject I came to you upon was marriage.

Ame. A very proper subject for the man who has taught me love, and I accept the proposal.

[Courtesying.]

Anh. Again you misconceive and confound me.

Ame. Ay, I see how it is,—you have no inclination to experience with me “the good part of matrimony.” I am not the female with whom you would like to go “hand-in-hand up hills, and through labyrinths”—with whom you would like to “root up thorns;” and with whom you would delight to “plant lilies and roses.” No; you had rather call out—“Oh, liberty! dear liberty!”

Anh. Why do you force from me what it is villainous to own?—I love you more than life—Oh, Amelia! had we lived in those golden times which the poets picture, no one but you—But, as the world is changed, your birth and fortune make—Our union is impossible.—To preserve the character, and, more, the feelings of an honest man, I would not marry you without the consent of your father; and could I, dare I, propose it to him?

Ame. He has commanded me never to conceal or disguise the truth. I will propose it to him. The subject of the count will force me to speak plainly, and this will be the most proper time, while he can compare the merit of you both.

Anh. I conjure you not to think of exposing yourself and me to his resentment.

Ame. It is my father's will that I should marry—it is my father's wish to see me happy.—If, then, you love me as you say, I will marry, and will be happy—but only with you. I will tell him this. At first he will start—then grow angry—then be in a passion. In his passion he will call me “undutiful;” but he will soon recollect himself, and resume his usual smiles, saying, “Well, well, if he love you, and you love him, in the name of heaven, let it be.”—Then I shall hug him round the neck, kiss his hands, run away from him, and fly to you; it will soon be known that I am your bride, the whole village will come to wish me joy, and heaven's blessing will follow.

Enter Butler.

Ah! is it you?

But. Without vanity, I have taken the liberty to enter this apartment the moment the good news reached my ears.

Ame. What news?

But. Pardon an old servant, your father's old butler, gracious lady, who has had the honour to carry the baron in his arms—and afterwards, with humble submission, to receive many a box o' the ear from you—if he thinks it his duty to make his congratulations with due reverence on this happy day, and to join with the muses in harmonious tunes on the lyre.

Ame. Oh! my good butler, I am not in a humour to listen to the muses and your lyre.

But. There has never been a birth-day, nor wedding-day, nor christening-day, celebrated in your family, in which I have not joined with the muses in full chorus. In forty-six years, three hundred and ninety-seven congratulations on different occasions have dropped from my pen. To-day, the three hundred and ninety-eighth is coming forth; for heaven has protected our noble master, who has been in great danger.

Ame. Danger! My father in danger! What do you mean?

But. One of the gamekeepers has returned to inform the whole castle of a base and knavish trick, of which the world will talk, and my poetry hand down to posterity.

Ame. What, what is all this?

But. The baron, my lord and master, in company with the strange count, had not been gone a mile beyond the lawn, when one of them—

Ame. What happen'd? Speak, for heaven's sake!

But. My verse shall tell you.

Ame. No, no; tell us in prose.

Anh. Yes, in prose.

But. Ah, you have neither of you ever been in love, or you would prefer poetry to prose. But excuse [Pulls out a paper.] the haste in which it was written. I heard the news in the fields—always have paper and a pencil about me, and composed the whole forty lines crossing the meadows and the park in my way home. [Reads.]

“Oh, muse, ascend the forked mount,

And lofty strains prepare,

About a baron and a count,

Who went to hunt the hare.

The hare she ran with utmost speed,

And sad and anxious looks,

Because the furious hounds, indeed,

Were near to her, gadzooks.

At length the count and baron bold

Their footsteps homeward bended—

For why, because, as you were told,

The hunting it was ended.

Before them straight a youth appears,

Who made a piteous pother,

And told a tale, with many tears,

About his dying mother.

The youth was in severe distress,

And seemed as he had spent all;

He look'd a soldier by his dress,

For that was regimental.

The baron's heart was full of ruth,

And from his eye fell brine O!

And soon he gave the mournful youth

A little ready rhino.

He gave a shilling, as I live,

Which sure was mighty well;

But to some people if you give

An inch—they'll take an ell.

The youth then drew his martial knife,

And seiz'd the baron's collar,—

He swore he'd have the baron's life,

Or else another dollar.

Then did the baron, in a fume,

Soon raise a mighty din,

Whereon came butler, huntsman, groom,

And eke the whipper-in.

Maugre this young man's warlike coat,

They bore him off to prison;

And held so strongly by his throat,

And almost stopp'd his whizzin.

Soon may a neckcloth called a rope

Of robbing cure this elf;

If so, I'll write, without a trope,

His dying speech myself.

And, had the baron chanced to die,

Oh! grief to all the nation,

I must have made an elegy,

And not this fine narration.

MORAL.

Henceforth let those who all have spent,
And would by begging live,

Take warning here, and be content

With what folks choose to give.

Ame. Your muse, Mr. Butler, is in a very inventive humour this morning.

Anh. And your tale too improbable even for fiction.

But. Improbable! It's a real fact.

Ame. What, a robber in our grounds at noon-day? Very likely, indeed!

But. I don't say it was likely—I only say it's true.

Anh. No, no, Mr. Verdun, we find no fault with your poetry: but don't attempt to impose it on us for truth.

Ame. Poets are allowed to speak falsehood, and we forgive yours.

But. I won't be forgiven, for I speak the truth. And here the robber comes, in custody, to prove my words.

“Soon may a neckcloth called a rope

Of robbing cure this elf;

If so, I'll write, without a trope,

His dying speech myself.” [Exit.

Ame. Look! as I live, so he does—they come nearer;—he's a young man, and has something interesting in his figure. An honest countenance, with grief and sorrow in his face. No, he is no robber—I pity him! Oh! look how the keepers drag him unmercifully into the tower—Now they lock it—Oh! how that poor unfortunate man must feel!

Anh. [Aside.] Hardly worse than I do.

Enter the BARON.

Ame. [Runs up to him.] A thousand congratulations, my dear papa.

Bar. For heaven's sake, spare your congratulations. The old butler, in coming up stairs, has already overwhelmed me with them.

Anh. Then, it is true, my lord? I could hardly believe the old man.

Ame. And the young prisoner, with all his honest looks, is a robber?

Bar. He is; but I verily believe for the first and last time. A most extraordinary event, Mr. Anhalt. This young man begged; then drew his sword upon me; but he trembled so when he seized me by the breast, a child might have overpowered him. I almost wish he had made his escape—this adventure may cost him his life, and I might have preserved it with one dollar; but now to save him would set a bad example.

Ame. Oh, no! my lord, have pity on him! Plead for him, Mr. Anhalt.

Bar. Amelia, have you had any conversation with Mr. Anhalt?

Ame. Yes, my lord.

Bar. Respecting matrimony!

Ame. Yes; and I have told him—

Anh. [Hastily.] According to your commands, Baron—

Ame. But he has conjured me—

Anh. I have endeavoured, my lord, to find out—

Ame. Yet, I am sure, dear papa, your affection for me—

Anh. You wish to say something to me in your closet, my lord?

Bar. What the devil is all this conversation? You will not let one another speak—I don't understand either of you.

Ame. Dear father, have you not promised you will not thwart my affections when I marry, but suffer me to follow their dictates?

Bar. Certainly.

Ame. Do you hear, Mr. Anhalt?
Anh. I beg pardon—I have a person who is waiting for me—I am obliged to retire.

[Exit in confusion.]

Bar. [Calls after him.] I shall expect you in my closet. I am going there immediately.

Ame. Pray, my lord, stop a few minutes longer: I have something of great importance to say to you.

Bar. Something of importance! to plead for the young man, I suppose! But that's a subject I must not listen to, [Exit.]

Ame. I wish to plead for two young men—For one, that he may be let out of prison; for the other, that he may be made a prisoner for life. [Looks out.] The tower is still locked. How dismal it must be to be shut up in such a place! and perhaps—[Calls.]—Butler! Butler! come this way. I wish to speak to you. This young man has risked his life for his mother, and that accounts for the interest I take in his misfortunes.

Enter the Butler.

Pray have you carried any thing to the prisoner to eat?

But. Yes.

Ame. What was it?

But. Some fine black bread, and water as clear as crystal.

Ame. Are you not ashamed? Even my father pities him. Go directly down to the kitchen, and desire the cook to give you something good and comfortable; and then go into the cellar for a bottle of wine.

But. Good and comfortable, indeed!

Ame. And carry both to the tower.

But. I am willing at any time, dear lady, to obey your orders; but, on this occasion, the prisoner's food must remain bread and water—It is the baron's particular command.

Ame. Ah! My father was in the height of passion when he gave it.

But. Whatsoever his passion might be, it is the duty of a true and honest dependant to obey his lord's mandates. I will not suffer a servant in this house, nor will I myself give the young man any thing except bread and water. But I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll read my verses to him.

Ame. Give me the key of the cellar—I'll go myself.

But. [Gives the key.] And there's my verses—[Taking them from his pocket.] Carry them with you, they may comfort him as much as the wine.

[She throws them down—Exit.]

But. [In amazement.] Not take them! Refuse to take them!—[Takes them up, and reads.]

"I must have made an elegy,

And not this fine narration."

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Prison in the Castle.

FREDERICK seated.

Fre. How a few moments destroy the happiness of man! When I, this morning, set out from my inn, and saw the sun rise, I sung with joy. [Rises.] Flattered with the hope of seeing my mother, I formed a scheme how I would with joy surprise her. But, farewell all pleasant prospects—I return to my native country, and the first object I behold is my dying parent; my first lodging a prison; and my next walk will perhaps be—Oh, merciful providence! have I deserved all this?

Enter AMELIA, with a basket.

Ame. Wait there, Francis—I shall soon be back.

Fre. Who's there?

Ame. You must be both hungry and thirsty, I fear.

Fre. Oh, no! neither.

Ame. Here's a bottle of wine, and something to eat. [Places the basket on the table.] I have often heard my father say that wine is quite a cordial to the heart.

Fre. A thousand thanks, dear stranger. Ah! could I prevail on you to have it sent to my mother, who is upon her death-bed, under the roof of an honest peasant called Hubert! Take it hence, my kind benefactress, and save my mother.

Ame. But first assure me that you did not intend to murder my father.

Fre. Your father! Heaven forbid—I meant but to preserve her life who gave me mine.—Murder your father! No, no—I hope not.

Ame. And I thought not—or, if you had murdered any one, you had better have killed the count; nobody would have missed him.

Fre. Who, may I inquire, were those gentlemen whom I hoped to frighten into charity.

Ame. Ay, if you only intended to frighten them, the count was the very person for your purpose. But you caught hold of the other gentleman.—And could you hope to intimidate Baron Wildenhaim?

Fre. Baron Wildenhaim!—Almighty powers!

Ame. What's the matter?

Fre. The man to whose breast I held my sword—

Ame. Was Baron Wildenhaim—the owner of this estate—my father!

Fre. My father!

Ame. Good heaven, how he looks! I am afraid he's mad. Here! Francis, Francis! [Exit.]

Fre. My father! Eternal Judge! thou dost not slumber! The man, against whom I drew my sword this day, was my father! One moment longer, and, provoked, I might have been the murderer of my father! My hair stands on end! My eyes are clouded? I cannot see any thing before me! [Stinks into a chair.] If providence had ordained that I should give the fatal blow, who would have been most in fault?—I dare not pronounce—That benevolent young female who left me just now, is, then, my sister—and I suppose that fop who accompanied my father—

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Welcome, sir! By your dress you are of the church, and consequently a messenger of comfort. You are most welcome, sir.

Anh. I wish to bring comfort, and avoid upbraidings; for your own conscience will reproach you more than the voice of a preacher. From the sensibility of your countenance, together with a language and address superior to the vulgar, it appears, young man, you have had an education which should have preserved you from a state like this.

Fre. My education I owe to my mother. Filial love, in return, has plunged me into the state you see. A civil magistrate will condemn according to the law—a priest, in judgment, is not to consider the act itself, but the impulse which led to the act.

Anh. I shall judge with all the lenity my religion dictates: and you are the prisoner of a nobleman who compassionates you for the affection which you bear towards your mother; for he has sent to the village where you directed him, and has found the account you gave relating to her true. With this impression in your favour, it is my advice, that you endeavour to see and supplicate the baron for your release from prison, and all the peril of his justice.

Fre. I—I see the baron! I—I supplicate for my deliverance. Will you favour me with his name? Is it not Baron—

Anh. Baron Wildenhaim.

Fre. Baron Wildenhaim! He lived formerly in Alsace?

Anh. The same. About a year after the death of his wife he left Alsace; and arrived here a few weeks ago to take possession of this his paternal estate.

Fre. So! his wife is dead; and that generous young lady who came to my prison just now is his daughter?

Anh. Miss Wildenhaim, his daughter.

Fre. And that young gentleman I saw with him this morning is his son?

Anh. He has no son.

Fre. Oh, yes, he has—I mean him that was out shooting to-day.

Anh. He is not his son.

Fre. [To himself.] Thank heaven!

Anh. He is only a visitor.

Fre. I thank you for this information; and, if you will undertake to procure me a private interview with Baron Wildenhaim—

Anh. Why private? However, I will venture to take you for a short time from this place, and introduce you; depending on your innocence, or your repentance—on his conviction in your favour, or his mercy towards your guilt. Follow me. [Exit.]

Fre. I have beheld an affectionate parent in deep adversity. Why should I tremble thus?—Why doubt my fortitude in the presence of an unnatural parent in prosperity? [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the Castle—table and two chairs.

Enter Baron WILDENHAIM and AMELIA.

Bar. I hope you judge more favourably of Count Cassel's understanding since the private interview you have had with him. Confess to me the exact effect of the long conference between you.

Ame. To make me hate him.

Bar. What has he done?

Ame. Oh! told me of such barbarous deeds he has committed.

Bar. What deeds?

Ame. Made vows of love to so many women, that, on his marriage with me, a hundred female hearts will at least be broken.

Bar. Pshaw! do you believe him?

Ame. Suppose I do not; is it to his honour that I believe he tells a falsehood?

Bar. He is mistaken merely.

Ame. Indeed, my lord, in one respect I am sure he speaks truth. For our old butler told my waiting-maid of a poor young creature who has been deceived, undone; and she and her whole family involved in shame and sorrow by his perfidy.

Bar. Are you sure the butler said this?

Ame. See him, and ask him. He knows the whole story,—indeed he does; the names of the persons, and every circumstance.

Bar. Desire he may be sent to me

Ame. [Goes to the door and calls.] Order old Verdun to come to the baron directly.

Bar. I know tale-bearers are apt to be erroneous. I'll hear from himself the account you speak of.

Ame. I believe it is in verse.

Bar. In verse!

Ame. But then, indeed, it's true.

Enter BUTLER.

Ame. Verdun, pray have you not some true poetry?

But. All my poetry is true—and, so far, better than some people's prose.

Bar. But I want prose on this occasion, and command you to give me nothing else. Have you heard of an engagement which Count Cassel is under to any other woman than my daughter?

But. I am to tell your honour in prose?

Bar. Certainly. Amelia, he does not like to divulge what he knows in the presence of a third person—leave the room. [Exit AMELIA.]

But. No, no—that did not cause my reluctance to speak.

Bar. What then?

But. Your not allowing me to speak in verse—for here is the poetic poem.

Bar. How dare you pretend to contend with my will? Tell me in plain language all you know on the subject I have named.

But. Well then, my lord, if you must have the account in quiet prose, thus it was—Phœbus, one morning, rose in the east, and having handed in the long-expected day, he called up his brother Hy-men—

Bar. Have done with your rhapsody.

But. Ay; I knew you'd like it best in verse—

[Reads.]

There lived a lady in this land,

Whose charms the heart made tingle;

At church she had not given her hand,

And therefore still was single.

Bar. Keep to prose.

But. I will, my lord; but I have repeated it so often in verse I scarce know how.—Count Cassel, influenced by the designs of Cupid in his very worst humour,—

Count Cassel woo'd this maid so rare,

And in her eye found grace;

And if his purpose was not fair—

Bar. No verse.

But. It probably was base.

I beg your pardon, my lord; but the verse will intrude, in spite of my efforts to forget it. 'Tis as difficult for me at times to forget, as 'tis for other men at times to remember. But, in plain truth, my lord, the count was treacherous, cruel, forsworn.

Bar. I am astonished! [Takes a chair and sits.]

But. And would be more so if you would listen to the whole poem. Pray, my lord, listen to it.

Bar. You know the family? All the parties?

But. I will bring the father of the damsel to prove the veracity of my muse. His name is Baden—poor old man! [Reads.]

The sire consents to bless the pair,

And names the nuptial day.

When, lo! the bridegroom was not there,

Because he was away.

Bar. But tell me—had the father his daughter's innocence to deplore?

But. Ah! my lord! ah! and you must hear that part in rhyme. Loss of innocence never sounds well except in verse. [Reads.]

For, ah! the very night before,
No prudent guard upon her,
The count he gave her oaths a score,
And took in change her honour.

[BARON rises.]

MORAL.

Then you, who now lead single lives,
From this sad tale beware;
And do not act as you were wives,
Before you really are.

Enter Count CASSEL.

Bar. [To the BUTLER.] Leave the room instantly.

Cou. Yes, good Mr. Family Post, leave the room, and take your doggrels with you.

But. Don't affront my poem, your honour; for I am indebted to you for the plot.

The count he gave her oaths a score,
And took in change her honour.

[Exit BUTLER.]

Bar. Count, you see me agitated.

Cou. What can be the cause?

Bar. I'll not keep you in doubt a moment. You are accused, young man, of being engaged to another woman, while you offer marriage to my child.

Cou. To only one other woman?

Bar. What do you mean?

Cou. My meaning is, that when a man is young and rich, has travelled, and is no personal object of disapprobation,—to have made vows but to one woman is an absolute slight upon the rest of the sex.

Bar. Without evasion, sir, do you know the name of Baden? Was there ever a promise of marriage made by you to his daughter? Answer me plainly; or must I take a journey to inquire of the father.

Cou. No; he can tell you no more than, I dare say, you already know; and which I shall not contradict.

Bar. Amazing insensibility! And can you hold your head erect while you acknowledge perfidy?

Cou. My dear baron,—if every man who deserves to have a charge such as this brought against him, was not permitted to look up, it is a doubt whom we might not meet crawling on all fours.

Bar. [Starts—recollects himself] Yet—nevertheless—the act is so atrocious—

Cou. But nothing new.

Bar. Yes—I hope—I hope it is new.

Cou. What, did you never meet with such a thing before?

Bar. If I have—I pronounced the man who so offended—a villain.

Cou. You are singularly scrupulous. I question if the man thought himself so.

Bar. Yes, he did.

Cou. How do you know.

Bar. I have heard him say so.

Cou. But he ate, drank, and slept, I suppose?

Bar. Perhaps he did.

Cou. And was merry with his friends; and his friends as fond of him as ever?

Bar. Perhaps—perhaps they were.

Cou. And perhaps he now and then took upon him to lecture young men for their gallantries?

Bar. Perhaps he did.

Cou. Why, then, after all, baron, your villain is a mighty good, prudent, honest fellow, and I have no objection to your giving me that name.

Bar. But do you not think of some atonement to the unfortunate girl?

Cou. Did your villain atone?

Bar. No: when his reason was matured, he wished to make some recompense, but his endeavours were too late.

Cou. I will follow his example, and wait till my reason is matured, before I think myself competent to determine what to do.

Bar. And till that time I defer your marriage with my daughter.

Cou. Would you delay her happiness so long?
Why, my dear baron, considering the fashionable life I lead, it may be these ten years before my judgment arrives to its necessary standard.

Bar. I have the head-ache, count: these tidings have discomposed, disordered me—I beg your absence for a few minutes.

Cou. I obey—and let me assure you, my lord, that, although, from the extreme delicacy of your honour, you have ever through life shuddered at seduction, yet there are constitutions, and there are circumstances, in which it can be palliated.

Bar. Never.

Cou. Not in a grave, serious, reflecting man, such as you, I grant. But in a gay, lively, inconsiderate, flimsy, frivolous coxcomb, such as myself, it is excu-sable: for me to keep my word to a woman would be deceit: 'tis not expected of me. It is my character to break oaths in love; as it is in your nature, my lord, never to have spoken any thing but wisdom and truth. [Exit.]

Bar. Could I have thought a creature so insignificant as that had power to excite sensations such as I feel at present! I am, indeed, worse than he is, as much as the crimes of a man exceed those of an idiot.

Enter AMELIA.

Ame. I heard the count leave you, my lord, and so I am come to inquire—

Bar. [Sitting down.] You are not to marry Count
Cassel—and now mention his name to me no more.

Ame. I won't, indeed I won't—for I hate his name. But thank you, my dear father, for this good news. [Sits opposite to him.] And who am I to marry?

Bar. I can't tell.

Ame. I never liked the count.

Bar. Nor more did I.

Ame. I think love comes just as it pleases, without being asked.

Bar. It does so.

Ame. And there are instances, where, perhaps, the object of love makes the passion meritorious.

Bar. To be sure there are.

Ame. For example, my affection for Mr. Anhalt as my tutor.

Bar. Right.

Ame. I should like to marry. [Sighing]

Bar. So you shall. It is proper for every body to marry.

Ame. Why, then, does not Mr. Anhalt marry?

Bar. You must ask him that question yourself.

Ame. I have.

Bar. And what did he say?

Ame. Will you give me leave to tell you what he said.

Bar. Certainly.

Ame. And what I said to him?

Bar. Certainly.

Ame. And won't you be angry?

Bar. Undoubtedly not.

Ame. Why, then—you know you commanded me never to disguise or conceal the truth.

Bar. I did so.

Ame. Why, then, he said—

Bar. What did he say?

Ame. He said—he would not marry me without your consent for the world.

Bar. And pray, how came this the subject of your conversation?

Ame. [Both rising.] I brought it up.

Bar. You brought it up! and what did you say?

Ame. I said, that birth and fortune were such old-fashioned things to me, I cared nothing about either; and that I had once heard my father declare he should consult my happiness in marrying me beyond any other consideration.

Bar. I will once more repeat to you my sentiments. It is the custom in this country for the children of nobility to marry only with their equals; but, as my daughter's content is more dear to me than an ancient custom, I would bestow you on the first man I thought calculated to make you happy; by this I do not mean to say that I should not be severely nice in the character of the man to whom I gave you; and Mr. Anhalt, from his obligations to me, and his high sense of honour, thinks too nobly—

Ame. Would it not be noble to make the daughter of his benefactor happy?

Bar. But when that daughter is a child, and thinks like a child—

Ame. No, indeed, papa, I begin to think very like a woman. Ask him if I don't.

Bar. Ask him! You feel gratitude for the instructions you have received from him, and you fancy it love.

Ame. Are there two gratuities?

Bar. What do you mean?

Ame. Because I feel gratitude to you; but that is very unlike the gratitude I feel towards him.

Bar. Indeed!

Ame. Yes; and then he feels another gratitude towards me. What's that?

Bar. Has he told you so?

Ame. Yes.

Bar. That was not right of him.

Ame. Oh! if you did but know how I surprised him!

Bar. Surprised him!

Ame. He came to me by your command, to examine my heart respecting Count Cassel. I told him that I would never marry the count.

Bar. But him?

Ame. Yes, him.

Bar. Very fine, indeed! And what was his answer?

Ame. He talked of my rank in life; of my aunts and cousins; of my grandfather, and great grandfather; of his duty to you; and endeavoured to persuade me to think no more of him.

Bar. He acted honestly.

Ame. But not politely.

Bar. No matter.

Ame. Dear father! I shall never be able to love another—never be happy with any one else.

[Throwing herself on her knees.

Bar. Rise, I command you.

Enter ANHALT.

Anh. My lord, forgive me! I have ventured on the privilege of my office, as a minister of holy charity, to bring the poor soldier, whom your justice has arrested, into the adjoining room; and I presume to entreat you will admit him to your presence, and hear his apology or supplication.

Bar. Anhalt, you have done wrong. I pity the unhappy boy; but you know I cannot, must not forgive him.

Anh. I beseech you, then, my lord, to tell him so yourself. From your lips he may receive his doom with resignation.

Ame. Oh, father! See him and take pity on him; his sorrows have made him frantic.

Bar. Leave the room, Amelia. Instantly.

[Exit AMELIA.]

Anh. He asked a private audience; perhaps he has some confession to make that may relieve his mind, and may be requisite for you to hear.

Bar. Well, bring him in—and do you wait in the adjoining room till our conference is over. I must then, sir, have a conference with you.

Anh. I shall obey your commands.

[He goes to the door, re-enters with FREDERICK, then retires.]

Bar. [Haughtily to FREDERICK.] I know, young man, you plead your mother's wants in excuse for an act of desperation: but, powerful as this plea might be in palliation of a fault, it cannot extenuate a crime like yours.

Fre. I have a plea for my conduct even more powerful than a mother's wants.

Bar. What's that?

Fre. My father's cruelty.

Bar. You have a father, then?

Fre. I have, and a rich one—Nay, one that's reputed virtuous and honourable. A great man, possessing estates and patronage in abundance; much esteemed at court, and beloved by his tenants; kind, benevolent, honest, generous—

Bar. And with all those great qualities abandons you?

Fre. He does, with all the qualities I mention.

Bar. Your father may do right; a dissipated, desperate youth, whom kindness cannot draw from vicious habits, severity may.

Fre. You are mistaken—My father does not discard me for my vices—He does not know me—has never seen me—He abandoned me, even before I was born.

Bar. What do you say?

Fre. The tears of my mother are all that I inherit from my father. Never has he protected or supported me—never protected her.

Bar. Why don't you apply to his relations?

Fre. They disown me, too; I am, they say, related to no one. All the world disclaim me, except my mother—and there again I have to thank my father.

Bar. How so?

Fre. Because I am an illegitimate son. My seduced mother has brought me up in patient misery. Industry enabled her to give me an education; but the days of my youth commenced with hardships, sorrow, and danger. My companions lived happy around me, and had a pleasing prospect in their view, while bread and water only were my food, and no hopes joined to sweeten it. But my father felt not that!

Bar. [To himself.] He touches my heart.

Fre. After five years' absence from my mother, I returned this very day, and found her dying in the streets for want—not even a hut to shelter her, or a pallet of straw—But my father feels not that! He lives in a palace, sleeps on the softest down, enjoys all the luxuries of the great; and, when he dies, a funeral sermon will praise his great benevolence, his christian charities.

Bar. [Agitated.] What is your father's name?

Fre. He took advantage of an innocent young woman, gained her affection by flattery and false promises; gave life to an unfortunate being,—who was on the point of murdering his father.

Bar. Who is he?

Fre. [With vehemence.] Baron Wildenhaim?

[The BARON'S emotion expresses his sense of amazement, guilt, shame, and horror.

Fre. In this house did you rob my mother of her honour; and in this house I am a sacrifice for the crime. I am your prisoner—I will not be free—I am a robber—I give myself up. You shall accompany me to the spot of public execution. You shall hear in vain the chaplain's consolation and injunctions. You shall find how I, in despair, will, to the last moment, call for retribution on my father.

Bar. Stop! Be pacified—

Fre. And when you turn your head from my extended corse, you will behold my weeping mother.—Need I paint how her eyes will greet you?

Bar. Desist—barbarian, savage, stop!

Enter ANHALT, alarmed.

Anh. What do I hear? What is this?—Young man, I hope you have not made a second attempt?

Fre. Yes; I have done what it was your place to do. I have made a sinner tremble.

[Points to the BARON, and exits.

Anh. What can this mean?—I do not comprehend—

Bar. He is my son!—He is my son!—Go, Anhalt;—advise me—help me—Go to the poor woman his mother—He can show you the way—make haste—speed to protect her—

Anh. But what am I to—

Bar. Go—your heart will tell you how to act.

[Exit ANHALT.

Who am I? What am I?—Mad—raving—no—I have a son—a son! The bravest—I will—I must—oh! Why have I not embraced him yet? why not pressed him to my heart? Ah! see—[Looking after him.]—He flies from the castle—Who's there? Where are my attendants?

Enter two Servants.

Follow him—bring the prisoner back.—But observe my command—treat him with respect—treat him as my son—and your master. [Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Inside of the Cottage.

AGATHA, Cottager, and his Wife, discovered,

Ag. Pray look and see if he's coming

Cot. It is of no use. I have been in the road; have looked up and down; but neither see nor hear any thing of him.

Wife. Have a little patience.

Ag. I wish you would step out once more—I think he cannot be far off.

Cot. I will; I will go. [Exit.

Wife. If your son knew what heaven had sent you, he would be here very soon.

Ag. I feel so anxious—

Wife. But why? I should think a purse of gold, such as you have received, would make any body easy.

Ag. Where can he be so long? He has been gone four hours. Some ill must have befallen him.

ACT. DRAMA—NOS. 41 & 42

Wife. It is still broad day-light—don't think of any danger.—This evening we must all be merry. I'll prepare the supper. What a good gentleman our Baron must be! I am sorry I ever spoke a word against him.

Ag. How did he know I was here?

Wife. Heaven only can tell. The servant that brought the money was very secret.

Ag. [To herself.] I am astonished! I wonder! Oh! surely he has been informed—Why else should he have sent so much money?

Re-enter Cottager.

Ag. Well! not yet!

Cot. I might look till I am blind for him—but I saw our new rector coming along the road; he calls in sometimes. May be, he will this evening.

Wife. He is a very good gentleman; pays great attention to his parishioners; and where he can assist the poor he is always ready.

Enter Mr. ANHALT.

Anh. Good evening, friends.

Cot. Thank you, reverend sir.

[They both run to fetch a chair.

Anh. I thank you, good people—I see you have a stranger here.

Cot. Yes, your reverence; it is a poor sick woman whom I took in doors.

Anh. You will be rewarded for it. [To AGATHA.] May I beg leave to ask your name?

Ag. Ah! If we were alone—

Anh. Good neighbours, will you leave us alone for a few minutes? I have something to say to this poor woman.

Cot. Wife, do you hear? Come along with me.

[Exeunt Cottager and his Wife.

Anh. Now—

Ag. Before I tell you who I am, what I am, and what I was—I must beg to ask—are you of this country?

Anh. No; I was born in Alsace.

Ag. Did you know the late rector personally, whom you have succeeded?

Anh. No.

Ag. Then you are not acquainted with my narrative.

Anh. Should I find you to be the person whom I have long been in search of, your history is not altogether unknown to me.

Ag. That you have been in search of! Who gave you such a commission?

Anh. A man, who, if it so prove, is much concerned for your misfortunes.

Ag. How? Oh, sir! tell me quickly—Whom do you think to find in me?

Anh. Agatha Friburg.

Ag. Yes, I am that unfortunate woman; and the man who pretends to take concern in my misfortunes is—Baron Wildenhaim—he who betrayed me, abandoned me and my child, and killed my parents. He would now repair our sufferings with this purse of gold. [Takes out the purse.] Whatever may be your errand, sir, whether to humble or to protect me, it is alike indifferently. I therefore request you to take this money to him who sent it. Tell him, my honour has never been saleable. Tell him, destitute as I am, even indigence will not tempt me to accept charity from my seducer. He despised my heart—I despise his gold. He has trampled on me—I trample on his representative.

[Throws the purse on the ground.

Anh. Be patient—I give you my word, that when the baron sent this present to an unfortunate woman, for whom her son had supplicated, he did not know that woman was Agatha.

Ag. My son! what of my son?

Anh. Do not be alarmed!—The baron met with an affectionate son, who begged for his sick mother, and it affected him.

Ag. Begged of the baron! of his father!

Anh. Yes; but they did not know each other; and the mother received the present on the son's account.

Ag. Did not know each other? Where is my son?

Anh. At the castle.

Ag. And still unknown?

Anh. Now he is known—an explanation has taken place; and I am sent here by the baron, not to a stranger, but to Agatha Friburg—not with gold! His commission was—"do what your heart directs you."

Ag. How is my Frederick? How did the baron receive him?

Anh. I left the castle just in the moment the discovery was made. By this time your son is, perhaps, in the arms of his father.

Ag. Oh! is it possible, that a man, who has been twenty years deaf to the voice of nature, should change so suddenly?

Anh. I do not mean to justify the baron; but—he has loved you—and fear of his noble kindred alone caused his breach of faith to you.

Ag. But to desert me wholly, and wed another—

Anh. War called him away: wounded in the field, he was taken to the adjacent seat of a nobleman, whose only daughter, by anxious attention to his recovery, won his gratitude; and, influenced by the will of his worldly friends, he married. But no sooner was I received into the family, and admitted to his confidence, than he related to me your story; and at times would exclaim in anguish,—"The proud imperious baroness avenges the wrongs of my deserted Agatha." Again, when he presented me this living, and I left France to take possession of it, his last words, before we parted, were—"The moment you arrive at Wildenhaim, make all inquiries to find out my poor Agatha." Every letter I afterwards received from him contained,—"Still, still, no tidings of my Agatha." And fate ordained it should be so till this fortunate day.

Ag. What you have said has made my heart overflow.—Where will this end?

Anh. I know not yet the baron's intentions; but your sufferings demand immediate remedy; and one way only is left,—come with me to the castle. Do not start—you shall be concealed in my apartments till you are called for.

Ag. I go to the baron's!—No.

Anh. Go, for the sake of your son,—reflect, that his fortunes may depend upon your presence.

Ag. And he is the only branch on which my hope still blossoms; the rest are withered. I will forget my wrongs as a woman, if the baron will atone to the mother—he shall have the woman's pardon if he will merit the mother's thanks.—I will go to the castle—for the sake of my Frederick, go even to his father. But where are my good host and hostess, that I may take leave, and thank them for their kindness?

Anh. [Taking up the purse.] Here, good friend! Good woman!

Enter Cottager and his Wife.

Wife. Yes, yes, here am I.

Anh. Good people, I will take your guest with me. You have acted an honest part, and therefore receive this reward for your trouble.

[He offers the purse to Cottager, who puts it by, and turns away.]

And. [To the Wife.] Do you take it.

Wife. I always obey my pastor.

[Takes it.]

Ag. Good bye. [Shakes hands with the Cottagers.]

For your hospitality to me, may ye enjoy continued happiness!

Cot. Fare you well—fare you well.

Wife. If you find friends and get health, we won't trouble you to call on us again; but if you should fall sick, or be in poverty, we shall take it very hard if we don't see you. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the Castle.

BARON sitting upon a sofa, FREDERICK standing near him, with one hand pressed between his—the BARON rises.

Bar. Been in battle too!—I am glad to hear it. You have known hard services, but now they are over, and joy and happiness will succeed. The reproach of your birth shall be removed, for I will acknowledge you my son and heir to my estate.

Fre. And my mother—

Bar. She shall live in peace and affluence. Do you think I would leave your mother unprotected for, unprotected? No! About a mile from this castle I have an estate called Weldeudorf—there she shall live, and call her own whatever it produces. There she shall reign, and be sole mistress of the little paradise. There her past sufferings shall be changed to peace and tranquillity. On a summer's morning we, my son, will ride to visit her; pass a day, a week, with her; and in this social intercourse time will glide pleasantly.

Fre. And pray, my lord, under what name is my mother to live, then?

Bar. How?

Fre. In what capacity? As your domestic—or as—

Bar. That we will settle afterwards.

Fre. Will you allow me, sir, to leave the room a little while, that you may have leisure to consider now?

Bar. I do not know how to explain myself in respect to your mother, more than I have done already.

Fre. My fate, whatever it may be, shall never part me from her. This is my firm resolution, upon which I call heaven to witness. My lord, it must be Frederick of Wildenhaim, and Agatha of Wildenhaim; or Agatha Friburg and Frederick Friburg. [Exit.]

Bar. Young man! Frederick! [Calling after him.] Hasty indeed! would make conditions with his father. No, no, that must not be. I just now thought how well I had contrived my plans—had relieved my heart of every burden, when, a second time, he throws a mountain upon it. Stop, friend conscience, why do you take his part? For twenty years thus you have used me, and been my torture.

Enter Mr. ANHALT.

Ah! Anhalt, I am glad you are come. My conscience and myself are at variance.

Anh. Your conscience is in the right.

Bar. You don't know yet what the quarrel is.

Anh. Conscience is always right—because it never speaks unless it is so.

Bar. Ay, a man of your order can more easily attend to its whispers than an old warrior. The sound of cannon has made him hard of hearing. I have found my son again, Mr. Anhalt, a fine brave young man—I mean to make him my heir; am I in the right?

Anh. Perfectly.

Bar. And his mother shall live in happiness; my estate, Woldendorf, shall be her's—I'll give it to her, and she shall make it her residence. Don't I do right?

Anh. No.

Bar. No! What else should I do?

Anh. Marry her

Bar. I marry her!

Anh. Baron Wildenhaim is a man who will not act inconsistently; as this is my opinion, I expect your reasons if you do not.

Bar. Would you have me marry a beggar?

Anh. Is that your only objection?

Bar. I have more—many more.

Anh. May I beg to know them likewise?

Bar. My birth.

Anh. Go on.

Bar. My relations will despise me.

Anh. Go on.

Bar. 'Death! are not these reasons enough?—I know no other.

Anh. Now, then, it is my turn to state mine for the advice I have given you. But first I presume to ask a few questions. Did Agatha, by artful insinuation, gain your affection? or did she give you cause to suppose her inconstant?

Bar. Neither; but for me she was always virtuous and good.

Anh. Did it cost you trouble and earnest entreaty to make her otherwise?

Bar. Yes.

Anh. You pledged your honour?

Bar. Yes.

Anh. Called God to witness?

Bar. Yes.

Anh. The witness you called at that time was the Being who sees you now. What you gave in pledge was your honour, which you must redeem. Therefore, thank heaven that it is in your power to redeem it. By marrying Agatha, the ransom's made; and she brings a dower greater than any princess can bestow—peace to your conscience. If you then esteem the value of this portion, you will not hesitate a moment to exclaim,—Friends, wish me joy, I will marry Agatha.

[BARON walks backwards and forwards, then takes ANHALT by the hand

Bar. "Friend, wish me joy, I will marry Agatha."

Anh. I do wish you joy.

Bar. Where is she?

Anh. In the castle—in my apartments here—I conducted her through the garden to avoid curiosity.

Bar. Well, then, this is the wedding-day. This very evening you shall give us your blessing.

Anh. Not so soon, not so private. The whole village was witness of Agatha's shame—the whole village must be witness of Agatha's re-established honour. Do you consent to this?

Bar. I do.

Anh. Now the quarrel is decided. Now is your conscience quiet?

Bar. As quiet as an infant's. I only wish the first interview was over.

Anh. Compose yourself. Agatha's heart is to be your judge.

Enter AMELIA.

Bar. Amelia, you have a brother.

Anh. I have just heard so, my lord; and rejoice to find the news confirmed by you.

Bar. I know, my dear Amelia, I can repay you for the loss of Count Cassel; but what return can I make to you for the loss of half your fortune?

Anh. My brother's love will be ample recompense.

Bar. I will reward you better. Mr. Anhalt, the battle I have just fought, I owe to myself: the victory I gained, I owe to you. A man of your principles, at once a teacher and an example of virtue, exalts his rank in life to a level with the noblest family—and I shall be proud to receive you as my son.

Anh. My lord, you overwhelm me with confusion, as well as with joy.

Bar. My obligations to you are infinite—Amelia shall pay the debt.

Anh. Oh, my dear father! what blessings have you bestowed on me in one day! [To ANHALT.] I will be your scholar still, and use more diligence than ever to please my master.

Anh. His present happiness admits of no addition.

Bar. Nor does mine—And there is yet another task to perform, that will require more fortitude, more courage, than this has done! A trial that—[Bursts into tears.] I cannot prevent them—Let me—let me—A few minutes will bring me to myself. Where is Agatha?

Anh. I will go and fetch her. [Exit ANHALT.

Bar. Stop! Let me first recover a little.—That door she will come from—that was once the dressing room of my mother—from that door I have seen her come many times—have been delighted with her lovely smiles—how shall I now behold her altered looks! Frederick must be my mediator. Where is he?—Where is my son? Now I am ready—my heart is prepared to receive her. Haste! haste! bring her in.

[ANHALT leads in AGATHA—the BARON clasps her in his arms—then kneels by her side.

Bar. Agatha, Agatha, do you know this voice?

Ag. Wildenhaim.

Bar. Can you forgive me?

Ag. Forgive you! [Embracing him.

Enter FREDERICK.

Fre. I hear the voice of my mother!—Ha! mother! father!

[FREDERICK throws himself on his knees by the side of his mother—She clasps him in her arms.

—Amelia goes to the side of her father, attentively viewing AGATHA.—ANHALT stands on the side of FREDERICK.—The curtain slowly drops.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Peachum's House.

PEACHUM sitting at a table, with a large book of accounts before him.

AIR.—PEACHUM.

Through all the employments of life,
Each neighbour abuses his brother;
Whore and rogue they call husband and wife;
All professions be-rogue one another.
The priest calls the lawyer a cheat;
The lawyer be-knaves the divine;
And the statesman, because he's so great,
Thinks his trade is as honest as mine.
A lawyer's is an honest employment; so is mine.
Like me, too, he acts in a double capacity; both against rogues, and for them: for 'tis but fitting, that we should protect and encourage cheats, since we live by them.

Enter FILCH.

Filch. Sir, Black Moll has sent word, her trial comes on in the afternoon, and she hopes you will order matters so as to bring her off.

Peach. Why, as the wench is very active and industrious, you may satisfy her that I'll soften the evidence.

Filch. Tom Gag, sir, is found guilty.

Peach. A lazy dog! When I took him, the time before, I told him what he would come to, if he did not mend his hand. This is death without reprieve. I may venture to book him [Writes]; for Tom Gag, forty pounds. Let Betty Sly know, that I'll save her from transportation, for I can get more by her staying in England.

Filch. Betty hath brought more goods to our lock this year, than any five of the gang; and, in truth, 'tis pity to lose so good a customer.

Peach. If none of the gang takes her off, she may, in the common course of business, live a twelve-month longer. I love to let women 'scape. A good sportsman always lets the hen partridges fly, because the breed of the game depends upon them. Besides, here the law allows us no reward; there is nothing to be got by the death of women—except our wives.

Filch. Without dispute, she is a fine woman! 'Twas to her I was obliged for my education. To say a bold word, she has trained up more young fellows to the business than the gaming-table.

Peach. Truly, Filch, thy observation is right. We and the surgeons are more beholden to women, than all the professions besides.

AIR.—FILCH.

'Tis woman that seduces all mankind!

By her we first were taught the wheedling arts;
Her very eyes can cheat; when most she is kind,
She tricks us of our money, with our hearts.
For her, like wolves by night, we roam for prey,
And practice every fraud to bribe her charms;
For suits of love, like law, are won by pay,
And beauty must be fee'd into our arms.

Peach. But make haste to Newgate, boy, and let my friends know what I intend; for I love to make them easy, one way or another.

Filch. When a gentleman is long kept in suspense, penitence may break his spirit ever after. Besides, certainty gives a man a good air upon his trial, and makes him risk another, without fear or scruple. But I'll away, for 'tis a pleasure to be a messenger of comfort to friends in affliction.

[Exit.]

Peach. But it is now high time to look about me for a decent execution against next sessions. I hate a lazy rogue, by whom one can get nothing till he is hanged. A register of the gang. [Reading.] "Crock-finger'd Jack—a year and a half in the service"—let me see how much the stock owes to his industry: one, two, three, four, five gold watches, and seven silver ones. A mighty clean-handed fellow! Sixteen snuff-boxes, five of them true gold; six dozen of handkerchiefs, four silver-hilted swords, half a dozen of shirts, three tie-periwigs, and a piece of broadcloth. Considering these are only the fruits of his leisure hours, I don't know a prettier fellow: for no man alive hath a more engaging presence of mind upon the road.—"Wat Dreary, alias Brown Will"—an irregular dog, who hath an underhand way of disposing of his goods; I'll try him only for a session or two longer, upon his good behaviour.—"Harry Paddington"—a poor petty larceny rascal, without the least genius! That fellow, though he were to live these six months, will never come to the gallows with any credit.—"Slippery Sam"—he goes off the next session; for the villain hath the impudence to have views of following his trade as a tailor, which he calls an honest employment.—"Mat-o'-the-Mint"—listed not above a month ago; a promising, sturdy fellow, and diligent in his way; somewhat too bold and hasty, and may raise good contributions on the public, if he does not cut himself short by murder.—"Tom Tiptle"—a guzzling soaking sot, who is always too drunk to stand himself, or to make others stand; a cart is absolutely necessary for him.—"Robin of Bagshot, alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Caruncle, alias Bob Booty"—

Enter MRS. PEACHUM.

Mrs. P. What of Bob Booty, husband? I hope nothing bad hath betided him. You know, my dear, he's a favourite customer of mine—'twas he made me a present of this ring.

Peach. I have set his name down in the black list, that's all, my dear; he spends his life among women, and as soon as his money is gone, one or other of the ladies will hang him for the reward, and there's forty pounds lost to us for ever!

Mrs. P. You know, my dear, I never meddle in matters of death; I always leave those affairs to you. Women, indeed, are bitter bad judges in these cases; for they are so partial to the brave, that they think every man handsome, who is going to the camp or the gallows. But really, husband, you should not be too hard-hearted, for you never had a finer, braver set of men than at present. We have not had a murder among them all these seven months: and truly, my dear, that is a great blessing.

Peach. What a dickens is the woman always whimpering about murder for! No gentleman is ever looked upon the worse for killing a man in his own defence; and if business cannot be carried on without it, what would you have a gentleman do? So, my dear, have done upon this subject. Was Captain Macheath here, this morning, for the bank-notes he left with you last week?

Mrs. P. Yes, my dear; and though the bank hath stopped payment, he was so cheerful, and so agreeable! Sure, there is not a finer gentleman upon the road than the Captain! If he comes from Bagshot at any reasonable hour, he hath promised to make one this evening, with Polly, me, and Bob Booty, at a party at quadrille. Pray, my dear, is the Captain rich?

Peach. The Captain keeps too good company ever to grow rich. Marybone and the chocolate-houses are his undoing. The man that purposes to get money by play, should have the education of a fine gentleman, and be trained up to it from his youth.

Mrs. P. Really, I am sorry, upon Polly's account, the Captain hath not more discretion. What business hath he to keep company with lords and gentlemen? he should leave them to prey upon one another.

Peach. Upon Polly's account! what a plague doth the woman mean?—Upon Polly's account!

Mrs. P. Captain Macheath is very fond of the girl.

Peach. And what then?

Mrs. P. If I have any skill in the ways of women, I am sure Polly thinks him a very pretty man.

Peach. And what then? you would not be so mad as to have the wench marry him! Gamblers and highwaymen are, generally, very good to their mistresses, but they are the very devils to their wives.

Mrs. P. But if Polly should be in love, how should we help her, or how can she help herself?—Poor girl! I am in the utmost concern about her.

Peach. Lookye, wife, a handsome wench, in our way of business, is as profitable as at the bar of a Temple coffee-house, who looks upon it as her livelihood, to grant every liberty but one. My daughter to me should be like a court lady to a minister of state, a key to the whole gang. Married! if the affair is not already done, I'll terrify her from it, by the example of our neighbours.

Mrs. P. Mayhap, my dear, you may injure the poor girl: she loves to imitate the fine ladies, and she may only allow the Captain liberties, in the view of interest.

Peach. But 'tis your duty, my dear, to warn the girl against her ruin; and to instruct her how to make the most of her beauty. I'll go to her this moment, and sift her. In the meantime, wife, rip out the coronets and marks of these dozen of cambric handkerchiefs; for I can dispose of them, this afternoon, to a chap in the city. [Exit.]

Mrs. P. Never was a man more out of the way in an argument than my husband. Why must our Polly, forsooth differ from her sex, and love only her husband? and why must Polly's marriage, contrary to all observation, make her the less followed by other men? All men are thieves in love, and like a woman the better for being another's property.

Enter FILCH.

Mrs. P. Come hither, Filch: I am as fond of this child, as though my mind misgave me he were my own. He hath as fine a hand at picking a pocket as a woman, and is as nimble-fingered as a juggler. If an unlucky session does not cut the rope of thy life, I pronounce, boy, thou wilt be a great man in history. Where was your post last night, my boy?

Filch. I plied at the opera, madam; and, considering 'twas neither dark nor rainy, so that there was no great hurry in getting chairs and coaches, made a tolerable hand on't. These seven handkerchiefs, madam. [Taking them from different parts of his dress.]

Mrs. P. Coloured ones, I see. They are of sure sale from our warehouse at Redriff, among the seamen.

Filch. And this snuff-box.

Mrs. P. Set in gold! A pretty encouragement this to a young beginner!

Filch. I had a fair tug at a charming gold watch. Plague take the tailors, for making the fobs so deep and narrow! it stuck by the way, and I was forced to make my escape under a coach. Really, madam, I fear I shall be cut off in the flower of my youth, so that every now and then, since I was pumped, I have thoughts of taking up and going to sea.

Mrs. P. You should go to Hockley-in-the-Hole, and to Marybone, child, to learn valour; these are the schools that have bred so many brave men. I thought, boy, by this time, thou hadst lost fear as well as shame. Poor lad! how little does he know yet of the Old Bailey! For the first fact, I'll insure thee from being hanged: and going to sea, Filch, will come time enough upon a sentence of transportation. But, hark you, my lad,—don't tell me a lie; for you know I hate a liar:—do you know of any thing that hath passed between Captain Macheath and our Polly?

Filch. I beg you, madam, don't ask me; for I must either tell a lie to you, or to Miss Polly; for I promised her I would not tell.

Mrs. P. But, when the honour of our family is concerned—

Filch. I shall lead a sad life with Miss Polly, if ever she comes to know I told you. Besides, I would not willingly forfeit my own honour, by betraying anybody.

Mrs. P. Yonder comes my husband and Polly. Come, Filch, you shall go with me into my own room, and tell me the whole story. I'll give thee a glass of a most delicious cordial, that I keep for my own drinking. [Exeunt.]

Enter PEACHUM and POLLY.

Polly. I know as well as any of the fine ladies how to make the most of myself, and of my man too. A woman knows how to be mercenary, though she hath never been in a court, or at an assembly. We have it in our natures, papa. If I allow Captain Macheath some trifling liberties, I have this watch, and other visible marks of his favour, to show for it. A girl who cannot grant some things, and refuse what is most material, will make but a poor hand of her beauty, and soon be thrown upon the common.

AIR.—POLLY.

Virgins are like the fair flow'r in its lustre,
Which in the garden enamels the ground;
Near it the bees in play flutter and cluster,
And gaudy butterflies frolic around.

But when once pluck'd 'tis no longer alluring,
To Covent-garden 'tis sent (as yet sweet),
There fades, and shrinks, and grows past all enduring,

Rots, stinks, and dies, and is trod under feet.

Peach. You know, Polly, I am not against your toying and trifling with a customer, in the way of business, or to get out a secret or so; but if I find out that you have played the fool, and are married, you jade you! I'll cut your throat, hussy. Now you know my mind.

Enter Mrs. PEACHUM, in a passion.

AIR.—Mrs. PEACHUM.

Our Polly is a sad slut! nor heeds what we have taught her,
I wonder any man alive will ever rear a daughter!

For she must have both hoods and gowns, and hoops,
to swell her pride,
With scarves and stays, and gloves and lace, and she will have men beside;
And when she's dress'd with care and cost, all tempting, fine, and gay,
As men should serve a cucumber, she flings herself
away.

You baggage! you hussy! you inconsiderate jade! had you been hanged, it would not have vexed me; for that might have been your misfortune; but to do such a mad thing by choice!—The wench is married, husband.

Peach. Married! the Captain is a bold man, and will risk anything for money: to be sure, he believes her a fortune. Do you think your mother and I should have lived comfortably so long together, if ever we had been married, baggage?

Mrs. P. I knew she was always a proud slut; and now the wench hath played the fool and married; because, forsooth, she would do like the gentry! Can you support the expense of a husband, hussy, in gaming and drinking? Have you money enough to carry on the daily quarrels of man and wife about who shall squander most? If you must be married, could you introduce nobody into our family but a highwayman? Why, you foolish jade! thou wilt be as ill-used, and as much neglected, as if thou hadst married a lord!

Peach. Let not your anger, my dear, break through the rules of decency; for the Captain looks upon himself, in the military capacity, as a gentleman by his profession. Besides what he hath already, I know he is in a fair way of getting or of dying; and both these ways, let me tell you, are most excellent chances for a wife. Tell me, hussy! are you ruined or no?

Mrs. P. With Polly's fortune, she might very well have gone off to a person of distinction: yes, that you might, you pouting slut!

Peach. What! is the wench dumb? Speak, or I'll make you plead by squeezing out an answer from you. Are you really bound wife to him, or are you only upon liking? [Pinching her.]

Polly. Oh!

Mrs. P. How the mother is to be pitied who hath handsome daughters! Locks, bolts, bars, and lectures of morality, are nothing to them: they break through them all; they have as much pleasure in cheating a father and mother, as in cheating at cards.

Peach. Why, Polly, I shall soon know if you are married, by Macheath's keeping from our house.

AIR.—POLLY.

Can love be controll'd by advice?

Will Cupid our mothers obey?

Though my heart were as frozen as ice,
At his flame 'twould have melted away.

When he kiss'd me, so sweetly he press'd,

'Twas so sweet, that I must have complied,

So I thought it both safest and best,

To marry, for fear you should chide.

Mrs. P. Then all the hopes of our family are gone for ever and ever!

Peach. And Macheath may hang his father and mother in-law, in hopes to get into their daughter's fortune.

Polly. I did not marry him (as 'tis the fashion), coolly and deliberately, for honour or money—but I love him.

Mrs. P. Love him! worse and worse! I thought the girl had been better bred. Oh, husband! husband! her folly makes me mad! My head swims! I'm distracted! I can't support myself—Oh!—

[Faints in a chair.]

Peach. See, wench, to what a condition you have reduced your poor mother! A glass of cordial this instant! How the poor woman takes it to heart! [POLLY goes out and returns.—She gives the bottle and glass to PEACHUM, who hands a glass of it to Mrs. P.] Ah, hussy! now this is the only comfort your mother has left.

Polly. Give her another glass, sir; my mamma drinks double the quantity whenever she is in this way. This, you see, fetches her.

[PEACHUM fills the glass.]

Mrs. P. The girl shows such readiness, and so much concern, that I almost could find in my heart to forgive her. [Drinks again.]

DUET.—Mrs. PEACHUM and POLLY.

Mrs. P. O Polly, you might have toy'd and kiss'd: By keeping men off, you keep them on.

Polly. But he so teased me,
And he so pleased me,
What I did, you must have done.

Mrs. P. Not with a highwayman, you sorry slut.

Peach. A word with you, wife. 'Tis no new thing for a wench to take a man without consent of parents. You know 'tis the frailty of woman, my dear.

Mrs. P. Yes, indeed, the sex is frail; but the first time a woman is frail, she should be somewhat nice methinks, for then or never is the time to make her fortune: after that she hath nothing to do but to guard herself from being found out, and she may do what she pleases.

Peach. Make yourself a little easy; I have a thought shall soon set all matters again to rights. Why so melancholy, Polly? since what is done cannot be undone, we must endeavour to make the best of it.

Mrs. P. Well, Polly, as far as one woman can forgive another, I forgive thee.—Your father is too fond of you, hussy.

Polly. Then all my sorrows are at an end.

Mrs. P. A mighty likely speech, in troth, for a wench who is just married!

AIR.—POLLY.

I like a ship in storms was toss'd,
Yet afraid to put into land,
For seiz'd in the port, the vessel's lost
Whose treasure is contraband.
The waves are laid,
My duty's paid;
O joy beyond expression!
Thus safe ashore,
I ask no more;
My all's in my possession.

Peach. I hear customers in t'other room. Go talk with them, Polly; but come again as soon as they are gone.—But harkye, child! if 'tis the gentleman who was here yesterday about the repeating watch, say you can't get intelligence of it till tomorrow, for I lent it to Sukey Straddle to make a figure with to-night at the tavern in Drury-lane. If t'other gentleman calls for the silver-hilted sword, you know Beetle-browed Jemmy hath it on, and he doth not come from Tunbridge till Tuesday night, so that it cannot be had till then. [Exit POLLY.]
Dear wife, be a little pacified; don't let your passion run away with your senses: Polly, I grant you, hath done a rash thing.

Mrs. P. If she had had only an intrigue with the fellow, why the very best families have excused and huddled up a frailty of that sort. 'Tis marriage, husband, that makes it a blemish.

Peach. But money, wife, is the true fuller's-earth for reputations; there is not a spot or stain but what it can take out. I tell you, wife, I can make this match turn to our advantage.

Mrs. P. I am very sensible, husband, that Captain Macheath is worth money, but I am in doubt whether he hath not two or three wives already; and then, if he should die in a session or two, Polly's dower would come into dispute.

Peach. That, indeed, is a point which ought to be considered. The lawyers are bitter enemies to those in our way; they don't care that anybody should get a clandestine livelihood but themselves.

Enter POLLY.

Polly. 'Twas only Nimming Ned: he brought in a damask window-curtain, a hoop-petticoat, a pair of silver candlesticks, a perriwig; and one silk stocking, from the fire that happened last night.

Peach. There is not a fellow that is cleverer in his way, and saves more goods out of the fire, than Ned. But now, Polly, to your affair; for matters must not be as they are. You are married then, it seems?

Polly. Yes, sir.

Peach. And how do you propose to live, child?

Polly. Like other women, sir, upon the industry of my husband.

Mrs. P. What! is the wench turned fool! A highwayman's wife, like a soldier's, hath as little of his pay as of his company.

Peach. And had not you the common views of a gentlewoman in your marriage, Polly?

Polly. I don't know what you mean, sir.

Peach. Of a jointure, and of being a widow.

Polly. But I love him, sir: how then could I have thoughts of parting with him?

Peach. Parting with him! why that is the whole scheme and intention of all marriage articles. The comfortable state of widowhood is the only hope that keeps up a wife's spirits. Where is the woman who would scruple to be a wife, if she had it in her power to be a widow whenever she pleased? If you have any views of this sort, Polly, I shall think the match not so very unreasonable.

Polly. How I dread to hear your advice! yet I must beg you to explain yourself.

Peach. Secure what he hath got; have him peached the next sessions, and then at once you are made a rich widow.

Polly. What! murder the man I love! the blood runs cold at my heart at the very thought of it!

Peach. Fie, Polly! what hath murder to do in the affair? Since the thing sooner or later must happen, I dare say that the Captain himself would like that we should get the reward for his death sooner than a stranger. Why, Polly, the Captain knows that as 'tis his employment to rob, so 'tis our's to take robbers. Every man in his business: so that there is no malice in the case.

Mrs. P. To have him 'peached is the only thing could ever make me forgive her.

AIR.—POLLY.

Oh ponder well! be not severe;

So save a wretched wife:

For on the rope that hangs my dear,
Depends poor Polly's life.

Mrs. P. But your duty to your parents, hussy, obliges you to hang him. What would many a wife give for such an opportunity!

Polly. What is a jointure, what is widowhood, to me? I know my heart; I cannot survive him. Thus, sir, it will happen to your poor Polly.

Mrs. P. What! is the fool in love in earnest then? I hate thee for being particular. Why, wench, thou art a shame to thy very sex.

Polly. But hear me, mother—if you ever loved—

Mrs. P. Those cursed play-books she reads have been her ruin! One word more, hussy, and I shall knock your brains out, if you have any.

Peach. Keep out of the way, Polly, for fear of mischief; and consider of what is proposed to you.

Mrs. P. Away, hussy! Hang your husband, and be dutiful.—[Exit POLLY.—The thing, husband, must and shall be done. If she will not know her duty, we know ours.

Peach. But really, my dear, it grieves one's heart to take off a great man. When I consider his personal bravery, his fine stratagems, how much we have already got by him, and how much more we may get, methinks I can't find in my heart to have a hand in his death: I wish you could have made Polly undertake it.

Mrs. P. But in case of necessity—our own lives are in danger.

Peach. Then, indeed, we must comply with the customs of the world, and make gratitude give way to interest: he shall be taken off.

Mrs. P. I'll undertake to manage Polly.

Peach. And I'll prepare matters for the Old Bailey. [Ereunt.]

Enter POLLY.

Polly. Now I'm a wretch indeed!—Methinks I see him already in the cart, sweeter and more lovely than the nosegay in his hand! I hear the crowd extolling his resolution and intrepidity!—I see him at the tree! the whole circle are in tears! What then will become of Polly? As yet I may inform him of their designs, and aid him in his escape.—It shall be so.—But then he flies, absents himself, and I bar myself from his dear, dear conversation! that too will distract me. If he keeps out of the way, my papa and mamma may in time relent, and we may be happy.—If he stays he is hanged, and then he is lost for ever! He intended to lie concealed in my room till the dusk of the evening. If they are abroad, I'll this instant let him out, lest some accident should prevent him. [Knocks.]

Enter MACHEATH.

DUET.—MACHEATH and POLLY.

Mac. Pretty Polly, say,
When I was away,
Did your fancy never stray
To some newer lover?

Polly. Without disguise,
Heaving sighs,
Doating eyes,
My constant heart discover.
Fondly let me loll!

Mac. O pretty, pretty Poll!

Polly. And are you as fond of me as ever, my dear?

Mac. Suspect my honour, my courage, suspect anything but my love. May my pistols miss fire, and my mare slip her shoulder, while I am pursued, if ever I forsake thee!

Polly. Nay, my dear, I have no reason to doubt you; for I find, in the romance you lent me, none of the great heroes were false in love.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

My heart was so free,
It roved like the bee,
Till Polly my passion requited;
I sipp'd each flower,
I changed every hour,
But here ev'ry flow'r is united.

Polly. Were you sentenced to transportation, sure, my dear, you could not leave me behind you—could you?

Mac. Is there any power, any force, that could tear me from thee? You might sooner tear a pension out of the hands of a courtier, a fee from a lawyer, a pretty woman from a looking-glass, or any woman from quadrille—but to tear me from thee is impossible!

DUET.—MACHEATH and POLLY.

Mac. Were I laid on Greenland's coast,
And in my arms embrac'd my lass,
Warm amidst eternal frost,
Too soon the half-year's night would pass.

Polly. Were I sold on Indian soil,
Soon as the burning day was clos'd,
I could mock the sultry toil,
When on my charmer's breast repos'd.

Mac. And I would love you all the day,

Polly. Every night would kiss and play

Mac. If with me you'd fondly stray

Polly. Over the hills and far away.

Polly. Yes, I would go with thee. But oh!—how shall I speak it? I must be torn from thee! We must part!

Mac. How! part?

Polly. We must, we must! My papa and mamma are set against thy life. They now, even now, are in search after thee: they are preparing evidence against thee; thy life depends upon a moment!

Mac. My hand, my heart, my dear, are so rivetted to thine, that I cannot unlose my hold!

Polly. But my papa may intercept thee, and then I should lose the very glimmering of hope. A few weeks, perhaps, may reconcile us all. Shall thy Polly hear from thee?

Mac. Must I then go?

Polly. And will not absence change your love?

Mac. If you doubt it, let me stay, and be hanged.
Polly. Oh, how I fear! how I tremble! Go; but, when safety will give you leave, you will be sure to see me again; for, till then, Polly is wretched.

DUET.—MACHEATH and POLLY.

Mac. The miser thus a shilling sees,
Which he's obliged to pay;
With sighs resigns it by degrees,
And fears 'tis gone for aye.

Polly. The boy thus, when his sparrow's flown,
The bird in silence eyes;
But soon as out of sight 'tis gone,
Whines, whimpers, sobs, and cries.

[Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—1 Tavern near Newgate.

JEMMY TWITCHER, CROOK-FINGERED JACK, WAT DREARY, ROBIN OF BAGSHOT, NIMMING NED, HARRY PADDINGTON, MAT-O'-THE MINT, BEN BUDGE, and the rest of the Gang, discovered at a table, with wine, brandy, and tobacco.

Ben. But pr'ythee, Mat, what is become of thy brother Tom? I have not seen him since my return from transportation.

Mat. Poor brother Tom had an accident, this time twelvemonth, and so clever a made fellow he was, I could not save him from those stealing rascals, the surgeons; and now, poor man, he is among the otamies, at Surgeon's-hall.

Ben. So, it seems, his time was come.

Jemmy. But the present time is our's, and nobody alive hath more. Why are the laws levelled at us? Are we more dishonest than the rest of mankind? What we win, gentlemen, is our own, by the law of arms, and the right of conquest.

Jack. Where shall we find such another set of practical philosophers; who, to a man, are above the fear of death?

Wat. Sound men and true!

Robin. Of tried courage, and indefatigable industry!

Ned. Who is there here that would not die for his friend?

Harry. Who is there here that would betray him for his interest?

Mat. Show me a gang of courtiers that can say as much. [All laugh.]

Ben. We are for a just partition of the world, for every man has a right to enjoy life.

Mat. We retrench the superfluities of mankind. The world is avaricious, and I hate avarice. A covetous fellow, like a jackdaw, steals what he was never made to enjoy, for the sake of hiding it. These are the robbers of mankind; for money was made for the free-hearted and generous: and where is the injury of taking from another what he hath not the heart to make use of? [All laugh.]

Jemmy. Our several stations for the day are fixed. Good luck attend us all! Fill the glasses.

AIR.—MAT.

Fill ev'ry glass, for wine inspires us,

And fires us,

With courage, love, and joy,

Women and wine should life employ;

Is there aught else on earth desirous?

Chorus. Fill ev'ry glass, &c.

Enter MACHEATH.

Mac. Gentlemen, well met: my heart hath been with you this hour, but an unexpected affair hath detained me. No ceremony, I beg you.

Mat. We were just breaking up, to go upon duty. Am I to have the honour of taking the air with you, sir, this evening upon the heath? I drink a dram, now and then, with the stage-coachmen, in the way of friendship and intelligence; and I know that, about this time, there will be passengers upon the western road, who are worth speaking with.

Mac. I was to have been of that party; but—

Mat. But what, sir?

Mac. Is there any one that suspects my courage?

Mat. We have all been witnesses of it.

Mac. My honour and truth to the gang?

Mat. I'll be answerable for it.

Mac. In the division of our booty, have I ever shewn the least marks of avarice or injustice?

Mat. By these questions, something seems to have ruffled you. Are any of us suspected?

Mac. I have a fixed confidence, gentlemen, in you all, as men of honour, and as such I value and respect you. Peachum is a man that is useful to us.

Mat. Is he about to shew us any foul play? I'll shoot him through the head.

All. And I.

Mac. I beg you, gentlemen, act with conduct and discretion. A pistol is your last resort.

Mat. He knows nothing of this meeting.

Mac. Business cannot go on without him: he is a man who knows the world, and is a necessary agent to us. We have had a slight difference; and till it is accommodated, I shall be obliged to keep out of his way. Any private dispute of mine shall be of no ill consequence to my friends. You must continue to act under his direction; for the moment we break loose from him, our gang is ruined.

Mat. He is, to us, of great convenience.

Mac. Make him believe I have quitted the gang.

All. How?

Mac. Which I never can do but with life. At our private quarters I will continue to meet you. A week, or so, will probably reconcile us.

Mat. Your instructions shall be observed. 'Tis now high time for us to repair to our several duties; so, till the evening, at our quarters, in Moorfields, we bid you farewell.

Mac. I shall wish myself with you. Success attend you. [Sits down melancholy at a table.]

AIR AND CHORUS.

MAT-O'-THE-MINT and Gang.

Let us take the road;

Hark! I hear the sound of coaches,

The hour of attack approaches,

To your arms, brave boys, and load.

See the ball I hold!

Let the chemists toil like asses,

Our fire their fire surpasses,

And turns all our lead to gold.

[The Gang, ranged in front of the stage, load their pistols, and stick them under their girdles; then go off, singing the first part in chorus.]

Mac. What a fool is a fond wench; Polly is most confoundedly bit. I love the sex; and a man who loves money might as well be contented with one guinea, as I with one woman. The town, perhaps, hath been as much obliged to me for recruiting it with free-hearted ladies, as to any recruiting officer in the army. If it were not for us, and the other gentlemen of the sword, Drury-lane would be uninhabited.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

If the heart of a man is depress'd with cares,
The mist is dispell'd when a woman appears;
Like the notes of a fiddle, she sweetly, sweetly,
Raises the spirits, and charms our ears.
Roses and lilies her cheeks disclose,
But her ripe lips are more sweet than those.

Press her,

Caress her,

With blisses,

Her kisses

Dissolve us in pleasure and soft repose.

I must have women; there is nothing unbends the mind like them: money is not so strong a cordial for the time. Drawer!

Enter Drawer.

Is the porter gone for all the ladies, according to my directions?

Drawer. I expect him back every minute; but you know, sir, you sent him as far as Hockley-in-the-hole for three of the ladies; for one in Vinegar-yard, and for the rest of them, somewhere about Lewkner's-lane. Sure some of them are below, for I hear the bar bell. As they come, I will shew them up. Coming! coming!

[Exit.]

Enter Mrs. COAXER, DOLLY TRULL, Mrs. VIXEN, BETTY DOXY, JENNY DIVER, Mrs. SLAMMERKIN, SUKEY TAWDRY, and MOLLY BRAZEN.

Mac. Dear Mrs. Coaxer, you are welcome; you look charmingly to-day: I hope you don't want the repairs of quality, and lay on paint. Dolly Trull, kiss me, you slut; you are always so taken up with stealing hearts, that you don't allow yourself time to steal any thing else. Ah, Dolly! thou wilt ever be a coquette. Mrs. Vixen, I'm your's; I always loved a woman of wit and spirit; they make charming mistresses, but plaguy wives. Betty Doxy! come hither, hussy: do you drink as hard as ever? You had better stick to good wholesome beer; for, in troth, Betty, strong waters will, in time, ruin your constitution; you should leave those to your betters. What, and my pretty Jenny Diver too! as prim and demure as ever: there is not any prude, though ever so high bred, hath a more sanctified look, with a more mischievous heart. Ah, thou art a dear, artful hypocrite! Mrs. Slammerkin! as careless and genteel as ever! All you fine ladies, who know your own beauty, affect an undress. But see, here's Sukey Tawdry come to contradict what I was saying. Molly Brazen! [She kisses him.] That's well done! I love a free-hearted wench: thou hast a most agreeable assurance, girl, and art as willing as a turtle.

AIR AND CHORUS.

MACHEATH and Ladies.

Youth's the season made for joys
Love is then our duty;
She alone who that employs,
Well deserves her beauty.
Let's be gay,
While we may,
Beauty's a flower despis'd in decay.

Chorus. Youth's the season, &c.

Let us drink and sport to-day,
Our's is not to-morrow;
Love with youth flies swift away,
Age is nought but sorrow.
Dance and sing,
Time's on the wing,
Life never knows the return of spring.

Chorus. Let us drink, &c.

Mac. Now, pray, ladies, take your places. Here, Drawer, bring us more wine. If any of the ladies choose gin, I hope they will be so free as to call for it.

Jenny. You look as if you meant me. Wine is strong enough for me. Indeed, sir, I never drink strong waters but when I have the cholick.

Mac. Just the excuse of the fine ladies: why a lady of quality is never without the cholick. I hope Mrs. Coaxer, you have had good success of late in your visits among the mercers.

Mrs. C. We have so many interlopers; yet, with industry, one may still have a little picking. If any woman hath more art than another, to be sure 'tis Jenny Diver.

Mac. Have done with your compliments, ladies, and drink about. You are not so fond of me, Jenny, as you used to be.

Jenny. 'Tis not convenient, sir, to shew my fondness among so many rivals. 'Tis your own choice, and not the warmth of my inclination, that will determine you. But, to be sure, sir, with so much good fortune as you have had upon the road, you must be grown immensely rich.

Mac. The reed, indeed, hath done me justice; but the gaming table hath been my ruin.

Jenny. A man of courage should never put anything to the risk but his life. These are the tools of a man of honour; [putting his pistols on the table] cards and dice are only fit for cowardly cheats, who prey upon their friends. [She takes up one of his pistols, SUKEY TAWDRY the other.]

Sukey. This, sir, is fitter for your hand. Besides your loss of money, 'tis a loss to the ladies. How fond could I be of you; but, before company 'tis ill-bred.

Mac. Wanton hussies!

Jenny. I must, and will, have a kiss to give my wine a zest. [They take him about the neck, and make signs to PEACHUM and Constables, who rush in upon him.]

Peach. I seize you, sir, as my prisoner.

Mac. Was this well done, Jenny? Women are decoy ducks. Who can trust them? Jades, jilts, furies!

Peach. Your case, Mr. Macheath, is not particular. The greatest heroes have been ruined by women.—But to do them justice, I must own they are a pretty sort of creatures, if we could trust them. You must now, sir, take your leave of the ladies; and, if they have a mind to make you a visit, they will be sure to find you at home. This gentleman, ladies, lodges in Newgate. Constables, wait upon the Captain to his lodgings.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

At the tree I shall suffer with pleasure,
At the tree I shall suffer with pleasure;
Let me go where I will,
In all kinds of ill,
I shall find no such furies as these are.

[Exit, guarded by PEACHUM and Constables.]

Mrs. V. Lookye, Mrs. Jenny; though Mr. Peachum may have made a private bargain with you and Sukey Tawdry, for betraying the Captain, as we were all assisting, we ought to share alike.

Jenny. As far as a bowl of punch, or a treat, I believe, Mrs. Sukey will join me; as for anything else, ladies, you cannot, in conscience, expect it.

Mrs. S. Dear madam! [Offering the pass to Mrs. VIXEN.]

Mrs. V. I wouldn't for the world.

Mrs. S. Nay, then I must stay here all night.

Mrs. V. Since you command me—

Mrs. S. [After having given way to Mrs. VIXEN, pushes her from the door.] Let your betters go before you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Newgate.

Enter LOCKIT, MACHEATH, and Constables.

Lockit. Noble Captain you are welcome! You have not been a lodger of mine this year and a half.

You know the custom, sir; garnish, Captain, garnish. Hand me down those fetters there. [Noise of chains behind.]

Mac. Those, Mr. Lockit seem to be the heaviest of the whole set. With your leave, I should like the further pair better.

Lockit. Lookye, Captain, we know what is fittest for our prisoners. When a gentleman uses me with civility, I always do the best I can to please him. Hand them down, I say! We have them of all prices, from one guinea to ten; and 'tis fitting every gentleman should please himself.

Mac. I understand you, sir. [Gives money.] The fees here are so many, and so exorbitant, that few fortunes can bear the expense of getting off handsomely, or of dying like a gentleman.

Lockit. Those, I see, will fit the Captain better. Take down the further pair.

Enter Turnkey with the chains.

Do but examine them, sir. Never was better work; how genteelly they are made! They will sit as easy as a glove, and the nicest man in England might not be ashamed to wear them. [He puts on the chains.] If I had the best gentleman in the land in my custody, I could not equip him more handsomely. And so, sir, I now leave you to your private meditations. [Exeunt LOCKIT and Turnkey.]

AIR.—MACHEATH.

Man may escape from rope and gun,

Nay, some have out-liv'd the doctor's pill;

Who takes a woman must be undone,

That basilisk is sure to kill.

The fly, that sips treacle, is lost in the sweets,

So he that tastes woman, woman, woman,

He that tastes woman, ruin meets.

To what a woeful plight have I brought myself! Here must I (all day long, till I am hanged,) be confined to hear the reproaches of a wench who lays her ruin at my door. I am in the custody of her father; and, to be sure, if he knows of the matter, I shall have a fine time on't betwixt this and my execution. But I promised the wench marriage. What signifies a promise to a woman? Does not man, in marriage itself, promise a hundred things that he never means to perform? Do all we can, women will believe us; for they look upon a promise as an excuse for following their own inclinations. But here comes Lucy, and I cannot get from her: 'would I were deaf!

Enter LUCY through the arch.

Lucy. You base man, you! how can you look me in the face, after what hath past between us! Oh, Macheath! thou hast robbed me of my quiet. To see thee tortured would give me pleasure.

AIR.—LUCY.

Thus, when a good housewife sees a rat,

In her trap in the morning taken,

With pleasure her heart goes pit-a-pat,

In revenge for her loss of bacon.

Then she throws him

To the dog or cat,

To be worried, crush'd, and shaken.

Mac. Have you notenderness, my dear Lucy! to see your husband in these circumstances?

Lucy. A husband!

Mac. In every respect but the form; and that, my dear, may be said over us at any time. Friends should not insist upon ceremonies. From a man of honour, his word is as good as his bond.

Lucy. It is the pleasure of all you fine men to insult the women you have ruined.

Mac. The very first opportunity, my dear but have patience, you shall be my wife in whatever manner you please.

Lucy. Insinuating monster! And so you think I know nothing of the affair of Miss Polly Peachum? I could tear thy eyes out.

Mac. Sure, Lucy, you can't be such a fool as to be jealous of Polly?

Lucy. Are you not married to her, you brute, you?

Mac. Married! very good. The wench gives it out only to vex thee, and to ruin me in thy good opinion. 'Tis true I go to the house, I chat with the girl, I say a thousand things to her, as all gentlemen do, that mean nothing, to divert myself; and now the silly jade has set it about that I am married to her. Indeed, my dear Lucy, those violent passions may be of ill consequence to a woman in your condition.

Lucy. Come, come, Captain, for all your assurance, you know that Miss Polly hath put it out of your power to do me the justice you promised me.

Mac. A jealous woman believes everything her passion suggests. To convince you of my sincerity, if we can find the ordinary, I shall have no scruples of making you my wife; and I know the consequence of having two at a time.

Lucy. That you are only to be hanged and so get rid of them both.

Mac. I am ready, my dear Lucy, to give you satisfaction; if you think there is any in marriage. What can a man of honour say more?

Lucy. So then, it seems you are not married to Miss Polly?

Mac. You know, Lucy, the girl is prodigiously conceited: no man can say a civil thing to her, but, like other fine ladies, her vanity makes her think he's her own for ever and ever.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

The first time at the looking-glass

The mother sets her daughter,

The image strikes the smiling lass

With self-love ever after.

Each time she looks, she, fonder grown,

Thinks every charm grows stronger;

But, alas, vain maid! all eyes but your own

Can see you are not younger.

When women consider their own beauties, they are all alike unreasonable in their demands; for they expect their lovers should like them as long as they like themselves.

Lucy. Yonder is my father; perhaps, this way we may light upon the ordinary, who shall try if you will be as good as your word; for I long to be made an honest woman. [Exeunt.]

Enter PEACHUM, and LOCKIT with an account book.

Lockit. In this last affair, brother Peachum, we are agreed. You have consented to go halves in Macheath.

Peach. We shall never fall out about an execution. But as to that article, pray how stands your last year's account?

Lockit. If you will run your eye over it, you'll find 'tis fairly and squarely stated.

Peach. This long arrear of the Government is very hard upon us. Can it be expected that we should hang our acquaintance for nothing, when our betters will hardly save their's without being paid for it? Unless the people in employment pay better,

I promise them for the future I shall let other rogues live beside their own.

Lockit. Perhaps, brother, they are afraid those matters may be carried too far. We are treated, too, by them with contempt, as if our profession were not reputable.

Peach. In one respect, indeed, our employment may be reckoned dishonest; because, like great statesmen, we encourage those who betray their friends.

Lockit. Such language, brother, anywhere else, might turn to your prejudice. Learn to be more guarded, I beg you.

AIR.—LOCKIT.

When you censure the age,
Be cautious and sage;
Lest the courtiers offended should be;
If you mention vice or bribe,
'Tis so pat to all the tribe,
Each cries—That was levell'd at me!

Peach. Here's poor Ned Clincher's name, I see. Sure, brother Lockit, there was a little unfair proceeding in Ned's case; for he told me, in the condemned hold, that, for value received, you had promised him a session or two longer without molestation.

Lockit. Mr. Peachum, this is the first time my honour was ever called in question.

Peach. Business is at an end, if once we act dishonourably.

Lockit. Who accuses me?

Peach. You are warm, brother

Lockit. He that attacks my honour, attacks my livelihood; and this usage—sir—is not to be borne.

Peach. Since you provoke me to speak, I must tell you too, that Mrs. Coaxer charges you with defrauding her of her information-money for the apprehending of curl-pated Hugh. Indeed, indeed, brother, we must punctually pay our spies, or we shall have no information.

Lockit. Is this language to me, sirrah! who have saved you from the gallows, sirrah! [Collaring each other.]

Peach. If I am hanged, it shall be for ridding the world of an arrant rascal.

Lockit. This hand shall do the office of the halter you deserve, and throttle you—you dog!

Peach. Brother, brother; we are both in the wrong; we shall be both losers in the dispute; for you know we have it in our power to hang each other. You should not be so passionate.

Lockit. Nor you so provoking.

Peach. 'Tis our mutual interest; 'tis for the interest of the world, we should agree. If I said anything, brother, to the prejudice of your character, I ask pardon.

Lockit. Brother Peachum, I can forgive as well as resent. Give me your hand. Suspicion does not become a friend.

Peach. I only meant to give you occasion to justify yourself. But I must now step home, for I expect the gentleman about this snuff-box that Filch nipped two nights ago in the park. I appointed him at this hour. [Exit.]

Enter LUCY.

Lockit. Whence come you, hussy?

Lucy. My tears might answer that question.

Lockit. You have been whimpering and fondling, like a spaniel over the fellow that hath abused you.

Lucy. One can't help love; one can't cure it. 'Tis not in my power to obey you and hate him.

Lockit. Learn to bear your husband's death like a reasonable woman. 'Tis not the fashion now-a-days so much as to affect sorrow upon these occasions. Act like a woman of spirit, hussy, and thank your father for what he is doing.

AIR.—LUCY.

Is then his fate decreed, sir?

Such a man can I think of quitting?

When first we met, so moves me yet,

Oh, see how my heart is splitting!

Lockit. Lookye, Lucy, there is no saving him; so I think you must even do like other widows, buy yourself weeds, and be cheerful.

AIR.—LOCKIT.

You'll think, ere many days ensue,

This sentence not severe;

I hang your husband, child, 'tis true,

But with him hang your care.

Twang dillo dee.

[Exit.]

Enter MACHEATH.

Lucy. Though the ordinary was out of the way to-day, I hope, my dear, you will, upon the first opportunity, quiet my scruples. Oh, sir! my father's hard heart is not to be softened, and I am in the utmost despair.

Mac. But if I could raise a small sum—would not twenty guineas, think you, move him? Of all the arguments in the way of business, the perquisite is the most prevailing. Money well-timed, and properly applied, will do anything.

Lucy. What love or money can do shall be done; for all my comfort depends upon your safety.

Enter POLLY.

Polly. Where is my dear husband? Was a rope ever intended for this neck? Why dost thou turn away from me? 'tis thy Polly; 'tis thy wife.

Mac. Was ever such an unfortunate rascal as I am?

Lucy. Was there ever such another villain!

Polly. Oh, Macheath! was it for this we parted? Taken! imprisoned! tried! hanged! Cruel reflection! I'll stay with thee till death: no force shall tear thy dear wife from thee now. What means my love? Not one kind word! not one kind look! Think what thy Polly suffers, to see thee in this condition!

Mac. I must disown her. [Aside.] The wench is distracted!

Lucy. Am I then bilked of my virtue? Can I have no reparation? Sure men were born to lie, and women to believe them! Oh villain villain!

Polly. Am I not thy wife? Thy neglect of me, thy aversion to me, too severely proves it. Look on me. Tell me, am I not thy wife?

Lucy. Perfidious wretch!

Polly. Barbarous husband!

Lucy. Hadst thou been hanged five months ago, I had been happy.

Polly. If you had been kind to me till death, it would not have vexed me.

Lucy. Art thou, then, married to another? Hast thou two wives, monster?

Mac. If woman's tongue can cease for an answer? hear me.

Lucy. I won't. Flesh and blood can't bear my usage.

Polly. Shall not I claim my own? Justice bids me speak.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

How bappy could I be with either,
 Were t'other dear charmer away;
 But while ye thus teaze me together,
 To neither a word will I say;
 But toll de roll, &c.

[Throws himself carelessly on the table]

Polly. Sure, my dear, there ought to be some preference shown to a wife; at least she may claim the appearance of it. He must be distracted with misfortunes, or he could not use me thus. [Aside.]

Lucy. Oh, villain! villain! thou hast deceived me: I could even inform against thee with pleasure. Not a prude wishes more heartily to have facts against her intimate acquaintance, than I now wish to have facts against thee. I would have her satisfaction, and they should all out.

DUETT.—POLLY and LUCY.

Polly. I'm bubbled.

Lucy. I'm bubbled.

Polly. Oh, how I'm troubled!

Lucy. Bamboozled and bit.

Polly. My distresses are doubled.

Lucy. When you come to the tree, should the hangman refuse,
 These fingers with pleasure could fasten the noose.

Polly. I'm bubbled, &c.

Mac. Be pacified, my dear Lucy; this is all a fetch of Polly's, to make me desperate with you, in case I get off. If I am hanged, she would fain have the credit of being thought my widow. Really, Polly, this is no time for a dispute of this sort; for whenever you are talking of marriage, I am thinking of hanging.

Polly. And hast thou the art to persist in disowning me?

Mac. And hast thou the heart to persist in persuading me that I am married? Why, Polly, dost thou seek to aggravate my misfortunes?

Lucy. Really Miss Peachum, you do but expose yourself; besides, 'tis barbarous in you to worry a gentleman in his circumstances, Miss Polly.

AIR.—POLLY.

Cease your funning:

Force or cunning

Never shall my heart trepan;

All these sallies

Are but malice,

To seduce my constant man.

'Tis most certain,

By their flirting,

Women oft have envy shown;

Pleased to ruin

Other's wooing,

Never happy in their own.

Decency, madam, methinks might teach you to behave yourself with some reserve to the husband, while his wife is present.

Mac. But, seriously, Polly, this is carrying the joke a little too far.

Lucy. If you are determined, madam, to raise a disturbance in the prison, I shall be obliged to send for the turnkey, to show you the door. I am sorry, madam, you force me to be so ill-bred, madam.

Polly. Give me leave to tell you, madam, these forward airs don't become you in the least, madam; and my duty, madam, obliges me to stay with my husband, madam.

DUETT.—LUCY and POLLY.

Lucy. Why, how now, madam Flirt?

If you thus must chatter,

And are for flinging dirt,

Let's try who best can spatter.

Madam Flirt!

Polly. Why, how now, saucy jade?

Sure, the wench is tipsy,

How can you see me made [To him.

The scoff of such a gipsy?

Saucy jade! [To her.

Enter PEACHUM.

Peach. Where's my wench? Ah, hussy, hussy! Come home, you slut! and when your fellow is hanged, hang yourself, to make your family some amends.

Polly. Dear, dear father! do not tear me from him. I must speak; I have more to say to him. Oh! twist thy fetters about me, that he may not haul me from thee.

Peach. Sure, all women are alike; if ever they commit one folly, they are sure to commit another, by exposing themselves. Away; not a word more. You are my prisoner, now, hussy.

AIR.—POLLY.

No pow'r on earth can e'er divide

The knot that sacred love hath tied;

When parents draw against our mind,

The true love's knot they faster bind.

Oh, oh, ray, oh, Amborah. Oh, oh, &c.

[Holding MACHEATH, PEACHUM pulling her.

[Exit PEACH. and POLLY. LUCY seats herself.

Mac. I am naturally compassionate, wife, so that I could not use the wench as she deserved, which made you at first, suspect there was something in what she said.

Lucy. Indeed, my dear, I was strangely puzzled.

Mac. If that had been the case, her father would never have brought me into this circumstance. No, Lucy, I had rather die than be false to thee.

Lucy. How happy am I, if you say this from your heart; for I love thee so, that I could sooner bear to see thee hanged than in the arms of another.

Mac. But couldst thou bear to see me hanged?

Lucy. Oh, Macheath! I could never live to see that day.

Mac. You see, Lucy, in the account of love, you are in my debt. Make me, if possible, love thee more; and let me owe my life to thee. If you refuse to assist me, Peachum and your father will immediately put me beyond all means of escape.

Lucy. My father, I know, hath been drinking hard with the prisoners, and I fancy he is now taking his nap in his own room; if I can procure the keys, shall I go off with thee, my dear?

Mac. If we are together, 'twill be impossible to lie concealed. As soon as the search begins to be a little cool, I will send to thee; till then, my heart is thy prisoner.

Lucy. Come then, my dear husband, owe thy life to me; and though you love me not, be grateful. But that Polly runs in my head strangely.

Mac. A moment of time may make us unhappy for ever.

AIR.—LUCY.

I like the fox shall grieve,

Whose mate hath left her side;

Whom hounds from morn to eve,

Chase o'er the country wide.

Where can my lover hide?
Where cheat the weary pack?
If love be not his guide,
He never will come back.

[Ereunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Newgate.

Enter LUCY and LOCKIT.

Lockit. To be sure, wench, you must have been aiding and abetting to help him to this escape!

Lucy. Sir, here hath been Peachum and his daughter Polly; and, to be sure, they know the ways of Newgate as well as if they had been born and bred in the place all their lives. Why must all your suspicion light upon me?

Lockit. Lucy, Lucy, I will have none of these shuffling answers.

Lucy. Well then, if I know anything of him, I wish I may be burned.

Lockit. Keep your temper, Lucy, or I shall pronounce you guilty.

Lucy. Keep your's sir; I do wish I may be burned, I do; and what can I say more to convince you?

Lockit. Did he tip handsomely? How much did he come down with? Come, hussy, don't cheat your father, and I shall not be angry with you. Perhaps you have made a better bargain with him than I could have done. How much, my good girl?

Lucy. You know, sir, I am fond of him, and would have given money to have kept him with me.

Lockit. Ah, Lucy! thy education might have put thee more upon thy guard: for a girl, in the bar of an alehouse, is always besieged.

Lucy. If you can forgive me, sir, I will make a fair confession; for, to be sure, he hath been a most barbarous villain to me.

Lockit. And so you have let him escape, hussy, have you?

Lucy. When a woman loves, a kind look, a tender word, can persuade her to anything, and I could ask no other bribe. Notwithstanding all he swore, I am now fully convinced, that Polly Peachum is actually his wife. Did I let him escape, fool that I was, to go to her? Polly will wheedle herself into his money; and then Peachum will hang him, and cheat us both.

Lockit. So I am to be ruined, because, forsooth, you must be in love! A very pretty excuse.

Lucy. I gave him his life, and that creature enjoys the sweets of it. Ungrateful Macheath!

AIR.—LUCY.

My love is all madness and folly;

Alone I lie,

Toss, tumble, and cry,

What a happy creature is Polly!

Was e'er such a wretch as I?

With rage I reddened like scarlet,

That my dear inconstant varlet,

Stark blind to my charms,

Is lost in the arms

Of that jilt, that inveigling harlot!

Stark blind to my charms,

Is lost in the arms

Of that jilt, that inveigling harlot!

This, this my resentment alarms.

Lockit. And so, after all this mischief, I must stay here to be entertained with your caterwauling, Mistress Puss? Out of my sight, wanton strumpet! You shall fast and mortify yourself into reason, with, now and then, a little handsome discipline, to bring you to your senses. Go! [Exit LUCY.] Peachum, then, intends to outwit me in this affair, but I'll be even with him. The dog is leaky in his liquor, so I'll ply him that way, get the secret from him, and turn this affair to my own advantage. Lucy!

Enter LUCY.

Are there any of Peachum's people now in the house?

Lucy. Filch, sir, is drinking a quartern of strong waters, in the next room, with Black Moll.

Lockit. Bid him come to me.

[Exit LUCY.]

Enter FILCH.

Why, boy, thou lookest as if thou wert half starved; like a shotten herring. But, boy, canst thou tell me where thy master is to be found?

Filch. At his lock, sir, at the Crooked Billet.

Lockit. Very well; I have nothing more with you. [Exit FILCH.] I'll go to him there, for I have many important affairs to settle with him, and in the way of those transactions, I'll artfully get into his secret; so that Macheath shall not remain a day longer out of my clutches.

[Exit.]

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Jealousy, rage, love, and fear, are at once tearing me to pieces. How am I weather-beaten and shattered with distress!

AIR.—LUCY.

I'm like a skiff on the ocean tost,

Now high, now low, with each billow borne.

With her rudder broke, and her anchor lost,

Deserted and all forlorn.

While thus I lie lolling and tossing all night,

That Polly lies sporting on seas of delight!

Revenge, revenge, revenge,

Shall appease my restless sprite.

I have the ratsbane ready. But say I were to be hanged, I never could be hanged for anything that would give me greater comfort than the poisoning that slut.

Enter FILCH.

Filch. Madam, here's Miss Polly come to wait upon you.

Lucy. Shew her in.

[Exit FILCH.]

Enter POLLY.

Dear madam, your servant. I hope you will pardon my passion when I was so happy to see you last. I was so overrun with the spleen, that I was perfectly out of myself; and really when one hath the spleen, everything is to be excused by a friend.

AIR.—LUCY.

When a wife's in the pout,

(As she's sometimes, no doubt,)

The good husband, as meek as a lamb,

Her vapours to still,

First grants her will,

And the quieting draught is a dram;

Poor man! and the quieting draught is a dram.

I wish all our quarrels might have so comfortable a reconciliation.

Polly. I have no excuse for my own behaviour, madam, but my misfortunes; and really, madam, I suffer too upon your account.

Lucy. But, Miss Polly; in the way of friendship, will you give me leave to propose a glass of cordial to you?

Polly. Strong waters are apt to give me the head-ache. I hope, madam, you will excuse me.

Lucy. Not the greatest lady in the land could have better in her closet for her own private drinking. You seem mighty low in spirits, my dear.

Polly. I am sorry, madam, my health will not allow me to accept of your offer: I should not have left you in the rude manner I did, when we met last, madam, had not my papa hauled me away so unexpectedly. I was indeed somewhat provoked, and perhaps might use some expressions that were disrespectful; but really, madam, the Captain treated me with so much contempt and cruelty, that I deserved your pity rather than your resentment.

Lucy. But since his escape, no doubt, all matters are made up again. Ah! Polly, Polly! 'tis I am the unhappy wife, and he loves you as if you were only his mistress.

Polly. Sure, madam, you cannot think me so happy as to be the object of your jealousy! A man is always afraid of a woman who loves him too well; so that I must expect to be neglected and avoided.

Lucy. Then our cases, my dear Polly, are exactly alike; both of us, indeed, have been too fond. Indeed, my dear Polly, we are both of us a cup too low; let me prevail upon you to accept of my offer.

AIR.—LUCY.

Come, sweet lass,
Let's banish sorrow
Till to-morrow;
Come, sweet lass,
Let's take a chirping glass.
Wine can clear
The vapours of despair,
And make us light as air;
Then drink and banish care.

I can't bear, child, to see you in such low spirits; and I must persuade you to what I know will do you good. [Exit.]

Polly. All this wheedling of Lucy can't be for nothing—at this time too, when I know she hates me! The dissembling of a woman is always the forerunner of mischief. By pouring strong waters down my throat, she thinks to pump some secrets out of me: I'll be upon my guard, and won't taste a drop of her liquor, I'm resolved.

Re-enter Lucy, with strong waters.

Lucy. Come, Miss Polly.

Polly. Indeed, child, you have given yourself trouble to no purpose; you must, my dear, excuse me.

Lucy. Really, Miss Polly, you are as squeamishly affected about taking a cup of strong waters as a lady before company.

Polly. What do I see? Macheath again in custody! Now every glimmering of happiness is lost!

[Drops the glass of liquor on the ground.]

Enter Lockit, MACHEATH, PEACHUM, and Constables.

Lockit. Set your heart at rest, Captain: you have neither the chance of love or money for another escape, for you are ordered to be called down upon your trial immediately.

Peach. Away, hussies! This is not a time for a man to be hampered with his wives; you see the gentleman is in chains already.

Lucy. Oh, husband, husband! my heart longed to see thee; but to see thee thus distracts me!

Polly. Will not my dear husband look upon his Polly? why hadst thou not flown to me for protection? With me thou hadst been safe.

DUET.—POLLY and LUCY.

Polly. Hither, dear husband, turn your eyes!

Lucy. Bestow one glance to cheer me!

Polly. Think, with that look, thy Polly dies.

Lucy. -Oh, shun me not, but hear me!

Polly. 'Tis Polly sues.

Lucy. 'Tis Lucy speaks.

Polly. Is thus true love requited?

Lucy. My heart is bursting!

Polly. Mine too, breaks!

Lucy. Must I—

Polly. Must I be slighted?

Mac. What would you have me say, ladies? You see the affair will soon be at an end, without my disobliging either of you.

Peach. But the settling of this point, Captain, might prevent a lawsuit between your two ladies.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

Which way shall I turn me? how can I decide?

Wives, the day of your death, are as fond as a bride.

One wife's too much for most husbands to hear,

But two at a time, there's no mortal can bear!

This way, and that way, and which way I will,

What would comfort the one, t'other wife would take ill!

Polly. But if his own misfortunes have made him insensible to mine, a father, sure, will be more compassionate. Dear, dear sir! sink the material evidence, and bring him off at his trial. Polly, upon her knees, begs it of you.

AIR.—POLLY.

When my hero in court appears,

And stands arraign'd for his life,

Then think of poor Polly's tears,

For ah! poor Polly's his wife.

Like the sailor, he holds up his hand,

Distress'd on the dashing wave;

To die a dry death at land

Is as bad as a watery grave.

And alas, poor Polly!

Alack, and well-a-day!

Before I was in love,

Oh, ev'ry month was May!

Peach. Set your heart at rest, Polly; your husband is to die to-day; therefore, if you are not already provided, 'tis high time to look about for another. There's comfort for you, you slut!

Lockit. We are ready, sir, to conduct you to the Old Bailey.

AIR.—MACHEATH.

The charge is prepared, the lawyers are met,

The judges all ranged; a terrible show!

I go undismayed, for death is a debt—

A debt on demand, so take what I owe.

Then, farewell, my love; dear charmers, adieu!

Contented I die; 'tis the better for you.

Here ends all dispute, for the rest of our lives;

For this way, at once, I please all my wives.

Now, gentlemen, I am ready to attend you.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another part of the Prison.

Dance of Prisoners in fetters.

SCENE III.—The Condemned Hold

MACHEATH in a melancholy posture.

MEDLEY.

Oh, cruel, cruel, cruel case!

Must I suffer this disgrace?

Of all the friends in time of grief,
When threat'ning death looks grimmer,
Not one so sure can bring relief,
As this best friend, a brimmer.

Since I must swing, I scorn,—I scorn to wince or whine : [Drinks. Rises.]

But now again my spirits sink,
I'll raise them high with wine. [Drinks.]

But valour the stronger grows,
The stronger liquor we're drinking ;

And how can we feel our woes,
When we've lost the trouble of thinking ?

If thus a man can die,
Much bolder with brandy.

[Pours out a bumper of brandy.]

So I drink off this bumper ; and now I can stand the test,

And my comrades shall see that I die as brave as the best. [Drinks.]

But can I leave my pretty hussies
Without one tear or tender sigh ?
Their eyes, their lips, their busses,
Recall my love :—Ah ! must I die ?

Since laws were made for every degree,
To curb vice in others, as well as in me,
I wonder we ha'n't better company

Upon Tyburn tree.

But gold from law can take out the sting ;
And if rich men, like us, were to swing,
'Twould thin the land, such numbers to string
Upon Tyburn tree.

Enter Gaoler.

Gaoler. Some friends of your's, Captain, desire to be admitted : I leave you together.

Enter BEN BUDGE, and MAT-O'-THE-MINT ; the Gaoler searches them, and exit.

Mac. For having broke prison, you see, gentlemen, I am ordered for immediate execution. The sheriff's officers, I believe, are now at the door.
That Jemmy Twitcher should 'peach me, I own, surprised me. 'Tis a plain proof that the world is all alike, and that even our gang can no more trust one another than other people ; therefore, I beg you, gentlemen, to look well to yourselves ; for, in all probability, you may live some months longer.

Mat. We are all heartily sorry, Captain, for your misfortune ; but 'tis what we must all come to.

Mac. Peachum and Lockit, you know, are infamous scoundrels ; their lives are as much in your power, as your's are in their's. Remember your dying friend ;—'tis my last request : bring those villains to the gallows before you, and I am satisfied.

Mat. We'll do it.

Re-enter Gaoler.

Gaoler. Miss Polly and Miss Lucy entreat a word with you. [Exit.]

Mac. Gentlemen, adieu !

[Ereunt BEN BUDGE and MAT-O'-THE MINT.]

Enter LUCY and POLLY.

Mac. My dear Lucy ! my dear Polly ! whatsoever hath passed between us is now at an end.

TRIO.—LUCY, POLLY, and MACHEATH.

Lucy. Would I might be hang'd !

Polly. And I would so too.

Lucy. To be hang'd with you.

Polly. My dear, with you.

Mac. Oh, leave me, thought ! I fear—I doubt !

I tremble—I droop ! See ! my courage is out.

[Turns up the empty bottle.]

Lucy. No token of love ?

Mac. See ! my courage is out.

[Turns up the empty bottle.]

Lucy. No token of love ?

Polly. Adieu !

Farewell !

Mac. But hark ! I hear the toll of the bell.

Re-enter Gaoler.

Gaoler. Four women more, Captain, with a child a-piece.

Mac. Tell the sheriff's officers I am ready.

[Ereunt.]

Mob. [Within.] A reprieve ! a reprieve !

Re-enter MACHEATH, POLLY, LUCY, &c.

Mac. Look you, ladies, we will have no controversy now,—and, ladies, I hope you will give me leave to present a partner to each of you ; and, for this time, I take Polly for mine ;—and for life, you slut, for we are really married.

FINALE.

Thus I stand like the Turk, with his doxies around,
From all sides their glances his passion confound ;
For black, brown, and fair, his inconstancy burns,
And the different beauties subdue him by turns :
Each calls forth her charms, to provoke his desires,
Though willing to all, with but one he retires ;
But think of this maxim, and put off all sorrow,
The wretch of to-day may be happy to-morrow.

CHORUS.

Then think of this maxim, and cast away sorrow,
The wretch of to-day may be happy to-morrow.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Dornton's House.

Enter MR. DORNTON.

Dor. Past two o'clock, and not yet returned—
Well, well,—it's my own fault!—Mr. Smith!

Enter MR. SMITH.

Mr. S. Sir.

Dor. Is Mr. Sulky come in?

Mr. S. No, sir.

Dor. Are you sure Harry Dornton said he should return to night?

Mr. S. Yes, sir.

Dor. And you don't know where he is gone?

Mr. S. He did not tell me, sir.

Dor. I ask you if you know.

Mr. S. I believe to Newmarket, sir.

Dor. You always believe the worst!—I'll sit up no longer.—Tell the servants to go to bed. And,
do you hear? should he apply to you for money,
don't let him have a guinea.

Mr. S. Very well, sir.

Dor. I have done with him; he is henceforth no son of mine! Let him starve!

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 43 & 44.

Mr. S. He acts very improperly, sir, indeed.

Dor. Improperly! How? [Taking SMITH's hand.] What does he do?

Mr. S. Sir!

Dor. Have you heard anything of—

Mr. S. No—no, sir—Nothing—nothing but what you yourself tell me.

Dor. Then how do you know he has acted improperly?

Mr. S. He is certainly a very good-hearted young gentleman, sir.

Dor. Good-hearted! How dare you make such an assertion?

Mr. S. Sir!

Dor. How dare you, Mr. Smith, insult me so?
Is not his gaming notorious; his racing, driving, riding, and associating with knaves, fools, de-bauchees, and blacklegs?

Mr. S. Upon my word, sir, I—

Dor. Upon your word. But it's over! His name has this very day been struck out of the firm! Let his drafts be returned. It's all ended! And, observe, not a guinea! If you lend him any yourself, I'll not pay you. I'll no longer be a fond doating father. Therefore, take warning! Take warning, I say! Be his distress what it will, not a guinea!
Though you should hereafter see him begging, starving in the streets, not so much as the loan of a single guinea.

*Mr. S. I shall be careful to observe your orders,
sir.*

Dor. Sir! Why, would you see him starve?
Would you see him starve, and not lend him a guinea? Would you, sir! Would you?

Mr. S. Sir! Certainly not, except in obedience to your orders.

Dor. And could any orders justify your seeing a poor unfortunate youth, rejected by his father, abandoned by his friends, starving to death?

Mr. S. There is no danger of that, sir.

Dor. I tell you the thing shall happen! He shall starve to death! I'll never look on him more as a son of mine! And I'm very certain, when I have forsaken him, all the world will forsake him, too.
[Weeps.] Yes, yes! he is born to be a poor wretched outcast.

Mr. S. I hope, sir, he still will make a fine man.

Dor. Will! there is not a finer, handsomer, nobler-looking youth in the kingdom; no, not in the world!

Mr. S. I mean, a worthy man, sir.

Dor. How can you mean any such thing? The company he keeps would corrupt a saint.

Mr. S. Sir, if you will only tell me what your pleasure is, I will endeavour to act like a faithful servant.

Dor. I know you are a faithful servant, Mr. Smith. [Takes his hand] I know you are —But you —you are not a father.

Enter Mr. SULKY.—Exit Mr. SMITH.

Dor. Well, Mr. Sulky, have you heard anything of him?

Sul. Yes.

Dor. And, hey! —Anything consoling—anything good?

Sul. No.

Dor. No? —No, say you! —Where is he? What is he about?

Sul. I don't know.

Dor. Don't? —You love to torture me, sir! —You love to torture me.

Sul. Humph!

Dor. For heaven's sake, tell me what you have heard!

Sul. I love to torture you.

Dor. Put me out of my pain! If you are not a tiger, put me out of my pain!

Sul. [Slowly drawing a newspaper out of his pocket.] There; read!

Dor. Dead?

Sul. Worse.

Dor. Mercy defend me! where? what?

Sul. The first paragraph in the postscript: the beginning line in capitals.

Dor. [Reads.] "The junior partner of the great banking house not a mile from the Post-office, has again been touched at Newmarket, for upwards of ten thousand pounds." —It can't be!

Sul. Humph!

Dor. Why, can it?

Sul. Yes.

Dor. How do you know? What proof have you that it is not a lie?

Sul. His own hand-writing.

Dor. How?

Sul. Bills at three days' sight to the full amount have already been presented.

Dor. And accepted?

Sul. Yes.

Dor. But—why—were you mad, Mr. Sulky? Were you mad?

Sul. I soon shall be.

Dor. Is not his name struck off the firm?

Sul. They were dated two days before.

Dor. The credit of my house begins to totter!

Sul. Well it may!

Dor. What the effect of such a paragraph may be, I cannot tell.

Sul. I can:—Ruin.

Dor. Are you serious, sir?

Sul. I am not inclined to laugh.—A run against the house, stoppage, disgrace, bankruptcy.

Dor. Really, Mr. Sulky, you—

Sul. Yes. I know I offend. I was bred in your house, you used me tenderly, I served you faithfully, and you admitted me a partner. Don't think I care for myself. No, I can sit at the desk again. But you! You! first man of the first commercial city on earth, your name in the Gazette! Were it mine only, I would laugh at it. What am I? who cares for me?

Dor. Where is the vile! —[Calling.] —Mr. Smith —Thomas—William!

Enter Mr. SMITH.

Call all the servants together, Mr. Smith; clerks, footmen, maids, every soul! Tell them their young master is a scoundrel.

Mr. S. Very well, sir.

Dor. Sir? Bid them shut the door in his face! I'll turn the first away that lets him set his foot in this house ever again!

Mr. S. Very well, sir.

Dor. Very well, sir? Damn your very well, sir! I tell you it is not very well, sir. He shall starve, die, rot in the street! Is that very well, sir?

[Exeunt DORNTON and SMITH.]

Sul. He has a noble heart. A fond father's heart. The boy was a fine youth; but he spoiled him; and now he quarrels with himself and all the world, because he hates his own folly. [A knocking at the door.] So! here is the youth returned.

[Knocking again.—Exit

Enter DORNTON, with Servants.

Dor. Don't stir! —On your lives, don't go to the door! Are the bolts and locks all fastened?

Servants. All, sir.

Dor. Don't mind his knocking! Go to bed, every soul of you, instantly, and fall fast asleep! He shall starve in the streets! [Knocking again.] Fetch me my blunderbuss! Make haste! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter HARRY DORNTON, MILFORD, and Postilions.

Pos. We smoked along, your honour!

Har. [Knocks at door.] I know you did. Had you been less free with your whip, you would have been a crown the richer. Your next step should be to turn drummers, and handle the cat-o'-nine-tails.

Pos. It is very late, your honour.

Har. Begone! I'll give you no more.

[Knocks.—Exeunt Postilions.]

Dor. [At the window over him, with Mr. SULKY, throwing up the sash and presenting the blunderbuss.] Knock again, you scoundrel, and you shall have the full contents loaded to the muzzle, rascal!

Har. So! I suspected dad was in his tantrums.

Mil. You have given him some cause.

Har. Very true. [To his father.] Consider, my dear sir, the consequences of lying out all night!

Dor. Begone, villain!

Har. Bad women, sir; damps, night airs!

Dor. Will you begone?

Har. Watch-houses, pickpockets, cutthroats!

Sul. Come, come, sir. [Shutting the window.]

Mil. We shall not get in.

Har. Pshaw! how little do you know of my father. The door will open in less than fifteen seconds.

Mil. Done, for a hundred!

Har. Done, done! [Take out their watches—the door opens.] I knew you were had; double or quits, we find the cloth laid, and supper on the table.

Mil. No, it won't do. [Exeunt into the house]

SCENE III.—Dornton's House.

Enter HARRY DORNTON, MILFORD, and a Footman

Foot. My old master is in a bitter passion, sir.

Har. I know it.

Foot. He is gone down to turn the servant out of doors that let you in.

Har. Is he? Then go you and let your fellow servant in again.

Foot. I dare not, sir.

Har. Then I must.

[Exit.

Foot. He enquired who was with my young master.

Mil. Well!

Foot. And when he heard it was you, sir, he was ten times more furious.

[Exit.

Re-enter HARRY DORNTON.

Har. All's well that ends well. This has been a cursed long voyage, Milford!

Mil. I am a hundred and fifty in.

Har. And I ten thousand out.

Mil. I believe I had better avoid your father for the present.

Har. I think you had. Dad considers you as my tempter; the cause of my ruin.

Mil. And I being in his debt, he conceives he may treat me without ceremony.

Har. Nay, damn it, Jack, do him justice: it is not the money you had of him, but the ill advice he imputes to you, that galls him.

Mil. I hear he threatens to arrest me.

Har. Yes! he has threatened to strike my name out of the firm, and disinherit me, a thousand times?

Mil. Oh, but he has been very serious in menacing me.

Har. And me too.

Mil. You'll be at the tennis-court to-morrow?

Har. No.

Mil. What, not to see the grand match?

Har. No.

Mil. Oh yes, you will.

Har. No; I am determined.

Mil. Yes, over night; you'll waver in the morning.

Har. No. It is high time, Jack, to grow prudent.

Mil. Ha, ha, ha! My plan is formed: I'll soon be out of debt.

Har. How will you get the money?

Mil. By calculation.

Har. Ha, ha, ha!

Mil. I am resolved on it. How many men of rank and honour, having lost their fortunes, have doubly recovered them!

Har. And very honourably!

Mil. Who doubts it?

Har. Ha, ha, ha! Nobody! nobody!

Mil. But pray, Harry, what is it you find so attractive in my late father's amorous relict?

Har. Ha, ha, ha! What, the Widow Warren?

Mil. She seems to think, and even reports, you are to marry her!

[Both sit at a table.

Har. Marry? Her? A coquette of forty, who ridiculously apes all the airs of a girl! Fantastic, selfish, and a fool! And marry? Disgusting idea! Thou wert philosophising, as we drove, on the condition of a post-horse—

Mil. Well?

Har. I would rather be a post-horse,—nay, the brute that drives a post-horse, than the base thing thou hast imagined!

[Rises.

Mil. Then why are you so often there?

[Rises.

Har. Because I can't keep away.

Mil. What, is it her daughter, Sophia?

Har. Lovely, bewitching innocent!

Mil. The poor young thing is fond of you?

Har. I should be half mad if I thought she was not; yet am obliged to half hope she is not.

Mil. Why?

Har. What a question! Am I not a profligate, and in all probability ruined? Not even my father can overlook this last affair! No! heigho!

Mil. The loss of my father's will, and the mystery made of its contents by those who witnessed it, are strange circumstances!

Har. In which the widow triumphs. And you, being a bastard, and left by the law to starve, she willingly pays obedience to laws so wise.

Mil. She refuses even to pay my debts.

Har. And the worthy alderman, your father, being overtaken by death in the south of France, carefully makes a will, and then as carefully hides it where it is not to be found; or commits it to the custody of some mercenary knave, who has made his market of it to the widow. So! here comes the supposed executor of this supposed will.

Enter Mr. SULKY.

My dear Mr. Sulky, how do you do?

Sul. Very ill.

Har. Indeed? I am very sorry! What's your disorder?

Sul. You.

Har. Ha, ha, ha!

Sul. Ruin, bankruptcy, infamy!

Har. The old story!

Sul. To a new tune.

Har. Ha, ha, ha!

Sul. You are—

Har. What, my good cynic?

Sul. A fashionable gentleman.

Har. I know it.

Sul. And fashionably ruined.

Har. No;—I have a father.

Sul. Who is ruined likewise.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! Is the Bank of England ruined?

Sul. I say, ruined. [MILFORD walks about.]

Nothing less than a miracle can save the house. The purse of Fortunatus could not supply you.

Har. No; it held nothing but guineas. Notes, bills, paper for me!

Sul. Such effrontery is insufferable. For these five years, sir, you have been driving to ruin more furiously than—

Har. An ambassador's coach on a birth-night. I saw you were stammering for a simile.

Sul. Sir!

Har. Youth mounts the box, seizes the reins, and Jehu headlong on in the dark; passion and prodigality blaze in the front, bewilder the coachman, and dazzle and blind the passengers; wisdom, prudence, and virtue are overset and maimed or murdered; and at last, repentance, like the footman's flambeau lagging behind, lights us to dangers when they are past all remedy.

Sul. Your name is struck off the firm. I was the adviser.

Har. You were very kind, Mr. Sulky.

Sul. Your father is at last determined.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! Do you think so?

Sul. You'll find so! And what brought you here, sir?

[To MILFORD.

Mil. A chaise and four.

Sul. It might have carried you to a safer place. When do you mean to pay your debts?

Mil. When my father's executor prevails on the Widow Warren to do me justice.

[HARRY sits.

Sul. And which way am I to prevail?

Mil. And which way am I to pay my debts?

Sul. You might have more modesty than insolently to come and brave one of your principal creditors, after having ruined his son by your evil counsel.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! Don't believe a word on't, my good-grumbler: I ruined myself: I wanted no counsellor.

Mil. My father died immensely rich; and, though I am what the law calls illegitimate, I ought not to starve.

Sul. You have had five thousand pounds, and are five more in debt.

Mil. Yes; thanks to those who trust boys with thousands.

Sul. You would do the same now that you think yourself a man.

Mil. Indeed, I would not.

Sul. Had you been watching the widow at home, instead of galloping after a knot of gamblers and pick-pockets, you might perhaps have done yourself more service.

Mil. Which way, sir?

Sul. The will of your late father is found!

Mil. Found?

Sul. I have received a letter, from which I learn it was at last discovered, carefully locked up in a private drawer; and that it is now a full month since a gentleman of Montpellier, coming to England, was entrusted with it. But no such gentleman has yet appeared.

Mil. If it should have got into the hands of the widow—

Sul. Which I suspect it has! You are a couple of pretty gentlemen! But beware! misfortune is at your heels! Mr. Dornnton vows vengeance on you both, and justly. He is not gone to bed; and, if you have confidence enough to look him in the face, I would have you stay where you are.

Mil. I neither wish to insult, nor be insulted.

[Exit.]

Sul. [Retiring to the table.] Do you know, sir, your father turned the poor fellow into the street, who compassionately opened the door for you?

Har. Yes; and my father knows I as compassionately opened the door for the poor fellow in return.

Sul. Very well, sir! Your fame is increasing daily.

Har. [Rising.] I am glad to hear it.

Sul. Humph! Then perhaps you have paragoned yourself?

Har. Paragoned? Where? where?

Sul. In the St. James's Evening.

Har. Me?

Sul. Stating the exact amount—

Har. Of my loss?

Sul. Yours.—You march through every avenue to fame, dirty or clean.

Har. Well said! Be witty when you can; sarcastic you must be, in spite of your teeth. But I like you the better. You are honest. You are my cruet of Cayenne, and a sprinkling of you is excellent.

Sul. Well, sir, when you know the state of your own affairs, and to what you have reduced the house, you will be less ready to grin.

Har. Reduced the house! ha, ha, ha!

Enter DORNTON, with a newspaper in his hand.

Dor. So, sir!

Har. [Bowing.] I am happy to see you, sir.

Dor. You are there, after having broken into my house at midnight!—And you are here [Holding up the paper], after having ruined me and my house by your unprincipled prodigality! Are you not a scoundrel?

Har. No, sir; I am only a fool.

Sul. Good night to you, gentlemen.

Dor. Stay where you are, Mr. Sulky. I beg you to stay where you are, and be a witness to my solemn renunciation of him and his vices!

Sul. I have witnessed it a thousand times.

Dor. But this is the last. Are you not a scoundrel, I say?

Har. I am your son.

Dor. [Calling.] Mr. Smith! bring in those deeds.

Enter MR. SMITH.

You will not deny you are an incorrigible squanderer?

Har. I will deny nothing.

Dor. A nuisance, a wart, a blot, a stain upon the face of nature!

Har. A stain that will wash out, sir.

Dor. A redundancy, a negation; a besotted sophisticated incumbrance; a jumble of fatuity; your head, your heart, your words, your actions, all a jargon; incoherent and unintelligible to yourself, absurd and offensive to others!

Har. I am whatever you please, sir.

Dor. Bills never examined, every thing bought on credit, the price of nothing asked! Conscious you were weak enough to wish for baubles you did not want, and pant for pleasures you could not enjoy, you had not the effrontery to assume the circumspect caution of common sense! And, to your other destructive follies, you must add the detestable vice of gaming!

Har. These things, sir, are much easier done than defended.

Dor. But here. [To SMITH.] Give me that parchment! The partners have all been summoned! Look, sir! your name has been formally erased!

Har. The partners are very kind.

Dor. The suspicions already incurred by the known profligacy of a principal in the firm, the immense sums you have drawn, this paragraph, the run on the house it will occasion, the consternation of the whole city—

Har. All very terrible, and some of it very true.

[Half aside.]

Dor. If I should happily outlive the storm you have raised, it shall not be to support a prodigal, or to reward a gambler! You are disinherited! Read!

[Taking more papers from SMITH.]

Har. Your word is as good as the Bank, sir.

Dor. I'll no longer act the doating father, fascinated by your arts!

Har. I never had any art, sir, except the one you taught me.

Dor. I taught you! What, scoundrel? what?

Har. That of loving you, sir.

Dor. Loving me!

Har. Most sincerely!

Dor. Why, can you say, Harry—Rascal! I mean—that you love me?

Har. I should be a rascal indeed if I did not, sir.

Dor. Harry! Harry! No; confound me if I do! Sir, you are a vile—

Har. I know I am.

Dor. And I'll never speak to you more.

Har. Bid me good night, sir. Mr. Sulky here will bid me good night, and you are my father!

Good night, Mr. Sulky.

Sul. Good night.

[Exit.]

Har. Come, sir.

Dor. Good—I won't! If I do—

Har. Reproach me with my follies, strike out my name, disinherit me,—I deserve it all, and more. But say, "Good night, Harry!"

Dor. I won't! I won't! I won't!

Har. Poverty is a trifle,—we can whistle it off; but enmity—

Dor. I will not!

Har. Sleep in enmity! And who can say how soundly? Come! good night.

Dor. I won't! I won't.

[Runs off.]

Har. Say you so? Why, then, my noble-hearted dad, I am indeed a scoundrel!

Re-enter Mr. DORNTON.

Dor. Good night!

Har. Good night!

[Exit.]

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The House of the Widow Warren.

Enter JENNY and Mrs. LEDGER.

Jen. I tell you, good woman, I can do nothing for you.

Mrs. L. Only let me see Mrs. Warren.

Jen. And get myself snubbed. Not I, indeed.

Enter SOPHIA.

Sop. La, Jenny! Yonder's my mamma with a whole congregation of milliners, mantua-makers, mercers, haberdashers, lacemen, feathermen, and—all the world, consulting about second mourning.

Jen. I know it.

Sop. It will be six months to-morrow, since the death of my father-in-law; and she has been busy giving orders for this fortnight, that every thing might be brought home and tried on to-day. I do believe she'll sleep in her new clothes!

Jen. How you run on, miss!

Sop. What would my dear grandma' say, if she saw her? Why, she is even fonder of finery than I am!

Jen. Sure, miss, you are not fond of finery?

Sop. Oh, but I am. I wonder why she won't let me wear high-heeled shoes! I am sure I am old enough; I shall be eighteen next Christmas-day, at midnight; which is only nine months and two days! And since she likes to wear slips, and sashes, and ringlets, and—nonsense, like a girl, why should not I have high heels and gowns, and satins, and trains, and sweeps, and—like a woman?

Jen. It's very true what your mamma tells you, miss: you have been spoiled by your old fond grandmother, in Gloucestershire.

Sop. Nay, Jenny, I won't hear you call my dear grandma' names! Though every body told the loving old soul she would spoil me.

Jen. And now your mamma has sent for you up to town, to finish your heddecation.

Sop. Yes, she began on the very first day. There was the stay-maker sent for to screw up my shape; the shoemaker to cripple my feet; the hair-dresser to burn my hair! the jeweller to bore my ears; and the dentist to file my teeth.

Jen. Ah! You came here such a hoyden! [To Mrs. LEDGER.] What, an't you gone yet, mistress?

Sop. La, Jenny, how can you be so cross to people? What is the matter with this good woman?

Jen. Oh, nothing but poverty.

Sop. Is that all? Here, [Rummaging her pockets.] give her this half-crown, and make her rich.

Jen. Rich, indeed!

Sop. What, is not it enough? La, I am sorry I spent all my money yesterday! I laid it out in sweetmeats, cakes, a canary-bird, and a poll parrot. But I hope you are not very, very poor?

Mrs. L. My husband served the late alderman five and-twenty years. His master promised to provide for him; but his pitiless widow can see him thrown with a broken heart upon the parish.

Sop. Oh dear!—Stop!—Stop a bit! [Capering off.] Be sure you don't go!

Enter Mr. SULKY.

Sul. Where's your mistress, girl?

Jen. My name is Jane Cocket, sir.

Sul. Where's your mistress?

Jen. Busy, sir.

Sul. Tell her to come down.—Don't stare, girl, but go and tell your mistress I want her.

Jen. [Aside.] Humph! Mr. Black-and-gruff!

[Exit.]

Re-enter SOPHIA, running.

Sop. I've got it! Here! Take this, good woman; go home and be happy! Take it, I tell you!

[Offering a purse.]

Sul. Who is this? Mrs. Ledger! How does your worthy husband?

Mrs. L. Alack, sir, ill enough: likely to starve in his latter days.

Sul. How! Starve?

Mrs. L. The widow refuses to do any thing for him.

Sul. Humph!

Mrs. L. Service, age, and honesty, are poor pleas with affluence, ease, and Mrs. Warren.

Sul. Humph!

Mrs. L. You, sir, I understand, are the late alderman's executor?

Sul. I can't tell.

Mrs. L. Perhaps you may be able to serve my husband?

Sul. I don't know. However, give my respects to him. He shan't starve: tell him that.

Sop. Nay, but take this in the meantime.

Sul. Ay; take it, take it. [Exit Mrs. LEDGER.] And who are you, Miss Charity?

Sop. Me, sir? Oh! I—I am my grandma's grand-daughter.

Sul. Humph!

Sop. Sophia Free love.

Sul. Oh!—The widow's daughter by her first husband?

Sop. Yes, sir.

Re-enter JENNY.

Sul. Where's your mistress?

Jen. Coming, sir. So! [To SOPHIA.] You have stolen your mamma's purse, miss?

Sop. La, don't say so; I only ran away with it! She was bargaining for some smuggled lace with one of your acquaintance, and I thought I could dispose of her money to better advantage.

Jen. Without her consent?

Sop. Yes, to be sure; I knew I should never dispose of it in that manner with her consent.

Jen. Well! Here comes your mamma. [Exit. Enter the Widow WARREN, in a fantastic girlish morning-dress, surrounded by Milliners, &c., and their Attendants, with band boxes; all talking as they enter.—SOPHIA humming a tune, and capering about.]

Wid. So you'll be sure not to forget my chapeau-a-la-Prusse, Mr. Mincing!

Hatter. Certainly not, madam.

Wid. And you'll make a delicate choice of the feathers?

Hatter. The selection will be elegant, madam.

Wid. Yes, I know, Mr. Mincing, you're a charming man! And you will let me have my pierrot a-la-Coblentz by nine in the morning, Mrs. Tiffany?

Mantua-maker. To a minute, ma'am.

Sul. Madam, when you have a moment's leisure—

Wid. Be quiet, you fright; don't interrupt me!—And my caraco a-la hussar, and my bavaeroises a-la-duchesse. And put four rows of pearl in my turban.

Milliner. Ver vell, me ladyship.

Wid. And you'll all come together exactly at nine?

Omnes. We'll all be here!

[Going.]

Wid. And don't forget the white ermine tippets, and the black fox muffs, and the Kamschatka furs, that you mentioned, Mr. Weazel!

Furrier. I'll bring a fine assortment, madam.

Wid. And, and, and—No; no—you may all go; I can think of nothing else;—I shall remember more to-morrow.

Hatter, Furrier, Milliner, &c. Thank you, madam!—Ver much obliged to you, ma'am!—Dee ver good bonjour to me ladyship.

[Exeunt.]

Wid. What was it you were saying, Mr. Sulky?—Pray, child, what have you done with my purse?

Sop. Given it away, ma'.

Wid. Given it away, minikin?

Sop. Yes, ma'.

Wid. Given my purse away? To whom? For what purpose?

Sop. La, ma', only—only to keep a poor woman from starving!

Wid. I protest, child, your grandmother has totally ruined you.

Sul. Not quite, madam; she has left the finishing to you.

Wid. What were you saying, Mr. Sulky?

Sul. You won't give me leave to say any thing, madam.

Wid. You know you are a shocking troublesome man, Mr. Sulky! I have a thousand things to remember, and can't bear teasing. It fatigues my spirits! So pray relate this very urgent business of your's in a single word. What would you have?

Sul. Justice.

Wid. Lord, what do you mean? Do you think I am in the commission?

Sul. Yes, of follies innumerable!

Wid. You are a sad savage, Mr. Sulky! And who is it you want justice for?

Sul. Your late husband's son, John Milford.

Wid. Now pray don't talk to me? You are a very intrusive person! You quite derange my ideas! I can think of nothing soft or satisfactory while you are present!

Sul. Will you hear me, madam?

Wid. I can't! I positively can't! It is an odious subject.

Sop. Nay, ma', how can you be so cross to my brother Milford?

Wid. Your brother, child?—Country education! How often, minikin, have I told you he is no brother of your's.

Sop. La, ma', he was your husband's son!

Wid. Yes, his ba—Faugh!—Odious word!—Your brother?

Sop. Yes, that he is! For he is in distress.

Sul. Humph!

Wid. And would you, now—you who pretend to be very prudent—ridiculous kind of a person, wish to see me squander the wealth of my poor dear little old dead man on Mr. Milford, and his profligate companions?

Sul. Not I, indeed, madam; though the profligate to whom you make love should happen to be one of them.

Wid. Ha, ha, ha! Oh, the monster! I make love!—You have no eyes, Mr. Sulky! You are really blind! But I know whom you mean.

Sul. I mean young Dornton, madam.

Wid. To be sure you do! Whom could you mean? Elegant youth! Rapturous thought!

Sop. I am sure, sir, young Mr. Dornton is no profligate!

Sul. You are sure?

Sop. Yes, that I am.

Sul. Humph.

Sop. And it's very scandalous, very scandalous, indeed, to say he is my ma's lover!

Sul. Humph.

Sop. Because he is a fine genteel young gentleman; and you know ma' is—

Wid. Pray, minikin, be less flippant with your tongue.

Sop. Why, la, ma', you yourself know you are too—

Wid. Go up to your chamber, child!

Sop. I am sure, ma', I say it is very scandalous to call the handsome Mr. Dornton your lover!

[Exit.]

Sul. Do you blush?

Wid. Blush, indeed? Blush? Ha, ha, ha! You are a very unaccountable creature, Mr. Sulky!—Blush at the babbling of a child?

Sul. Who is your rival?

Wid. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! My rival? The poor minikin! My rival? But I have a message for you. Now do compose your features to softness and complacency! Look pleasant if you can! Smile for once in your life!

Sul. Don't make love to me! I'll have nothing to say to you!

Wid. Ha, ha, ha! Love?

Sul. Yes, you make love to Dornton! Nay, you make love to the booby Goldfinch! Even I am not secure in your company.

Wid. Ha, ha, ha! You are a shocking being, Mr. Sulky! But, if you should happen to see Mr. Dornton, do astonish your acquaintance; do a good-natured thing, and tell him I am at home all the day. Love to you? Ha, ha, ha! Oh, you figure! Your caricature of tenderness! You insupportable thing!

[Exit.]

Sul. Ah! All labour in vain!

Enter JENNY.

Stand out of the way, girl!

[Exit.]

Jen. There she goes! That's lucky! This way, sir!

Enter HARRY DORNTON, followed by a servant, with bills in his hand.

Jen. My mistress is gone up to her toilette, sir; but I can send you somebody you may like better.

[Exit.]

Har. Obliging abigail! [Looking over his papers.]

'Sdeath! What, all these tradesmen's bills?

Ser. All, sir. Mr. Smith sent me after you with them.

Har. When were they brought?

Ser. Some last night, but most this morning.

Har. Ill news travels fast, and honesty is devilish industrious. Go round to them all, return their bills, and bid them come themselves to-day. Has Mr. Williams, the hosier, sent in his bill?

Ser. No, sir.

Har. I thought as much; tell him to come with the rest, and on his life not to fail.

Ser. Very well, sir.

[Exit.

Enter SOPHIA.

Sop. Oh, Mr. Dornton, I am glad to see you! Do you know, I have got the song by heart that you were so good as to teach me!

Har. And do you know, my charming Sophia, you are the most delightful, beautiful, bewitching scholar that ever took lesson!

Sop. La, Mr. Dornton, I'm sure I'm very stupid!

Har. That you are all intelligence, all grace, all wit!

Sop. To be sure, my ma' caught me singing it, and she was pettish; because, you know, it's all about love, and ends with a happy marriage.

Har. But why pettish?

Sop. La, I can't tell. I suppose she wants to have all the marriage in the world to herself! It's her whole talk! I do believe she'd be married every morning that she rises, if any body would have her!

Har. Think not of her, my sweet Sophia, but tell me—

Sop. What?

Har. I dare not ask.

Sop. Why?

Har. Lest I should offend you.

Sop. Nay, now, Mr. Dornton, that is not right of you! I am never offended with any body, and I am sure I should not be offended with you! My grandma' always said I was the best tempered girl in the world.—What is it?

Har. Were you? [Taking her hand.] Did you ever know what it is to love?

Sop. La, now, how could you ask one such a question? You know very well one must not tell! Besides, you know, too, one must not be in love!

Har. Why not?

Sop. Because—Because I'm but a girl. My grandma' has told me a hundred times, it's a sin for any body to be in love before they be a woman grown, full one-and-twenty; and I am not eighteen!

Har. Love, they say, cannot be resisted.

Sop. Ah, but I have been taught better!—it may be resisted: nobody need be in love unless they like: and so I won't be in love, for I won't wilfully do amiss. No! I won't love any person, though I should love him ever so dearly!

Har. [Aside.] Angelic innocence! [Aloud.] Right, lovely Sophia, guard your heart against seducers.

Sop. Do you know it is full five weeks since Valentine's Day; and, because I'm not one-and-twenty, nobody sent me a Valentine!

Har. And did you expect one?

Sop. Nay, I can't say but I did think! In Gloucestershire, if any young man happens to have a liking for a young woman, she is sure to hear of it on Valentine's Day. But perhaps Valentine's Day does not fall so soon here as it does in the country.

Har. Why, it is possible you may yet receive a Valentine.

Sop. Nay, now, but don't you go to think that I am asking for one; for that would be very wrong of me, and I know better. My grandma' told me I must never mention nor think of such things till I am a woman, full one-and-twenty grown; and that, if I were to find such a thing at my window, or under my pillow, or concealed in a plum cake—

Har. A plum cake?

Sop. Yes, I assure you, I have heard of a Valentine sent baked in a plum cake—and, indeed, I would not receive such a thing for the world—no, not from the finest man on earth, if I did not think him to be a true and faithful, true, true lover!

Har. But how must he prove his faith and truth?

Sop. Why, first, he must love me very dearly!—

With all his heart and soul! And then he must be willing to wait till I am one-and-twenty.

Har. And would not you love in return?

Sop. N—yes, when I come to be one-and-twenty.

Har. Not sooner?

Sop. Oh no! I must not!

Har. Surely, you might if you pleased?

Sop. Oh, but you must not persuade me to that! If you do, I shall think you are a bad man, such as my grandma' warned me of!

Har. And do you think me so?

Sop. Do I?—No!—I would not think you so for a thousand, thousand golden guineas!

Har. [Aside.] Fascinating purity! What am I about? To deceive or trifle with such unsuspecting affection would indeed be villainy!

Gol. [Without.] Is she above? must see her!

Sop. La, I hear that great, ridiculous, horse-jockey Goldfinch coming up! [Sighs.] Good bye, Mr. Dornton.

Har. Heaven bless you, Sophia!—Sweet Sophia, Heaven bless you, my lovely angel! heigho!

Sop. Heigho!

Gol. [Without.] Is she here?

Ser. [Without.] I don't know, sir.

Enter GOLDFINCH.

Gol. Hah! my tight one!

Har. Well, Charles?

Gol. How you stare!—an't I the go? that's your sort!

Har. Ha, ha, ha!

Gol. Where's the widow?

Har. Gone up to dress, and will not be down these two hours.

Gol. A hundred to eighty, I'd sup up a string of twenty horses in less time than she takes to dress her fetlocks, plait her mane, trim her ears, and buckle on her body clothes!

Har. You improve daily, Charles!

Gol. To be sure! that's your sort! An't I a genius?

Har. Quite an original!—You may challenge the whole fraternity of the whip to match you!

Gol. Match me! Newmarket can't match me!—That's your sort!

Har. Oh no! ha, ha, ha! you are harder to match than one of your own pied ponies—a very different being from either your father or grandfather.

Gol. Father or grandfather!—Shakebags both.

Har. How?

Gol. Father a sugar-baker, grandfather a slop-seller—I'm a gentleman—that's your sort!

Har. Ha, ha, ha! and your father was only a man of worth?

Gol. Kept a gig! Knew nothing of life! never drove four!

Har. No, but he was a useful member of society.

Gol. A usef—what's that?

Har. Ha, ha, ha! A pertinent question.

Gol. A gentleman like me a useful member of society! bet the long odds nobody ever heard of such a thing!

Har. You have not acquired your character in the world for nothing, Charles.

Gol. World! what does the world say?

Har. Strange things. It says you have got into the hands of jockies, Jews, and swindlers; and that, though old Goldfinch was in his day one of the richest men on 'Change, his son will shortly become poorer than the poorest black-leg at Newmarket.

Gol. Damn the world!

Har. With all my heart, damn the world, for it says little better of me.

Gol. Bet you seven to five the Eclipse colts against the Highflyer, the second spring meeting.

Har. No.—I have done with the Highflyer and Eclipse too. So you are in pursuit of the widow?

Gol. Full cry; must have her.

Har. Ha ha, ha! heigho! you must?

Gol. All up with me else! If I don't marry the widow, I must smash! I've secured the knowing one.

Har. Whom do you mean, the maid?

Gol. Promised her a hundred on the wedding-day.

Enter JENNY.

Jen. My mistress can't see you, at present, gentlemen.

Gol. Can't see me? Take Harriet an airing in the phaeton.

Har. What, is Harriet your favourite?

Gol. To be sure, I keep her.

Har. You do?

Gol. Fine creature!

Har. Well bred?

Gol. Just to my taste! Like myself, free and easy. That's your sort!

Har. A fine woman?

Gol. Prodigious! Sister to the Irish Giant! Six feet in her stockings!—That's your sort!—Sleek coat, flowing mane, broad chest, all bone!—Dashing figure in a phaeton!—Sky blue habit, scarlet sash, green hat, yellow ribands, white feathers, gold band and tassel!—That's your sort!

Har. Ha, ha, ha! Heigho! Why, you are a high fellow, Charles!

Gol. To be sure! know the odds—hold four in hand—turn a corner in style—reins in form—elbows square—wrist pliant—hayait!—drive the Coventry stage twice a week all summer—pay for an inside place—mount the box—tip the coachy a crown—beat the mail—come in full speed—rattle down the gateway—take care of your heads!—never killed but one woman and a child in all my life—that's your sort!

Jen. [Aside to GOLDFINCH.] Take him with you. [Exit

Gol. Want a hedge? Take guineas to pounds—Precipitate against Dragon?

Har. No.

Gol. [Aside.] Wish I could have him a few!—odd or even for fifty?

Har. Ha, ha, ha! odd enough.

Gol. Will you cut a card, hide in the hat, chuck in the glass, draw cuts, heads or tails, gallop the naggot, swim the hedgehog, any thing?

Har. Nothing.

Gol. I'm up to all—that's your sort! get him with me and pigeon him. [Aside.] Come and see my grays—been to Tattersall's and bought a set of six—smokers! beat all England for figure, bone, and beauty! Hayit, charmers! that's your sort! bid for two pair of mouse ponies for Harriet.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! The Irish giantess drawn by mouse ponies!

Gol. Come and see 'em.

Har. No.—I am weary of the company of stable boys.

Gol. Why so? Shan't play you any tricks. If they squirt water at you, or make the colts kick you, tell me, and I'll horsewhip 'em—Arch dogs! deal of wit!

Har. When they do, I'll horsewhip them myself.

Gol. Yourself? 'Ware that!—wrong there!

Har. I think I should be right.

Gol. Do you? what—been to school?

Har. To school! why yes—I—

Gol. Mendoza! oh! good morrow! [Going.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! There goes one of my friends! heigho!

Enter MILFORD hastily, followed by GOLDFINCH.

Gol. What is it, Jack, tell me!

Mil. Come, Harry! we shall be too late! they are about to begin! we may have what bets we please!

Gol. Where? what?

Mil. The great match! the famous Frenchman, and Will the marker! A thousand guineas aside!

Gol. What, tennis?

Mil. Yes. The Frenchman gives fifteen and a bisk.

Gol. To Will the marker?

Mil. Yes.

Gol. Well, for a hundred!

Mil. Done!

Gol. Done, done!

Har. I bar the bet; the odds are five to four already.

Gol. What, for the Mounseer?

Har. Yes.

Gol. I'll take it, five hundred to four.

Har. Done!

Gol. Done, done!

Har. No, I bar!—I forgot—I have cut. I'll never bet another guinea.

Mil. You do for a hundred?

Har. Done!

Mil. Done, done! ha, ha, ha!

Har. Pshaw!

Gol. What a cake!

Mil. But you'll go?

Har. No.

Mil. Yes, you will. Come, come, the match is begun! every body is there! the Frenchman is the first player in the world!

Har. It's a noble exercise.

Mil. Ay! Cato himself delighted in it.

Har. Yes, it was much practised by the Romans.

Gol. The Romans! who are they?

Har. Ha, ha, ha!

Mil. Ha, ha, ha!—Will you go, or will you not, Harry?

Har. I can't, Jack. My conscience won't let me!

Mil. Pshaw! Zounds, if we don't make haste, it will be all over!

Har. Do you think it will?—No—I won't—I must not.

Mil. [Taking hold of him.] Come along, I tell you.

Har. No.

Mil. They have begun!

Gol. Have they?—I'm off!

Mil. [Struggling with HARRY.] What folly!—come along.

Har. No, I will not.

Mil. [Leaving him and going.] Well, well, if you're so positive—

Har. Stay, Jack; stay—I'll walk up the street with you, but I won't go in.

Mil. Double or quits the hundred that you won of me last night you do!

Har. I don't for a thousand!
 Mil. No, no; the hundred.
 Har. I tell you I won't. I won't go in with you.
 Mil. Done for the hundred!
 Har. Done, done! [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—The Parlour of the Tennis Court.—
Markers discovered engaged with rackets and balls.

Sheriff's Officer, two Followers, and one of the Markers.—[Shout.]

Marker. Hurrah!

Officer. Pray, is Mr. Milford in the court?

Marker. I'll bet you gold to silver the Frenchman loses! hurrah! [Exit.]

Enter MR. SMITH, from the court.

Mr. S. He is not there.

Officer. Are you sure?

Mr. S. The crowd is very great, but I can neither see him nor any of his companions.

Officer. Then he will not come.

Mr. S. I begin to hope so!

Officer. [Examining his writ.] "Middlesex to wit—one thousand pounds—Dornton against John Milford."

Mr. S. You must take none but substantial bail.
 [Shout.] What a scene.

Officer. He will not be here.

Mr. S. Heaven send! [Shout.]

Enter GOLDFINCH, and a Marker, running across.

Gol. Is the match begun?

Marker. The first game is just over.

Gol. Who lost?

Marker. The Frenchman.

Gol. Hurrah!

Marker. Hurrah.

Gol. Damn the Mounseers!—That's your sort.

[Exit into the court.]

Mr. S. That's one of his companions. I begin to tremble. [Aside.] Stand aside! Here they both come!

Officer. Which is he?

Mr. S. The second. [Shout.]

Enter HARRY DORNTON and MILFORD, in haste.

Har. I hear them! I hear them! Come along!

Mil. Ha, ha, ha!—Harry!—You would not go!
 —You were determined. [Shout.]

Har. Zounds! Come along!

[Exit in haste, MILFORD following him, laughing.]

Officer. [Stopping him.] A word with you, sir, if you please.

Mil. With me? Who are you? What do you want?

Officer. You are my prisoner.

Mil. Prisoner! Damnation! Let me go.

Officer. I must do my duty, sir.

Mil. Here, here; this is your duty.

[Taking out his purse.]

Mr. S. [Advancing.] It must not be, sir.

Mil. Mr. Smith!—What! at the suit of Dornton?

Mr. S. Yes, sir. 'Tis your own fault. Why do you lead his son to these places? He heard you were to bring him here.

Mil. Furies! Marker! [To a Servant passing.]
 Tell Harry Dornton to come to me instantly.

Ser. Yes, sir. [Exit.—Shout.]

Mil. Zounds! Let me but go and see the match!

Mr. S. You must not, sir.

Enter Marker.

Mil. [To another Marker.] Marker!

Mar. Sir!

Mil. Who wins?

Mar. The Frenchman has the best on't.

Mil. Tell Harry Dornton I am here in trouble.
 Desire him to come this moment.

Mar. Very well, sir.

[Exit.—Shout.]

Mil. [To the Officer.] I'll give you ten guineas for five minutes!

Mr. S. Take him away, sir.

Officer. You must come along, sir.

Mil. [To a Marker, returning.] Have you told
 him?

Mar. He can't come, sir.

Mil. Very well, Harry! Very well! [To the second Marker.] Well, sir?

Mar. He would not leave the court for a thousand pounds. [Exit.]

Officer. Come, come, sir. [To his two Attendants.]
 Bring him along!

Mil. Hands off, scoundrels! [Shout.] Fiends!

[Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—The House of Mr. Silky.—A Room of Business.

SILKY discovered, and JACOB entering.

Sil. Well, Jacob! Have you been?

Jac. Yes, sir.

Sil. Well, and what news? How is he? Very bad?

Jac. Dead, sir.

Sil. Dead?

Jac. As Deborah!

Sil. [Aside.] I'm a lucky man! Are you sure he is dead, Jacob?

Jac. I saw him with my own eyes, sir.

Sil. That's right, Jacob! I'm a lucky man! And what say the people at the hotel? Do they know who he is?

Jac. Oh yes, sir! He was rich! A gentleman in his own country!

Sil. And did you take care they should not know
 you?

Jac. To be sure, sir! You had given me my lesson.

Sil. Ay, ay, Jacob! That's right!—You are a fine boy! Mind me, and I'll make a man of you!
 And you think they had heard nothing of his having called on me?

Jac. Not a word.

Sil. [Aside.] It was a lucky mistake!—Well, Jacob! Keep close! Don't say a word, and I'll give you—I'll give you a crown.

Jac. You promised me a guinea, sir.

Sil. Did I, Jacob! did I? Well, well! I'll give you a guinea! But be close. Did you call at the Widow Warren's?

Jac. Yes, sir.

Sil. And will she see me?

Jac. She desires you will be there in an hour.

Sil. Very well, Jacob. Keep close! Not a word about the foreign gentleman, or his having been here a week ago, or his being taken suddenly ill and dying! [Aside.] It is a lucky stroke! Close,
 Jacob, my boy!

Jac. But give me the guinea, sir!

Sil. What now, Jacob?

Jac. If you please, sir. You may forget—

Sil. Well, there, Jacob; there! You'll be a rich man, Jacob! a cunning fellow! I read it in your countenance, Jacob! Close, Jacob, and then—

Jac. Perhaps you'll give me another guinea?

Sil. Well said, Jacob! you'll be a great man. Mind what I say to you, and you'll be a great man! [Knocking.] Here's somebody coming! go, Jacob! close!

Jac. And another guinea?

Sil. This is a lucky stroke!

Enter GOLDFINCH.

So, Mr. Goldfinch! what do you want?

Gol. Money—a thousand pounds directly.

Sil. Fine talking, Mr. Goldfinch! money's a scarce commodity! times are ticklish!

Gol. Tellee I must have it.

Sil. Give me but good security, and you know I'm your friend.

Gol. Yes; good security and fifty per cent.!

Sil. Why look you there now! for all you know, the last annuity I had of you, I gave a full hundred more than was offered by your friend Aaron, the Jew.

Gol. My friend? your friend! you collogue together!

Sil. Hear you now! for all you know I have always been your friend—always supplied you with money, have not I? and, when I saw you running to ruin, I never told you of it, did I? I was willing to make all things easy!

Gol. Easy enough! you have pretty well eased me!

Sil. There is your companion, Jack Milford, I shall be a heavy loser by him!

Gol. Ah! it's all up with poor Jack! he's fixed at last!

Sil. What do you mean?

Gol. Old Dornton has sent the Nab-man after him!

Sil. And arrested him?

Gol. Yes, he's touched!

Sil. Jacob!

Enter JACOB.

Run as fast as you can to my good friend, Mr. Strawshoe, the attorney, and tell him to take out detainers for all the debts I have bought up against Mr. Milford; make haste!

Jac. Yes, sir.

Gol. I thought you were Jack Milford's friend, too!

Sil. So I am, Mr. Goldfinch! but I must provide for my family.

Gol. Come, come!—The bit! tellee I want the coal, directly! Sale at Tattersall's to-morrow morning! three pot eight o' brood mares, with each an Eclipse colt! would not lose 'em for all Lombard-street—so will you let me have the bit?

Sil. Dear, dear! I tell you I can't, Mr. Goldfinch.

Gol. Then some other Jew must.

Sil. Jew! hear you! hear you! this is to be the friend of an ungrateful spendthrift! Calls me Jew! I, who go to morning prayers every day of my life, and three times to tabernacle on a Sunday!

Gol. Yes! you cheat all day, tremble all night, and act the hypocrite the first thing in the morning.

[Going.]

Sil. Nay, but stay, Mr. Goldfinch! stay! I want to talk to you! I have a scheme to make a man of you!

Gol. What! bind me 'prentice to an usurer.

Sil. Pshaw! you are in pursuit of the Widow Warren?

Gol. Well.

Sil. Now what will you give me, and I'll secure her to you?

Gol. You?

Sil. I.

Gol. Which way?

Sil. I have a deed in my power,—I won't tell you what, but I have it, by which I can make her marry the man I please, or remain a widow all her life; and that I am sure she will never do if she can help it.

Gol. You a deed?

Sil. Yes, I.

Gol. Show it me.

Sil. Not for twenty thousand pounds!—Depend upon me, I have it! I tell you I'm your friend, and you shall have her; that is, on proper conditions.—If not Mr. Goldfinch, you shall not have her.

Gol. Indeed, old Judas; well, what are your conditions?

Sil. I find the late alderman died worth a hundred and fifty thousand pounds!

Gol. Ah!

Sil. Every farthing, Mr. Goldfinch! and my conscience tells me that, risk and character and all things considered, I must come in for my thirds.

Gol. Your conscience tells you that!

Sil. Yes, it does, Mr. Goldfinch;—fifty thousand is a fair price.

Gol. For the soul of a miser.

Sil. If you'll join me, say so.

Gol. Fifty thousand.

Sil. Not a farthing less! What, will there not be a hundred thousand remaining?

Gol. Why, that's true!—It will cut a fine dash!

Sil. To be sure it will! Come with me; I'll draw up a sketch of an agreement. After which we must fight cunning. The widow is a vain, weak woman.—You must get her written promise.

Gol. Written?

Sil. Under her own hand; with a good round penalty in case of forfeiture.

Gol. Well said, old one.

Sil. Not less than twenty thousand pounds! A jury would grant half.

Gol. Damme, you're a good one!

Sil. That would secure something, and we would snack!

Gol. Damme, you're a deep one!

Sil. Ah, ha, ha, ha! Do you think I am, Mr. Goldfinch?—Signed on a stamp!

Gol. You know a thing or two!

Sil. Ah, ha, ha, ha! Do you think I do, Mr. Goldfinch?

Gol. You can teach 'em to bite the bubble.

Sil. Ah, ha, ha, ha! You joke, Mr. Goldfinch, you joke!

Gol. But the devil will have you at last.

Sil. Lord forbid, Mr. Goldfinch! Don't terrify me! I hate the devil, Mr. Goldfinch; indeed I do. I hate the name of him. Heaven keep me out of his fiery clutches!

Gol. No: he has you safe enough. Bait his trap but with a guinea, and he is sure to find you nibbling.

Sil. Don't talk about the devil, Mr. Goldfinch! Pray don't! But think about the widow: secure her.

Gol. I must have the coal, though, this evening.

Sil. Don't lose a moment, Mr. Goldfinch.

Gol. Must not lose the Eclipse colts!

Sil. Pshaw, Mr. Goldfinch, think less of the colts and more of the widow! Get her promise in black and white.

Gol. Tellee I must have 'em.

Sil. All will then be safe.

Gol. Must have 'em.

[Ereunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The House of the Widow Warren.

Enter JENNY and SOPHIA.

Jen. Oh, Miss! I have got something for you.

Sop. Something for me! What is it? What is it?

Jen. [Holding her hand behind her.] What will you give me?

Sop. Oh, I'll give you—[Feeling in her pocket.] La, I've got no money! But I'll give you a kiss and owe you sixpence.

Jen. No. A shilling without the kiss.

Sop. Well, well, a shilling.

Jen. There then.

[Giving her a small parcel.]
Sop. La! What is it? [Reads.] "To Miss Sophia Freeclove." And such a beautiful seal! It's a pity to break it. [Opening the paper.] La! Nothing but a plum-cake!

Jen. Is that all?

Sop. [Considering.] Ecod!—Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! I do think—As sure as sixpence, it is!—It is!—

Jen. Is what?

Sop. Oh la, it is!

Jen. What's the matter with the girl?

Sop. Ecod, Jenny, it is the most curious plum-cake you ever saw.

Jen. I see nothing curious about it.

Sop. [Kneeling.] Oh, but you shall see! Give me a knife!—Oh, no, that will spoil all!—Look you, Jenny, look!—Do but look! [Breaks open the cake, and finds a valentine enclosed.] Ha, ha, ha, ha! I told you so! The sweet, dear—[Kisses it.] Did you ever see such a plum-cake in your whole life, Jenny?—And look here! [Opening the valentine.] Oh, how beautiful!—The shape of a honey-suckle!—What should that mean?—And two doves cooing! But here!—Here's the writing:

"The woodbine sweet and turtle dove

Are types of chaste and faithful love.

Ah! were such peace and truth but mine,

I'd gladly be your Valentine!"

[Repeating.] Were such peace and truth but mine! La, now, Mr. Dornton, you know they are yours.

Jen. So, so! Mr. Dornton sends you valentines, Miss!

Sop. Oh, yes, Jenny! He is the kindest, sweetest, handsomest gentleman!

Jen. You must give me that valentine, Miss.

Sop. Give it you?

Jen. Yes; that I may show it your mamma.

Sop. Indeed! but don't you think it! I would not give you this tiny bit of paper,—no, not for a diamond as big—as big as the whole world—And, if you were to take it from me, I'd never love you, nor forgive you, as long as I live.

Jen. Oh! but indeed, Miss, I'm not obliged to keep secrets for nothing.

Sop. Nay, Jenny, you know I am very good to you. And here!—Here! Don't tell 'ma, and I'll give you this silver thimble.

[Exit JENNY.—SOPHIA retires.

Enter Widow WARREN and SULKY.

Wid. You are a very shocking person, Mr. Sulky! the wild man of the woods broke loose!

Do return to your keeper, good ourang-outang; and don't go about to terrify children.

Sul. I tell you, madam, Mr. Milford is arrested.

Sop. My brother?

Sul. Locked up at a bailiff's in the next street.

Sop. Oh, dear!

Wid. And pray, now, what is that to me?

Sul. Madam!

Wid. I am not arrested.

Sul. Would you were

Wid. Oh, the savage!

Sul. The pitiless only should feel pain. The stony-hearted alone should be enclosed by walls of stone.

Sop. Don't be cross with ma', sir; I'm sure she'll release my brother

Wid. You are sure, minikin!

Sop. Yes, ma'; for I am sure no soul on earth would suffer a fellow-creature to lie and pine to death, in a frightful dark dungeon, and fed with bread and water.

Sul. Your late husband recommended the payment of his son's debts.

Wid. Recommended?

Sul. Yes.

Wid. But leaving it to my own prudence.

Sul. More's the pity.

Wid. Which prudence I shall follow.

Sul. It will be the first time in your life—You never yet followed prudence, you always ran before it.

Sop. Nay, come, dear ma'; I am sure you have a pitiful heart; I am sure you could not rest in your bed if my poor brother was in prison.

Wid. Hold your prattle, child.

Sop. Ah, I'm sure you'll make him happy, and pay his debts.

Wid. Why, Jenny!

Sul. You won't?

Enter JENNY.

Sop. La, dear sir, have patience—

Sul. You are an angel; [To SOPHIA.] And you are—[To WIDOW.] [Exit.]

Sop. Nay, pray, sir, do stay! [Exit, following.]

Wid. I am glad the monster is gone; he is a very intolerable person.—Pray, Jenny, how did it happen that Mr. Dornton went away without seeing me?

Enter Servant and SILKY.

Ser. Mr. Silky, madam.

Wid. Leave us, Jenny. [Exit JENNY.] So, Mr.

Silky.—What is this very urgent business of yours?

Sil. Are we safe, madam? Will nobody interrupt us; nobody overhear us?

Wid. No, no.—But what is the meaning of all this caution?

Sil. Carefully drawing the will from his pocket.] Do you know this hand-writing, madam? [Both sit.]

Wid. Ah!—It is my poor old dear man's, I see.

Sil. You have heard of a will he left in France?

Wid. Pshaw! Will, indeed! He left no will.

Sil. Yes, he did, madam:

Wid. I won't believe it! He loved me too well to rob me of a single guinea! Poor simple soul! I was his darling!

Sil. His darling, madam?—With your permission, I will just read a single clause, in which his darling is mentioned! Look, madam; it is the alderman's hand! [Reads.] "But, as I have sometimes painfully suspected the excessive affection which my said wife, Winifred Warren, professed for me during my decline, and that the solemn protestations she made never to marry again, should she survive me, were both done with sinister views, it is my will that, should she marry, or give a legal promise of marriage, written or verbal, that she shall be cut off with an annuity of six hundred a year; and the residue of my effects in that case to be equally divided between my natural son, John Milford, and my wife's daughter, Sophia Freelove."

Wid. Six hundred a year! An odd dotard! brute! monster! I hate him now as heartily as when he was alive! But pray, sir, how came you by this will?

Sil. Why it was odd enough! and yet easy enough: My name is Silky, madam—

Wid. Well?

Sil. And you know the executor's name is Sulky—

Wid. Well?

Sil. The gentleman that delivered it only made a mistake of a letter, and gave it to Mr. Silky instead of Mr. Sulky.

Wid. And where is that gentleman?

Sil. Ah, poor man—He is dead.

Wid. Dead?

Sil. And gone.—

Wid. And does Mr. Sulky know of this will being delivered?

Sil. Not a syllable; it's all close and smooth.

Wid. So much the better—Come, give it me, and—

Sil. Excuse me there, madam; I can't do that.

Wid. Why so?

Sil. My conscience won't let me; I must provide for my family.

Wid. And pray what provision is this will to make for your family, Mr. Silky?

Sil. Why, madam, I have a proposal.—You know the power of your own charms.

Wid. Which, I believe, is more than you do, Mr. Silky—

Sil. Hah; don't say so, madam;—Don't say so; Would I were a handsome, rich, and well-born youth:—But you know Mr. Goldfinch?—Ah, ha, ha, ha; I could tell you a secret!

Wid. What, that he is dying for me, I suppose?

Sil. Ah?—So smitten!—Talks of nothing else!

Wid. And is that any secret, think you?

Sil. The alderman, I find, died worth more than a plun and a half—

Wid. Well?

Sil. I have talked the matter over with my friend, Mr. Goldfinch, and he thinks it but reasonable, that for a secret of so much importance, which would almost sweep the whole away, I should receive one third Wid. Fifty thousand pounds, Mr. Silky?

Sil. I can't take less.

Wid. Why you are a greater rogue than even I thought you!

Sil. Lord, madam, it's no roguery; it's only a knowledge of the world; a young husband with a hundred thousand pounds, or poor six hundred a year without any husband.

Wid. You are a very shocking old miser, Mr. Silky; a very repulsive sort of a person; what heart you had is turned to stone; you are insensible of the power of a pair of fine eyes; but I have made a conquest that places me beyond your reach—I mean to marry Mr. Dornton.

Sil. [Rising.] What! old Mr. Dornton, madam?

Wid. [Rising.] Old Mr. Dornton, man! I never saw the figure in my life; no. The gay and gallant young Mr. Dornton; the pride of the city, and the lawful monarch of my bleeding heart.

Sil. Ha, ha, ha! young Mr. Dornton.

Wid. So you may take your will and light your fires with it; you will not make a penny of it any other way. Mr. Sulky, the executor, is Mr. Dornton's partner, and when I marry Mr. Dornton he will never inflict the absurd penalty.

Sil. Ha, ha, ha! no, madam! when you marry Mr. Dornton, that he certainly never will! but, if any accident should happen to prevent the match, you will then let me hear from you?

Wid. Lord, good man! don't mention the horrid idea! do leave me to my delightful meditations! I would indulge in soft sensibility and dreams of bliss; and not be disturbed by dead men's wills, or the sordid extortions of an avaricious old rogue!

Sil. Very well, madam! the secret for the present remains between ourselves. You'll be silent for your own sake! only remember, ha, ha, ha! if you should want me, I live at number forty. My name is on the door. Ha, ha, ha! Mr. Dornton! good morning, madam! [Going.] Mr. Dornton! ha, ha, ha! you'll send if you should want me?

[Exit laughing.
Calling.]

Wid. Jenny!

Enter JENNY.

Jen. Ma'am.

Wid. As I was saying, Jenny, pray how did it happen that Mr. Dornton went away without seeing me?

Jen. Indeed, ma'am, I don't know.

Wid. Cruel youth.

Jen. I'm sure, ma'am, I wonder how you can like him better than Mr. Goldfinch?

Wid. Mr. Goldfinch is very well, Jenny; but Mr. Dornton; oh! incomparable.

Jen. I am sure, ma'am, if I was a rich lady, and a handsome lady, and a fine lady, like you, I should say Mr. Goldfinch for my money.

Wid. Should you, Jenny? Well, I don't know.

Gol. [Without.] Tellee I must see her.

Wid. As I live, here he comes;—he is such a boisterous person? How do I look, Jenny?

Jen. You had better go up to your toilette for a minute.

Wid. That smooth-tongued extortioner has put me into such a flutter.—Don't let him go, Jenny.

Jen. Never fear, ma'am.

Wid. I'll not stay too long.

[Exit.]

Enter GOLDFINCH, his clothes dirty.

Gol. Here I am—all alive.

Jen. Dear; what's the matter?

Gol. Safe and sound; fine kick-up!

Jen. Have you been thrown?

Gol. Pitched five-and-twenty feet into a ditch—souse.

Jen. Dear me!

Gol. Pretty commence;—no matter—limbs whole—heart sound—that's your sort!

Jen. Where did it happen?

Gol. By-road—back of Islington—had them tight in hand, too—came to short turn and a narrow lane—up flew a damned dancing-master's umbrella—bounce—off they went—road repairing—wheelbarrow in the way—crash—out flew I—whiz—fire flashed—lay stunned—got up—looked foolish—shafts broke—Snarler and Blackguard both down—Black-and-all-black paying away—pannels smashed, traces cut, Snarler lamed.

Jen. Terrible!

Gol. Damned mad!—cursed a few, cut up Black-and-all-black, horsewhipped Tom, took coach, and drove here like a devil in a whirlwind.

Jen. 'Tis very well your neck's not broke.

Gol. Little stiff—no matter—damn all dancing-masters and their umbrellas!

Jen. You had better have been here, Mr. Goldfinch. You stand so long, shilly shally, that you'll be cut out at last. If you had but a licence now in your pocket, I'd undertake to have you married in half an hour.

Gol. Do you think so?

Jen. Think! I'm sure on't.

Gol. Damme, I'll post away and get one—must not lose her; the game's up, if I do!—must have her!—be true to me, and I'll secure you the hundred. I'll be back from the Commons in a smack.

[Exit JENNY.]

Enter the Widow WARREN.

Gol. Ah, widow! here am I!

[Runs to her, kisses her, and dirties her clothes.]

Wid. I protest, Mr. Goldfinch!—was ever the like!

Gol. Never mind, brush off—I'm the lad!—been to Hatchet's—bespoke the wedding-coach.

Wid. But—Sir—

Gol. Pannels stripe painted—hammer-cloth fringed—green and white—curtains festooned—patent wheels—silver furniture—all flash—light as a band-box—trundle and spin after my grays like a tandem down hill—pass—show 'em the road—whurr—whizz—gig—that's your sort!

Wid. It will be superb!

Gol. Superb! Tellee it will be the thing!—the go—the stare—the gape—the gaze!—the rich widow and the tight one!—there they go—that's your sort—I'm the boy that shall drive you.

Wid. Pardon me, Mr. Goldfinch; if a certain event were, by the wise disposition of Providence, to take place, I should think proper to drive.

Gol. You drive! If you do, damn me.

Wid. Sir!

Gol. I'm christened and called Charles!—Charles Goldfinch—the knowing lad that's not to be had—winter and summer—fair weather and foul—low ruts or no ruts—never take a false quarter. No, no, widow—I drive—hayit—ah! ah!—get on—St—St—touch Whitefoot in the flank—tickle Snarler in the ear—cut up the Yelper—take out a fly's eye—smack, crack—that's your sort!

Wid. I assure you, Mr. Goldfinch, you entertain very improper suppositions concerning—

Gol. Go for the licence. [Going.]

Wid. Nay, but surely, Mr.—

Gol. Go for the licence—resolved—taken it here.

[Pointing to his forehead.]

Wid. If retrospect and—and affection threw no other obstacles in the way—yet the—the world—prudence.

Gol. The world!—prudence!—damn the world—damn prudence.

Wid. Oh but, sir—

Gol. The world nor nobody else has nothing to do with neither your prudence nor mine—we'll be married immediately—

Wid. Immediately, Mr. Goldfinch? I—

Gol. What, you won't?

Wid. Nay, Mr. Goldfinch—I—do not—absolutely renunciate—but I—wish—

Gol. It was over—know you do—go for the licence—

Wid. Pray dear Mr. Goldfinch—

Gol. Go for the licence, I tellee.

Wid. Only a word—

Gol. To the wise—I'm he—go for the licence—that's your sort. [Exit.]

Wid. Mr. Goldfinch—I declare—

[Exit, following.]

SCENE II.—Dornton's House.

Enter Mr. DORNTON and Mr. SMITH.

Dor. Still the same hurry, the same crowd, Mr. Smith?

Mr. S. Much the same, sir: the house never experienced a day like this; Mr. Sulky thinks we shall never get through.

Dor. Is Milford taken?

Mr. S. Yes, sir.

Dor. Unprincipled prodigal; my son owes his ruin to him alone. But he shall suffer.

Mr. S. My young master's tradesmen are waiting.

Dor. Bid them come in. [Exit Mr. SMITH.] All my own fault, my own fond folly: denied him nothing, encouraged him to spend; and now—

Re-enter Mr. SMITH, followed by upwards of twenty tradesmen.

Mr. S. This way, gentlemen.

Dor. Zounds, what an army!—a vile, thoughtless profligate.

Enter CLERK.

Clerk. [To Mr. DORNTON.] You are wanted in the counting-house, sir.

Dor. Very well. I'll be with you in a moment, gentlemen—abandoned spendthrift!

[Exit, followed by Mr. SMITH.]

First T. I don't like this! what does this mean?

Second T. Danger!

Third T. He has been a good customer—none of your punctual paymasters, that look over their accounts.

First T. Oh, a different thing! nothing to be got by them—always take care to affront them.

Second T. Perhaps, it is a trick of the old gentleman, to inspect into our charges.

Third T. I don't like that: rather hear of any tax than of taxing my bill.

First T. Humph! tradesmen begin to understand these things, and allow a reasonable profit.

Second T. Can't have less than fifty per cent. for retail credit trade!

Third T. To be sure not; if a man would live in style, and have a fortune, as he ought.

First T. Hush! mind—all devilish hard run.

Omnes. Certainly.

First T. Not a guinea in the house; to-morrow's Saturday—hem!

Re-enter Mr. DORNTON.

Dor. Your servant, gentlemen, your servant.—Pray how happens it that you bring your accounts in here?

First T. We received notice, sir.

Dor. You have none of you any demands upon me

First T. Happy to serve you, sir.

Second T. We shall be glad of your custom, sir.

Omnes. All, all!

Dor. And do you come expecting to be paid?

First T. Money, sir, is always agreeable!

Second T. Tradesmen find it a scarce commodity!

Third T. Bills come round quick!

Fourth T. Workmen must eat!

Second T. For my part, I always give a gentleman, who is a gentleman, his own time.

Dor. I understand you! And what are you, sir, who seem to stand apart from the rest?

Hosier. A hosier, sir. I am unworthy the company of these honest gentlemen, who live in style. I never affront a punctual paymaster, not I; and, what they will think strange, I get more by those who do look over their bills than those who do not!

First T. Humph! [Aside.]

Second T. Blab! [Aside.]

Third T. Shab! [Aside.]

Dor. And what may be the amount of your bill, sir?

Hosier. A trifle, for which I have no right to ask.

Dor. No right! what do you mean?

Hosier. Your son, sir, made me what I am; re-deemed me and my family from ruin; and it would be an ill requital of his goodness to come here, like a dun, at such a time as this; when I would rather, if that could help him, give him every shilling I have in the world.

Dor. Would you? would you? You look like an honest man! But what do you do here, then?

Hosier. Mr. Dornton, sir, knew I should be unwilling to come, and sent me word he would never speak to me more if I did not; and, rather than offend him, I would even come here on business like this.

Dor. [Shakes him by the hand.] You are an honest fellow! an unaccountable!—and so Harry has been your friend?

Hosier. Yes, sir: a liberal-minded friend; for he lent me money, though I was sincere enough to tell him of his faults.

Dor. Zounds, sir! how came you to be a weaver of stockings?

Hosier. I don't know, sir, how I came to be at all; I only know that here I am.

Dor. A philosopher!

Hosier. I am not fond of titles, sir; I'm a man.

Dor. Why, is it not a shame, now, that the soul of Socrates should have crept and hid itself in the body of a stocking-weaver? Give me your bill.

Hosier. Excuse me, sir.

Dor. Give me your bill, I tell you! I'll pay this bill myself.

Hosier. I cannot, must not, sir.

Dor. Sir, I insist on— [All press forward.]

Enter HARRY DORNTON.

So, sir; why have you assembled these people, into whose debt you have dishonestly run, wanting the power to pay: and who have as dishonestly trusted you, hoping to profit exorbitantly by your extravagance?

Har. Oh, sir, you don't know them? They are a very complaisant, indulgent kind of people. Are not you, gentlemen?

First T. Certainly, sir.

Omnes. Certainly.

Har. Be kind enough to wait a few minutes without, my very good friends. [Exeunt Tradesmen.]

Mr. Williams— [Takes his hand.]

Hosier. Sir— [Exit.]

Dor. How dare you introduce this swarm of locusts here? How dare you?

Har. Despair, sir, is a dauntless hero.

Dor. Have you the effrontery to suppose that I can or shall pay them? What is it you mean?

Har. To let you see I have creditors.

Dor. Cheats! bloodsuckers!

Har. Some of them: but that is my fault. They must be paid.

Dor. Paid!

Har. The innocent must not suffer for the guilty.

Dor. You will die in an almshouse!

Har. May be so; but the orphan's and the widow's curse shall not meet me there.

Dor. Harry! Zounds! Paid! Whom do you mean to rob?

Har. My name is Dornton, sir.

Dor. Are you not—

Har. Yes, sir.

Dor. Quit the room. Begone.

Har. You are the best of men, sir, and I—But I hate whining. Repentance is a pitiful scoundrel, that never brought back a single yesterday. Amendment is a fellow of more mettle. But it is too late. Suffer I ought, and suffer I must. My debts of honour discharged, do not let my tradesmen go unpaid.

Dor. You have ruined me!

Har. The whole is but five thousand pounds.

Dor. But?—The counter is loaded with the destruction you have brought upon us all.

Har. No, no—I have been a sad fellow, but not even my extravagance can shake this house.

Enter Mr. SMITH.

Mr. S. Bills are pouring in so fast upon us we shall never get through!

Har. What? What?

Mr. S. We have paid our light gold so often over, that the people are very surly.

Dor. Pay it no more! Sell it instantly for what it is worth, disburse the last guinea, and shut up the doors!

Har. [To Mr. SMITH.] Are you serious?

Mr. S. Sir!

Har. Are you serious, I say! Is it not some trick to impose upon me?

Mr. S. Look into the shop, sir, and convince yourself! If we have not a supply in half an hour, we must stop. [Exit.]

Har. [Wildly.] My father! sir! [Turning away.] Is it possible? Disgraced! Ruined! In reality ruined! By me? Are these things so?

Dor. Harry! how you look. You frighten me.

Har. It shall be done.

Dor. What do you mean!—Calm yourself, Harry.

Har. Ay! by heaven!

Dor. Hear me, Harry.

Har. This instant.

Going.

Dor. Harry!

Har. Don't droop! [Returning.] Don't despair! I'll find relief. [Aside.] First to my friend—He cannot fail. But if he should!—Why ay, then, to Magæra! I will marry her, in such a cause, were she fifty widows and fifty furies!

Dor. Calm yourself, Harry.

Har. I am calm! Very calm. It shall be done.—Don't be dejected—You are my father—You were the first of men in the first of cities—Revered by the good and respected by the great—You flourished prosperously!—But you had a son—I remember it.

Dor. Why do you roll your eyes, Harry?

Har. I won't be long away.

Dor. Stay where you are, Harry. [Seizing his hand.] All will be well. I am very happy.—Do not leave me. I am very happy. Indeed I am, Harry.—Very happy.

Har. Heaven bless you, sir. You are a worthy gentleman. I'll not be long.

Dor. Hear me, Harry. I am very happy

Enter MR. SMITH.

Mr. S. Sir, shall we send to the Bank for a thousand pounds' worth of silver?

Har. No, scoundrel!

[Exit.]

Dor. Harry! Harry! I am very happy. Harry Dornton—I am very happy! Very happy.

[Exit MR. SMITH, following.]

SCENE III.—The House of Mr. Silky.

Enter MR. SILKY and JACOB.

Sil. Mr. Goldfinch not called yet, Jacob?

Jac. No, sir.

Sil. Nor any message from the widow?

Jac. No, sir.

[Knocking.]

Sil. See who knocks, Jacob. [Exit JACOB.] I dare say it is one or t'other. They must come to me at last.

Enter HARRY DORNTON, in haste, following JACOB.

Har. Are you sure he is at home?

Jac. He is here, sir.

[Exit.]

Har. Mr. Silky—

[Panting.]

Sil. Ah! my dear Mr. Dornton, how do you do? —[Both sit.] I hope you are very well. I am exceedingly glad to see you! This call is so kind, so condescending. It gives me infinite pleasure.

Har. Mr. Silky, you must instantly grant me a favour.

Sil. A favour! What is it? How can I serve you? I would run to the world's end.

Har. You must exert your whole friendship!

Sil. Friendship, sir? Say duty! 'Twas you that made a man of me! I should have been ruined, in the Bench, I know not where or what, had you not come forward and supported me at the critical moment. And now I can defy the world.

Har. Hear me! I know you can.

Sil. Oh yes. The sum you lent me, a lucky speculation, five years of continual good fortune, and other little lifts, have made me—I won't say what. But your father, and perhaps another or two excepted,—I say perhaps, I'll show my head with the proudest of 'em.

Har. Why, then, I am a fortunate man.

Sil. To be sure you are. How can I serve you? —What can I do? Make me happy.

Har. You can rescue me from phrenzy.

Sil. Can I?—I am proud! Infinitely happy! —What? How? I am a lucky fellow! Tell me which way?—Where can I run? What can I do?

Har. [Hesitating] The request is serious—trying.

Sil. So much the better! So much the better! Whom could I serve, if not you?—You! The son of the first man in the city!

Har. You mistake!

Sil. I don't! You are, you are! Dornton and Co. may challenge the world, the house of Hope perhaps excepted.

Har. Woful mistake!

Sil. Pooh!

Har. Our house is in danger of stopping payment.

Sil. Sir! [Rises.] Stop payment!

Har. My follies are the cause.

Sil. [Turning away.] Stop payment!

Har. I have not been used to ask favours—but—

Sil. Stop payment!

Har. [Rises.] What means this alteration in your countenance?

Sil. Oh dear no! Ha, ha, ha! Not in the least. Ha, ha, ha! I assure you, I, I, I—

Har. I have told you our situation. Yourself and two other friends must jointly support my father by your credit, to the amount of fifty thousand pounds. Mark me!—Must!

Sil. Fifty thousand pounds, Mr. Dornton! Fifty thousand pounds! Are you dreaming? Me? Fifty thousand pounds? Me? Or half the sum? Or a fifth of the sum? Me?

Har. Prevaricating sound—Hear me, sir!

Sil. Yes, sir.

Har. I must be calm. Are you not a—I say—sir—You have yourself informed me of your ability, and I must insist. Observe, sir! I insist on your immediate performance of this act of duty!

Sil. Duty, and fifty thousand pounds! Are you mad, Mr. Dornton? Are you mad? Or do you think me mad?

Har. I think you the basest of wretches.

Sil. Nay, Mr. Dornton, I would do anything to serve you—Anything, I protest to heaven! Would go anywhere, run—

Har. Of my errands, wipe my shoes! Any dirty menial office that cost you nothing. And this you call showing your gratitude?

Sil. Is it not, Mr. Dornton?

Har. And will you give no help to the house?

Sil. Nay, Mr. Dornton—

Har. After the favours you have been for years receiving, the professions you have been daily making, and the wealth you have by these means been hourly acquiring—will you not, sir?

Sil. Nay, Mr. Dornton—

Har. Will you not, sir?

Sil. Don't hurt a poor old man! I can't!

Har. [Throwing him from him] Scoundrel! [Exit.]

Sil. Bless my heart! Stopp'd payment!—The house of Dornton!—Fifty thousand pounds!—I declare I am all of a tremble. Jacob!

Enter JACOB.

Have we any bills on the house of Dornton?

Jac. I have just been examining the books, sir.—We have bills to the amount of—

Sil. How much? How much? A thousand pounds?

Jac. Three, sir.

Sil. Three?—Three thousand? Bless my heart!

Jac. We heard the news the very moment after young Mr. Dornton came in.

Sil. Run, pay the bills away.

Jac. Where, sir?

Sil. Anywhere! Anybody will take 'em! Run with them to my dear friend, Mr. Smallware: it is too far for him to have heard of the crash. Begone! Don't leave him. Give my very best respects to him. He will oblige me infinitely. Fly! And Jacob—Make haste, go to the clearing-house, and get it whispered among the clerks. Then, if there are any of Dornton's bills to be bought at fifty per cent. discount, let me know. I will buy up all I can. [Exit JACOB.] It's a safe speculation—I know the house—there must be a good round dividend.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The House of the Widow Warren.

Enter JENNY, followed by HARRY DORNTON, half drunk.

Har. Away, Handmaid of Hecate. Fly!

Jen. Lord, sir, you don't mean as you say?

Har. Will you begone, Cerberca? Invite my goddess to descend in a golden shower, and suddenly relieve these racking doubts.

Jen. Goddess! I knew who you meant—Miss Sophy.

Enter WIDOW.—Exit JENNY.

Wid. Mr. Dornton!

Har. Widow! Here am I. Phaeton the second hurled from my flaming car. I come burning with fierce desires, devoutly bent on committing the deadly sin of matrimony. May these things be? Speak, my saving angel.

Wid. Nay, but—Dear Mr. Dornton—

Har. Do not imagine, amiable widow, that I am mad. No, no, no! Only a little flighty—Left my father furiously, drank three bottles of Burgundy frantically, flew in amorous phrenzy to the attack, and will carry the place or die on the spot! Powder and poison await my choice; and let me tell you, sweet widow, I am a man of my word. So you'll have me, won't you?

Wid. Oh, Mr. Dornton—

Har. Why, you would not see my father perish, would you? And me expire? would you?

Wid. Am I so very cruel?

Har. Then say yes!—Yes, or—Pistols—Daggers—Cannon-balls!

Wid. Yes, sir; yes, yes!

Har. Hold, fair widow! Kind widow, hold! Be not rash. I am the veriest villain.—Avoid me!—A ruined—But that were indeed a trifle—My father? Him! him have I ruined! Heard you that? Bring forth your hoards. Let him once more be himself, and bid me kiss the dust.

Wid. [Aside.] Elegant youth!

Har. And wilt thou, widow, be his support? Wilt thou?

Wid. Cruel question. How can I deny?

Har. Immortal blessings be upon thee! My father—

Wid. Will be all rapture to hear—

Har. Ah, ha, ha, ha! You don't know my father. A strange, affectionate—That loves me—Oh! He—And you see how I use him—you see how I use him! But no matter.—Tol de rol—We'll be married to-night.

Wid. Oh, fie!

Har. Ay, my Madona! To-night's the day. The sooner the better. 'Tis to rescue a father, blithesome widow. A father! To save him have I fallen in love. Remember—Sin with open eyes, widow—Money—I must have money. Early in the morn, ere counters echo with the ring of gold, fifty thousand must be raised.

Wid. It shall, Mr. Dornton.

Har. Why, shall it? Shall it? Speak again, beautiful vision, speak! Shall it?

Wid. Dear Mr. Dornton, it shall.

Har. Remember! Fifty thousand the first thing in the morning.

Wid. And would not a part this evening—?

[Coquetting.

Har. What sayest thou? Oh, no!—Who!—Thousands—

Wid. I have a trifling sum.

Har. How much?

Wid. Six thousand—

Har. Six?

Wid. Which I meant to have disposed of, but—

Har. No, no! I'll dispose of it, dear widow.

[Kisses her.] I'll dispose of it in a twinkling. Doubt not my gratitude—Let this and this—

[Kissing.]
Wid. Fie! You are a sad man. But I'll bring you a draft.

Har. Do, my blooming widow! Empress of the golden isles, do.

Wid. But, remember, this trifle is for your own use.

Har. No, my pearl unparalleled! My father! My father's. Save but my father, and I will kiss the ground on which thou treadest, and live and breathe but on thy bounty!

At least till time and fate shall means afford
Somewhat to perform, worthy of man and me.

Enter JENNY, peeping.

Jen. Sir!

Har. Ah, ha! my merry maid of May!

Jen. I suppose you are waiting to see Miss Sophy, now you have got rid of the old lady.

Har. Got rid of the old lady? Thou brazen pin-placer! thou virgin of nine-and-twenty years' occupation! No! I have not got rid of the old lady! the old lady! The old lady is to be my blooming, youthful bride! and I, happy youth, am written and destined in the records of eternity her other half. Heigho!

Jen. Lord, sir, what rapturation:—but stay a little, and I'll tell Miss Sophy her mamma wants her, here; so then—Hush! [Retires.]

Re-enter the Widow WARREN.

Wid. Here's the draft.

Har. Thanks, my Sultana!—this halcyon night the priest, pronouncing conjurations dire—

Wid. Fie! I won't look at you.

Har. Ay, to night we'll marry; shall we not?

[Sitting down and coquetting.

Enter SOPHIA, skipping, but stops short on seeing them.

Har. To-night shall be a night of wonder; and we'll love like—[Aside.]—like Darby and Joan.

Wid. [Languishing.] I shall hate you intolerably. [SOPHIA advances on tip-toe.]

Har. Hey for the parson's permission! Hey, my sublime widow.

Wid. To steal thus upon one at an unguarded moment.

Har. But here first let me kneel, and thus to Ceres pay—

[Going to kiss her hand, meets the eye of SOPHIA.

Sop. [Coming between them with bursting trepidation, taking the valentine from her bosom, and presenting it.] There, sir.

Wid. Ah!

Sop. There, sir—oh, pray, sir, take it, sir.

Wid. Why, minikin—

Sop. I request, sir. I desire, sir.

Har. [Declining it.] Tol de rol—

Sop. [Tearing the paper, and throwing it away.]

Why then, there, sir—and there, sir—and there, there, there, sir!

Wid. Poor minikin! I declare she is jealous.

Sop. [Her sobs rising.] And I'll—I'll—wri-i-i-ite to my—to my grandma-a-a directly—

Wid. Fie, child!

Sop. And I'll go do-o-own—into Glo-o-oster-shire—

Wid. Go up to your chamber, child.

Sop. And I'll tell my grandma-a what a false, base, bad man you are; and she shall ha-a-ate you, and despise you; and I'll ha-a-ate you, and despise you myself.

Wid. Poor thing.

Sop. And moreover I'll hate and despise all mankind! and for your sake—I'll live and die a maid.

Wid. Yes, child, that I dare be sworn you will.

Har. Widow! I'm a sad fellow! don't have me.—I'm a vile fellow. Sophy, you are right to despise me; I am going to marry your mother.

Sop. I'll go down into Glo-o-o-stershire—I wo' on't live in such a false-hearted city. And you ought to be ashamed of yourself, ma', to make yourself so ridiculous.

Har. No, no, sweet Sylph, it is my fault! all my fault.

Wid. [Enraged.] Be gone, miss.

Har. Sweet widow! Gentle widow!—I've sold myself, Sophy: six thousand pounds is the earnest-money paid down, for the reptile Harry Dornton.—I love you, Sophy

Wid. How, Mr. Dornton?

Har. I do, by heaven! take back your money, widow. [Offering the draft.] I'm a sad scoundrel.

Sop. You are a base, faithless man,—you know you are. And you are a pitiless woman, a merciless woman, for all you are my own mother, to let my poor brother Milford go to be starved to death in a dark dungeon.

Har. Milford in prison?

Sop. Yes, sir; arrested by your cruel, old, ugly father! I'm sure he is ugly, though I never saw him in my life—I'm sure he is an ugly, hideous, ugly monster. [Exit.]

Har. [Rising.] Is this true, widow?

Wid. [Rising.] Sir—

Har. Arrested by my father?—squandering her money on a ruined reprobate, and won't release her husband's son.

Wid. Nay but, dear Mr. Dornton—

Har. I'll be with you again presently, widow! presently, presently.

Wid. To-night, you know, Mr. Dornton—

[Exit HARRY.]

Enter JENNY.

Jen. Mr. Goldfinch is coming up, ma'am.

Wid. I have no time to waste with Mr. Goldfinch. I'll presently send him about his business. Mr. Dornton talks, I don't know how, Jenny. Says it must be to-night.

Enter GOLDFINCH

Gol. Well, widow?

Wid. Not so free, sir!

Jen. [Aside to GOLDFINCH.] Have you got the license?

Gol. No.

Jen. No!

Gol. No—been to Tattersall's.

Jen. And not for the license?

Gol. Tellee I've been to Tattersall's!

Jen. Ah! it's all over!

Gol. Made sure of the Eclipse colts!—must not lose 'em.

Jen. [Aside.] Stupid booby!

Wid. What is your present business, sir?

Gol. My business? Ha, ha, ha! that's a good one! I'll tell you my business—

[Approaching with open arms.]

Wid. Keep your distance, sir.

Gol. Distance, widow? No; that's not the way. I should be double distanced if I did.

Wid. Were you indeed a man of deportment and breeding—

Gol. Breeding?—Look at my spurs.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 45 & 46.

Wid. Had you but the manner, the spirit, the— But no, you are no gentleman—

Gol. Whew! no gentleman? [Claps on his hat.] Damme, that's a good one.—Charles Goldfinch, no gentleman?—Ask in the box-lobby! inquire at the school. [In a boxing attitude.]

Wid. Sir, you are a tedious person: your company is troublesome.

Gol. Turf or turnpike, keep the best of cattle—Walk, trot, or gallop—Run, amble, or canter—Laugh at everything on the road—Give 'em all the go-by.—Beat the trotting butcher!—Gentleman!—That's your sort!

Jen. [Aside to GOLDFINCH.] Follow me. [Exit.]

Wid. I beg, sir, I may not be intruded upon with you or your horse-jockey jargon any more. [Exit.]

Gol. Here's a kick-up—dish'd again—I knew I should have no luck—started badly in the morning—damn all dancing-masters and their umbrellas!

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in the House of a Sheriff's Officer.

Enter HARRY DORNTON, with an Officer.

Har. Despatch, man! despatch! Tell Jack Milford I can't wait a moment.—Hold—write an acquittal instantly for the thousand pounds. But say not a word to him of my intention.

Offi. A thousand, sir; it is almost five thousand!

Har. Impossible!

Offi. Here are detainers already lodged to that amount.

Har. Five thousand?

Offi. Must I write the acquittal for the sum total?

Har. No—yes, write it, however. Have it ready. Early to-morrow morning it shall all be paid.

Offi. In the meantime there may be more detainers.

Har. Damnation! What shall I do?—Run, send him!—and do you hear, a bottle of champagne and two rummers. Rummers, mind!—Not a word to him! [Exit Officer.] Five thousand?—And more detainers!

Enter Officer, with a bottle and glasses, MILFORD following.

Mil. Mr. Dornton!

Har. [Lying on a table.] How now, Jack! What's your wonder? I can't stay a moment with you, but I could not pass without giving you a call. Your hand, my boy, cheer up.

Mil. Excuse me, sir.

Har. Why, Jack!—Pshaw! cast away this gloom and be—Honest Jack Milford! You are now in tribulation; what of that? Why, man, the blessed sun himself is sometimes under a cloud. Wait but till to-morrow.—Where is the wine! [Fills the rummers.] Come, drink and wash away grief. 'Sblood, never look frosty and askance, man, but drink, drink, drink.

Mil. Sir! I am not disposed to drink.

Har. Here's confusion to all sorrow and thinking!—I could a tale unfold—But won't afflict you—I must fly—Yet I can do no good to-night—Hurrah! Jack! Keep up your spirits! Be determined, like me!—I am the vilest of animals that crawl the earth—Yet I won't flag!—I'll die a bold-faced villain.—I have sold myself—Am disinherited—Have lost—Ah, Sophia!—Hurrah, Jack!—Keep it up.—Round let the great globe whirl! and whirl it will, though I should happen to slide from its surface into infinite nothingness—Drink, my noble soul!

Mil. Your mirth is impertinent, sir.

Har. So it is, Jack—Damned impertinent. But ruin is around us, and it is high time to be merry.

Mil. Sir? I must inform you that, though I have been betrayed by you, and imprisoned by your father, I will not be insulted.

Har. Betrayed by me?

Mil. Ay, sir; I have had full information of your mean arts. It was necessary I should be out of the way, that your designs on Mrs. Warren might meet no interruption.

Har. [Gets off the table.] Pshaw! Good day, Jack, good day. [Going]

Mil. And pray, sir, inform your father I despise his meanness, and spurn at his malice.

Har. [Darting back to MILFORD.] Jack Milford—Utter no blasphemy against my father. I am half mad! I came your friend—

Mil. I despise your friendship.

Har. That's as you please. Think all that is vile of me. I defy you to exceed the truth.—But utter not a word against my father.

Mil. Deliberately, pitifully malignant! Not satisfied with the little vengeance he himself could take, he has sent round to all my creditors.

Har. 'Tis false.

Mil. False!

Har. A vile, eternal falsehood.

Enter Officer, with papers and writs.

Offi. Gentlemen, did you call?

Har. Leave the room, sir.

Offi. But—

Har. We are busy, sir.

Offi. I thought—

Har. I tell you we are busy, and must not be interrupted. [Exit Officer.] Mr. Milford, you shall hear from me immediately. [Exit.]

Mil. What were those papers? Surely I have not been rash! Nobody but his father could have brought my creditors thus on me all at once. He seemed half drunk or half frantic: said he was ruined, disinherited. Talked something of tomorrow. What could the purport of his coming be?

Enter Officer.

Well, sir?

Offi. Here is a note, sir.

Mil. From whom?

Offi. The young gentleman.

Mil. [Reads.] "I understand you are at liberty." How! at liberty! [Officer bows.] "I shall walk up to Hyde-park: you will find me at the ring at six. Exactly at six." At liberty!

Offi. Your debts are all discharged.

Mil. Impossible! Which way? By whom?

Offi. Why, sir—that is—

Mil. No hesitation, but tell me by whom.

Offi. Sir—I thought I perceived some anger between you and the young gentleman?

Mil. Ask no questions, sir: make no delays. Tell me who has paid my debts? Tell me the truth. Consequences you do not suspect depend upon your answer.

Offi. I perceive, sir, there has been some warmth between you; and, though the young gentleman made me promise silence and secrecy—

Mil. What, then, it was Mr. Dornton? [Officer bows.] Madman! what have I done! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The House of Dornton.

Enter HARRY DORNTON, followed by Mr. SMITH.

Har. And the danger not yet past?

Mr. S. Far from it. Mr. Sulky has twice brought us supplies, and is gone a third time.

Har. Brave spirit! He would coin his heart! My father supports it nobly.

Mr. S. He is anxious only for you.

Har. Well, well. Ha, ha, ha! Tol-lol—I'll bring him relief. Comfort him, assure him of it. Ay, hear me, heaven, and—To-night is too late, but to-morrow all shall be well—excellent well.

Mr. S. You will marry the widow.

Har. Have you heard? Ay, boy, ay—We'll marry. I will go and prepare her; we'll marry early in the morning, that all may be safe. I have told her the truth. She knows all—Why, ay, [Looking at his watch.] The proctor's, the lawyer's, the widow's, and—[Starts.]—at six!—the ring!—at six!—Fiends! Who can say what may—What, leave my father to perish? I'll not go! though all hell should brand me for a coward, I'll not go. Mr. Smith, take care of my father. Mark me, I recommend my father to you. [Exit.]

Enter Mr. DORNTON.

Dor. Where is Harry? Did not I hear his voice?

Mr. S. He is this moment gone, sir.

Dor. Gone!—where?

Mr. S. Do you not suspect where, sir?

Dor. Suspect! What? Speak!

Mr. S. To the Widow Warren's.

Dor. For what purpose?

Mr. S. To marry her.

Dor. Marry! The Widow Warren!

Mr. S. And save the house by her fortune.

Dor. Generous Harry! Noble, affectionate boy! I'd perish first!

Mr. S. He seems very resolute. He has already had six thousand pounds of her.

Dor. Marry her! I shall go mad! Where is Mr. Sulky?

Mr. S. He is just returned. I hear him in the counting-house.

Dor. Tell him I wish to speak to him. [Exit Mr. SMITH.] Harry Dornton and the Widow Warren! I shall die in Bedlam!

Enter Mr. SULKY, with a pen in his hand.

Are we safe, Mr. Sulky?

Sul. For to-day, perhaps.

Dor. What bank have we to begin to-morrow?

Sul. I can't tell: I fear not thirty thousand.

Dor. Mr. Sulky, you—you—you—have this day shown yourself an active partner, and a sincere friend.

Sul. Humph.

Dor. I have long esteemed you! I esteem you more and more.

Sul. Humph.

Dor. My son, Harry—You are a very good man, Mr. Sulky; a compassionate man, though you don't look so.

Sul. Humph.

Dor. 'Tis pity to see so noble a youth—I am sure you would not wish him any harm, Mr. Sulky. I am sure you would not.

Sul. Whom?

Dor. Harry Dornton. Would you? Would you? Would you, Mr. Sulky?

Sul. A kind question.

Dor. Nay, I did not mean to be unkind, Mr. Sulky; you know I did not. Shall we not venture one step more to save him?

Sul. Save! Impossible! Ruin only can reform him. Total ruin!

Dor. You mistake, Mr. Sulky. His own misfortunes little affected him, but mine. He is struck to the heart! I know him.

Sul. So do I.

Dor. Struck to the heart. I'm sure on't. He'll be a good man! A great man!

Sul. Humph.

Dor. You know the Widow Warren, Mr. Sulky?

Sul. Don't you?

Dor. I never saw her in my life. I hear she is full forty, her manners absurd, her character cruel, and her morals—

Sul. Bad enough.

Dor. Six thousand pounds at this moment is a great sum. I own it. But do you think I ought not to venture?

Sul. Venture what!

Dor. To—to take it from our Bank.

Sul. For what?

Dor. For—for the—the relief of Harry Dornton.

Sul. What you please! Take all! What is it to me?

Dor. Nay, but, Mr. Sulky, you surely don't see the thing in the right light?

Sul. I can starve like the rest!

Dor. Very well, Mr. Sulky! Very well! I perceive you can be interested, and—and—

Sul. And what?

Dor. Very well, Mr. Sulky! Very well!

Sul. I can stare bankruptcy in the face as steadfastly as you can.

Dor. Ay, ay, no doubt! The world is all alike! I am an old fool, and so shall live and die!

Sul. Why do you ask my advice? Take the money! Empty the coffers! Pour it all into his hat! Give him guineas to play at chuck-farthing, and bank bills to curl his hair!

Dor. Very well, Mr. Sulky! Friendship, generosity, a sense of justice! Oh, it's all a farce!

Sul. Humph.

Dor. [Rings.] Very well, sir! Very well!

Enter Servant.

Is the carriage ready?

Ser. It's at the door, sir.

[Exit.

Dor. So, Mr. Sulky, you would see him married to this widow, to whom you have so often as well as now given the worst of characters, rather than incur a little more risk for your friend?

Sul. Marry!

Dor. Yes, marry!

Sul. Whom?

Dor. The Widow Warren, I tell you.

Sul. Harry Dornton!

Dor. Yes, Harry Dornton!

Sul. When? Where?

Dor. Immediately! With unexampled affection, to save me, who am old and worthless, he would devote his youth, his great qualities, and his noble heart, to all the torments which such a marriage and such a woman can inflict!

Sul. Take the money!

Dor. Are you serious, Mr. Sulky?

Sul. Take the money! Away! Begone! I would indeed starve, inchmeal, rather than he should marry her!

Dor. Mr. Sulky, you are a worthy man, a true friend!

Sul. Curse compliments! Make haste! [Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Widow Warren's.

Enter SOPHIA and JENNY.

Jen. So, Miss! Here's your mamma just coming down.

Sop. Is she dressed?

Jen. Oh yes!—I have decorated her out like any king's coach-horse!

Sop. It's very well.

Jen. With her ribands and ringlets stuck about and dangle-ating down her back; and all her—

Sop. It's very well. It's all very well. But it will be no wedding.—

Jen. [Aside.] I hope not.

Sop. He told her to her face that he loved me, and offered to give her the money back. He'll never have her. And, if he does, I don't care. I know I shall die broken-hearted, but I don't care, I'll tell all to my dear grandma, for I'll not stay in this wicked city. No! he shan't see me pine away. I know my ghost will haunt him; but I can't help it. I never wished him any harm, and had he but been true-hearted and have waited for me, I would—but it's no matter.—He shan't see a tear that I shed, nor hear the least sigh that I heave.

Enter the Widow WARREN.

Jen. Well, ma'am—I declare you're a picture—

Wid. Do you think I look tolerably, Jenny?

Shall I do execution? What is the matter, child?

Sop. Mark my words, he'll never have you.

Wid. Poor thing!

Sop. He never will. [Knocking.

Wid. Run, Jenny, see who it is. [Exit JENNY.

Go up to your chamber, child.

Sop. No, I will stay here.

Wid. Begone to your chamber, I say, miss.

Sop. Beat me, if you please; kill me, but I will not.

Re-enter JENNY.

Jen. Here's an elderly gentleman, ma'am, asks to speak to you.

Wid. Will you begone, miss?

Sop. Since it is not he, I don't want to stay. I only want to look him in the face once more. [Exit.

Wid. How is he dressed?

Jen. In gray, ma'am.

Wid. In gray?

Jen. Yes, ma'am.

Wid. In dark gray?

Jen. Yes, ma'am.

Wid. Does he look like a parson, Jenny?

Jen. Why, ma'am, he's a soberly, snug, jobation-looking man enough.

Wid. Let him be shown in. [Exit JENNY.] I dare say it is the divine

Enter JENNY and Mr. DORNTON.

Dor. Your humble servant, madam!

Wid. Sir, your very most humble servant.

Dor. I presume you are unacquainted with me?

Wid. I believe I can penetrate, sir—

Dor. Can you, madam?

Wid. [Holding her fan before her face.] You—You come on the—part of—young Mr. Dornton?

Dor. I do.

Wid. [Aside.] It is the parson?—[Aloud.] Would you be so indulgent as to be seated, sir?

Dor. Excuse me, madam!

Wid. Would you be pleased to take any refreshment, sir?

Dor. Madam!

Wid. A morsel of seed-cake, a French biscuit, a bit of orange-loaf, a glass of Constantia, or a jelly? I know these little cordial comforts are agreeable consolations to gentlemen of your cloth.

Dor. Cloth!

Wid. No offence, I hope! I participate in them myself.

Dor. Hem! No doubt.

Wid. You are acquainted with Mr. Dornton?

Dor. Why—Yes—I am, I believe, one of his oldest acquaintance.

Wid. Then I dare say you have a great regard for him?

Dor. Hem!—Yes—I—had a—sort of a friendship for him even before he was born.

Wid. Sir!—Oh—you are intimate with the family!

Dor. Yes—yes, madam!

Wid. And know his father?

Dor. Hem—Why—Though I have kept him company from the day of his birth to this very hour, they tell me I don't know him yet!

Wid. Ay, indeed! is he so odd?

Dor. Sometimes—To my great regret, I have sometimes found him a very absurd old gentleman!

Wid. I am sorry for it?—Because, as I am soon to become—hymeneally—his intimate—relation—I—!

Dor. You would wish for a sensible indulgent—papa.

Wid. It's natural, sir.

Dor. Ha! I dare not say too much in his favour.

Wid. Nay, though I have a vast—hum—ha—regard for young Mr. Dornton—I own I have no great predilection of opinion for the father!

Dor. Nor he for you, madam!

Wid. Do you think so?

Dor. I am sure so!

Wid. I warrant, sir, he is, as you say, a very precise acrimonious old gentleman!

Dor. I said no such thing, madam!

Wid. Ah! a little caution, sir, to be sure, becomes gentlemen of your cloth.

Dor. Cloth again!—I don't know what you mean by my cloth! but Mr. Dornton, madam, is little older than yourself; nor does he think himself half so repugnant.

Wid. Sir!

Dor. Madam!—I beg pardon!—I—

Wid. [Knocking.] Oh! here, I dare say, comes the bridegroom!

Dor. [Aside.] My curs'd vivacity! I can never tell her, after this, who I am. [Retires.]

Enter HARRY DORNTON.

Wid. Oh, you rover!

Har. Well, my kind Widow! My loving, compassionate widow! I am come post haste to cast myself once more on your bounty.

Wid. Hush!

Har. To entreat instant commiseration, and aid!

Wid. Hem! Hem!

Har. I have not a minute to spare!

Wid. [Whispers.] He's here! He's come! A waspish, tetchy!—Hem!—[Aloud.] Your friend has been here some time, Mr. Dornton!

Har. My friend! What friend?

Wid. Your friend, the clergyman.

[Pointing to Mr. DORNTON.]

Har. Clergyman! [Turns and sees his father close at his elbow.] My father!

Wid. His father!

Dor. Well, Harry, why do you look so blank? I am glad you are here. Your coming, and the mutual sincerity with which this lady and I have just spoken our sentiments, will save all circumlocution.—At present we understand each other.

Wid. Sir—I—

Dor. Oh, madam, never retract. Let us continue the like plain honest dealing—

Wid. But—sir—Mr. Dornton's affection—

Dor. Ha, ha, ha! Affection, madam!—

Har. Sir—

Dor. Harry, I know your motives. Will never forget them. But the cause of them has ceased.

Har. Sir, beware! No false compassion! Remember not the vile reprobate that was your son. I spurn at the existence that is coupled with your misery.

Dor. Harry, our danger is over.

Har. Are you—are you serious?

Dor. Mr. Sulky is a worthy man! His rich uncle is dead, and has left him sole heir. Our books, too, have been examined, and exceed our best hopes.

Har. My—

Dor. Here is your money, madam. [Offering it.]

Har. My father saved! Tol-de-rol!

Wid. Nay, but—Mr. Dornton!—sir—[Weeping.]

Dor. I must beg you will take it—

Har. Rejoice, Widow! Rejoice! Sing, Shout! Tol-de-rol!

Wid. I do not want the money, sir. Filthy money—And as to what I said, though you have arrested Mr. Milford—

Har. Ha! [Pausing and looking at his watch.]

Wid. I am sorry—I beg your pardon—And, if Mr. Dornton—

Dor. Why don't you speak, Harry? Where are you going? Come back, Harry!—Stay, I say!

Har. I cannot stay! I must fly! My honour is at stake! [Exit.]

Dor. His honour! His honour at stake!—Here, here, madam! [Offering money.]

Wid. Nay, sir—

Dor. 'Sdeath, madam, take your money. [Exit.]

Wid. Cruel usage! Faithless men.—Blind! Stupid! I'll forsake and forswear the whole sex!

Enter JENNY.

Jen. Ma'am! ma'am! Mr. Goldfinch, ma'am!

Wid. Hay! Mr. Goldfinch! Was that what you said, Jenny? Where?

Jen. Below, ma'am. I persuaded him to come up, but he is quite surly.

Wid. Oh! He is coming. Well, I think I will see him—Yes—I think I will.

Jen. I always told you, ma'am, Mr. Goldfinch for me.

Wid. Did you?

Jen. But he says he will have your written promise this very night, or never speak to you more. I hear him. Law, ma'am, you had better give a few touches—Hereabout—Your eyes will have double the spirit and fire.

Wid. Will they?

[Exit.]

Enter GOLDFINCH

Gol. Where's the dowager?

Jen. Hush! Mind what I said to you—It is too late now for a licence, so be sure get the promise—Don't finch!

Gol. Me finch? Game to the backbone!

Jen. Hush!

Re-enter the Widow WARREN.

Gol. Here I am once more, Widow.

Wid. Ah, rambler!

Gol. Are you cured of the tantrums?

Wid. Nay, Mr. Goldfinch—

Gol. Must I keep my distance?

Wid. Unkind!

Gol. Am I a gentleman now?

Wid. Killing!

Gol. Look you, Widow, I know your tricks. Skittish! Won't answer to the whip! Run out of the course! Take the rest.—So give me your promise.

Wid. My promise!

Gol. Signed and sealed.

Wid. Naughty man. You shan't; I won't let you tyrannize over a palpitating heart.

Gol. Palpi—What does she say?

Wid. Go, intruder.

Gol. Oh! what, you won't?

Wid. I'll never forgive you

Gol. I'm off.

Wid. Cruel man!

Gol. I'm off.

Wid. Mr. Goldfinch!

Gol. I'm off—

Wid. You shall have the promise!

Gol. Oh, ho! Why then I pull up—

Wid. Barbarous youth! Could you leave me?—But I must send to Mr. Silky.

Gol. No, no! Let me have the promise directly! I'll go myself to Silky.

Wid. Will you, Mr. Goldfinch?

Gol. Will I not? Take a hack, mount the box—Hayit!—Scud away for the old scoundrel! I'm a deep one—Know the course every inch! I'm the lad for the widow! That's your sort!

Wid. Saucy man! I'll be very angry with you.

Gol. Soon be back.

Wid. Adieu! Fly swiftly, ye minutes!

Gol. But I must have the promise first.

Wid. I will go and write it. Come, dissembler, come!

Gol. She's an old courser; but I knew I should take her at the double. [Exit.]

Enter MILFORD.

Mil. So, Charles; where's the widow?

Gol. The widow's mine!

Mil. Your's?

Gol. I'm the lad! All's concluded—Going post haste for old Silky.

Mil. Silky, did you say?

Gol. Am to pay the miserly rascal fifty thousand pounds down. But mum! That's a secret.

Mil. You are raving.

Gol. Tellee he has her on the hip; she can't marry without his consent.

Mil. But why?

Gol. Don't know. The close old rogue won't tell—Has got some deed, he says—Some writing.

Mil. Indeed!

Gol. Yes—but it's a secret! I shall be a higher fellow than ever, Jack! Go to the second spring meeting—Take you with me—Come down a few to the sweaters and trainers—The knowing ones—The lads—Get into the secret—Lay it on thick—Seven hundred to five—Favourite against the field!—Done!—I'll do it again!—Done!—Five times over—ditto repeated!—Done, done!—Off they go!—Winner lays by—Pretends to want foot—Odds rise high! Take 'em—Winner whispered lame—Lags after—Odds higher, and higher. Take 'em—Creeps up—Breathes 'em over the flat—Works 'em up hill—Passes the distance-post—Still only second—Betting chair in an uproar!—Neck to neck!—Lets him out—Shows him the whip—Shoots by like an arrow—Oh, damme, a hollow thing! That's your sort. [Exit.]

[Exit.]

Mil. Fifty thousand to Silky for his consent, because of some instrument, some writing?—If it should be the—It must—By heaven it must. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Ring in Hyde Park.

Enter HARRY DORNTON, looking at his watch.

Har. How long must I wait? I see nothing of Milford—I'll cut off that bailiff's ears if he has betrayed me.

Enter Mr. DORNTON.

Dor. So, Harry!

Har. My father again.

Dor. What do you do here, Harry?

Har. Sir—I want air.

Dor. So do I.—A pretty dance you have led me. What brought you hither?—Where's the money you had of the Widow? Where's the money, Harry?

Har. Gone, sir.

Dor. Gone!

Har. Most of it.

Dor. And your creditors not paid? [Pause.] And your creditors not paid?

Har. No, sir.

Dor. I suspected—I foreboded this! He has been at some gaming-house, lost all, quarrelled, and come here to put a miserable end to a miserable existence! Oh, who would be a father?

Enter Waiter.

Waiter. Pray—sir—Is your name Dornton?

Dor. It is.

Waiter. Then I am right—Mr. Milford, sir, has sent me with this note. [Exit.]

Har. It is for me, sir!

Dor. How do you know, Harry?

Har. Sir, I am certain!—I must beg—

Dor. This is no time for ceremony!—[Reads.]—“Dear Harry, forgive the provocation I have given you; forgive the wrongs I have done your father”—Me!—“I will submit to any disgrace rather than lift my hand against your life—I would have come and apologized even on my knees, but am prevented—” “J. MILFORD.”

Why, Harry!—What?—What is this?—Tell me—Tell me. Is it in paying Milford's debts you have expended the money?

Har. It is, sir

Dor. But how had he wronged me?—Why did you come here to fight him?

Har. Sir—He—he spoke disrespectfully of you.

Dor. [Taking his son's hand.] Harry!

Har. [Taking his father's hand.] My father!

Dor. Harry! Harry!

Har. Dear sir, let us fly to console poor Milford!

Dor. What you will, Harry! Do with me what you will—Oh, who would not be a father! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The House of the Widow Warren.

Enter MILFORD and Mr. SILKY.

Mil. That fool, Goldfinch, himself informed me, sir, that Silky is to receive fifty thousand pounds for his consent!

Sul. Fifty thousand! Zounds! Why, then, the old scoundrel must have got possession of the will.

Mil. Which is indubitably meant to be destroyed. Goldfinch is just returned with Silky. They are now with the widow; all in high glee, and are coming up here immediately, no doubt to settle the business in private.

Sul. What can be done?

Mil. We must hide ourselves somewhere, and spring upon them.

Sul. I hate hiding! It's deceit, and deceit is the resource of a rascal.

Mil. But there is no avoiding it. We cannot get legal assistance in time. Here are two closets—Do you go into one, and I'll shut myself up in the other. We shall hear what they are about, and can burst upon them at the proper moment.

Sul. Well, if it must be so—But it's a vile, paltry refuge!

Mil. I hear them coming! Make haste.

[Ereunt into the closets.]

Enter SILKY, WIDOW, and GOLDFINCH.

Sil. Ha, ha, ha! I told you, madam, I should hear from you when you wanted me! I knew it must come to that. But you are a lucky man, Mr. Goldfinch! and I'm a lucky man! Ay, and you are a lucky woman, too, madam! We are all in luck.

Gol. Ay, damme, old one, you have been concerned in many a good thing in your time.

Sil. Ah, ha, ha, ha, ha! To be sure I have! I must provide for my family, Mr. Goldfinch.

Wid. It is indeed a fortunate event! Do you not participate my raptures, Mr. Goldfinch?

Gol. To be sure—it's a deep scheme; it's knowing a thing or two! Ha, old one! Pigeoning the greenhorns.

Sil. All so safe, too; so snug! I am so pleased, and so happy! It's all our own! Not a soul will know of it but our three selves.

Gol. Oh, yes—One more, old one.

Sil. Ay! Who? Who?

Gol. Your father—Beelzebub.

Sil. Lord! Mr. Goldfinch, don't terrify me!

Wid. To be sure, it must be owned you are a shocking old rogue, Mr. Silky; but there is no doing without you. So make haste with your deeds and your extortions; for really we should be very glad to be rid of your company—

Sil. Well, well, I'm ready; I'll not long interrupt your amorous haste. I am a man of business. I expected how it would be, and have a legal instrument here, ready drawn up by my own hand; which, when it is signed and sealed, will make all safe.

Wid. But where is the will?

Sil. [All three sit at a table.] Oh, I have it. First, however, let us be secure. [Locks the chamber doors; is going to read, but looks round, sees the closet doors, and locks them too.]

Gol. You're an old trader in sin! There's no being too deep for you.

Sil. Ah, ha, ha, ha! Do you think so, Mr. Goldfinch?

Gol. But I should like to see you on your death-bed! [A blow from one of the closets.]

Sil. Bless my soul! What's that?

Gol. Zounds! Odd enough. I believe he's coming for you before your time.

Wid. It was very strange.

Sil. I declare I am all of a tremble!

Wid. Come, come, let us get the shocking business over.—Where is the will?

Gol. Don't shake so, man!

Sil. Well, well; first sign the bond. [Widow and GOLDFINCH going to sign, another knock heard.] Lord have mercy upon me!

Gol. I smell sulphur.

Wid. Save me, Mr. Goldfinch

Sil. The candles burn blue!

Gol. Pshaw! Zounds, it's only some cat in the closet!

Sil. I heard it in both the closets.

Gol. Why, then, there are two cats! Come, I'll sign. [They sign the bond.]

Sil. Where's the promise?

Gol. Here it is. [Laying it on the table.]

Sil. And here is the will, which, that all may be safe, we will immediately commit to the flames. [Is going to burn it at the candle. Knocking at each of the doors. SILKY starts, drops one candle, and over-returns the other.] Lord have mercy upon us!

Gol. My hair stands on end.

Wid. [Knocking at closets and doors.] Save me, Mr. Goldfinch! Protect me! Ah! [Shrieks.]

[SILKY and MILFORD burst open the closets, and seize on the bond and promise; then open the chamber doors; enter JENNY with lights, and SOPHIA, HARRY DORNTON, and Mr. DORNTON.]

Sop. Dear ma', what's the matter?

Sul. Where is the will? [SILKY snatches it up.] Give it me, you old scoundrel! Give it me this instant, or I'll throttle you! [Wrests it from him.]

Mil. So, gentlemen! you are a pretty pair of knaves.

Sul. And you are a very worthy lady.

Wid. Don't talk to me, man!—Don't talk to me! I shall never recover my senses again. [Retires.]

Har. What has happened, gentlemen? How came you all locked up together?

Dor. Are you here, Mr. Silky?

Sul. Yes; there's the honest, grateful, friendly Mr. Silky! who would betray his friends, plunder the living, and defraud the dead, for the ease of his conscience, and to provide for his family.

Gol. Old one! You're done up.

Sul. And here is the girlish old coquette, who would rob her daughter and leave her husband's son to rot in a dungeon, that she might marry the first fool she could find.

Gol. Widow, you are dished! [SILKY examines the will.] Lost your last chance!

Dor. A broken gamester, nurtured in idleness, ignorance, and dissipation, whose ridings, racings, and drivings are over, and whose whole train of horses, dogs, curricles, phaetons, and fooleries must come to the hammer, immediately, is no great loss.

Sop. Oh, la!

Dor. I knew your father, sir: 'tis happy for him that he is dead. If you will forsake these courses and apply to trade—

Gol. Damn trade! Whose for the spring meeting? Cross 'em and wind 'em! Seven to five, you don't name the winner! I'm for life and a curricule! A cut at the caster, and the long odds!—Damn trade! The four aces, a back hand, and a lucky nick! I'm a deep one? That's your sort! [Exit.]

Sil. And now, madam—

Wid. Keep off, monster! You smell of malice, cruelty, and persecution.

Sul. No, madam: I smell of honesty! A drug you nauseate, but with which you must forcibly be dosed!—I have glanced over the will, and find I have the power.

Wid. Let me go, goblin!—You are a hideous person, and I hate the sight of you. Your breast is flint! flint! unfeeling gorgon, and I abominate you.

Sop. Nay, you are a kind, good, cross old soul; and I am sure you will forgive my poor ma'. We ought all to forget and forgive. Ought not we, Mr. Dornton?

Har. Do you hear her, sir? [To DORNTON.]

Dor. Harry has told me of your innocent, pure, and unsuspecting heart—I love you for having called me an ugly monster.

Sop. [To HARRY.] La, Mr. Dornton, how could you—

Sul. Harry—Give me your hand—You have a generous and a noble nature. But your generosity would have proved more pernicious than even your dissipation. No misfortunes,—no, not the beggary and ruin of a father, could justify so unprincipled a marriage.

Dor. And now, [To SULKY.] my friend.

Mil. My father!

Har. My—

Sul. Whoo! if you wish to get another word from me to-night, have done. [Turning to SILKY.] I hate fawning.

Sil. Ah, Mr. Sulky, you will have your humour.

Sul. The indiscriminating generosity of this young man supported you in your day of distress; for which, serpent-like, you turned to sting your preserver.

Sil. Ah, you will have your humour.

Sul. Yes; and it is my humour to see that your villainy shall be exposed in its true colours. Hypocrisy, falsehood, and fraud, are your familiars. To screen your avarice, you made it believed that this gentleman had been the cause of lodging the debtors, and had done the dirty work of which even you were ashamed. But the creditors shall receive their full demand.

Dor. The proposal is just. Listen to that worthy man; and, if you can, be honest with a good grace. Everything will then be readily adjusted, and I hope to the satisfaction of all parties.

THE END.

A TALE OF MYSTERY;

A MELODRAMA, IN TWO ACTS,

SELINA
FIAMETTA

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Gothic Hall in the House of Bonamo, a table, pen, ink, paper, and chairs.

Enter SELINA and FIAMETTA.

Sel. You seem hurried, Fiametta.

Fiam. Hurried, truly! yes, yes, and you'll be hurried too.

Sel. I?

Fiam. Fine news!

Sel. Of what kind?

Fiam. A very bad kind. The Count Romaldi—

Sel. What of him?

Fiam. Is coming.

Sel. When?

Fiam. This evening.

Sel. Heavens! what can he want?

Fiam. Want? he wants mischief. We all know he wants you to marry his son, because you're a rich heiress.

Sel. Surely, my uncle will never consent?

Fiam. Your uncle and all Savoy fear him.

Bona. [Without.] Fiametta!

Fiam. I am here, sir.

Bona. [Without.] But I want you here!

Fiam. Lord, sir, I am busy.

Sel. Go, run to my uncle.

Fiam. It's a shame that he should not think of marrying you to his own son, when he knows how dearly you love each other.

Sel. It is the excellence of my dear uncle's heart that disdains the appearance of self-interest.

Fiam. So, rather than be blamed himself, he'll make you and I and every body miserable! But I'll talk to him.

Bona. [Without.] Fiametta, I say.

Fiam. Coming! He shall hear of it. I'm in the proper cue. He knows I'm right, and I'll not spare him. [Exit.]

Enter STEPHANO, with his fowling-piece, net, and game.

Sel. Why are you so late, Stephano? I had a thousand alarms.

Steph. Forgive me, dear Selino; the pursuit of game led me too far among the mountains.

Sel. Do you know—

Steph. What?

Sel. I almost dread to tell you. Count Romaldi is coming.

Steph. Romaldi!

Sel. I shudder when I recollect the selfishness of his views, and the violence of his character.

Steph. Add, the wickedness of his heart.

Enter BONAMO and FIAMETTA.

Fiam. I tell you again, sir, it is uncharitable, it is cruel, it is hard-hearted in you to give any such orders.

Bona. And I tell you they shall be obeyed. Have not I a right to do as I please in my own house?

Fiam. No, sir, you have no right to do wrong any where.

Steph. What is the dispute, sir?

Fiam. He has ordered me to turn the poor Francisco out of doors; because, forsooth, the house is not large enough to hold this Count Romaldi.

Sel. Think, my dear uncle, how grateful and kind is his heart.

Steph. And that he is a man of fortune.

Bona. Folly and misfortune are twins: nobody can tell one from the other. He has got footing here, and you seem all determined he shall keep it.

Sel. I own I am interested in his favour: his manners are so mild.

Steph. His eye so expressive.

Sel. His behaviour so proper.

Fiam. I'll be bound he is of genteel parentage!

Bona. Who told you so?

Fiam. Not he, himself, for certain: because poor creature, he is dumb. But only observe his sorrowful looks. What it is I don't know, but there is something on his mind so—

Bona. You are a fool!

Fiam. Fool or not, I have served you faithfully these three-and-twenty years; so you may turn me out of doors at last, if you please.

Bona. I!

Fiam. Yes; for if you turn Francisco out, I'll never enter them again.

Bona. You certainly know more concerning this man?

Fiam. Since it must be told, I do.

Bona. Then speak.

Fiam. It is quite a tragedy.

Bona. Indeed! let us hear.

Fiam. It is now seven or eight years ago, when, you having sent me to Chambery, I was coming home; it was almost dark; everything was still; I was winding along the dale, and the rocks were all as it were turning black; of a sudden I heard cries; a man was murdering; I shook from head to foot; presently the cries died away; and I beheld two bloody men, with their daggers in their hands, stealing off under the crags at the foot of the hill. I stood like a stone, for I was frightened out of my wits! So I thought I heard groans; and, afraid as I was, I had the sense to think they must come from the poor murdered creature. So I listened, and followed my ears, and presently I saw this very man—

Sel. Francisco?

Fiam. Weltering in his blood! To be sure I screamed and called loud enough; for what could I do by myself? So presently my cries were heard: and honest Michelli, the miller, with his man, came running.

Bona. I now remember the tale. The poor man recovered, and every body praised Michelli.

Fiam. So they ought; he is an honest good soul! What then, sir, can you suppose I thought, when, about a week ago, I again saw Francisco's apparition standing before me; making signs that he was famished with hunger and thirst. I knew him at once; and he soon bethought himself of me. If you had seen his clasped hands, and his thankful looks, and his dumb notes, and his signs of joy at having found me! While I have a morsel he shall never want. I'll hire him a cottage; I'll wait upon him; I'll work for him; so turn him out of doors, if you have the heart.

Steph. Fiametta, you wrong my father.

Bona. I'll hear his story from himself.

Fiam. He can't speak.

Bona. But he can write.

Fiam. I'll warrant him. I'm sure he's a gentleman.

Bona. Bring him here: if he prove himself an honest man, I am his friend.

Fiam. I know that, or you should be no master of mine. [Erit.]

Steph. His kind attentions to Selina are singular.

Sel. Every morning I find him waiting for me with fresh gathered flowers; which he offers with such modest yet affectionate looks.

FIAMETTA returns with FRANCISCO.

Bona. Come near, friend. You understand his gestures, Fiametta; so stay where you are.

Fiam. I intend it.

Bona. [Aside.] He has a manly form; a benevolent eye! Sit down, sir. Leave us, my children.

[Francisco suddenly rises, as STEPHANO and SELINA offer to go; brings them back, and entreats by signs that they may remain.]

Bona. Since he desires it, stay. There are pen, ink, and paper; when you cannot answer by signs, write; but be strict to the truth.

[Francisco, with dignity, points to heaven and his heart.]

Bona. Who are you?

[FRANCISCO goes to a table, sits and writes; and STEPHANO, standing behind him, takes up the paper and reads the answers.]

Fran. "A noble Roman!"

Bona. Your family?—

Fran. [Gives a sudden sign of Forbear! and writes.] "Must not be known."

Bona. Why?

Fran. "It is disgraced."

Bona. By you?

Fran. [Gesticulates.]

Fiam. [Interpreting.] No, no, no!

Bona. Who made you dumb?

Fran. "The Algerines."

Bona. How came you in their power?

Fran. "By treachery."

Bona. Do you know the traitors?

Fran. [Gesticulates.]

Fiam. He does, he does!

Bona. Who are they?

Fran. "The same who stabbed me among the rocks."

Bona. Name them.

Fran. [Gesticulates.] "Never!"

Bona. Are they known by me?

Fiam. [Interpreting.] They are, they are!

Bona. Are they rich?

Fran. "Rich and powerful."

Bona. Astonishing! Your refusal to name them gives strange suspicions. I must know more: tell me all, or quit my house.

Enter PIERO.

Pier. Count Romaldi, sir.

[FRANCISCO starts up, struck with alarm.]

Steph. So soon!

Bona. Shew him up.

Pier. He's here.

[ROMALDI suddenly enters, as FRANCISCO is attempting to pass the door; they start back at the sight of each other.—FRANCISCO leaves the room.]

Bona. What is all this! Where is he gone? Call him back, Fiametta.

[Exeunt FIAMETTA and STEPHANO.]

Rom. At length, my good friend, I am here. I have long promised myself the pleasure of seeing you. Your hand. How hearty you look! And your lovely niece! Her father's picture.

Bona. Rather her mother's.

Rom. My son will adore her. In two days I expect him here. I have serious business to communicate.

Sel. [To BONAMO.] Permit me to retire, sir.

Bona. Go, my child; go.

Sel. [Aside.] Grant, oh merciful heaven, I may not fall a sacrifice to avarice! [Erit.]

Bona. And now your pleasure, count?

Rom. Nay, I imagine, you can guess my errand. You know my friendship for my son; who, let me tell you, is your great admirer. The care you have bestowed upon your niece, her education, mind, and manners, and the faithful guardian you have been, both of her wealth and person, well deserve praise.

Bona. If I have done my duty, I am greatly fortunate.

Rom. She is a lovely young lady; and you are not ignorant of my son's passion; to which your duty towards your niece must make you a friend. I therefore come, with open frankness, to propose their union.

Bona. And I, with equal candour, must tell you, I can give no answer.

Rom. No answer!

Bona. Your rank and wealth make the proposal flattering; but there is a question still more serious.

Rom. What can that be?

Bona. One which my niece only can resolve.

Rom. Inexperience like hers should have no opinion.

Bona. How, my lord! Drag the bride, by force, to that solemn altar, where, in the face of heaven, she is to declare her choice is free?

Rom. Mere ceremonies.

Bona. Ceremonies! Bethink yourself; lest marriage become a farce, libertinism a thing to laugh at, and adultery itself a finable offence!

Rom. Ay, ay; you are a moralist; a conscientious man. Your son is reported to have designs on Selina.

Bona. My lord!

Rom. No anger: I speak as a friend. Her fortune is tempting; but you disdain to be influenced. The wealth and rank of our family—

Bona. Surpass mine. True: still my niece, I say, must be consulted.

Rom. Indeed! Then my alliance, it seems, is refused?

Bona. By no means; I have neither the right to refuse nor to accept. If Selina—

Re-enter SELINA, with a letter.

Sel. [Presenting it to BONAMO.] From the unfortunate Francisco.

Rom. What, that strange fellow I met as I came in?

Sel. [Aside.] He knows his name!

Rom. I forgot to ask how he got admittance here?

Sel. I should hope, my lord, there would always be some charitable door open to the unfortunate!

Rom. I addressed your uncle, lovely lady.

Bona. When you came in, he was relating his adventures, which have been strange.

Rom. And are you, my friend, simple enough to believe such tales?

Sel. What tales, my lord?

Bona. The proofs are convincing! the mutilation he has suffered; the wounds he received, not a league from hence; and the—

Rom. Did he name—

Bona. Who? The monsters that gave them?—No; but they are not unknown to him.

Rom. That—that is fortunate.

Bona. I was amazed to learn—

Rom. What?

Bona. That they are rich and powerful. But I forget: the story can have no interest for you.

Rom. You mistake: I—my feelings are as keen as yours.

Bona. But what has he written?

[Offers to open the letter.]

Rom. If you will take my advice, you will not read. Doubtless he has more complaints, more tales, more favours to request. Be kind and hospitable; but do not be a dupe.

Bona. Of which, I own, there is danger.

Rom. [Seizing the letter.] Then let me guard you against it.

Sel. [After watching ROMALDI, snatches the letter back.] This letter, my lord, was given in charge to me; I promised to bring an answer; and I respectfully intreat my uncle will read it.

Bona. Well, well. [Reads.] "Friend of humanity, should I remain, the peace of your family might be disturbed. I therefore go; but earnestly intreat you will neither think me capable of falsehood nor ingratitude—Wherever I am, my wishes and my heart will be here.—Farewell." He shall not go.

Rom. Why not? He owns the peace of your family may be disturbed.

Bona. Fly, Selina; tell him I require, I request him to sleep here to-night, that I may speak with him to-morrow.

Rom. [Aside.] That must not be.

Sel. Thanks, my dear uncle! you have made me happy. [Exit.]

Enter PIERO.

Bona. What now, Piero?

Pier. Signior Montano is below.

Rom. [Aside.] Montano!

Bona. I'm very glad of it, for I wanted his advice. The best of men!

Pier. Please to come up, sir.

Rom. With your permission, I will retire.

Enter MONTANO.

Mon. I beg pardon, good sir, but—

[MONTANO sees ROMALDI, at which he starts with terror and indignation.]

Can it be possible!

Rom. Sir!

Mon. You here!

Rom. Not having the honour of your acquaintance, I know not why my presence should please or displease you.

Mon. [After a look of contempt at ROMALDI, addresses BONAMO.] Good night, my friend; I will see you to-morrow. [Exit.]

Bona. Nay, but signior! Signior Montano! Are the people all mad? Fiametta!

Fiam. [Without.] Sir!

Bona. Run, overtake him; and say I must speak with him. Excuse me for going.

Rom. Why in such haste? I have heard of this Montano: a credulous person; a relator of strange stories.

Bona. Signior Montano credulous! There is not in all Savoy a man of sounder understanding. Good night, my lord; I will send your servant: that door leads to your bed-room. Call for whatever you want; the house is at your command. [Exit.]

Rom. What am I to think? How act? The arm of Providence seems raised to strike!—Am I become a coward? shall I betray, rather than defend myself? I am not yet an idiot.

Enter MALVOGLIO.

Mal. Your lordship seems disturbed?

Rom. Francisco is here.

Mal. I saw him.

Rom. And did not your blood freeze?

Mal. I was sorry.

Rom. For what?

Mal. That my dagger had missed its aim.

Rom. We are in his power.

Mal. He is in ours.

Rom. What are your thoughts?

Mal. What are yours, my lord?

Rom. Guess them.

Mal. Executioners!

Rom. Infamy!

Mal. Racks!

Rom. Maledictions!

Mal. From all which a blow may yet deliver us.

Enter SELINA, who hides behind a door.

Rom. 'Tis a damning crime!

Mal. Were it the first.

Rom. Where is he to sleep?

Mal. There! [Pointing to a chamber.]

Sel. They mean Francisco! The monsters!

Rom. Obstinate fool! since he will stay—

Mal. He must die.

Sel. The monsters!

Rom. I heard a noise.

Mal. He's coming.

Rom. Let us retire and concert—

Mal. Then, at midnight—

Rom. When he sleeps—

Mal. He'll wake no more!

[Ereunt.]

[FIANETTA enters, with FRANCISCO and a lamp, which she places on a table. She points to his bed-room, then curtsies and retires, he returning her kindness. He seats himself as if to write; rises, takes the lamp, looks round with apprehension; goes to the chamber-door of ROMALDI, starts away with horror, recovers himself, again places the lamp on the table, and sits down to write. The door of ROMALDI's chamber opens; MALVOGLIO half appears, watching FRANCISCO; but as he turns, again retires.]

Enter SELINA, who gently pulls FRANCISCO's sleeve; she starts; but seeing her, is satisfied.

Sel. [In a low voice.] Dare not to sleep! I will be on the watch! Your life is in danger! [Exit.]

[FRANCISCO, greatly agitated, draws a pair of pistols, lays them on the table, and seats himself.]

Enter ROMALDI and MALVOGLIO.

Rom. [To MALVOGLIO.] Watch that entrance. [To FRANCISCO.] Wretched fool! Why are you here?

[FRANCISCO starts up, seizes the pistols, points them towards ROMALDI and MALVOGLIO, and commands the former, by signs, to read the paper on the table.]

Rom. [Reads.] "Repent; leave the house. Oblige me not to betray you. Force me not on self-defence." Fool! do you pretend to command? [Throws him a purse.] We are two. Take that, and fly.

[FRANCISCO, after a look of compassionate appeal, spurns it from him; and commands them to go.]

Rom. [Aside to MALVOGLIO.] I know him! he will not fire.

[They draw their daggers; he at first avoids them; at length they each seize him by the arm, and are in the attitude of striking, when the shrieks of SELINA bring BONAMO, STEPHANO and Servants.]

Sel. Uncle! Stephano! Murder!

[ROMALDI and MALVOGLIO, at hearing the noise behind, quit FRANCISCO, and feign to be standing on self-defence.]

Bona. What mean these cries? What strange proceedings are here?

Sel. They are horrible.

Bona. Why, my lord, are these daggers drawn against a man under my protection?

Rom. Self-defence is a duty. Is not his pistol levelled at my breast?

Bona. [To FRANCISCO.] Can it be?

[FRANCISCO inclines his head.]

Bona. Do you thus repay hospitality?

Sel. Sir, you are deceived: his life was threatened.

Rom. Madam—

Sel. I fear you not! I watched, I overheard you!

Bona. Is this true?

Rom. No.

Sel. By the purity of heaven, yes! Behind that door, I heard the whole; Francisco must quit the house, or be murdered!

Rom. [To BONAMO.] I expect, sir, my word will not be doubted.

Bona. My lord, there is one thing of which I cannot doubt: the moment you appeared, terror was spread through my house. Men's minds are troubled at the sight of you: they seem all to avoid you. Good seldom accompanies mystery; I therefore now decidedly reply, to your proposal, that my niece cannot be the wife of your son; and must further add, you oblige me to decline the honour of your present visit.

Rom. Speak the truth, old man, and own you are glad to find a pretext to colour refusal, and gratify ambition. Selina and Stephano; you want her wealth, and mean in that way to make it secure. But, beware! Dare to pursue your project, and tremble at the consequences! To-morrow, before ten o'clock, send your written consent; or dread what shall be done

[Ereunt ROMALDI and MALVOGLIO.]

Bona. Dangerous and haughty man! But his threats are vain; my doubts are removed; Selina shall not be the victim of mean precaution and cowardly fears. I know your wishes, children. Let us retire. [To his Servants.] Make preparations for rejoicing: early to-morrow, Stephano and Selina shall be affianced.

[They kneel.]

Steph. My kind father!

Sel. Dearest, best of guardians!

Bona. Francisco shall partake the common happiness.

Fiam. Dear, dear! I sha'n't sleep to-night.

[Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A beautiful garden and pleasure grounds, with garlands, festoons, love devices, and every preparation for a marriage festival.

First and Second Gardeners. PIERRO and his companions; all busy.

Pier. Come, come; bestir yourselves! The company will soon be here.

First Gard. Well; let them come: all is ready.

Pier. It has a nice look, by my fackins!

First Gard. I believe it has! thanks to me.

Pier. Thanks to you!

Second Gard. And me.

Pier. And you? Here's impudence! I say it is thanks to me.

F. and S. Gard. You, indeed?

Pier. Why, surely, you'll not have the face to pretend to deny my incapacity?

F. Gard. Yours?

S. Gard. Yours?

Pier. Mine, mine!

Enter STEPHANO.

Steph. What is the matter, my honest friends?

F. Gard. Why, here's Mr. Piero pretends to dispute his claim to all that has been done.

S. Gard. Yes; and says every thing is owing to his incapacity.

F. Gard. Now I maintain the incapacity was all my own. [To STEPH.] Saving and excepting yours, sir.

S. Gard. And mine.

F. Gard. Seeing you gave the first orders.

Pier. But wasn't they given to me, sir? Did'n't you say to me, Piero, says you—

Steph. Ay, ay; each man has done his part: all is excellent, and I thank you kindly. Are the villagers invited?

Pier. Invited! They no sooner heard of the wedding than they were half out of their wits! There will be such dancing and sporting! Then the music! Little Nanine, with her hurdy-gurdy; her brother, with the tabor and pipe; the blind fiddler, the lame piper, I and my Jew's harp! such a band!

Steph. Bravo: order every thing for the best.

Pier. But who is to order? Please to tell me that, sir?

Steph. Why, you.

Pier. There; [To his companions.] Mind! I am to order! Mark that!

Steph. You shall be major-domo for the day.

Pier. You hear. I am to be—do—drum-major for the day.

Steph. Selina is coming. To your posts.

[They hurry each to his garland, and conceal themselves by the trees and bushes.]

Enter BONAMO, SELINA, and FIAMETTA.

Bona. Vastly well, upon my word!

Sel. I fear, Stephano, you have slept but 'ittle?

Bona. Sleep, indeed! He had something better to think of. Come, come; we'll breakfast here in the bower. Order it, Fiametta.

Fiam. Directly, sir.

[She goes, and returns with the servants; aiding them to arrange the breakfast table.]

Bona. How reviving to age is the happiness of the young! And yet—thou hast long been an orphan, Selina; it has more than doubled thy fortune, which was great at my brother's sudden death. Would thou hadst less wealth, or I more!

Sel. And why, my dear uncle?

Bona. Evil tongues—this Romaldi—

Steph. Forget him.

Sel. Would that were possible! his menace—before ten o'clock—oh! that the hour were over.

Bona. Come, come; we'll not disturb our hearts with fears. To breakfast, and then to the notary. I forgot Francisco; why is he not here?

Sel. Shall I bring him?

Bona. Do you go, Fiametta.

Fiam. Most willingly.

Bona. Come, sit down. [They seat themselves.]

[PIERO peeps from behind a shrub. STEPHANO gives a gentle clap with his hands, and the peasants all rise from their hiding-places, and suspend their garlands in a picturesque group, over BONAMO, SELINA, and STEPHANO.]

Pier. What say you to that now?

Bona. Charming! charming!

Pier. I hope I am not made a major for nothing.

Bona. [To FRANCISCO, who enters with FIAMETTA.] Come, sir, please to take your seat.

Pier. [To STEPH.] Shall the sports begin?

Steph. [Gives an affirmative sign.]

Pier. Here, dancers! pipers! strummers! thrummers! to your places. This bench is for the band of music—mount.

[Dancing commences. In the midst of the rejoicing the clock strikes; the dancing suddenly ceases.]

Enter MALVOGLIO.

[The company start up; FRANCISCO, STEPHANO, SELINA, and BONAMO express terror. The peasants alarmed and watching: the whole, during a short pause, forming a picture.]

MALVOGLIO then presents a letter to BONAMO, and retires. BONAMO opens the letter and reads.

Bona. Oh, shame! dishonour! treachery!

Steph. My father!

Sel. My uncle!

Fiam. What treachery?

Fran. [Attitude of despair.]

Bona. No more of love or marriage! no more of sports, rejoicings, and mirth.

Steph. Good heavens!

Sel. My guardian! my friend! my uncle!

Bona. I am not your uncle.

Sel. Sir!

Steph. Not?

Bona. She is the child of crime! of adultery.

[A general surprise; the despair of FRANCISCO extreme.]

Step. 'Tis malice, my father!

Bona. Read.

Steph. The calumny of Romaldi!

Bona. Read.

Steph. [Reads.] "Selina is not your brother's daughter. To prove I speak nothing but the truth, I send you the certificate of her baptism."

Bona. 'Tis here—authenticated. Once more read.

Steph. [Reads.] "May the 11th, 1584, at ten o'clock this evening was baptized Selina Bianchi, the daughter of Francisco Bianchi."

Fran. [Utters a cry, and falls on the seat.]

Sel. Is it possible? my father!

Fran. [Opens his arms, and SELINA falls on his neck.]

Steph. Amazement!

Bona. Sinful man! not satisfied with having dishonoured my brother, after claiming my pity, would you aid in making me contract a most shameful alliance? Begone! you and the offspring of your guilt.

Steph. Selina is innocent.

Fran. [Confirms it.]

Bona. Her father is—a wretch! Once more begone.

Fran. [During this dialogue had held his daughter in his arms: he now rises with a sense of injury, and is leading her away.]

Bona. Hold, miserable man.—[To himself:] Houseless—pennyless—without bread—without asylum—must she perish because her father has been wicked? [To FRANCISCO.] Take this purse, conceal your shame, and, when 'tis empty, let me know your hiding place.

Fran. [Expresses gratitude, but rejects the purse.]

Sel. Spare your benefits, sir, till you think we deserve them.

Bona. Poor Selina!

Steph. What say you, sir?

Bona. Nothing—let them begone.

Sel. Stephano! farewell.

Steph. She shall not go! or—I will follow.

Bona. And forsake your father! ungrateful boy! [To FRANCISCO.] Begone, I say. Let me never see you more. [To the peasants.] Confine that frantic youth.

[STEPHANO endeavours to force his way to SELINA; FIAMETTA embraces her; and by gesture reproaches BONAMO, who persists, yet is tormented by doubt. STEPHANO escapes, and suddenly hurries SELINA forward, to detain her; after violent efforts, they are again forced asunder.

SCENE II.—The House of Bonamo.

BONAMO, STEPHANO brought on by the Peasants, who then leave the room.

Bona. Disobedient, senseless boy!

Steph. Selina! give me back Selina, or take my life!

Bona. Forbear these complaints.

Steph. She is the woman I love.

Bona. Dare you—

Steph. None but she shall be my wife.

Bona. Your wife!

Steph. To the world's end I'll follow her!

Bona. And quit your father? Now, when age and infirmity bend him to the grave?

Steph. We will return to claim your blessing.

Bona. Stephano! I have loved you like a father; beware of my malediction.

Steph. When a father's malediction is unjust, Heaven is deaf.

Enter FIAMETTA.

Fiam. Very well! It's all very right! But you will see how it will end!

Bona. [To STEPH.] I no longer wonder, Count Romaldi should advise me to drive such a wretch from my house.

Fiam. Count Romaldi is himself a wretch.

Bona. Fiametta!—

Fiam. I say it again: a vile, wicked wretch! and has written—

Bona. The truth. The certificate is incontestible.

Fiam. I would not for all the world be guilty of your sins.

Bona. Woman!

Fiam. I don't care for you; I loved you this morning; I would have lost my life for you; but you are grown wicked.

Bona. Will you be silent?

Fiam. Is it not wickedness to turn a sweet innocent helpless young creature out of doors; one who has behaved with such tenderness; and leave her at last to starve? Oh, it is abominable!

Bona. Once more, hold your tongue.

Fiam. I won't! I can't! Poor Stephano! And do you think he'll forbear to love her? If he did, I should hate him! But he'll make his escape. You may hold him to-day, but he'll be gone to-morrow. He'll overtake and find his dear forlorn Selina; and they will marry, and live in poverty; but they will work, and eat their morsel with a good conscience; while you will turn from your dainties with an aching heart!

Bona. For the last time, I warn you.

Fiam. I know the worst: I have worked for you all the prime of my youth; and now you'll serve me as you have served the innocent, wretched Selina; you'll turn me out of doors. Do it! But I'll not go till I've said out my say: so I tell you again, you are a hard-hearted uncle, an unfeeling father, and an unjust master! Every body will shun you! You will dwindle out a life of misery, and nobody will pity you; because you don't deserve pity. So now I'll go, as soon as you please.

Enter Signior MONTANO.

Mon. What is it I have just heard, my friend? Have you driven away your niece?

Bona. She is not my niece.

Mon. 'Tis true.

Fiam. How?

Mon. But where did you learn that?

Bona. From these papers.

Mon. Who sent them?

Bona. Count Romaldi.

Mon. Count Romaldi is—a villain.

Fiam. There! there!

Steph. You hear, sir!

Fiam. I hope I shall be believed another time.

Bona. Silence, woman!—By a man like you, such an accusation cannot be made without sufficient proofs.

Mon. You shall have them. Be attentive.

Fiam. I won't breathe! A word sha'n't escape my lips. [They press round MONTANO.

Mon. Eight years ago, before I had the honour to know you, returning one evening after visiting my friends, I was leisurely ascending the rock of Arpennaz—

Fiam. So, so! The rock of Arpennaz! You hear! But I'll not say a word.

Mon. Two men, wild in their looks, and smeared with blood, passed hastily by me, with every appearance of guilt impressed upon their countenances.

Fiam. The very same! Eight years ago! The rock of Arpennaz! The—Bona. Silence!

Fiam. I'll not say a word. Tell all, sir; I am dumb.

Mon. They had not gone a hundred paces before he who appeared the master staggered and fell. I hastened to him: he bled much, and I and his servant supported him to my house. They said they had been attacked by banditti; yet their torn clothes, a deep bite which the master had on the back of his hand, and other hurts appearing to be given by an unarmed man, made me doubt. Their embarrassment increased suspicion, which was confirmed next day by Michelli, the honest miller of Arpennaz; who, the evening before, near the spot from which I saw these men ascend, had succoured a poor wretch, dreadfully cut and mangled.

Fiam. It's all true! 'Twas I! I myself! My cries made Michelli come! Eight years—

Bona. Again?

Fiam. I've done.

Mon. I no longer doubted I had entertained men of blood, and hastened to deliver them up to justice; but, when I returned, they had flown, having left a purse, and this letter.

Bona. 'Tis the hand of Romaldi.

Mon. Imagine my surprise and indignation yesterday evening, when I here once more beheld the assassin! I could not disguise my emotion; and I left you with such abruptness to give immediate information. The archers are now in pursuit; I have no doubt they will soon secure him, as they have already secured his accomplice.

Steph. Malvoglio?

Mon. Yes, who has confessed—

Steph. What?

Mon. That the real name of this pretended Romaldi is Bianchi.

Bona. Just heaven! Francisco's brother!

Mon. Whose wife this wicked brother loved. Privately married, and she pregnant, Francisco put her under the protection of his friend here in Savoy.

Steph. My uncle! His sudden death occasioned the mystery.

Mon. But the false Romaldi decoyed Francisco into the power of the Algerines, seized his estates, and, finding he had escaped, attempted to assassinate him.

Fiam. Now are you convinced? He would not 'peach his brother of abomination! I told you Francisco was an angel! but, for all you know me so well, I'm not to be believed.

Bona. You are not to be silenced.

Fiam. No; I'm not. Francisco is an angel, Selina is an angel, Stephano is an angel: they shall be married, and all make one family; of which, if you repent, you shall be received into the bosom.

Bona. Pray, good woman, hold your tongue.

Fiam. Repent, then! Repent! [Distant thunder.]

Bona. I do repent!

Fiam. Then I forgive you. [Sobs.] I won't turn you away. You're my master again.

[Kisses his hand, and wipes her eyes.]

Bona. But where shall we find Selina, and—

Fiam. Oh, I know where!

Steph. Do you?

Fiam. Why, could you think that—Follow me! Only follow me. [Exeunt.—Thunder.]

SCENE III.—A wild mountainous country. A rude wooden bridge; a mill-stream; the Miller's house; a stone or bank to sit on.—Thunder, lightning, &c.

Enter ROMALDI from the rocks, disguised as a peasant.

Rom. Whither fly? Where shield me from pursuit, and death, and ignominy? My hour is come! The fiends that tempted, now tear me. [Thunder.] The heavens shoot their fires at me! Save! Spare! Oh spare me! [Falls on the bank.]

After a pause, he raises his head. Thunder. He again falls on his face. The storm gradually abates. A distant voice "Holloa!" He half rises, starts, and runs from side to side, looking and listening. Voice again, "Holloa!"

Rom. They are after me! Some one points me out! No den, no cave, can hide me! [Looking the way he came.] I cannot return that way, I cannot. It is the place of blood! A robbed and wretched brother! 'Tis his blood, by which I am covered! Ay! There! There have I been driven for shelter! Under those very rocks! Oh, that they would open! Cover me, earth! Cover my crimes! Cover my shame! [Falls.]

Enter MICHELLI on the bridge.

Mich. 'Tis a fearful storm! One's very heart shrinks! It makes a poor mortal think of his sins—and his danger.

Rom. [Rises.] Danger! What?—Is it me?

[Listening.]

Mich. [Descending.] Every thunder-clap seems to flash vengeance in his face!

Rom. I am known; or must be!—Shall I yield? or shall I—[Points his pistol at MICHELLI, then shrinks.]—More murder!

Mich. At such terrible times, a clear conscience is better than kingdoms of gold mines.

Rom. [Hesitating whether he shall murder or not.] How to act?

Mich. [Perceiving ROMALDI, who conceals his pistol.] Now, friend.

Rom. Now, miller!

Mich. You look—

Rom. How do I look?

Mich. I—What have you there?

Rom. Where?

Mich. Under your coat.

Rom. [Shewing his hands.] Nothing.

Mich. Something is the matter with you.

Rom. I am tired.

Mich. Come in, then, and rest yourself.

Rom. Thank you! Thank you!

Mich. Whence do you come?

Rom. From—the neighbourhood of Geneva.

Mich. Did you pass through Sallancha?

Rom. Sallancha? Why do you ask?

Mich. You have heard of what has happened?

Rom. Where?

Mich. There! At Sallancha! One Count Romaldi—

Rom. What of him?

Mich. Do you know him?

Rom. I—How should a poor—

Mich. Justice is at his heels. He has escaped; but he'll be taken. The executioner will have him! At least I hope so.

Rom. Ay?

Mich. As sure as you are here.

Rom. [Aside.] All men hate me! Why should I spare him?

Mich. I saved the good Francisco.

Rom. You? Was it you?

Mich. I.

Rom. Then—live.

Mich. Live?

Rom. To be rewarded.

Mich. I'd have done the same for you.

Rom. Live—live!

Mich. I will, my friend, as long as I can; and when I die, I'll die with an honest heart.

Rom. Miserable wretch!

Mich. Who?

Rom. That Count Romaldi.

Mich. Why ay!—Unless he is a devil, he is miserable indeed. He'll be taken; for, look, yonder are the archers. [They cross the bridge.]

Rom. What then? Where is Romaldi?

Mich. How should I know?

Rom. [Aside.] Does he dissemble? They are here! I am lost! [Retires.]

Enter Archers.

Mich. Good day, worthy sirs.

Exempt. Honest miller, good day. We are in search of Count Romaldi, whom we are to take, dead or alive. Do you know his person?

Mich. No.

Rom. Thanks, merciful heaven!

Exempt. [Reads.] "Five feet eight, &c., with a large scar on the back of the right hand."

Rom. [Thrusting his hand in his bosom.] 'Twill betray me!

Exempt. 'Twas a bite! The wretch Malvoglio has deposited that good Francisco is the brother of the vile Romaldi.

Mich. How!

Exempt. And that Francisco, tho' robbed, betrayed and mutilated, has endured every misery, and lived in continual dread of steel or poison, rather than bring this monster to the scaffold.

Mich. But, he'll come there at last!

Exempt. We are told, he is among these mountains.

Mich. Oh, could I catch him by the collar!

Exempt. Should you meet him, beware: he's not unarmed.

Mich. There is no passing for him or you by this valley after the storm, the mountain torrents are falling. You must go back.

Exempt. Many thanks. We must lose no time.

Mich. Success to you. Exeunt Archers.

Rom. Death! Infamy! Is there no escaping?

Mich. The day declines, and you look—

Rom. How?

Mich. Um—I wish you looked better. Come in; pass the evening here: recover your strength and spirits.

Rom. [Holding out his hand.] You are a worthy man.

Mich. I wish to be. [Feeling ROMALDI's hand, after shaking.] Zounds! What? Hey?

Rom. A scar—

Mich. On the back of the right hand!

Rom. I have served. A hussar with his sabre gave the cut.

Mich. Humph! it may be.

Rom. It is.

Mich. At least it may be; and the innocent—

Rom. Ay! might suffer for the guilty.

Mich. Rather than that—I will run all risks. I am alone; my family is at the fair, and cannot be home to-night. But you are a stranger; you want protection—

Rom. I do indeed!

Mich. You shall have it. Come. Never shall my door be shut against the houseless wretch.

[Exit into house.]

[FRANCISCO and SELINA approach the bridge, he points to the Miller's house. She testifies joy, and admiration of the Miller. They descend, he carefully guiding and aiding her. The Miller comes out, sees FRANCISCO, and they run into each other's arms.]

Mich. Welcome! A thousand times welcome!

Sel. Ten thousand thanks to the saviour of my father!

Mich. Your father, sweet lady?

Sel. Oh yes! discovered to me by his mortal enemy.

Mich. The monster Romaldi?

Sel. Alas!

Mich. For your father's sake, for your own sake. welcome both.

Rom. [At the door.] I heard my name!

Mich. [Leading them to the door.] Come. I have a stranger—

Sel. [Seeing ROMALDI.] Ah!

[FRANCISCO falls back, and covers his eyes with agony.]

Mich. How now?

[ROMALDI retires.]

[FRANCISCO putting his hand towards her mouth, enjoins her silence with great eagerness. MICHELLI, by making signs of biting his right hand, asks FRANCISCO if it be ROMALDI. FRANCISCO turns away without answering. MICHELLI denotes his conviction it is ROMALDI, and hastily ascends to cross the bridge in search of the Archers; FRANCISCO entreats him back in vain. ROMALDI enters from the house, presenting his pistol. FRANCISCO opens his breast for him to shoot if he pleases. SELINA falls between them.]

Rom. No! Too much of your blood is upon my head! Be justly revenged: take mine!

[ROMALDI offers the pistol, which FRANCISCO throws to a distance, and entreats him to fly by the valley.—ROMALDI signifies the impossibility, and runs distractedly from side to side; then, after FRANCISCO and SELINA's entreaties, ascends to cross the bridge. Met at the edge of the hill by an Archer, he is driven back; they struggle on the bridge. The Archer's sword taken by ROMALDI; who, again attempting flight, is met by several Archers. ROMALDI maintains a retreating fight. FIAMETTA, BONAMO, STEPHANO, MONTANO, and Peasants follow the Archers. FRANCISCO and SELINA several times throw themselves between the assailants and ROMALDI. When the combatants have descended the hill, ROMALDI's foot slips, he falls, and FRANCISCO intervenes to guard his body. The Archers prepare to shoot and strike with their sabres; when the entreaties and efforts of FRANCISCO and SELINA are renewed. The Archers forbear for a moment, and FRANCISCO shields his body.]

Sel. Oh, forbear! Let my father's virtues plead for my uncle's errors!

Bona. We all will entreat for mercy; since of mercy we all have need: for his sake, and for our own, may it be freely granted!

ACT I.

SCENE I.—*A Room in the Palace of Harancour.—
A whole-length portrait of a boy hangs in the centre of the room.*

Enter DUPRE and PIERRE.

Dup. Don't you be so inquisitive.

Pie. Don't you be so surly.

Dup. I won't be tormented.

Pie. Come, come, Dupré; fellow-servants should be communicative, and tell one another everything that passes in the family.

Dup. And, if they did, woe betide some families.
Pie. Dupré, what is the meaning of all this mystery?

Dup. Why do you nail your eyes on me thus? I won't be wormed and sifted. What is it you want to pick out of me?

Pie. I want to know the meaning of your private interviews with my master's father: admitted to his closet, doors locked, cautionings—whisperings. Take care, take care; I have my suspicions.

Dup. Suspicions! of what?

Pie. Of no good, I promise you.

Dup. Why, what do you suspect?

Pie. To be plain with you, that you are aiding and abetting your old master to make his son, my young master, miserable: in short, you are making a match for him with the first President's daughter, against his will.

Dup. Oh! is that all you know?

Pie. All! and isn't that enough?

Dup. Yes—no; I could almost wish the whole world knew—Ah! [Looking at the portrait.]

Pie. Knew what? How you fix your eyes on that—

Dup. Do I?

Pie. Yes; you never pass through the room without pausing on that portrait.

Dup. Not half an hour ago, I saw him start from his frame, and stand before me.

Pie. What do you mean? Are you crazy?

Dup. I believe, it was only a dream. Perhaps he lives.

Pie. Lives! what lives? Why, look, man, 'tis but a picture.

Enter DARLEMONT.

Dar. How now? What are you doing?

Pie. Only looking at this picture, sir.

Dar. That picture! and why are you looking at it?

Pie. By Dupré's account, it ought to be a miracle; he says, he saw it start from its frame, and stand before him.

Dar. Fellow!

Pie. Why, didn't you say so, Dupré?

Dar. Begone! [Exit PIERRE.] Are you mad, Dupré?

Dup. Almost, I am.

Dar. How dare you hint at what must be eternally concealed?

Dup. Dare? The sinner dreads no tyrant but his own conscience.

Dar. Let that portrait be removed.

Dup. No, that it never shall be.

Dar. Ha!

Dup. Frown on: there it shall remain, and daily haunt us.

Dar. Again this insolence? Remember, villain, that you are my slave.

Dup. I do; and I remember, too, that you are mine: accomplices in guilt are, of necessity, the slaves of each other.

Dar. I must contain myself. [Aside.] I see, I see, Dupré, that neither my gifts, nor my promises, have satisfied you; however, I have been thinking of you: leave me. You will soon find that you are not forgotten.

Dup. I wish I were; but you and I can never be forgotten; even in the grave we shall be remembered, only to be cursed, despised, and hated. [Exit.]

Dar. Must I hold wealth, reputation, nay, life itself, perhaps, at the disposal of this dotard? His slave! While he spoke it, audacious as the reptile toad, he dared to fix his brazen eyes upon me. Let him accuse. Am I not Darlemont, possessor of the fortune and the power of Harancour? Where is the man who will venture to support his accusation?

Re-enter PIERRE.

Besides, my son's marriage with the President's daughter will, I hope—Why are you loitering there?

Pie. Sir, I am only waiting till my master comes in.

Dar. What, is he abroad so early? Something disturbs him.

Pie. Yes, sir; indeed, something or other seems to disturb every soul in the house. [Going.]

Dar. What's that you say? Come hither, Pierre; you know the deference due to your master's father; be faithful, and you shall profit by it. I must have no prying—mark me, no babbling; talk not of me, nor my affairs. As for Dupré, at times, you see, he raves; he has lost his senses; he grows old.

Pie. In your service, sir.

Dar. And, therefore, what would be punished in another, I overlook in him. Pay no regard to his wanderings, except, observe me, should you think them extraordinary, to inform me of them;—me alone, no other, not even my son; I have my reasons; which are not for you to inquire into. Obey me, and depend on my bounty. [Exit.]

Pie. Your bounty? Humph! that may be well enough; but the devil take your pride. A few years ago, this grand signior was but a petty merchant; and now—

Enter ST. ALME.

St. A. Was not that my father?

Pie. Yes, sir; you seem as much ruffled as he was.

St. A. My soul is on the rack; yet, I am resolved: this hated marriage never can, never shall take place. No; never, never will I renounce thee, my lovely Marianne!

Pie. Then, sir, you must renounce your father's favour and fortune.

St. A. Unfeeling prejudice! Is she not the daughter of a man, whose memory is honoured and beloved? The sister of a man of virtue and of talents—of Franval, the most renowned advocate of Toulouse?

Pie. True, sir; but his talents are the only dependence of her and her mother.

St. A. While my father was but a merchant, he would have thought himself honoured by my marriage with the daughter of the Seneschal Franval; but, since he has inherited the estates of his nephew and ward, the unhappy Count of Harancour, his nature seems changed; and he now listens only to the dictates of his ambition.

Pie. Ah! the old servants of the family often talk of the young Count of Harancour; they say, he had the misfortune to be deaf and dumb.

St. A. 'Tis true, he had. Poor boy! my father took him to Paris about eight years ago, in hopes that this affliction might be removed; and, whether improper medicines were administered to him, or that his constitution sunk under the efforts for his cure, I know not; but there, in a short time, he died in the arms of Dupré, who accompanied my father on this journey.

Pie. That's the secret; now I no longer wonder, that I so often catch Dupré gazing on that picture of the young Count.

St. A. Do you? 'Tis only natural in him: this youth was the last remaining branch of an illustrious family, which Dupré had long faithfully served. My poor Julio! He once saved my life; how bravely he exposed himself for me! Never, never will his image quit my heart. I see him at the moment of his departure; dumb as he was, his form spoke moving eloquence; every look was so affectionate, every action so expressive! Dear, dear, lamented Julio! he crushed me into his very heart, as if he had foreknown, and would have told me, that that embrace was to be our last. Ah! were he now alive, I should enjoy his tender and endearing friendship; and my father, less opulent, would not then oppose my union with Marianne.

Pie. But you say, sir, you have never yet told this lady that you love her; how, then, do you know what her thoughts of you may be?

St. A. I cannot mistake them: our mutual tremours when we meet; my faltering voice, her downcast eyes; and other thousand, thousand delicious proofs of sympathizing thoughts.

Pie. You know best, sir; but, for my part, I should wish for more substantial proofs; besides, her mother—

St. A. Born of a noble family, is, if possible, more haughty than my father; but her son has a complete empire over her affections: he is my friend; he cannot but have discovered that I love his sister; and, as our intimacy daily strengthens, I must presume that he approves my pretensions.

Dom. [Without.] I'll just deliver my message myself.

Pie. Hush! here comes their gossiping footman, old Dominique. Now, sir, if you wish to know the lady's real sentiments, only let me set his tongue running, and he will tell you, in his own chuckling, talkative way, all that he sees and hears.

Enter DOMINIQUE.

Ha! Good morning, friend Dominique. What brings you to our house?

Dom. Good day, good day, friend! So, sir! [To St. ALME.] you're an early stirrer. Ha, ha, ha, ha! I saw you just now, I saw you; ha, ha, ha!

St. A. Saw me?

Dom. Yes, I did; pacing backwards and forwards, under my young lady's window; ha, ha, ha!

St. A. I was only taking the morning air, I do assure you, Dominique.

Dom. Ha, ha, ha!

Pie. Ha, ha, ha! What do you mean, Dominique?

Dom. Why, that I'd take the morning air myself, old as I am, if I hoped to see a young, blooming, lovely—ha, ha, ha!—But, no, fast as a church; she was up till two o'clock this morning practising the song that somebody made on her recovery.—Ha, ha, ha! and at last went to bed, I dare say, only to dream of the author—ha, ha, ha!

St. A. Your frankness and good humour forbid dissimulation; yes, Dominique, I adore your charming mistress.

Pie. Ay, that he does; the more's his misfortune.

Dom. Misfortune! and pray, sir, why so?

Pie. Because I can see very well, and so do you too, Dominique, that your young lady does not care a straw for my master.

Dom. You can see it, can you? Lord! what a clear-sighted wiseacre thou art! Ha, ha, ha!

St. A. Why, Dominique, do you believe she loves me?

Dom. No, I don't believe it; I know it. Why, there was, in the first place—

St. A. Ay, Dominique—

Pie. Let him go on, sir. Well, but let us hear what proofs?

Dom. Proofs! a thousand. Why, when she was recovering from her last illness, and I told her how you had called to inquire after her—"Did he come himself, Dominique?" says she—"and did he come often?" "Every minute in the day, ma'am," says I. "And did he look concerned?" "Ma'am," says I, "he looked charmingly: his eyes were as red as a ferret's; his cheeks as white as a sheet; he looked like a perfect ghost; a sweet lover-like figure, indeed, ma'am." "I think I'm better," says she, "Dominique: I'm a great deal better: I'm sure I shall soon be well." Ha, ha, ha! true love is your best doctor.

Pie. O, lord! and is this all you know?

Dom. No, sir; it is not all I know, nor half I know. She gave me such a scolding about you, to'other day!

St. A. About me?

Dom. Yes; she was painting away at her little desk, and took no notice of my coming in, to put the room to rights; so I crept softly on tip-toe towards her; and, peeping over her shoulder,—I love to detect the sly rogues—what should I behold, but the picture of a young gentleman.

St. A. What young gentleman?

Pie. Yes; what young gentleman?

Dom. What young gentleman? "How like it is!" says I, pop, at once, without thinking of it. "Like!" says she, starting up—"Like whom? Do you think it is like my brother?" "Your brother! Like a certain person, called Captain St. Alme, to be sure!" "St. Alme?" says she, pouting, and vexed a little—"I desire, Dominique,"—you know her way—"I desire you won't say any such thing; I beg and desire you won't." And away she went, blushing as red as a rose, but all the while hiding somebody carefully in her bosom; ha, ha, ha! But, Lord, I stand chattering here—

St. A. Thank you, thank you, Dominique; you have made me happy beyond measure.

Dom. I knew I should. Doesn't care a straw for my master! Ha, ha, ha! I knew very well I should make you happy: I love to make people happy, and to be happy myself. But I must not forget my errands. [Takes out a paper.] What with my old mistress, and my young mistress, and my master—[Going.] O, Lord! he sent me here to tell you that he wants to speak with you. Now, don't you blab one word of all this, for your life; these girls have such freaks and vagaries! though they're in love over head and ears, and can't conceal it a moment, yet they expect other folks to be blind, and see nothing at all of the matter. [Going.]

St. A. Pray, say, I'll wait on your master, Dominique.

Dom. To be sure; you'll wait on my master, because you expect to see my young mistress. Ha, ha, ha! O, the turnings and twinings of your true lovers! Yes, yes; she hid the picture in her fair bosom; I warrant, as near as she could to her heart! Ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

St. A. Now, Pierre, is there any cause for doubt?

Pie. I think not, sir.

St. A. And would my father tear me from her? Never! Run to the President's; inquire when I may have the honour of seeing him. [Exit PIERRE.] I'll go to Franval's, avow to him my passion for his sister, and openly declare myself to her in her brother's presence. If I obtain their consents, I'll instantly wait on the President, acquaint him with my love for Marianne, make him refuse me his daughter, and thus, strike at once at the very root of my misfortunes. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Square in the city of Toulouse. On one side the Palace of Harancour, on the other the house of Franval; bridge, church, &c.

Enter THEODORE and DE L'EPEE over the bridge. —THEODORE expresses by signs that he recollects the spot they are in.

De L'E. This warm emotion, this sudden change in all his features, convinces me that he recollects this place. Hadst thou the use of speech! [THEODORE, looking round him, observes a church, and gives signs more expressive of his knowing the place.] It is, it must be so: and am I then at length arrived at the period of my long and painful search? [THEODORE now sees the Palace of Harancour; he starts, rivets his eyes to it, advances a step or two, points to the statues, utters a shriek, and drops breathless into the arms of DE L'EPEE.] Ah, my poor wronged boy, for such I'm sure you are, that sound goes to my very heart! He scarcely breathes! I never saw him so much agitated. There, there! Come, come! Why was a voice denied to sensibility so eloquent? [THEODORE makes signs with the utmost rapidity, that he was born in that palace; that he lived in it when a child; had seen the statues; come through the gate, &c. &c.] Yes; in that house was he born: words could not tell it more plainly. The care of heaven still wakes upon the helpless. [THEODORE makes signs of gratitude to DE L'EPEE, and fervently kisses his hands.] DE L'EPEE explains that it is not to him, but to heaven, that he ought to pay his thanks. THEODORE instantly drops on his knee, and expresses a prayer for blessings on his benefactor. DE L'EPEE, bareheaded, bows. O, thou, who guidest at thy will the thoughts of men; thou, by whom I was inspired to this great undertaking; O, power omnipotent! deign to accept the grateful adoration of thy servant, whom thou hast still protected, and of this speechless orphan, to whom thou hast made me a second father! If I have uprightly discharged my duty; if all my love and labours for him may dare to ask a benediction; vouchsafe to shed its dew on this forlorn one, and let his good be all my great reward! [DE L'EPEE raises THEODORE, and embraces him.] We must proceed with caution, and first, to learn who is the owner of this house. [THEODORE is running to knock at the gate; DE L'EPEE stops him, &c.]

Enter PIERRE.

Pie. Well, that President is the best natured gentleman—

De L'E. O, here comes one that may, perhaps, instruct me. [Signs to THEODORE to attend.] Pray, sir, can you tell me the name of this square?

Pie. [Aside.] Strangers, I perceive. It is called St. George's-square, sir. [Looking at THEODORE.]

De l'E. Thank you, sir. Another word: do you know this superb mansion?

Pie. [Observing DE l'EPEE and THEODORE more closely.] Know it! I think I ought; I have lived here these five years.

De l'E. That's fortunate. And you call it—

Pie. [Aside.] Plaguy inquisitive. A few years ago it was called the Palace of Harancour.

De l'E. Of Harancour?

Pie. But, at present, it belongs to a gentleman of the name of Darlemont. [Observing THEODORE.]

'Tis odd! He seems to talk by signs. Is he dumb?

[During the above dialogue, THEODORE examines the gateway, pillars, arms, &c. of the Palace of Harancour, and explains to DE l'EPEE his recollection of the various objects.]

De l'E. And who is this gentleman of the name of Darlemont?

[THEODORE now turns his face fairly towards PIERRE.]

Pie. 'Gad, how like it is! Sir? Who is he?

De l'E. Yes; I mean, what is his rank, his profession?

Pie. [Still looking at THEODORE.] Profession! He has no profession, sir; he's one of the richest men in Toulouse. [Looking at THEODORE.] One might almost swear it. Your servant, sir; I'm wanted. [Aside.] Very odd, all these questions. [Looking at THEODORE.] The strongest likeness I ever saw in my life. [Exit PIERRE into the Palace.]

De l'E. Ay, my friend; you little know the motive of my questions. There's not a moment to be lost. This house, that once belonged to so distinguished a family; this Darlemont, the present possessor of it; every circumstance relating to it, must be publicly known in Toulouse. I'll instantly away, seek out some lodging, and then—But, for fear it should escape me—[Writes in a note-book.] Harancour—Darlemont. [THEODORE, as DE l'EPEE writes, runs to him with eager curiosity; DE l'EPEE presses him in his arms.] Yes, my poor mute Theodore, if you belong to parents who can feel, no doubt, they still lament your loss; and will, with transport, hail your return:—If, as I fear, you are the victim of unnatural foul play, grant me, Providence, to unmask and confound it! So men shall have another proof, that every fraud will soon or late be detected, and that no crime escapes eternal justice.

[Exit DE l'EPEE, over the bridge, leading THEODORE, who looks back at the Palace of Harancour, &c.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Franval's Library.—A library table, with books, parchments, vase with flowers, &c.

FRANVAL discovered, re-reading.

Fran. I shall never be happy, till I have accomplished this task. To reconcile mistaken friends, is an employment as useful to society, as it is honourable to my profession.

Enter MARIANNE, with a basket of flowers.

Mar. Good morning, brother.

Fran. [Rises.] Good morning, Marianne.

Mar. Late and early, always at your studies.

Fran. The causes which a lawyer is expected to undertake are frequently so disguised, either by the passions, or the arts of men, that, if he is honest, he cannot consider them too attentively.

Mar. Ah! your's must often be a painful employment.

Fran. 'Tis odious, indeed, to witness villainy; but then to justify the innocent, is the noblest and most gratifying duty of man.

Mar. True; it is sweeter to the soul than these flowers to the sense.

[She takes the flowers out of the vase, and puts those which she has brought into their place.]

Fran. Every morning fresh odorous flowers, and a kind kiss from my dear sister. [He kisses her.] My thoughts must be clear and pure. Ah! Marianne, delightful as these gifts are to me, I have a young friend to whom they would be still more precious.

Mar. What do you mean, brother?

Fran. Nay, I would not make you blush. [He leads her forward, and looks steadfastly in her face.] Sister!

Mar. [With a downcast look.] Brother!

Fran. Your presents are sweet; your affections sweeter; yet both want of their true value, while you deny me your confidence.

Mar. Nay!

Fran. Besides, Marianne, you may as well frankly own it; for your heart is too innocent and simple to wear disguise gracefully.

Mar. Pray, forbear!

Fran. And why this hesitation? Do not the noble qualities of St. Alme make him worthy any woman's love?

Mar. I—I—believe they do.

Fran. I won't speak of his person—

Mar. Which is elegance itself.

Fran. I won't speak of his countenance—

Mar. Which is all comeliness and candour.

Fran. But, for his heart and understanding—

Mar. They are excellent and generous, indeed!

Fran. What woman but must be happy with such a husband?

Mar. So I have often thought! [Sighing.]

Fran. In a word, Marianne, he loves you.

Mar. Why do you think so?

Fran. Every look declares it.

Mar. Ah! I'm afraid to trust to looks.

Fran. Are you so? At last, Marianne, you're caught. You own, then, that you love him in return?

Mar. Oh! [Hides her face in his bosom.]

Enter ST. ALME, hastily.

Fran. My friend, you come at a lucky moment. You seem disturbed; is anything the matter?

St. A. Never stood I so much in need of your friendship. [Takes FRANVAL's hand.]

Mar. Heavens!

Fran. Explain yourself.

Mar. I'll leave you. [Going.]

St. A. No; stay a moment—I entreat you, stay. My father, Franval, my father!

Fran. What of him?

St. A. His dreadful menaces still sound in my ears; and wherefore were they uttered? Because I cannot second his ambition. Had he required my blood, my life, I would have given them willingly; but to renounce her I love, the tenderest and first affections of my soul!

Mar. Ah!

St. A. Cruel parents! You cannot look with our eyes; you cannot feel with our hearts! Are we your children, only to become your victims?

Fran. Be calm, and tell me what has passed.

St. A. My father has this morning informed me, that the marriage I have so much dreaded, must take place within these three days. "Three days!" I exclaimed. "No, sir; never, never." This reply, which burst from the very bottom of my wounded heart, roused his displeasure into a rage too violent for all my excuses or prayers to pacify: he insisted on my instantly giving him a reason for my peremptory refusal. Hoping the name of her I adore might disarm his fury, I at once declared, that my affections were irrevocably devoted to—

Fran. To whom? Speak out.

St. A. To your sister.

Mar. Me!

St. A. [Throwing himself at her feet.] Forgive my rashness! Yes, to you; 'tis you alone I love, and ever, ever shall; and, might I hope—

Mar. [Raising him.] What said your father?

St. A. Embarrassed at first, and overpowered with confusion, he acknowledged your worth and beauty; but added, that he had disposed of me elsewhere, and enjoined me to forget you. "Sooner forget to live!" At this, his wrath redoubled: he reprobated my audacious disobedience; threatened me with his malediction; and forbade me ever again to enter his presence, but with repentance and submission.

Mar. Alas!

St. A. My whole frame shuddered while he spoke; yet I felt my heart revolt against this tyranny. Banished the bosom of a father, I come to find refuge in the arms of a friend.

Fran. [Embracing him.] Of a friend, my dear St. Alme, whose first advice to you is to calm this over eager sensibility; and to remember, that a parent is to be respected, even under his mistakes.

St. A. Ah! were the heart of Marianne but mine!

Fran. Of that you are secure.

Mar. O, brother!

St. A. Am I so blessed? Am I, indeed?

Fran. And why disseemble what will alleviate his sufferings? [To MARIANNE.]

Mar. And why reveal what may increase our misery?

St. A. O, no; since that I am blessed, obstinate and stern as my father is, I shall subdue, I shall soften his inflexibility; and he will hereafter rejoice in the happiness of his children. But I forget: I must away.

Fran. Whither are you hurrying?

St. A. To the President's; I cannot now tell you more. We shall have every thing to hope, if I can prevail on him to countenance my project. I shall—I will! Secure of thy heart, my lovely Marianne, what can I not perform? [Exit.]

Fran. St. Alme! My friend! Hear me one moment.

Mar. I tremble, lest his ardent temper should precipitate him into—

Enter DOMINIQUE, with books under his arm.

Dom. Sir, your mother desires to know whether you choose to have breakfast in your study.

Fran. By all means; as she pleases.

Mar. You have not been to pay her your respects this morning. [DOMINIQUE lays the books on the desk, and places a breakfast table, chairs, &c.

Fran. Come, let us wait on her. Cheer up, Marianne; all will go well yet.

Mar. You are very good, brother. But, you should not have told.

[Exeunt FRANVAL and MARIANNE.]

Dom. I'm tired to death already. I verily believe, I have walked five miles this morning. Let me see that I have done all my errands though, or Madame Franval will be telling me I begin to grow old, and good for nothing. [Looks over a paper.] "Cards of invitation to the Prior and the Countess of—;" both delivered. "Books from the library;" there they are. "Go to the lawyer, and desire him to stop proceedings against the poor officer, the money being ready to discharge the debt;" paid by my good master to save an unfortunate family from prison. Ha, ha, ha! O, stop! Ah! "And as I return, to leave six crowns with—" sent by my young mistress, Marianne, to the widow of the late porter of the palace of Harancour—That's because she's a favourite of Captain St. Alme's. How the poor soul did bless and pray for her lovely benefactress! Ha, ha, ha! I am tired; but it's a pleasure to go on such errands. Ha, ha, ha! They're coming. [Exit, and returns with the breakfast, which he places on the table, and exit.]

Enter Madame FRANVAL, leaning on FRANVAL's arm, and MARIANNE.

Mad. F. Yes, my son, there are few families in Toulouse, more ancient than our's; and though but an advocate, I trust that you will shew yourself worthy of the name of Franval.

Fran. My employment, madam, is an honour to all who exercise it properly. [They sit; MARIANNE prepares the breakfast.]

Mad. F. The office of seneschal had been, I may say, for ages held by your ancestors; at the death of your father, I was obliged to sell it, and the degradation cuts me to the soul.

Fran. Yet, madam, this very circumstance has stimulated me to attain by my own talents that consideration in the world, for which I should otherwise, in all probability, have stood indebted merely to accident and prejudice.

Enter DOMINIQUE.

Dom. A letter for you, madam. [Gives Madame FRANVAL a letter.] The servant waits for an answer.

Mad. F. Have you been on those messages?

Dom. Yes, madam.

Mad. F. [Reading.] "Darlemont!" What occasion can Darlemont have to write to me?

Fran. Darlemont!

Mad. F. [Reads.] "Madam, I take the freedom of addressing myself to you, in claim of the most sacred rights"—[To DOMINIQUE.] You may leave us. [Exit DOMINIQUE.] [Reads.] "Sacred rights of a father." What does he mean? [Reads.] "Rights of a father: my son loves your daughter." Indeed! [Reads.] "I met him this moment, and he assures me that his love is returned." [They all rise.]

Fran. Go on, madam; I beseech you, go on.

Mad. F. [Reads.] "Be assured their union never can take place." Ha, ha, ha! No, sir; be assured their union never can take place.

Mar. What will become of me?

Mad. F. [Reads.] "I therefore trust you will forbid him your house; and no longer encourage him to contemn and brave the authority of a father."

DARLEMONT.' Encourage! I encourage! Insupportable insolence!

Fran. Be calm, I beg you, madam.

Mad. F. Who told this petty trader, this gentleman of yesterday, that I should dream of an alliance with his mushroom family? What! have his riches made him forget the disparity of our births? Daughter, I cannot believe this of you. I hope, son Franval, after such an insult, you will no longer honour this St. Alme with your notice. As for the father, should he ever—Yes, he shall have an answer. [Sits down to write.]

Enter DOMINIQUE.

Dom. Sir, a stranger desires to speak with you.

Fran. A stranger?

Dom. Yes, sir; a very good-looking gentleman desires to see you; I believe he's a clergyman.

Fran. Desire him to walk in. [Exit DOMINIQUE.]

Mad. F. [Reading the letter with vexation.] "Their union never can take place." Ha, ha, ha!

Mar. My dreams of happiness are ended.

Fran. Madam, the gentleman comes: if you please, we'll consider the letter another time.

Mad. F. [Rising.] No; I won't honour him with an answer at all.

Enter the ABBE DE L'EPÉE and DOMINIQUE.

Dom. Walk in, sir; pray walk in. [Exit.]

De l'E. [Salutes the ladies, then FRANVAL.] I presume, sir, you are Monsieur Franval?

Fran. At your service.

De l'E. Could you favour me with a few moments' conversation?

Fran. Very willingly. May I take the liberty of asking who—

De l'E. I am from Paris; my name is De l'Epée.

Fran. De l'Epée! The instructor of the deaf and dumb? [De L'EPÉE bows.] Madam—sister—you see before you one who is an honour to human nature.

De l'E. Sir! [Bows. The ladies salute De L'EPÉE.]

Fran. How often have I admired you as the dispenser of the most valuable gifts of heaven!

De l'E. Then have I been fortunate, indeed, in applying myself to you.

Fran. How can I serve you?

De l'E. By aiding me to redress the injured. Your high reputation, sir, has brought me hither, in order to communicate to you an affair of the utmost importance.

Mad. F. Daughter, we'll retire.

De l'E. If you have time to listen, ladies, pray stay. It is my earnest wish to interest every virtuous and feeling heart in the cause I have undertaken.

Mad. F. If we have your leave, sir.

Fran. Be seated, pray sir. [They sit.]

De l'E. Perhaps you will think my story tedious; yet I must be particular.

Mar. How interesting an appearance! [Aside.]

Fran. Pray, proceed.

De l'E. This, then, is my business. About eight years ago, a boy, deaf and dumb, found in the dead of night on the Pont Neuf, was brought to me by an officer of the police. From the meanness of his dress, I supposed him of poor parents, and undertook to educate and provide for him.

Fran. As I know you have done for many others.

De l'E. I soon remarked an uncommon intelligence in his eyes; a well-mannered ease and assurance in his behaviour; and, above all, a strange and sorrowful surprise in his looks, whenever he examined the coarseness of his cloathing. In a word, the more I saw, the more I was convinced, that he had been purposely lost in the streets. I gave a public, full, minute description of the unhappy foundling; but in vain. Few will claim interest in the unfortunate.

Fran. Ah! few indeed!

De l'E. Placed among my scholars, he profited so well by my lessons, that he was, at last, able to converse with me by signs, rapid almost as thought itself. One day, as we were passing the high court of justice, a judge alighted from his carriage. The sight gave Theodore (for so I called him) an emotion, violent and instant. The tears ran down his cheeks in torrents, while he explained to me, that, when a child, a man who often wore similar robes of purple and ermine had been accustomed to caress, and take him in his arms. Observe: another time, a grand funeral passed us in the streets; I watched the various changes in his colour, and learned that he had himself, long ago, followed the coffin of the very person, by whom he had been thus fondly caressed. I could not be mistaken. I concluded, that he was probably the orphan heir of some chief magistrate, purposely turned adrift in a strange and populous city; defrauded, robbed, and even fortunate enough, to have escaped with life.

Mar. Poor youth!

De l'E. These strong presumptions redoubled all my hope and zeal. Theodore grew every day more and more interesting. He confirmed to me many circumstances of his story. Yet, how proceed in his behalf? He had never heard his father's name, he neither knew his family, nor the place of his birth. Well, sir, some months ago, as we went through the Barriere d'Enfer, observing a carriage stopped and examined, the recollection suddenly struck him, that this was the very gate through which he entered Paris, and that the chaise, in which he travelled with two persons, whom he well remembered, had, in this very spot, been thus visited. I see—I see it in your eyes—you anticipate my firm persuasion, that he came from some city in the south of France, of which, in all likelihood, his father had been the chief magistrate.

Fran. For heaven's sake, sir, go on!

De l'E. Finding all my researches ineffectual, I resolved at last to take my pupil with me, and traverse, in person, and on foot, the whole of the south of France. We embraced each other, invoked the protection of heaven, and set forward. After a journey, long, fatiguing, almost hopeless, we this morning, blessed be the Divine Providence! arrived at the gates of Toulouse.

Fran. Good heavens!

De l'E. He knew the place, he seized my hand, uttered wild cries of joy, and led me quickly, here and there, through various quarters of the city. At length, we arrived at this square; he stopped, pointed to the mansion opposite your door, shrieked, and senseless dropped into my arms.

Fran. The palace of Harancourt?

De l'E. Yes; and from the inquiries I have already made, I am convinced that my boy is the lawful heir of that family; and that his inheritance has been seized by his guardian and maternal uncle—Darlemont.

Mad. F. I don't doubt it. O, the wretch! [She rises.]

De l'E. To you, sir, I have been directed; to your talents; to your virtue; and to you, in the names of justice and humanity, I now address myself for aid. Earth, heaven, and all the blessings it can promise, will second my petition. O, let the voice of irresistible truth be raised in his behalf! Let not a noble orphan, denied the precious bounties of nature, and quickened by these privations into ten-fold sensibility—let him not, I conjure you, let him not fall the victim of the ambitious and the base.

Fran. Sir, could I have listened to a tale like this unmoved, I were unworthy the form and name of man. [To Mad. F.] If ever I were truly proud of my profession, madam, it is at this moment, when I am called upon to assault the powerful, and defend the helpless. [To DE L'E.] Sir, the faculties of life, body, and soul, while I possess them, shall be employed to serve him.

Mad F. Thank heaven! I shall see him reduced to his original insignificance at last.

Mar. Ah! poor St. Alme! Brother—

Fran. I don't forget St. Alme. Sir, I must now acquaint you, that this Darlemont is the father of my dearest friend. Delicacy, duty, require me to try persuasion, gentleness, and every milder method; should these fail with him, I shall be driven to expose his guilt, and publicly compel him to restore the rights which, I have cause to fear, he has so unaturally usurped. Where is your pupil?

De l'E. I left him at our lodgings; and his anxiety, no doubt, makes my absence seem long.

Fran. Dear sir, why didn't you bring him with you?

Mar. How impatient I am to see him!

Fran. Let me beg that you will use us like old friends, and accept apartments here.

De l'E. I am afraid—

Mad. F. Not, I hope, to do us pleasure and an honour?

De l'E. It is impossible to resist such goodness. Madam, I obey. [DE L'EEPE and FRANVAL talk together.]

Mad. F. Come, Marianne, we'll go and prepare for our young guest. Yes, yes, you shall have an answer; my son shall be your correspondent. Come, Marianne. [Exit.]

Mar. Brother, remember your friend. Your servant, sir. [To DE L'EEPE.] [Exit.]

Fran. Yes, sir; we shall have great difficulties to encounter in our way: the wealth and influence of Darlemont are formidable; his temper daring, haughty, and obstinate. Yet, in the First President, we have so upright and wise a judge to hear us, that, if truth and justice are on our side, our triumph is certain.

De l'E. I rely entirely on you. Let the result of our inquiry be what it may, to have done my duty, will be my consolation; and to have known you, sir, my recompense. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same Room in the Palace of Harancour.

Enter DARLEMONT, followed by PHILIPPE and ETIENNE, to whom he gives his hat and cane, and they retire.

Dar. My life is one continued scene of terror and disappointment. This undutiful, this headstrong boy! to refuse the match I had provided for him!

Thus to thwart my long-laboured plan for our security! But let the rebel dread the consequence of his disobedience.

Enter PIERRE.

Now, sir, where is your master?

Pie. I don't know, sir; but, indeed, I am very much afraid—

Dar. Afraid! Of what? Speak.

Pie. That he'll soon lose his senses, poor gentleman!

Dar. Blockhead!

Pie. He had such a wild look, when you turned away from him in the street just now. Do, good sir, pardon my boldness; do take this wedding into a little consideration.

Dar. Silence! Who were they you were chattering with so busily in the square, about an hour ago?

Pie. In the square? O! they were strangers.

Dar. How came they to examine and point at this house so often?

Pie. I don't know, sir; but one of them asked me whose that fine house was, and I said it had been the palace of Harancour.

Dar. You said?

Pie. Yes, sir; but that now it belonged to—

Dar. Babbling dunce!

Pie. I beg your pardon, sir; if I had been a babbler, I should have staid with them; but, no; I got away as fast as I could, that they might ask me no questions about you, sir.

Dar. About me! And why should you fear any questions being asked about me?

Pie. I'm sure, I don't know, sir.

Dar. Don't know! Tell me this moment, who put that thought into your head?

Pie. Upon my life, sir, you frighten me out of my wits! Why, sir, it was—

Dar. Who, who was it?

Pie. It was you yourself, sir, who ordered me not to talk of you, nor your affairs, to any body.

Dar. Well; and pray, what passed between them?

Pie. They kept that to themselves. They seemed to me to talk by signs.

Dar. By signs! Why talk by signs?

Pie. I can't tell, sir; only I guess that the young gentleman was dumb.

Dar. Dumb?

Pie. He surely was; at least I thought so.

Dar. Dumb! 'tis false.

Pie. No, indeed; you'll find it true, I believe, sir. Dar. Impossible. Was it the youth, do you say, that was dumb?

Pie. Yes, sir, the boy; and I was the more sorry for him somehow, because he is so very like—

Dar. Like whom?

Pie. So very like that picture of the young Count. And so—

Dar. And so! And what so? Officious fool! isn't the boy dead?

Pie. So I have heard, sir.

Dar. Heard, reptile! Do you dare to doubt, sir?

Pie. I, sir? No. Only this morning Dupré said that, perhaps, he was still alive.

Dar. When did he say so?

Pie. While we were looking at the picture.

Dar. Flames devour the picture! [Aside.] Let that picture be removed into my apartment.

Pie. Yes, sir. So I thought, if it should happen to be him, it might turn out to be a lucky discovery.

My master, thinks I—

Dar. Go; send them to remove that picture.

Pie. Yes, sir. It's very odd, all this. [Exit.]

Dar. Here I am countermined again. That picture I had painted at the moment of my departure, in order to impress an opinion of my affection for this boy, and so prevent suspicion. My very precautions work towards my detection.—Like the picture!—Dumb! No, no; it can't be. And yet—

Enter DUPRE, with a paper in his hand.

Now, sir; who sent for you? What want you here?

Dup. I come to unburthen a loaded conscience.

Dar. I'm busy; and can't be troubled.

Dup. I come to—[Holding out a letter.]

Dar. Did you hear me? I'm busy.

Dup. Sir, sir, you waste your anger on me: you have laid a crime on my soul, that annihilates the duties and distance of my calling: I cast off the servant, and assume the man.

Dar. What is it you mean by this insolence?

Dup. First, sir, please to take back the annuity you have sent me.

Dar. [Snatching the paper.] Take back! Is it not yet sufficient? I thought it beyond your hopes. Your conscience knows its price.

Dup. No, sir; you wrong me; 'twas when I had no conscience that I had a price.

Dar. Liar! You come to practise on me. You tattle! Gossip of sworn secrets! Perjuror—Go—point, and pretend to start at pictures—pernicious dotard! Conscience! 'tis false! No; 'tis to wring my purse, you act remorse, and feign this pity for a thing who, say the best, was but an idiot—an automaton.

Dup. Of me, sir, think what you will; I have deserved it; but in behalf of that injured youth, I must retort the falsehood.

Dar. You?

Dup. I.—Though speech and hearing were denied him, yet nature recompensed him with a mind that glowed with intelligence, and a heart that ran over with benevolence. And you, sir—is your heart so deadened by the injuries you have done him, that you forget it was this idiot saved the life of that most excellent young man, your only son? Did not Julio—regardless of danger to himself, and thoughtful only for St. Aline—when the fierce wolf had fastened on his throat, did he not bravely rend asunder his bloody jaws, receiving in his own arm a wound, so deep and dangerous, that the scar could never be effaced?

Dar. Silence, I charge you!

Dup. When I call to mind his infancy, his pretty looks, his fond kisses when I have borne him in my arms—and think how I yielded, weak and wicked as I was, to your temptations, and abandoned him to perish—poor helpless babe!—in a wide unpitied world—I could call for curses on my head, proclaim my guilt, and take delight in the abhorrence and punishment, with which men enraged, and the just laws, would pursue me to destruction!

Dar. Hence, raving visionary! The serpent that stung the friend that fostered him, paid with his life the forfeit of his ingratitude. [Puts his hand on his sword.] Coward, beware! Shall my honour stand in danger from your treachery?

Dup. Treachery has never entered my mind. Julio is gone, and the crime cannot be repaired; yet, the sincere repentance of a servant might claim respect from that master, who, after a blameless life of forty years, had seduced him to villainy.

Dar. Villainy!

Dup. My part was impious villainy: what yours was—ask of the vexing thoughts that nightly take watch on the pillow of the wicked.

Dar. Urge me no further. Lectured by my slave!—a worm that crawls at the mercy of my foot! Because I have forborne, presume thou that I dare not strike? Hence! Here, take thy recompense: [Offering him the paper.] be thankful, and obedient; guard thy lips, or—

Dup. No; vile as you think me, my silence is not to be bought; my silence shall not be pensioned. Hitherto you are safe. Don't let your insult drive me to disclose you.

Dar. Here, here; and have done. [Offering him the paper.]

Dup. You are deceived. I was bribed, not by your gold, but by the wild vanity of sharing your confidence, your familiarity; and becoming, instead of him you call your slave, your friend.

Dar. Such you might have been.

Dup. No: there can be no friendship in guilt—'tis my doom to live in dread of you, and of my own reflections—'tis your's, to know that your honour and life are in the keeping of a man stung in conscience, distracted in mind; and by yourself rendered a wretch, infamous, and never more to be trusted. [Exit.]

Dar. Indeed! Do you grow so fast on us? Prevention or treachery—his life or mine. And shall I hesitate? A single blow will give me peace. Whither am I going? Peace! No, no, 'tis false: peace dwells only with innocence: yet to be led—exposed—a public malefactor—help heaven! shield me from the frenzy of these thoughts! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Franval's Study, as before.

Enter MARIANNE.

Mar. Where can Dominique loiter all this while? When I told him, too, how anxiously I should wait for his return! My dear father valued his honest simplicity of heart: and he has lived among us so long, and so familiarly indulged, that he treats me with as little ceremony, as if he were guiding me in my leading-strings again. Ah! poor fellow! here he comes, quite out of breath. I beg his pardon—

Enter DOMINIQUE.

Well, my good, dear Dominique, have you seen St. Aline?

Dom. I was coming to tell you, ma'am. No, ma'am, he has not been at home since.

Mar. Unlucky! Never did I wish so earnestly to see him.

Dom. Lord, Lord, what a pity! Where is he? Where can he be? Ha, ha, ha! If he did but know how you are fretting about him, he'd fly on the wings of love—

Mar. I had forgot—Did you go to the poor widow?

Dom. Yes, true, ma'am; and gave her your present. Ha, ha! poor Claudine! she kissed the crowns because they had touched your hand; and blessed your sweet name a thousand and a thousand times.

Mar. Surely, you did not tell her that it came from me?

Dom. Lord, ma'am! I couldn't help it. To be sure, nobody, though I say it myself, can keep a secret better than I can; but, then—ha, ha! poor soul!—she begged, and prayed, and laughed, and cried: ha, ha! I reckon she'll be here in a minute to thank you.

Mar. I can't see her, Dominique. I'm too much disturbed. I'm not—It was very wrong, indeed.

Dom. Well, then, she sha'n't come. And yet, why should you be so ashamed of doing good? I'm sure, virtue should have somebody to shew it a little countenance now-a-days. Ah, poor Claudine! times are sadly changed with her since her good man, Blaise, was porter at the palace of Harancour. She wanted for nothing then. Ah! when Count Julio died, his uncle, Darlemont, turned away all the old servants; and, but for the charity of his son, I believe some of them might have starved, poor things! He has been very good to Claudine, too, and would have done more, but for fear of his father

Mar. Yes; the father is unlike the son.

Dom. Unlike! The one is as proud as the—and the other as mild as a May morning. O, he'd make an admirable master for one, he would: an excellent head of a family; and, above all, a most charming spouse. Don't you think so, ma'am?

Mar. Yes; I believe the woman of his choice—

Dom. That's done. His choice is made.

Mar. I've heard he's to be married to the great heiress, the President's daughter.

Dom. So have I.

Mar. Have you?

Dom. Yes. Ha, ha, ha! But he won't have her.

Mar. Dominique!

Dom. Lord, ma'am! you know very well, he loves somebody else.

Mar. [Agitated.] Are the apartments ready for our two guests?

Dom. I can do that in a minute, ma'am. Yes, yes, he—

Mar. Go, go; make haste; they are expected instantly. Go.

Dom. Well, well, I'm gone. [Aside.] No, never can make her own it. Ah! you cunning little hypocrite! Ha, ha! a girl in love is for all the world like the moon in a cloudy night; now out, now in: this moment clear as the day; and the next you're all in the dark again. [Exit.]

Mar. One would think that this old man took a pleasure in tormenting me. If this scholar of De l'Épée's should prove to be Count Julio, and recover the possessions he has been deprived of, St. Alme would then be only the equal of my fortune, and his father no longer, perhaps, see any distance between us. Ah! flattering Hope, you are too forward.

SONG.

(Written by M. G. Lewis, Esq.)

What, tho' Fate forbids me offer
Golden gifts from Fortune's store;
All I have to Love I proffer,
Fortune cannot offer more.

What, tho' bright the jewell'd treasure
Which Peruvian mines supply;
Brighter still the tear of pleasure
Sparkling in Affection's eye.

Hymen, in his power for ever,
Firm the god of hearts would hold;
Binding oft—ah, vain endeavour!
Love with Interest's chains of gold.

Soon their weight his strength o'erpowers;
Soon they crush the petty elf;
Love can bear no chains but flowers,
Light and blooming like himself.

Ah, me! Why is St. Alme out of the way? He must be prepared for this discovery—and yet, my mother!—Should Darlemont be softened, will she consent?

Enter Mad. FRANVAL and FRANVAL.

Mad. F. Don't tell me, son; don't tell me. This is my opinion: to hesitate to deliver up this usurper to the vengeance of the laws—to wink at such enormities—is to become an accomplice in them.

Fran. You will allow us first to prove them on him, madam. Besides, can I forget, that he is the father of my friend? [Mad. F. turns away in great displeasure.] Has Dominique been to St. Alme?

[To MARIANNE.]

Mar. Yes; but he hadn't been at home.

Mad. F. And to tell you my opinion further, son—after this letter, I very much disapprove of that young man's visits here.

Fran. Ought we to make him responsible for his father's faults?

Mar. Which he is so far from sharing, that he will devote his life to atone them. [Mad. FRANVAL gives her a look of disapprobation.] One need only look in his face, to be sure of it.

Mad. F. Oh! had the Seneschal been living now!

Fran. If only Darlemont were concerned, madam, I should, without regret, tear away his specious visor, and expose him bare-faced; such, however, are the prejudices of the world, that I cannot publish the guilt of the parent without reflecting the disgrace of his actions on his blameless son.

Mad. F. What, then, he is to escape after all?

Fran. Here's somebody coming. My dear madam—

Mar. Good mother—

Mad. F. Nay, nay—

Enter DE L'ÉPÉE, introducing THEODORE.

De l'E. In obedience to your kind commands, I present to you my adopted child, my Theodore. This, sir, is the orphan, whose story you have heard, and whose wrongs you will redress.

[THEODORE, having saluted them with great vivacity, fixes his eyes on FRANVAL.]

Mar. How intelligent and animated a look!

Mad. F. The perfect image of his late father!

De l'E. Do you say so, madam?

Mad. F. I see his father in him, at his age, as if he stood before me.

[THEODORE, to whom DE L'ÉPÉE is attentive, points to FRANVAL; lays the fore-finger of his right hand on his forehead, and assumes an expression of genius; then darts his arm forward with force, grandeur, &c.]

De l'E. Ay! he tells me, that he reads in your countenance the certainty of triumphing, and confounding his oppressor.

Fran. Yes; I have given him my promise, and will perform it.

[THEODORE having touched his lips with a look of regret, seizes the hand of FRANVAL; holds it to his heart; and, with his other hand, beats quickly and often on the bosom of FRANVAL.]

De l'E. Ah! that he could speak his gratitude! But, by the throbbings of his heart, he bids you learn, that your goodness to him will live there for ever. These are his true expressions.

Fran. Are you then so perfectly comprehensible to each other?

Mad. F. Are your signs so minutely accurate?

De l'E. As speech itself.

Mar. And does he understand everything you desire to express?

De l'E. You shall have proof of it this moment.

[DE L'ÉPÉE taps THEODORE on the shoulder, to make him observe, rubs his forehead, then points to MARIANNE, and writes a line or two with his finger on the palm of his hand. THEODORE nods to DE L'EPEE; runs to the table, sits down, snatches up a pen, and shews that he is ready to write.] Now, madam, make what inquiry you please of him, he will copy it down from my action, and immediately give you his reply. He waits for you.

Mar. I really don't know what to—

Fran. Anything—anything.

Mad. F. Ay, ay, child; the first thing that comes into your head.

Mar. [After a moment's reflection.] In your opinion,—

De l'E. Speak slowly, and repeat the question, as if you were dictating to him yourself.

[THEODORE expresses that he attends to DE L'EPEE's signs.

Mar. In your opinion—

[DE L'E. makes a sign, THEO. writes.

Mar. Who is the greatest genius—

[DE L'E. makes a sign, THEO. writes.

Mar. That France has ever produced?

De l'E. [Makes a sign, THEO. writes.—Takes the paper from the table, and shews it to FRANVAL.] You see he has written the question distinctly.

[Returns the paper to THEO., who for a moment meditates.

Mar. He seems a little at a loss.

De l'E. I don't wonder at it; it's a delicate question.

[THEODORE starts from his reverie, looks affectionately at DE L'EPEE, wipes his eyes, and writes with the utmost rapidity.

Fran. Look, look! what fire sparkles in his eyes! What animation in every turn! I dare promise you, this will be the answer of a feeling heart, and an enlightened mind.

[THEODORE starts up; presents the paper to MARIANNE, and desires her to read it to the company. Mad. FRANVAL and FRANVAL look over MARIANNE as she reads; THEODORE runs to DE L'EPEE, and looks at him with fond curiosity.

Mar. [Reads.] "In your opinion, who is the greatest genius that France has ever produced?"

Mad. F. Ay; what does he say to that?

Mar. [Reads.] "Science would decide for D'Alembert, and Nature say, Buffon; Wit and Taste present Voltaire; and Sentiment pleads for Rousseau; but Genius and Humanity cry out for De l'Epée; and him I call the best and greatest of human creatures."

[MARIANNE drops the paper, and retires to a chair in tears. THEODORE throws himself into DE L'EPEE's arms. Mad. FRANVAL and FRANVAL look at each other in astonishment.

De l'E. [With an emotion which he strives to repress.] You must excuse him; 'tis a great mistake; but a very, very pardonable one.

Fran. [Takes up the paper, and examines it.] I can hardly credit what I see.

Mad. F. What do you think of this Darlemont now?

[THEODORE and Mad. FRANVAL go to MARIANNE.

Fran. This decision discovers an extent of acquirements, and shews a purity of taste, that—[To DE L'E.] What study, what pains, must it have cost you to accomplish such effects!

De l'E. To tell you what it has cost me, were impossible; but the bare thought of prompting to the forgetfulness of nature; of calling forth the faculties of mind; this one persuasion gives strength, courage, and perseverance, to accomplish miracles. If the laborious husbandman, when he views a rich harvest waving over the lands he has fertilized, experiences a pleasure proportioned to his toils; judge what are my sensations when, surrounded by my pupils, I watch them gradually emerging from the night that overshadows them, and see them dazzled at the widening dawn of opening Deity, till the full blaze of perfect intellect informs their souls to hope and adoration. This is to new-create our brethren. What transport to bring man acquainted with himself! Enjoyments, I own, there may be, more splendid, more alluring; but I am sure that, in the wide round of our capacities, none will be found more true.

Fran. They are the just reward of such benevolence; and if my efforts—

Dom. [Without.] Come back, come back! I tell you, Claudine, you can't see her.

Clau. [Without.] I tell you I must and will see her, if I search the whole house after her.

Enter CLAUDINE, followed by DOMINIQUE.

Clau. [To Mad. F.] I beg pardon for being so bold—

Dom. [To MAR.] She slipped by, the back way, and got the start of me.

[THEODORE, on the entrance of CLAUDINE, appears struck with recollection of her; then falls in the most lively agitation; and signifies to DE L'EPEE that she was wife to the porter of the house he lived in, and had been his nurse. DE L'EPEE answers him in signs of surprise and joy.

Clau. [To FRANVAL.] Sir, I beg pardon; yet, when the heart is full—This dear young lady has been so good. [Kisses MARIANNE's hand.

Mad. F. What does all this mean, Marianne?

Mar. [Hesitating.] Madam—

Clau. Sweet saint! She blushes to speak her own good deeds. Ah! madam, this angel of a girl heard I was in distress, and has been for a long time my benefactress; I never knew what charitable hand was stretched to me, till this morning Dominique told me—

Dom. No, I didn't tell you; you coaxed it out of me. Come away, come away; you're a rare one to keep a secret! [Signs to her to be gone.

De l'E. Good woman! good woman!

Clau. Me, sir?

De l'E. You lived formerly in the palace of Harancour?

Clau. My husband was porter there nine-and-twenty years.

De l'E. Do you remember young Count Julio, your late master's son?

Clau. Remember him? I had him in my arms the very hour he was born. My lady died in childhood; I was his nurse—his mother, begging your pardon, I may say; and a sweet babe he was. I shall never forget him. His death was a hard pinch to us all. [Weeping.

[THEODORE gazes on her in great agitation. De l'E. [Takes THEODORE by the hand.] Did you ever see his face?

Clau. [Starting.] Merciful goodness! why sure—[THEODORE flings back the hair from his forehead, &c.

Clau. It is, it is he! it is young Count Juho himself!

[THEODORE, as she runs to him, and is falling at his feet, prevents, and kisses her.

Dom. Ha, ha! and there I had like not to have let her in.

De l'E. Providential encounter!

Fran. This may lead to other proofs.

Mad. F. And confound the insolent Darlemont. Now, son!

Clau. If my poor Blaise were but alive! But where has he been?—the dear boy! where has he—

De l'E. Hush! recollect yourself: are you so thoroughly convinced, that this is Julio of Harancour, that you dare solemnly attest it—

Clau. To the whole world; to men and angels; earth and heaven.

Fran. Can't you immediately, without letting them know what has passed, bring hither some others of the servants, who knew Count Julio in his infancy?

Clau. To be sure; there's the coachman's widow living still: and there's—

Dom. Ay, so there is; and there's Denys the groom besides, and his old wife; they don't live far off.

Mad. F. Fetch them this moment; fetch them all.

Dom. Come along, Claudine; come along.

[Going.

Fran. And—not a word, for your lives.

Dom. Oh! I know better than to chatter about what doesn't concern me. Long live Count Julio!

Fran. Dominique—

Dom. Oh! come along, Claudine.

[Exit DOMINIQUE and CLAUDINE.

Mad. F. There, there! make haste, make haste!

Mar. My dear madam, if they should discover—

Mad. F. Daughter, daughter, he must be punished for his ambition; his insolence must be humbled. Son, we'll leave you together. Come, we'll shew the Count of Harancour his apartment.

[Signs to THEODORE to go with her; he takes her hand. Exit Mad. FRANVAL, very ceremoniously; THEODORE nodding to DE L'EVEE; and MARIANNE, with an imploring look at FRANVAL.

Fran. I have already told you, the friendship that binds me to St. Alme imposes on me the duty of proceeding by the gentlest steps. I now propose, that we present ourselves at the palace of Harancour; there, jointly, and in private, we may attack this Darlemont; you, with the energy so good a cause inspires; and I, with all the terror of the laws. He must be more hardened and audacious than I think him, if he can withstand us.

De l'E. I agree: and a thought this instant strikes me, which, if he is not quite a monster, must insure our success.

[Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Room in the Palace of Harancour: the picture being removed.

Enter DARLEMONT and PIERRE.

Dar. Go and inquire immediately. [Exit PIERRE.] Vain, groundless apprehensions, leave me! what an absurd propensity there is in man to be his own tormentor: to conjure up the wildest visions; to fancy the most frightful accidents; and shake the more, the more preposterous the terrors are which his imagination creates!

Re-enter PIERRE.

Pie. Sir, my master is not come in yet.

Dar. I suppose he's at Franval's, then.

Pie. No, sir, he's not; they sent here just now to inquire for him.

Dar. [Aside.] My son opposing all my wishes; my servant ready to betray me; whom can I trust in? my ambition is my curse; the moment I attained its object, my plague began. Where is Dupré?

Pie. Shut up in his own room.

Dar. Is anybody with him?

Pie. No, sir; I saw him go in alone, and heard the door lock.

[Going

Dar. Well, Pierre, have you seen anything more of these—

Pie. What, the strangers, sir?

Dar. So very like the—No, nothing. You may go. [Exit PIERRE.] Dumb! Like the picture! Should he be still alive; should some infernal accident have returned him hither. Well, how will he prove his story? His death is registered; that testimony no evidence but Dupré's can now invalidate; and him, too, I might set at defiance, and be at rest for ever, could I but link my interest to the President's by this marriage with his daughter: that would place me beyond the result of danger.

Enter St. ALME, who stands at a distance, as if not daring to approach his father.

I am on the rack, till it is accomplished.

St. A. Am I permitted, sir,—

Dar. Who's there?

St. A. I was told, sir, you wished to see me.

Dar. I do; and let me warn you, sir, that unless you come resolved to shew a proper sense of duty to your father, you have heard that wish for the last time. Tell me, where have you been all this morning?

St. A. My father, it is not in my nature to dissemble with you.—I come from the President's.

Dar. Ha! What was your business there, and without me?

St. A. To lay open my whole soul before him; to acquaint him from my own lips with my engagements to Marianne. [DARLEMONT starts.] Pardon me, sir. O, think how resistless must be the power that over-masters me, since it could hurry me to make this declaration, even at the risk of your displeasure!

Dar. [Stifling his rage.] Well, sir; what was his answer?

St. A. Noble, kind, and like himself. He gently told me, it would have been the pride of his heart, and the comfort of his declining years, to have seen me happy with his daughter; but that the choice I had made did me honour—

Dar. [Gradually giving way to his fury.] How!

St. A. And that the ties by which I was engaged to so worthy an object must be indissoluble.

Dar. [Bursting out.] Parricide! You have undone me. Vain, empty schemes of human foresight! I possess myself of my ne—of a vast inheritance: I devote it to your advancement; employ it to ally you with the most powerful and wealthy family in Languedoc; and, when I have succeeded in removing every prejudice, every obstacle, you dare to make a mockery of my solicitudes, and audaciously reject power, rank, fortune, for the interested attractions of a beggar, the seductive arts of a—

St. A. O, no; that she has fixed me her's, and her's alone, 'tis true: but, sir, 'twas without artifices, as it was without design. Her enchanting loveliness, my father—her innocence, if possible, still more lovely: these are the seductions, these the arts, this virtuous girl has practised on me.

Dar. [Bursting into tears.] Short-sighted, foolish parents! for thankless children, thus to plunge yourselves in guilt and danger.

St. A. O, sir! [Affectionately.] Surely, you are in no danger?

Dar. [Resolutely.] No! I don't know that I am. Yet, should the world once suspect—

St. A. Who can live fairer in the opinion of the world?

Dar. He who lives fair in his own mind.

St. A. For heaven's sake, sir! what labours in your bosom?

Dar. O, misery! to think I have a son, and want a friend!

St. A. You rend my heart with these doubts. Honour me as a friend; shew me how I may serve my father; and let man and heaven renounce me, if I forget the duty of a son!

Dar. Do you speak this from your soul? May I depend on you?

St. A. Can it be a question, sir?

Dar. Then return to the President—

St. A. Ha!

Dar. Retrieve the mischief; apologise, plead, obtain his daughter.

St. A. Sir!

Dar. If you have the affection of a son—if you value the safety, life, and honour of your father—go.

St. A. Your agitation terrifies me. Tell me, I conjure you, tell me the cause of it.

Dar. Impossible! Think, 'tis no trivial cause that could induce me to plead by dark hints for a son's obedience.

St. A. Speak, sir; O, speak!

Dar. It is not to be told. Nothing but the support of rank, wealth, office, can secure me: the gulph of ruin gapes at my feet. I call on my son; him to whom I have given life; for whom I have risked life, infamy, and perdition. I once more call on him; save me, or never see me more. [Exit.]

St. A. Such guilt! Such danger! Can this be real? Impossible! 'Tis but a cruel artifice to extort my consent to this hated marriage. Unkind father! thus with suborned emotions, to practise on the affections of a son, who would die for you.

Enter PIERRE.

Pie. Sir, the porter says, Dominique was here just now in a great hurry to ask for you.

St. A. I come. Yes, Franval; my friend; my brother! Your advice and assistance are the only reliance left me. [Exit.]

Pie. And now for a little chat with Dupré about this picture. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Franval's Study.

Enter Mad. FRANVAL, MARIANNE, DE L'ÉPÉE, and FRANVAL, with a paper in his hand.

Mad. F. Bless my soul! Where can they be? No news of these witnesses yet?

De l'E. We must have patience, madam.

Mad. F. This Dominique is so slow!

Fran. [To DE L'ÉPÉE.] How severe is the duty you have imposed on me! Must I present the accusation of the father of St. Alme? My heart bleeds at the thought!

De l'E. Would he had been less criminal, and Theodore less injured!

Mad. F. No, no; his punishment cannot be too sudden, nor too public.

Fran. Think of his virtuous son:

Mar. Who, innocent of his crimes, would share in his disgrace.

De l'E. Besides, madam, we must remember that he still is my poor boy's uncle; his mother's brother.

Mad. F. How the Count of Harancour could stoop to marry into such a family; and then, to make this wretch his eventual heir!

De l'E. Integrity and honour, it may be, governed his life, till this temptation overpowered him; at least, under that persuasion, madam, I would first try, whether he may not still be reclaimable by lenient means.

Fran. On that I am fixed.

Mad. F. Remember, I tell you, he'll treat all your sentiments, and your lenient means, with contempt.

Enter ST. ALME, dejected.

Fran. Then, madam—St. Alme! I wished to see you. [Talks apart with ST. ALME.

De l'E. [To MARIANNE.] Is this his son?

Mar. Yes, sir.

Mad. F. Daughter!

[Exit Mad. F., looking disdainfully at ST. A.

Mar. [To DE L'E.] O, sir, speak with him; acquaint yourself with the virtues of his heart, then ask your own, whether ignominy be his desert!

[Exit in tears.]

Fran. [To DE L'E.] My friend requests a moment's conversation.

De l'E. Honour and persuasion sit on his brow; trust him at once; his father will never be able to resist him.

Fran. You judge him by yourself.

De l'E. Try everything. Theodore shall know that his cousin is here. [Exit.]

Fran. St. Alme, why are your looks so sad?

St. A. My distresses double every moment, and are inexplicable. The stern reserve, in which my father has so long wrapped himself, is suddenly changed to terrors that distract him.

Fran. [Aside.] Indeed!

St. A. The horror of his thoughts seems agonizing. To me he appeals for safety; yet mysteriously hides from me the cause of his alarm: by the sacred names of son and friend; with prayers, with tears, and solemn warnings, I am adjured to shield a father from perdition.

Fran. [Aside.] Surely he cannot have heard— [To ST. ALME.] What are the means?

St. A. The means? The sacrifice of friendship, happiness, and love. O, heaven, can this be just? And yet, he is my father.

Fran. Ay, would he were not!

St. A. Hold, hold, Franval! If you are my friend, no wish like that.

Fran. I am your friend: and have an office to discharge, that might better suit your bitterest enemy.

St. A. No word against my father; or, here for ever—

Fran. Be calm, and hear me. You had a cousin, Julio, Count of Harancour?

St. A. You know I had.

Fran. St. Alme, I cannot proceed; I cannot tell you; yet you must know it, for all your sakes.

St. A. Speak out at once.

Fran. I want the courage to reveal it.

St. A. Speak; what of Julio?

Fran. You loved him.

St. A. Dearly as my own life.

Fran. You would not see him wronged.

St. A. What mean you? Wronged! Who wrongs him? 'Tis eight years and more, since Julio died in Paris.

Fran. Ay, in the report of guilt.

St. A. Sir, in the report of Darlemont. Wronged! He died in Paris.

Fran. No, no.

St. A. Whither would these dark insinuations tend? Merciful heaven! add not to my miseries, that of hating the brother of Marianne! Julio—

Fran. Is still alive.

St. A. Franval! you are deceived; the attestation of his death is in my father's hands. Dupré was present in his last moments, and is a surviving witness to it.

Fran. Indeed! Then let your own eyes judge between us. Look, who comes here. Darlemont declares Count Julio dead; I, Franval, present him living. There—

Enter DE L'ÉPÉE and THEODORE.

St. A. All gracious heaven! Do my eyes deceive me? Risen from the dead! It is, it is—[THEODORE, after they have gazed a moment on each other, utters a shriek of joy, and rushes into ST. ALME's arms.

De l'É. No, you are not deceived. He calls you friend; he speaks to you in smiles and tears, the language of the heart—his only language.

St. A. Can this be real? I know not yet. Speechless! it must, it must be he—my long lost, dear, lamented Julio! And yet, stand off awhile, and let me gaze till I have satisfied my doubts.

[THEODORE affected at ST. ALME's putting him away, hastily recollects himself, bares his right arm, and points to the scar upon it. ST. ALME bursting into tears, runs to him, and kisses the scar.

St. A. That scar!

De l'É. O, nature, nature, how resistless is thy eloquence!

Fran. St. Alme, compose yourself; I shudder for the final close of this discovery.

St. A. It is, it is my Julio. Friend! companion! preserver of my life! I'm lost in joy and wonder. To whom are we indebted for this strange blessing?

Fran. To him; to the benevolence of De l'Épée.

St. A. De l'Épée! has Julio been an object of your generous pity? O, sir, I cannot thank you. [Kisses DE L'ÉPÉE's hand.] Come, come, my dear Julio; [To DE L'ÉPÉE.] my father's gratitude shall bless you; how will he rejoice at this event! Let us haste to him; he has been much altered since your loss; your presence shall dispel all gloom, and his heart dance with transport to behold you.

Fran. Hold, hold, one moment.

Mad. F. [Within.] Come in, come in, Dupré; he is here—it's all true.

Fran. Dupré!

[Looking at ST. ALME.

Dup. [Within.] Where is he? Let me see him, let me see him.

Enter Mad. FRANVAL and DUPRE.

Fran. How has he learned—

Dup. No; Pierre was not mistaken. O, Julio, Julio!

[Throws himself at THEODORE's feet.

Mad. F. We expect the other servants every moment.

St. A. All overjoyed to hear of his return.

THEODORE instantly recollects DUPRE, shrinks from him, and explains to DE L'ÉPÉE who he is.

Dup. Now I have seen him once again, let me but ask forgiveness, and expire at his feet.

De l'É. [To ST. A.] This man seems strangely agitated.

St. A. Forgiveness! What does he mean? He was his favourite servant, and attended Julio, when my father carried him to Paris.

Dup. [Starting up.] Yes, I am that ungrateful viper; that villain who became the accomplice of an act—He lives, however, and I can now substantiate the truth. Drag me away; I am ready. Deliver me and my seducer to the just punishment of our crimes.

De l'É. You went with him to Paris about eight years ago?

Dup. Yes, yes—with Darlemont, with Darlemont!

St. A. With Darlemont! What then?

Fran. St. Alme! St. Alme!

St. A. Rack me not thus, but speak.

Dup. I must; and may my true confession and remorse find acceptance there [Pointing to heaven.] towards the remission of my guilt.
